The Brill Dictionary of Religion

Edited by Kocku von Stuckrad

IV
S-Z

The Brill Dictionary of Religion

The Brill Dictionary of Religion

Edited by Kocku von Stuckrad

Revised edition of Metzler Lexikon Religion edited by Christoph Auffarth, Jutta Bernard and Hubert Mohr Translated from the German by Robert R. Barr

Volume I

A-D

BRILL Leiden · Boston 2006

This book is printed on acid-free paper.

Dustjacket design and photography by Celine Ostendorf and Ivo Romein.

Original German language edition: Metzler Lexikon Religion, vol. 1-4. Stuttgart, Germany. Copyright © J. B. Metzlersche Verlagsbuchhandlung und Carl Ernst Poeschel Verlag 2000.
Vol. 1 published 1999 as: Metzler Lexikon Religion. Gegenwart – Alltag – Medien. Band 1: Abendmahl – Guru. Herausgegeben von Christoph Auffarth, Jutta Bernard, Hubert Mohr, unter Mitarbeit von Agnes Imhof und Silvia Kurre. Stuttgart · Weimar, 1999. ISBN 3-476-01551-3.
Vol. 2 published 1999 as: Metzler Lexikon Religion. Gegenwart – Alltag – Medien. Band 2: Haar – Osho-Bewegung. Herausgegeben von Christoph Auffarth, Jutta Bernard, Hubert Mohr, unter Mitarbeit von Agnes Imhof und Silvia Kurre. Stuttgart · Weimar, 1999. ISBN 3-476-01552-1.
Vol. 3 published 2000 as: Metzler Lexikon Religion. Gegenwart – Alltag – Medien. Band 3: Paganismus – Zombie. Herausgegeben von Christoph Auffarth, Jutta Bernard, Hubert Mohr, unter Mitarbeit von Agnes Imhof und Silvia Kurre. Stuttgart · Weimar, 2000. ISBN 3-476-01553-X.
Vol. 4 published 2002 as: Metzler Lexikon Religion. Gegenwart – Alltag – Medien. Band 4: Text- und Bildquellen, Filmographie, Zeittafeln, Gesamtregister. Herausgegeben von Christoph Auffarth und Hubert Mohr, unter Mitarbeit von Benita von Behr, Jutta Bernard und Kirsten Holzapfel. Stuttgart · Weimar, 2002. ISBN 3-476-01554-8.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication-data
LC Control Number

ISBN (Vol. 1): 90 04 12429 2
ISBN (Vol. 2): 90 04 12430 6
ISBN (Vol. 3): 90 04 12431 4
ISBN (Vol. 4): 90 04 12432 2
ISBN (Set): 90 04 12433 0

Printed in The Netherlands

CONTENTS

PREFACE: THE CONCEPTUAL FRAMEWORK OF THE BRILL DICTIONARY OF RELIGION

1. Religion in the Twenty-First Century

The End of Religion?

Well into the twentieth century, it has been the expectation of the majority of scholars that religions will sooner or later disappear from the modern world. Scholars based their expectation on the assumption that in the wake of the eighteenth-century Enlightenment the rational and scientific worldview would ultimately lead to a decline of religious truth-claims. We have been told that in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the rise of modern science, the separation of church and state, industrialization, and individualization have led to an inescapable secularization and a disenchantment of the world. In these scenarios, Europe was regarded as the 'normal case,' representing a development that sooner or later would seize the rest of the world.

Much to the surprise of sociologists and scholars of religion, the last thirty years have witnessed a remarkable revival of religious truth-claims. Religions entered the public spheres and became strong identity markers both for individuals and for communities. In the name of religious traditions people raised political claims and interpreted history with reference to an ongoing global apocalyptic scenario, to a struggle between 'good' and 'bad,' or to the conviction that the project of 'modernity' has utterly failed. Often, these claims went hand in hand with violent action or even terrorism.

Scholars of religion have responded to this surprising development by adjusting their older models of interpretation. Some scholars talked of a mere 'misuse' of religion for political goals or of a 'patchwork religion,' in which 'postmodern' individuals 'syncretistically' build their own private religion. 'Religion' was now located in individual biographies, rather than in larger communities. Notions of 'desecularization' or 'reenchantment' were introduced in order to integrate the (still surprising) existence of religions in the modern world. Recently, scholars have begun to regard Europe as the 'exceptional case,' while the persistence of religious worldviews in the United States, in South America, Africa, or Asia is viewed as the 'normal case.'

Beyond Exorcism

All these models of interpretation, interesting as they are, render an impression of helpless attempts at coping with a changing world. Therefore, new strategies of interpretation have been put forward, strategies that reflect on—and often undermine—the basic assumptions and concepts of the older models. As a result of the 'cultural turn' that affected both the humanities and, to a lesser extent, the natural sciences, scholars today focus on the rhetorics of academic interpretation. For example, from a meta-theoretical point of view the notions of 'Enlightenment' and 'modernity' are themselves ideological programs that rest heavily on religiously inclined ideas of progress and salvation; depicting terrorism and violence as a 'misuse' of religion reflects a theological idea of 'pure religion' that is essentially peaceful and tolerant. Critical scholars argue that in a discourse of sui generis religion phenomena that are thought to threaten or disturb 'modern' identities are exorcised and banned with the help of academic models of interpretation: they are expelled to the realm of 'magic,' 'superstition,' 'folk belief,' 'commodification,' 'political exploitation,' 'brain washing,' and so on.

Religion in Public Discourse

We can conclude that today the academic study of religion has lost its innocence (see also the 'Introduction' by Christoph Auffarth and Hubert Mohr). Scholars are themselves part of an ongoing cultural discourse of identity, which means that if they apply concepts and models of interpretation, they constantly have to be aware of the underlying biases that shape these models. On the one hand, this is an uncomfortable situation. On the other hand, this self-reflection opens up a new understanding of historical and social research into something called 'religion.' The combination of meta-theoretical analysis and serious historical and sociological work has turned the academic study of religion into a modern discipline that finds its place in the concert of cultural studies. Two consequences are particularly relevant here. First, after the demise of the sui generis approach to religion, scholars scrutinize 'religion' as a powerful element of public discourse that shapes identities by way of communication and interaction. From being a signifier of inner beliefs and sanctified traditions, 'religion' is turned into an everyday phenomenon that is capable of providing groups and individuals with meaningful interpretations of their places in time and space. Second, this understanding of religion fosters an interdisciplinary cross-fertilization. Locating religions in public spheres and communicational processes calls for the collaboration of many disciplines, among them history, sociology, anthropology, psychology, philosophy, theology, political sciences, literary studies, art, law, and parts of the natural sciences.

2. The Brill Dictionary of Religion

The Brill Dictionary of Religion explicitly reflects the transformation that the academic study of religion has undergone within the last twenty years. It is not by chance that all the catchwords mentioned above—Modernity, Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Secularization, Identity, Industrial Society, Money, but also Terrorism and Violence—are addressed with individual entries. The rationale that underlies the selection of entries and their respective presentation is aimed at reflecting the many aspects of religious fields of discourse in modern societies. To succeed in this endeavor, two perspectives have to be combined: First, the public and communicative aspects of religion have to be addressed explicitly; entries such as 'Media,' 'Perception,' 'Collective Representations,' or 'Everyday Life' are examples of this attempt. The large number of illustrations, sometimes tracing religion in unexpected places, likewise underscores this rationale. Second, the historical dimension is of crucial importance, because a proper understanding of modern religious discourses is impossible without knowledge of the past and a comparison with different periods and contexts. That is why the reader will also find historical overviews both of concepts and of religious traditions.

Thematic Fields

As an overall structure, the entries are organized in six thematic fields: (1) the human being (body, life cycle, perception, sexuality, psyche, emotions, illness and health, death and dying); (2) the individual and the group (socialization, family and genealogy, everyday life, work, violence); (3) environment, society, culture (nature/environment, media, collective representations, identity, society, government, politics, the 'other,' law, economy, science, art, aesthetics); (4) elements of religious systems (religion and critique, ritual, communication, dynamics of groups, belief systems, theologies, myth and mythology, gods and goddesses, meaning and signification, morals and ethics); (5) history of religions (time, calendar, history, individual epochs, religious and philosophical traditions, forms of reception); (6) geography and territoriality of religion (place, migration, pilgrimage, heaven/sky, orientation, specific geographical regions and cities). In addition to these six thematic fields, a group of entries discusses critical terms for the study of religion, such as 'communication,' 'discourse,' 'language,' 'colonialism,' 'gender stereotypes,' 'tradition,' 'memory,' or 'materiality.'

Types of Entries

The thematic fields are made accessible with different kinds of entries. While large entries provide an overview and orientation for the major aspects of all thematic fields, the more specified entries can be distinguished as follows:

- Systematic entries explain basic elements of religion, such as 'sacrifice,' 'purity,' 'trance,' or 'ritual.'
- Historical entries present an overview of important religious and philosophical traditions (with extended time tables); in addition, they historically contextualize elements of religions and provide information of certain details (e.g., 'cemetery,' 'pilgrimage,' 'vegetarianism,' or 'mysticism').
- Focused entries access themes that are of public interest in contemporary societies, sometimes discussed controversially; examples are 'anti-Semitism,' 'fundamentalism,' 'anti-cult movements,' 'suicide,' 'abortion,' or 'genetic engineering.'
- Biographical entries introduce important representatives of religious traditions (Jesus, Muhammad, Hildegard of Bingen, Luther, Gandhi, etc.) and trace their influence, reception, and perhaps mythologization; there are likewise entries to introduce influential figures in the study of religion (Freud, Eliade, Weber).
- Regional entries open up cultural and anthropo-geographical units, such as the 'Indian subcontinent,' 'North America,' 'Africa,' or the 'Mediterranean region' (see the overview of maps).
- Epoch entries provide an overview of certain historical periods, at the same time reflecting on the difficulties involved in constructing these periods (e.g., 'antiquity,' 'Middle Ages,' 'Renaissance,' 'Reformation,' 'modernity,' or 'postmodernity').
- Information entries give brief information on certain historical phenomena and terms, such as 'druid,' 'genius,' 'Hare Krishna,' or 'sphinx.'

The Editor's Role

The Brill Dictionary of Religion is a thoroughly revised version of the German Metzler Lexikon Religion: Gegenwart, Alltag, Medien (4 vols., Stuttgart/Weimar: J. B. Metzler 1999–2002), edited by Christoph Auffarth, Jutta Bernard, and Hubert Mohr. Although I subscribe to the underlying rationale and the approach of the Metzler Lexikon Religion, substantial changes were necessary in order to compile a dictionary for an English-speaking audience. Some of these changes pertain to the dictionary's very structure. More important, however, are changes in the selection of entries, their focus, and their reference section. My overall policy here was to carefully remove the focus on Europe in general and on Germany in particular. Several entries were dropped, while other entries were added. When I had the impression that certain entries did not match international scholarly standards or were superfluous, I found new authors for these entries or left them out.

The edited translations were sent to the respective authors, along with suggestions for changes in the entries' reference section. For various reasons, only a minority of authors responded to these requests, which left me with the delicate task of providing the respective literature myself. On the one hand, the nature and theoretical background of the entries should be reflected in the reference section; on the other hand, the editor is also an advocate of the English-speaking reader and an international audience, which means that he has to make sure that the relevant English literature is mentioned. I hope that my handling of this dilemma works out for the benefit of the reader.

Acknowledgements

Without the smooth collaboration between the editor, the publishing house, the authors, the copy-editor, and colleagues who offered their expertise, this fascinating project would not have materialized in reasonable time. Therefore, I want to express my gratitude to Loes Schouten and the team at Brill who were helpful in every respect and handled the project in a professional way. Gustavo Benavides, who was involved in the first phase of production, helped me considerably with his advice. For the editors of the German dictionary, Hubert Mohr has been understanding and helpful in many ways, for which I am very grateful. Last not least, I want to thank my American copy-editor Matthew D. Rogers who has brought in his erudition and turned the translation into a lucid English text.

Amsterdam, July 2005 — Kocku von Stuckrad

INTRODUCTION: THE ACADEMIC STUDY OF RELIGION—HISTORICAL AND CONTEMPORARY ISSUES*

Christoph Auffarth and Hubert Mohr

By the end of the twentieth century, religion appeared to many people to have fallen into terminal decline, something defeated and soon to be forgotten. However, this view appears to have been quite widespread at the beginning of the twentieth century also. Declining numbers of churchgoers have always been used as an argument for the imminent fall of religion (→ Secularization). Throughout the twentieth century the trend seemed unstoppable, despite a temporary 'rush' on the churches after the collapse of the nationalist regimes and the ensuing attempts to find a new meaning for life in the Christian churches. At the turn of the twenty-first century, however, a completely different situation has arisen: religion has regained its importance—but it is no longer the same religion as that of the beginning of the twentieth century:

- Religion is no longer the religion of the commandments and directives.
- The Christian religion of the churches has become simply one form of religion among others.
- The Christian religion is no longer prescribed by theologians, out of reach of an obedient laity.
- Being a member of a church in what was formerly the 'Christian West' no longer brings with it social advantages or prestige in Europe's public sector.

→ Migration, working abroad, the need to escape from war and poverty, travel and the media, and broad networks of societal connections have brought a multiplicity of religions and cultures into Europe.

(1) These religions are represented by actual persons, all with their own expectations, interests, and peculiarities. Formerly, there had only been a one-way street of European nations going to other cultures and sharing what they thought of as meaningful and civilizing. At times, this 'sharing' was carried out in a disparaging and authoritarian fashion, occasionally it was done in an empathetic or enlightened manner, but it was almost always done without any desire for, or even thought of, reciprocal interaction. This one-way street is gone. Instead, persons, groups, colleagues, refugees, the person with the vegetable stand on the corner—they all stand for the respective 'foreign' religions that they have brought with them 'in their baggage.'

* Introductory remark: The following survey is an attempt to present scientific trends and different schools and styles of research that have either been characteristic of the academic study of religion over the past century or that have recently entered upon the scene but have nevertheless already had an effect on religious research. This is, therefore, a study of the typical and the paradigmatic (which is not to imply that another approach would have been qualitatively inferior, this is simply the approach that we thought to be most rewarding). After every entry can be found a list of relevant literature, which is also indicated in the texts by cross-references.

(2) Religion is no longer present as 'bookish knowledge' in isolation from other 'knowledge.' This is true whether it be received as doctrine from powers in the other world or as the path to happiness or as a matter for exotic and alluring depictions. It is present in the context of its cultural carriers and vehicles—in their language, food, and clothing. Nor does it disappear again: it abides and changes in its foreign environment, alters that environment while forming a visible distinction between its own members and other persons.
(3) In its respective cultural context, religion changes, so that there are no longer simple easily definable 'religions'—like 'Islam' or 'Christianity'—but multiple 'Islams' and 'Christianities' in the form of local or historical units. Two lines converge: a 'great tradition,' such as might be canonized in a 'sacred Scripture' and commented on and expounded upon by the traditional custodians of that tradition. This 'great tradition' can undergo revolutionary changes, through the change of paradigms when the pinnacle of the institution involved 'switches.' Then there is the 'small tradition'—closer to 'real life,' in which one religion competes with others, in the city or in the country, for example, by adopting the attractive elements of a festive procession or by stalwartly opposing them. This 'other' tradition is often tenacious and tends to be observed "as Grandmother remembers."

The altered role of the religions and what we perceive as → religion, is also clearly to be seen in the academic disciplines that research it. The → academic study of religion is a small discipline, producing no history of its own as such, but developing in the context of other, altering disciplines. Like many other sciences, it emerged in the age of imperialism, at the end of the nineteenth century. The 'two cultures' in the sciences, of which we so often hear—the natural sciences and humanities—cover the many academic disciplines that developed around the turn of the century. At the dawn of the twenty-first century, however, it is a characteristic of university research and doctrine that many disciplines are overflowing their bounds, forming themselves into new disciplines alongside the old ones. The 'life sciences' belong to this new type of discipline—biologists, chemists, medical researchers, philosophical and theological ethicists carry out their research together. 'Cultural studies' are another discipline that goes further, beyond the received philologies and historical sciences and including, for instance, law or theology. Below, we attempt to sketch out certain historical aspects of the scholarly investigation of religion, along with important lines of questioning, present and future.

1. The Crisis of Historicism and the Empirical Sciences—Religious Studies and the Legacy of the Nineteenth Century

§1. Anthropology of Religion and Ancient History

Texts and Scriptures

a) Until the beginning of the Renaissance (and, in Judaism, until modernity) the most eminent task of religious → specialists was considered to be that of looking after the transmission of the 'Sacred Scriptures'—transcribing them, to the letter as far as was possible, preserving them, and handing them on. As the humanistic philologists began to busy themselves with the written testimonials of religion, they concentrated first on their concern with the texts of antiquity. But as early as Erasmus's critical edition of the New Testament (Novum Testamentum, in Greek and Latin, Basle, 1516 and frequently thereafter), their concern with the texts of Christian tradition began. Texts to translate, to commentate, to free from later interpolations, were their goal. Ad Fontes (Lat., "[Back] to the Sources") was the humanist motto. The humanists understood their task as being to separate the original from the influences that had had a 'sullying' effect upon the textual testimonies. Concerns over a philologically founded 'original' text, of course, collided, increasingly frequently, with the revelatory character of the 'sacred books.' By the middle of the nineteenth century, as a result of the progress that had been made in methods of scientific analysis, concern for the theology of the texts (and, further, for theology itself) precipitated a crisis. Catholicism categorically forbade this manner of 'subversive' theological work with the 'Oath against Modernism,' which, from September 8, 1907 until 1967, every cleric had to pronounce (Encyclical Pascendi Gregis [Lat., "(Duty) of Pasturing the Flock"]; 1910). Protestant theologians of the Religionsgeschichtliche Schule (Ger., "school of the history of religion"), however, sought to separate theological dogma from research into religious history—hence, the 'split' between faith and knowledge (see §2).

With the natural → sciences, and the world travels of Charles Darwin and Alexander von Humboldt, a new claim for credibility emerged, calling traditional belief fundamentally into question. Soon to be promoted to the status of ideology, the claim was made that one can only believe that which can be observed, in the present, through personal experience. Only what could be grasped as demonstrably and repeatably as a stuffed bird, as a soil sample, as a mathematical conclusion could be real. Everything else is fiction. Here, we witness the birth of the ideology of materialism. The problem was that this was also a fiction—from a scanty amount of findings, a millennial, unitary history was created, sketched out on the basis of limited discoveries with connecting elements that were simply conjectural. Only later did this fiction make room for a more modest self-evaluation of such theories.

Imperialism

b) A further challenge to the formerly prevailing canon of knowledge came from the political sphere. Imperialism confronted European colonial masters with a new empire, against which previously cultivated historical and religious traditions should be measured, with observations from colonial functionaries and missionaries (→ Colonialism). The latter testified to ever new forms of religious faith, and especially, behavior the world over. Religious studies constituted one program in this revolution. Its founder, Friedrich Max Müller, a Saxon in British service, chose the word "science" to describe it, referring to the empirical nature of its research and scholarship. Its model was constituted by British natural scientists, who turned away from natural history to experimental science—to the repeatable experiment. In his search for the source of religion, Müller cataloged and edited humanity's oldest accessible texts, the "Sacred Books of the East," of the Orient that was then British colonial territory (→ Orientalism/Exotism).

Comparative Mythology

c) But, according to Müller, even these books represented a late misunderstanding. This was based on the notion that narrative fiction is simply the account of a reality no longer comprehended: "Myth is ritual misunderstood."

Müller's investigations, founded on linguistic history, led him to a supposed 'oldest stage' of culture and religion. Based on information provided by → language, this stage was supposed to have extended from the Indians to the Teutons: the 'Indo-Germanic' or 'Arian' stage. Their oldest conceptualization of the cosmos, Müller held, rested on the certainty and regularity of the rising sun. Indo-Germans had personalized the sun, 'Father Sky' (in Sanskr., Diaus Pitar; in Gk., Zeus Patér; in Lat., Jupiter). To be sure, such etymologically based reconstructions led promptly to the speculative, and after Müller's death in 1900, the theses of the 'natural mythology school' became scientifically obsolete. Only with French linguistic scientist Georges Dumézil has an attempt been made, in a flood of books since the 1930s, to reconstruct a comparative mythology and idéologie of the Indo-European societies. His guiding notion (that he pursued from 1939 onwards) was that these societies rested on a 'trifunctional' model: farmers—warriors—priests. His trichotomy did not, however, go uncontested, not only because its 'structural' methodology was often difficult to apply: his 'trifunctionality' bore a fatal resemblance to current regressive political 'ideologemes,' the principal one being the social trichotomy of 'nurturing class—defending class—teaching class.'

Myth versus Ritual

d) At the same time, textual experts in the branches of ancient history strove to reach a stratum beyond the text—to reach not only the con-text of that knowledge in terms of literary history, but also its Sitz im Leben, i.e., to the practice of life and ritual out of which texts arise. What experience and social behaviors lie at the foundation of the transmitted texts? This was their methodological question. In spirited intercourse with anthropology, → 'ritual' became a category of explanation. By way of example, according to this schema of interpretation, festivals possess their experiential foundation in their warranty of a goal of action, human fertility, livestock and land. Accordingly, 'fertility cults' and 'agricultural magic' (W. Mannhardt, J. G. Frazer) were to be found everywhere. In the viewpoint of 'ritualists' like Jane E. Harrison, English head of the Cambridge Ritualists, myths were later rationalizations ('etiologies') of existing rites. The 'chicken or the egg' dispute over the precedence of myth or ritual long outlived the turn of the twentieth century. Behind the respective preferences for religious history or systematics, foundationally distinct images of Mediterranean antiquity and its religion(s) lie hidden. One image was that of classical idealism that started out with the literary accounts or gods and heroes (Homer, the tragedies, Virgil), and which fits somewhere between → art religion and essential insight). Another was oriented towards cult, which, in turn, was oriented towards religious anthropology and folklore studies, relying on inscriptions and other archaeological testimonials, and was interested in religious practice. In the eyes of its adversaries, its representatives drew humanistic ideals into the lowlands of African tribal rituals or European agricultural practices. Indisputably, however, from the perspective of comparative cultural anthropology, there arose a continuity of further description, in theoretically stimulating studies like Karl Meulis's attempt to derive the 'Greek sacrificial rituals' from North Eurasian shamanisms. Another study with a similar impact was Walter Burkert's dismal vision of homo necans (Lat., 'slaughtering human being'), whom he supposed to have developed out of the bloody → sacrifice. Burkert also further extended his basis for comparison into primate ethology.

Evolutionism

c) There supervened, as a heuristic premise, → evolutionism. What investigators of folk cultures were observing in the colonies at that time by way of religious customs and usages, had, it was held, long since disappeared in Europe. But they did correspond to a prehistoric period. Humanity's 'childhood' could be documented in extra-European tribal religion, and was functionally equivalent to the 'childhood' of Europe's own 'people,' represented by 'pagan' customs and usages. Surprising outlooks emerged. The prehistoric drama could be unlocked in equivalencies with Southern Italian folk theater; or Roman agricultural cults with an appeal to Pomeranian or Baltic harvest customs (Wilhelm Mannhardt; → Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic). Evolution belongs to the scientific myths of the turn of the twentieth century as do other theories of a scientific culture. The latter, opening the way, laid out ever new stage-models of culture and society, in a tireless quest for a starting point in history and religion (→ Origin) that had no antecedent:

- Totemism proposed symbolic relationships between clans and animals, or species of → animals, as the responsible agent in the shaping of groups and religions (William Robertson Smith, James G. Fraser). Models were supplied by the tribes of the American West Coast, as well as, especially, by the → Aborigines of Central Australia, then being researched by Baldwin Spencer and Francis Gillen.
- → Animism was belief in the 'ensoulment' of nature, and in the emergence of religion from belief in souls and spirits of the dead. Another generative factor was the production of fantasies, and the 'appearances' at hand in dream and vision (Edward B. Tylor).
- "Pre-animistic" manaism (mana theory), or dynamism, a theory that—coupled with, among other things, the Polynesian concept of mana—took belief in impersonal → power and energies to constitute the primordial stage of religiosity (R. R. Marett).

These theories were quickly refuted, in part, or are still in scientific use, if at all, for the purpose of limited ethno-cultural designation. Still, they frequently endure today as 'knowledge' among travel guides, in armchair expeditions taken in front of the television, or among apologists for Christian missions. To an extent, they entered literature (T. S. Eliot, The Wasteland) and popular science—many of Fraser's mythological groceries can be found in the 'new mythology' of 'spiritual feminism' and the Wicca movement (→ Paganism/Neopaganism; New Myths/New Mythologies).

§2. Theology and Religious Studies: Exposition of Texts and Religion in Theology

As mentioned above, investigations into the history of religions developed in theological departments, as well. Foreign religions have always formed a considerable challenge. They are not only complementary, exotic additives. They also challenge, relativize, and pose fundamental questions. Granted, Christian → theology devotes itself to them, as a rule, with a goes-without-saying claim that its own religion is the only true one. With the adoption of the Hebrew Bible into the Christians' sacred Scripture, however, the fundamental challenge emerged that the one sole God was to bestow salvation not only on one people alone. In the crisis of historicism, around 1900, biblical scholars caused a furor, in particular a group at the University of Göttingen that formed a Religionsgeschichtliche Schule (Wilhelm Bousset, 1865–1920; Hermann Gunkel, 1862–1932, etc.)—then discovered that the books of the → Bible formed completely distinct forms of literature from one another, and that every book had been reworked several times and adapted to new situations. In particular, by way of this 'form-historical method,' 'layers' of editing were discovered, for instance, in the Pentateuch, those of the 'Yahwist,' of the 'priestly writings,' with the Prophets that of 'Deutero-Isaiah' as well as the editorial stages of the New Testament Gospels. Here, the Book of Revelation is not God's map of the upcoming trip. Rather, it represents the pamphlet of a Christian resistance group against Roman Emperor Domitian, which can be precisely located historically even if it is disguised as the Babylonian myth of the struggle with the dragon. Sacred Scripture, then—so ran the provocative conclusion of theological historicism of this kind—could not be understood simply as the supra-historical word of God for us today. It must be conceived as a collection of texts, made for and in the times of its emergence, in its contemporary literary forms and different editions. This is its Sitz im Leben, which is decisive, and which must be subjected to historical analysis. Thus goes the prescription of the school of historical criticism.

The Religionsgeschichtliche Schule

The Religionsgeschichtliche Schule was an object of dispute. It was the laity who gave it great attention, especially in the series of publications of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher (Ger., "Volumes in the History of Religion for the Laity"), and the lexicon Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart (Ger., "Religion in History and Today"; the RGG). The second edition of the latter, whose subtitle is Handwörterbuch für Theologie und Religionswissenschaft ("Short Dictionary of Theology and Religious Studies"), 1927–1931, was edited by Hermann Gunkel (who had already collaborated on the first edition, beginning in 1909) and Leopold Zscharnack. Among theologians, the effort immediately arose to transform theological faculties into religious studies departments, which could then no longer be controlled by the Church. Adolf von Harnack (1851–1930), the most important theologian of the German Empire, shook the program with the argument that Christianity contained all of the stages of religion (singular!). "Whoever knows this one—with all of its stages—knows them all." This claim was in opposition to the 'comparativist' maxim of Max Müller, who declared: "Whoever knows only one, knows none!"

A scholarly or scientific theology that made use of historical, philological, and historico-literary criticism in its biblical studies might entail considerable risk for its representatives. In Scotland, which had played the role of an outrider in the development of an independent religious scholarship, theologian and Arabist William Robertson Smith (1846–1894) had to submit to an ecclesiastical 'heresy process.' The Church had found his ethnological comparativism objectionable, with the result that he was dismissed from his professorship in Aberdeen. His thesis of a totemism in the Hebrew Bible was simply too much research. On the Catholic side, theologian and Assyriologist Alfred Loisy (1857–1940) was the target of ecclesiastical criticism for 'methodological modernism' in his theology. Forced to resign his teaching position in Biblical Studies at the Institut Catholique de Paris in 1893, Loisy was excommunicated in 1908, and finally, in 1932, saw his opera omnia placed on the Index of Forbidden Books. With the First World War, any relativization of one's own—German/Christian/Protestant—position was rejected as destructive (see below), and along with it, so were any religious studies of the sort demanded by the historico-religious school. Besides neo-Lutheranism, a new group heavily influenced opinion. This group was denominated 'dialectical theology,' whose representatives—first of all Karl Barth (1996–1968), Rudolf Bultmann, 1884–1976, and Friedrich Gogarten (1887–1967)—evaluated religion as the attempt of human beings to have God at their disposition, bribing and pressuring him through cult and ritual. Only Christianity had not succumbed to this temptation. Christianity was 'without religion.' God did not place himself at human disposition.

'Dialectical Theology'

Despite multiple assaults, a scholarly theological prolongation was established, in the second half of the twentieth century, in both confessions, with historical as well as textual and literary criticism in mind. Its conclusions provided further opportunity for religious studies, as seen especially in research on the Bible, and on primitive and ancient Christian community. Their destiny, granted, is to be compelled to extend and balance the tension between faith and knowledge.

Attempts on the part of today's theologians to establish a dialogue with the other religious communities—Christian and non-Christian alike—concerning the globalization and de-Christianization of Western culture, have updated the question of and demand for a Christian 'theology of religions' (Theo Sundermeier, John Hick). The attempts to which we refer have been mounted at various times—sometimes through the World Council of Churches; sometimes through a review of dogmatic teachings, such as was effected by the Catholic Church during the Second Vatican Council, with its then revolutionary text Lumen Gentium (Lat., "Light of the Nations"); at other times through private initiatives like Catholic theologian Hans Küng's "Project World Ethos" (→ Ethics/Morals). However, this sort of theology can only be an object, not an example nor a method, of religious studies operating in the sense of cultural sciences. Of course, on the other hand, religious scholars such as Friedrich Heiler (1892–1967) themselves sought to discover and organize a 'third way' among the (Christian) confessions, through their teaching activities. Catholic Heiler was a member of the Hochkirchliche Vereinigung Augsburgischen Bekenntnisses (Ger., "High-Church Union of the Augsburg Confession"), and came out as early as 1919 with the ecumenical motto, 'Evangelical Catholicity' (Das Wesen des Katholizismus; Ger., "The Essence of Catholicism"; Munich, 1920), and even consented to his own episcopal ordination—whereby, of course, his official activity became limited to the Castle Church at Marburg.

§3. Action, Experience, and Meaning: Sociology

Early Sociology: The Religions Face the Social Problem

a) A twin dispute signaled the ascent of new sciences. On the one hand, in the clash over experience, the natural sciences demanded conformity with theoretical principles. On the other hand, the humanities disputed the historical singularity and fictional nature of the texts. The new sciences demanded exact descriptions, in order to be able to understand the meaning with which a culture endows itself. Just as the geographer describes, makes mistakes, observes, then discovers—but does not invent—so did the newly appearing 'sociology' of the time around 1900 wish to describe human beings as 'social' or 'societal' beings, and then to investigate them with statistical precision, in order to be able to understand their actions. It is not individual 'great men' who determine world history, as the majority of the historical scholars at the close of the nineteenth century preferred to believe. It is the collective agents of → society, of supra-individual interest groups, organizations, institutions, classes, and sub-classes that create, each of them, their own culture or subculture. In this new discipline, scientific facts were gained by describing what could be experienced, verified, or 'objectified.' Not so unlike geographers' 'landscapes,' society was there to be quantitatively and qualitatively discovered, investigated, and described, not invented or aesthetically interpreted on the grounds of ideas and surmises. A key object of investigation on the part of early sociology, the relationship between religion and → economics, was determined by way of the socio-political 'workers' question.' True, in → Marxism, → socialism, and communism, industrial labor developed an independently and politically organized class-consciousness. This threatened not only middle-class society and economic order, but Christianity itself, as a middle-class or bourgeois religion. It was not only the Christian confessions that responded to this fundamental criticism with newly developed social ethics, but also bourgeois scientists and scholars who developed far-ranging studies on Christian 'social doctrines' (Ernst Troeltsch), or on the social ethics of the 'world religions' (Max → Weber). The socialists, in the footsteps of Karl Marx, saw the driving force of history in economic conditions. But in a countermove, Max Weber (1864–1920) saw the particular direction of the national economy transformed into a cultural sociology—into a 'spirit' (including religion, in its respective culture). This characteristic meaning was then caught up with and overtaken by the autonomous forces of the economy.

The Durkheim School

b) At this point a new concept of 'fact' appears. In many ways, society's action itself creates facts, which can form the basis of decision for future actions. French sociologist Émile Durkheim (1858–1917) calls these created facts 'social facts' (in Fr., faits sociaux). Whether the present is perceived as a crisis is a social question that does not depend directly on the success or failure of market turnover at the time in question. In → modernity, it is not religion alone that creates the sense and meaning of social life. Rather, religion is a part of the social bestowal of meaning, both guiding and being guided.

c) Important as his questioning was to religion, Weber had no successor among his colleagues. Durkheim, on the other hand, founded an influential school in France. Among his students were, in particular, Marcel Mauss (1872–1950) and Maurice Halbwachs (1877–1945). Recent German sociology (along with that country's historical and religious research) has re-imported Weber from the United States. There, others advanced and developed his ideas, especially Talcott Parsons, in whose hands Weber's standpoints were remodeled.

Sociology of Knowledge

d) New impulses were given primarily by sociological investigations of the differently assembled structures of religious organizations and developments in the United States. As Thomas Luckmann (b. 1927) and Peter L. Berger (b. 1929) broadened Alfred Schütz's (1899–1959) concept of Lebenswelt (the environment in which one "lives one's life") to a social and religious theory of a sociology of knowledge, they communicated a further drive to the sociology of religion. It was with the help of philosophical approaches borrowed from Henri Bergson and Edmund Husserl that Schütz deepened Max Weber's 'sociology that understands' to the level of a 'structural analysis of the social world,' building on the attraction—and thus on the social interaction—of daily activity.

Berger and Luckmann's model of a 'social construction of reality'—which incorporated propositions in the area of an analysis of development, received from Erik H. Erikson, for example—made new approaches possible for an analytical use of Weltanschauung and world-view, in the social space obtaining between individual and collective instances. Their thesis of the constructive character of → society (and thus of religion, as well, as a societal system) has proved influential. Here, society is a product of its vehicles: it is separated, 'externalized,' 'objectified' in a 'dialectical' process, and—by learning—'internalized' once more. Consequently, in this view, religion is also produced by daily action, and must be continually observed and verified. It has the purpose of a mechanism for the bestowal of meaning, a mechanism that takes → everyday knowledge and experiences, as well as 'borderline experiences,' and makes them 'plausible' and legitimate. Luckmann concentrated this sketch and outline in his thesis, intended as diagnostic for the time, that the modern form of religion is an 'invisible religion,' folded back into its private recesses. Peter L. Berger mounted his provocative slogan, 'heretical imperative,' according to which today's believer is exposed to a 'compulsion to heresy'—to the selection of her or his own religion and Weltanschauung (→ Private Religion).

Sociometry

e) One of the most important accomplishments of the sociology of religion is the tradition of a quantitative sociometry. This is intended to demonstrate and illuminate the (religious) behavior of a → group or → society and its concepts (of beliefs) through empirical investigation, for example, with questionnaires (opinion surveys). The data acquired have today reached a high degree of methodological verification. Nevertheless, with statistics, there is always the (source critical) question of the epistemological interest of their gathering, and the political or ideological environment in which the latter is effected. Classic lines of questioning here concern faith conceptualizations and everyday religious activity (faith in God; participation at → rituals, such as assisting at divine service on → Sunday), or questioning in terms of the religious conceptualizations of social classes, sub-classes, or groups (e.g. industrial workers; physicians; theologians). Thus, quantitative profiles of opinion can serve in the discernment of trends in religious behavior, and can reveal aspects of current everyday piety and 'applied belief' that lie outside publications of religious 'professionals.' For large church organizations, 'ecclesio-sociological' polls of this kind, concerning their members' religious behavior and attitudes, are highly informative.

Sociology of religion based on empirical social research is an influential tradition in the United States (cf. Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion), as well as having an influential role in French sociology. For the debate concerning religious trends, movements, and problematics of the present, quantitative collections are an indispensable aid, as shown by fertile studies on the 'new religious movements' and the social type known as the 'seeker' since the 1970s, as well as on → 'fundamentalism' or the 'politicized religion' of minorities and immigrants. Poll results from opinion research institutes on the 'nation's religious state' constitute a public and popular form of this kind or social analysis. Despite possessing elements of significant objective import that ought to be verified individually, the 'media-friendly' preparation of the results is in itself a part of contemporary religious history—as is the political discourse that tends to usurp the results of these studies.

§4. The Anti-Historical Turn: Political Theology and Phenomenology of Religion

The First World War shattered all the harmonizing conceptualizations of the oneness of the higher cultures. The age of 'decisions' called for new values and 'existential' conceptions: 'either—or.' Radical solutions replaced differentiated description. The demand for a 'revision of basic concepts' rejected further work on the traditions. One of the reassessments made was the inversion of the notion of development: the modern age was not going forwards, but backwards—the 'demise of the West' (Oswald Spengler) was the terrifying image of the time. In the same year, 1917, in his Das Heilige ("The Holy"), the Marburg theologian and Indian specialist Rudolf Otto (1869–1937) produced another slogan, a 'world formula' for the religions. This was the 'Holy'—as object and goal of all religions, and not understood by way of rationality (read: theology, philosophy, and science), but only in the 'irrational' experience of an infinitely superior experience (→ Holy). This experience was totally distinct from the everyday—and was that of the 'Utterly Other,' as a 'Mystery' that at once astonished, fascinated, and terrified—a mirum, fascinosum, and tremendum. Otto's far-reaching phenomenology of the 'moment of the Numinous,' of religious 'primitive experiences,' would render religion, worlds of religious emotions, describable—however, it especially pointed to the limits of descriptive expression. In a further development of Schleiermacher's romantic theology of emotion (→ Emotions/Feelings), Otto constitutes 'the Holy' (and thus God and religion across the board) by way of its emotions and sensations in the believer, such as the sensation of being defeated, overcome, by the tremendous majesty of God. In a fashion consistent with his outline of religion, Otto prefers to adduce poetic texts, prayer formulae, hymnody, and texts of Western/Eastern mysticism.

Phenomenology of Religion

Rudolf Otto is one of the godparents of the phenomenology of religion, as it was later called, after the title of Gerardus van der Leeuw's 1933 book—a current that dominated religious scholarship from 1920 to 1970. R. R. Marett's theory of a 'pre-animistic dynamism' was included and generalized. A 'force' or 'energy' was at work in sacred places, at sacred times, in the sacred community that could be compared to an electric current—invisible, but unmistakable in its effectiveness (→ Power). The Holy 'reveals itself,' whether human beings see it or not. All questions of how—of the media, the sermon, the preacher, the sociology of the community—were unimportant, in the face of the immediacy of numinous 'apparitions' (→ Epiphany). They are 'bracketed' in a 'phenomenological reduction.' Here, Edmund Husserl's philosophical system (Logische Untersuchungen; Ger., "Logical Investigations," vol. 1, 1901) became relevant—although usually only in a free interpretation, and further blurred by an earlier tradition (that of Chantepie de la Saussaye), which also applied the Hegelian concept of phenomenology. In any case, the prime concern was the reine Wesensschau, the 'pure sight of essence,' without deception by historical or societal contingencies. This agenda made the task into that of discovering—indeed, of rescuing, of redeeming—the 'essence' of the Holy that underlay all phenomena.

The progress of this phenomenology of religion was open to two threats. On the one hand, there was the danger of reducing the description of the "forms of appearance of the religious" (F. Heiler) into an unreflective enumerative positivism ("In the Greek, or Indian," etc., religion, we find 'a,' 'b,' 'c' . . .). On the other hand was the seductiveness of the 'apparition' model, the promotion of general principles or powers 'behind' the 'phenomena,' to the equivalent of theological bestowals of meaning. This model was of especial interest for the study of symbols and symbolism, as well as for outlines of philosophies of → history. An actually anti-historical tendency lies at the roots of the best-known concept of religious history, the 'history of religion' of the Romanian religious scholar Mircea → Eliade (1907–1986). A successor of Joachim Wach, Eliade was an important agent in the Chicago school of the history of religion: the archaic or the source was for him something good, while the advent of history meant the 'plunge into terror.' Eliade developed his program in the atmosphere prevailing after the murderous Second World War. He did not shrink from invoking backdrops of paganism with populist and nationalist undertones. Christianity, with its aim of a linear salvation history, destroyed the archaic thought of an eternal cycle. 'The Holy' could be received by only a few in the modern age, while the archaic cultures—among which he numbered not only non-European tribal religions or → shamanism, but also the farming civilization of his own country—lived entirely in the Holy. A gnostic variant of a bestowal of meaning in the sense of a phenomenology of religion was incarnated in the scholar of Islam and Persia, Henry Corbin (1907–1978). Corbin propagated an 'umma of the esoterics,' an 'Inner Church,' to which the called had always belonged—which did not prevent him from founding his own spiritual circle with his Université de St. Jean de Jérusalem (→ Gnosticism; Mysticism; Esotericism).

Mircea Eliade

Eranos and Research into Symbols

In the search for an apparitional basis for the 'Holy' on the far side of the data and facts, not only cyclical time-models, but also symbols were readily available. It was precisely in the 1920s that interest grew in the esoteric symbolical conceptions and traditions of European religious history, such as emblematics, alchemy, or baroque allegory. We need only (despite theoretical differences) think of Walter Benjamin. Not surprisingly, then, the international range of the phenomenological paradigm of religion increased substantially through the meetings of the Eranos Circle in → Ascona, led, beginning in 1933, by Theosophist Olga Froebe-Kapteyn (1881–1962). Its self-understanding and programmatics, into the 1950s, were signed authoritatively by Carl Gustav Jung and his 'depth-psychology,' which focused on 'archetypes' (→ Psychoanalysis). Froebe-Kapteyn also established, in Casa Eranos, a comprehensive archive of images for symbolical research. In Anglo-Saxon linguistic space, Eranos, and the symbology that belonged with it, was transmitted primarily by the Bollingen Foundation's Bollingen Series (1943ff.—impelled by Mary and Paul Mellon). Bollingen was also the place of Jung's personal ivory tower on the shores of Lake Zurich. Since the 1970s, with the change of generations, a paradigm shift has occurred among scholars of religion, so that positions in the phenomenology of religion have been extensively surrendered. However, the works of their grandmasters and popularizers (such as Joseph Campbell) continue to reach a large audience. This is precisely because—even according to their own aspirations—they go beyond 'pure scholarship.' They are modern wisdom-texts.

2. Aesthetics and Psychology

§5. Traditions in Cultural Studies (Warburg School)

The phenomenology of religion expressly opposed contemporaneous currents of Kulturwissenschaft ('cultural science') and psychoanalysis. In his science of art, drawn up in terms of 'cultural science,' the Hamburg private scholar Aby Warburg (1866–1929) explained his claim that the perception of religion must not be distinguished basically from perceptions of another (cultural) sort (→ Perception). It is not only works of genius, holds Warburg, that bear witness to how a society and an era collectively create images of their world, but also the images of the → masses. Warburg's psychological theory of a social production of images stood at the service of a question. Along what pathways did 'pagan antiquity's' imagery find its way into the → Renaissance—a Renaissance that, for German Jew Aby Warburg, was the vehicle of a human hope leading to an enlightened society, a society without 'superstition'? Admittedly, these paths were perpetually threatened by irrationality and 'dark images.' Nevertheless, Warburg held, works on the reception of this imagery in antiquity—especially, works on religious → Platonism and the history of → astrology (as the menacing potential)—were a central focus when it came to research. In the 1920s, the Kulturwissenschaftliche Bibliothek Warburg ("Warburg Library of Cultural Studies") in Hamburg attracted a brilliant circle of scholars, including cultural scholars Erwin Panofsky (1892–1968), Ernst Cassirer (1874–1945), and Raymond Klibanski, as well as Fritz Saxl (1890–1948), who developed the library's systematics and built up its fabled breadth. In 1933, owing to the racist persecution of Jewish scholars by the Nazi state, the circle was dispersed; the library, however, was successfully moved to London. It is still there, today, as the Warburg and Courtauld Institute. Among Warburg's successors, especially worthy of citation is Ernst H. Gombrich (1909–2001), who headed the Institute from 1959 through 1976 and further developed and popularized the approach known as that of the psychology of art.

Warburg Library of Cultural Studies

With the pioneering series, Vorträge der Kulturwissenschaftlichen Bibliothek Warburg (Ger., "Lectures at the Warburg Library of Cultural Studies"), research in the academic study of religion published its methodological alternative as early as the time of the formative phase of phenomenology. But that alternative was not put to use. Only the generation of 1968 finally reintroduced this suppressed legacy into the scholarship of art. It is only since the rediscovery of the fugitive scholars at the end of the 1970s, and the publication of their investigations, that the Warburg circle has attained a growing significance in the debates held among art historians, issues of body-language ('pathos formulae'), and, especially, 'collective → memory' and societal mechanisms of recall (→ Monument/Memorial Places). In the academic study of religion, in the 1980s, the periodical, Visible Religion (publisher: Hans G. Kippenberg), attempted to bring to fruition the seeds sown by the Warburg school. Thus far, however, the incorporation of these impulses into the broader framework of an 'aesthetics of religion' remains a desideratum, despite the many new approaches to visual culture that have been published in the last decades (→ Materiality). The latter would research → perception (and non-perceptions), as well as their culturally specific conditions and semantic codifications, hence the societal image media and products—as premise, counter-part, and conclusion of images that are mentally constructed.

§6. Psychology and Psychoanalysis

Analytical Psychology

a) Rudolf Otto understood his phenomenology of religion expressly as a psychology of religion. But he guarded against those who could recall a 'puberty feeling,' but not properly religious emotions. In sharp contrast, Sigmund → Freud (1856–1939) and his school, regarding itself as the profile of a science, saw in religion a neurotic condition that instills itself in children and the mentally ill (→ Psychoanalysis; Psychopathology). Only later was Freud willing to imagine that, as a mystic, a person could experience an 'oceanic feeling' (Romain Rolland), with religion as a locus of positive psychic effects. Freud's pupil, Carl Gustav Jung (1875–1961), saw things the other way around, as mentioned above: in religion Jung saw concrete material to be examined for its universal anthropological depth. Here was the 'Archetype' of elementary stereotypes such as 'Anima/soul' or the 'Great Mother,' lying at the basis of the historical image-coining of all cultures—as well as of the individual's fantasies (→ Fantasy/Imagination) and → dream images.

The Difficulties with the Psychology of Religion

b) The 'psychology of religion' has dealt mostly with special forms of individual religious → experience—prophecy, conversion, mystical and paranormal experiences. To this day, its inspired and inspiring work is one that was written in 1902: The Varieties of Religious Experience by William James. Thereafter, psychology fell to pieces. It became merely an analytic and an empirical/psychometric current, while the field of collective or social psychology was extensively abandoned, or left to the devices of speculative cultural criticism. Patterns of religious actions, emotions, or conceptualizations faded from view, in the polemics mounted between a rationalism, with its criticism of religion, behavioralistic experiments, interest-led individual studies of interest to few, and a philosophizing 'soul science.'

Neuro-Sciences

c) Just recently, indications of a new foundation of research in religious psychology have multiplied. Since the 1980s, there has been important progress in brain research in the neurosciences. In the neurosciences, the various forms of consciousness have become much more precisely determinable. Relations among → dream, vision (→ Visions/Auditory Experiences), the experience of → mysticism, and drug-induced altered states of consciousness (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens) have been observed empirically. Religious experiences need no longer fall under the diagnosis of a disease of altered personality. Altered states of consciousness, then, only form higher degrees and forms of normal conditions of the consciousness of every person: they can be reinforced by → asceticism (hunger, overexertion, sensory deprivation, or diminished stimulation), techniques of ecstasy (→ meditation, breathing techniques), diseases, medicines, and drugs. There is a broad discussion, meanwhile, in the cognitive area of the storage of knowledge in the → 'memory' and the recall or actualization of the latter through practices of 'remembering' (memorial rites; → Monument/Memorial Places). This discussion is increasingly concerned with the connection of physiological and social discoveries. The inescapable question from the scientific side of how the brain and human psyche function has therefore led researchers like John Eccles directly to the attempt to describe 'spirit' and 'soul' neuro-scientifically and to establish them in terms of a philosophy of religion.

Psychohistory

d) Psychology as a science—which (like sociology) deals with the problems, experiences, and manners of relationship of persons of the present—cannot simply be transferred to past eras. Each culture and era defines the life cycle, and the boundaries between normal and disturbed, differently. Hence, their respective objects are distinct. Further, long-dead crusaders can no longer be laid on the psychoanalytic couch. Thus, psychohistory attempts to accentuate historical difference, as well as the methodological survey deficit over the evaluation of images, metaphors, instances of self-witness, and literary descriptions. To be sure, up to the present only Eric H. Erikson (1902–1994), with his psychoanalytic theory of stages of development in the → life cycle, has provided convincing historical case studies, with his biographical and genetic investigation of the life course of → Gandhi and Martin → Luther.

e) The psychology of religion is a neglected field. With regard to the inquiries and progress at hand in the individual sciences, ranging from neurology, brain research, and clinical, analytic, and empirical psychology, to the social and cultural sciences—such as Warburg's experiments, cited above, in a psychology of art, along with those of Gombrich and Rudolf Arnheim (see §5)—a synthesis of these studies is still to be desired. Considerable difficulties still seem to stand in the way of such a combination, however, not least of all in consequence of the disciplinary 'sealing off' among academic disciplines, schools, techniques, and pedagogical models.

3. New Methodological Perspectives: From the Linguistic Turn to Integral Cultural Science

§7. Paradigms of Historical Science I: History Consists of Words: The "Linguistic Turn" and the History of Concepts

The crisis of historicism after the First World War (see above, §4) led first to disdain for the methods and concepts that had been developed in historical studies. On the one hand, these had to be corrected as children of the nineteenth century, under the label of a discredited 'liberalism' of belief in progress. On the other hand, they had produced crisp and methodologically assured conclusions. The 'revision of basic concepts' called for by Carl Schmitt provided an opportunity to postulate war and violence ('decision,' 'emergency') as the driving mechanism of history, altogether in the sense of the nationalistic systems of violence and compulsion prevailing everywhere in Europe. In the 1960s, the manual, Geschichtliche Grundbegriffe (Ger., "Basic Historical Concepts"; GGB), published by Reinhart Koselleck et al., finally opened up for historical research a debate on 'basic concepts' that reached beyond an ideological reactionary revisionism. It showed how 'history'—as historiography, and as the collective image of history—was marked by linguistic concepts, and how the transformation of concepts provided the opportunity for research into a transformation of society as well. History, then—and thus the history of religions also—is not only a series of acts and facts, but also their 'reworking' and evaluation, in reports, commentaries, slogans and watchwords, and public recitals. This recognition of 'historical semantics' pertains, of course, not only to the political agents of historical events and processes, but also to those who document them or re-create them in narrative: historians. History is a linguistic event. Those 'writing history'—whether it be the history of nations, persons, cultural areas, or religions—are not only confronted with the processes of composition and textualization, but also with inscribing themselves into the texts they compose. Scholarly texts possess not only the logic of their argumentation, but also their respective narratives, and literary, aesthetic, and rhetorical dimensions, as Hayden White in particular has demonstrated.

The Linguistic Turn

These considerations, which are by no means limited to historical scholarship, were comprehensive, and led to a discussion of methods in the cultural sciences that still goes on today. The linguistic turn—which, for the sake of a title, and for purposes of criticism, American philosopher Richard Rorty named, as early as 1968—relied partly on the scientific logic of the Vienna Circle (Rudolf Carnap, 1891–1970), as well as the linguistic philosophy and linguistic criticism of the later Ludwig Wittgenstein (Philosophische Untersuchungen ["Philosophical Investigations"; composed 1945/46–1949]). The 'textualistic turn,' however, drew the approaches of its thought from the 'crisis of representation' launched by, among others, Michel Foucault, with his criticism of the bases of scientific thought, and anthropologist Clifford Geertz with his 'interpretative' approach ("Culture is text"—"Science means writing"). The 'turn' itself appeared in the 1980s and culminated in the anthropological writing-culture debate, the new historicism of literary science (Stephen Greenblatt, Louis Montrose), and the new cultural history in the historical sciences (see §12).

For religious studies in the 1970s, concern with the field's own conceptuality was almost more pressing than it was for historians. The self-concept of a discipline was at stake. In historical scholarship, it was a matter of establishing the history of concepts as part of a discipline. But the publishers of the Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe ("Manual of Basic Concepts in Religious Studies," 1988–2001; English translation in preparation) reacted to the crisis of basic concepts into which the specialty had been brought by religious phenomenology's 'escape from history.' What had to be done was not only to historicize the received stock of descriptive words and categories in terms of the history of individual words, but at the same time to probe this supply critically for its potential for merging with the human, social, and cultural sciences. The goal was the construction of a viable concept for the description of religious facts even in complex cultures, as well as for a systematic analysis that went beyond theological premises. Beginning in the 1990s, reinforced reflections have appeared, in anglophone scholarship also, on establishing the foundations for the formation of concepts in the → academic study of religion.

§8. Paradigms of Historical Science II: Social History, Social Science of History, and Historical Anthropology

Historical Social Science

A social science of history seeks to open up sources through which historical eras can be investigated using the methods of empirical sociology (statistical quantification)—see above, §3e. In the German-speaking scientific tradition, the label Historische Sozialwissenschaft ('historical social science') is connected with the work of Max Weber (see above, §3), and therefore refers to a qualitative, verstehende ('understanding') sociology. Of course, historians of the 'Bielefeld school' (Hans-Ulrich Wehler, Jürgen Kocka, Jörn Rüsen), who introduced Weber's work into the discussion over historical science, neglected his theses and questioning in the study of religion.

École des Annales

In France, however, representatives of a 'quantitative science of history,' or 'cliometry,' in the École des Annales have gone further than simply broadening historical research into models and methods of social science (economic, demographic). They also practice a quantitative historiography of the 'third degree,' which builds on a quantitative science of history, and has even sought to grasp unconscious, 'obvious,' collective attitudes and behavioral modes (mentalités). For example, they have approached designations as difficult to grasp, in terms of religious history, as '→ spirituality' or 'religiosity,' by means of a 'harder' socio-historical methodology—so far as the material has permitted. Spirituality, its growth and decline, can be read, for instance, in the weight of burned-out wax candles in pilgrim churches, as Michel Vovelle did in the church archives of Catholic Provence from the eighteenth century. The methodological spectrum of historians who have gathered around the periodical, Annales. Économies—Sociétés—Civilizations (founded 1929), and its founders, Marc Bloch (1886–1944) and Lucien Febvre (1878–1956), has broadened continually, out beyond a social and economic history: Fernand Braudel (1902–1985), who dominated the second generation of researchers, deepened the cultural and anthropo-geographic tradition of géographie humaine with a model of time-periods ('short duration,' history of events; 'intermediate duration,' economic and population history, with their cycles and conjunctures; 'long duration'—longue durée—history of forms of subsistence, framework of climatic and geological conditions). In the 1970s, the third generation—to which belong medievalists Jacques Le Goff (b. 1924), Georges Duby (1919–1996), and Emmanuel Le Roy Ladurie (b. 1929)—tied lines of questioning in cultural and social anthropology to the Nouvelle Histoire (Fr., "New History"). It was in this context that the latter was definitively promoted, by the École des Annales, from the condition of outsider to that of unprecedented international success. Although the analyses and conclusions of the French company of social historians are also acceptable individually, it remains their great merit to have introduced new methods and subjects into historical scholarship, besides having produced an abundance of special studies precisely for historians of religion. Stimulating, and rich in material for the scholar of religion, are, in particular, works on the ages of life and fundamental experiences of the life cycle—as birth, puberty (initiation), marriage, old age, and death—but also on the history of mentalities (for instance, religious attitudes) and of collective images, both principal and conceptual (in Fr., imaginaires; → Social Myths and Fantasy Images).

Nouvelle Histoire

In the context of these and other stimuli, new sub-disciplines of historical research have, to some extent, materialized, that were also fruitful for the academic study of religion. Examples of other stimuli are the Marxist English tradition of cultural studies (Raymond Williams, E. P. Thompson), as well as Hermann Bausinger's (Tübingen) Empirische Kulturwissenschaft ('empirical cultural studies') as the successor to Volkskunde (Ger., 'folklore studies'; 'ethnology'). Thus the influence of Anglo-Saxon anthropology encouraged more and more researchers to regard European history from the viewpoint of an 'ethnography of complex cultures.' On the other hand, neo-Marxism, and the counter-culture of the 1960s and 1970s, were abrupt in their reminder that history of rulers and governments (and their intellectual elite) was always written, while the 'simple folk' (farmers, workers, the urban sub-proletariat) remained silent. Or better: the culture of the latter has been (and indeed, still is, even in our own day) an oral culture, and therefore has been practically ignored by a (religio-) historical investigation fixated on written sources (→ Oral Tradition). The problem of the sources of a 'history from below' was then approached in a twofold fashion. First, in the framework of a resumed 'research in folk culture' (or better: research in popular and subaltern cultures), the technique of local ethnographic studies, with their claim to 'total' description, was transferred to—preponderantly early modern—historical investigation. That sort of 'micro-history' (C. Ginzburg) must be dialectically and contextually related to the macro-history of nations and dynasties. Second, an attempt was made thereby to 'track down' the history of everyday life and of lifestyles, by way of the notion that it was the scholars themselves who produced the sources: it was they who sought out the subjects of their history, and made them speak. The technique of 'oral history,' of the report of living and experience that was recorded face to face with the researcher, and recorded on tape, a technique which was applied in the 'investigation of everyday history,' nevertheless has its natural biological limits. It can accept only 'time witnesses'—can only poll the living. For certain areas of qualitative sociology of religion, however—for example in investigation into → conversion or in the investigation of small religious groups—'depth interviewing' has brought encouraging results.

Women's Studies / Gender Studies

Under the influence of the women's liberation movement of the 1970s, an innovative women's studies has developed. The political impulse of many female researchers to give their own gender its own history, has today yielded to more comprehensive gender studies, which, also, obviously, include the history of male comportment. It inquires into social pressures, expectations, and opportunities attaching to the roles of both genders, and besides, into the production, historicity, variability, and dependency on → discourse of gender itself (→ Gender Stereotypes; Homosexuality; Sexuality; Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism). Parts of the research on the → Matriarchy/Patriarchy and on the persecution of → witches themselves belong to the religious history of other times. But religious studies, just like other disciplines, could greatly profit from works of historical criticism, or of the history of discourse (for instance, on life sketches of nuns and female saints, or on feminine ideals of piety)—provided such studies and sciences were permitted to address the subject. For the European scene, unlike the flourishing American one, it cannot be very credibly maintained that this permission has been granted.

Historical Anthropology

Surveying the content and objects of recent research in historical studies, we are confronted with more than theological 'normativity.' We are dealing with living religion. We are studying pilgrimages and pilgrim usages, belief in miracles, festival customs, ritual assimilation of childhood death, the function of confession. Here, as with the investigation of European veneration of saints, monastic practices of asceticism, and the history of the witch persecution, growing attention is being paid to the material of social and cultural anthropology. Research into witchcraft and witches, into which investigation Alan Macfarlane injected standpoints of cultural anthropology, is an example of how prolific this kind of interdisciplinary 'crossover' can be.

Many of the currents of thought described above, and their disciples, are collectively labeled today as belonging to historical anthropology. What joins them all is their common point of departure, their interest in the knowledge of individual persons, their subsistence conditions, the world they inhabit, their opportunities for action and the roles they fulfill—as natives or strangers, men or women, workers or unemployed, silent, singing or praying. This is in contrast to, for instance, societal or social history, which they analyze in terms of particular groups, sub-classes, classes, institutions or organizations, or of the traditional history of events. For the history of religion, historical anthropology is both a blessing and a danger. Fortunately, it is practiced in the everyday religious world, in the places where religion emerges and is verified. But it runs the risk of squandering this good fortune in its arbitrary attraction to the strange and the sensational. Only when 'little history,' along with 'medium-size' and 'large,' the special along with the general, is reflected on, connected and contextualized, then alone can we expect new, even pioneering, insights into the attitudes, ways of thinking, and action-orientations of those without whom neither religions, nor religious studies, would exist: believers.

§9. Structuralism and Semiotics: On the Logic of Myths, with Systems of Classification and Signs

Claude Lévi-Strauss

With the structuralism of the 1950s and 1960s, the interest of research in the academic study of religion once more turned to myths. Structuralism now laid claim to opening up a new era of research in religious studies (it could be called the formalistic investigation). Its representatives sought to introduce a truly scientific precision and logical rigor into mythological research (→ Myth/Mythology; Discourse). It is true that this investigative direction is particularly connected with one person and his work, the Franco-Belgian anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss (b. 1908). But the latter's manner of approach must be seen in the context of a broader methodological background. The structuralist view is broad and comprehensive. It seeks to grasp religion, and especially, the forms of religious thought—its myths, its idea-structures ('ideologies'), its collective worlds of conceptualization (→ Collective Representations) and images of the world, as symbolical, communicative, and open to classifying and classification. In general, it seeks to grasp religion, and the forms of religious thought, as cognitive systems (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture). In particular, the structuralist view belongs to an essentially francophone scientific and philosophical movement, which draws its model from linguistics (from the work of the Ghent linguist Ferdinand de Saussure, 1857–1913; Cour de linguistic générale, 1916—text authoritatively co-authored by editors Charles Bally and Albert Sechehaye)—then, developed out of linguistics, from the 'phonology' of Roman Jacobson and Nikolai Trubetskoy ('Prague school'). The fundamental idea consisted in a shift, not of the content or 'substance,' but of the systematic form of the sounds, myths, relations of kinship, into the center of the analysis. Analogously with the linguistic distinction between the spoken or written word (Fr. parole) on the one side, and the language's (Fr. langue) implicit grammatical or 'phonological' system of rules on the other, the intention was to read myths as interrelated parts of a 'depth structure.' It was maintained that the latter could now be presented as the totality of logical rules and relations of respect, especially homologies and binary oppositions. The service to be rendered by the structuralism of the Straussian imprint, it was held, lay, for one, in the fact that it attracted the gaze to the variants of mythic narratives that would now become equally authentic members of a respective 'structure'—of a respective relational meaning-connection of 'functions.' For another, the method required searching for elementary building blocks of mythic narratives, 'myth themes.' In his approach to mythic analysis, Lévi-Strauss had tested the phonological method first in the analysis of relations of kinship. Now, beginning in the mid-1950s, he went deeper into his method, in the presence of ever more comprehensive stores of myths, until, in his chef-d'oeuvre, Mythologiques (Fr., "Mythological Matters"; 1964–1971), he had interrelated more than one hundred myths of the Indian cultures of South and North America. However, Lévi-Strauss fell victim to his own brilliance. True, he introduced a salutary, 'cool' regard into mythic analysis. However, he elevated his methodology to such hermetic brilliance that few still could, or wished to, follow him. Structural process, nevertheless, in a less strict sense, became a widespread method of analysis. In the Paris School of Comparative Research in Ancient Religion, at the Centre Louis Gernet (Centre de Recherches Comparées sur les Sociétés Anciennes), with Jean-Pierre Vernant (b. 1914) and Marcel Détienne, the thrust of Lévi-Strauss was profitably transferred to ancient Greek myths. The latter school, incidentally, also draws on other sources, e.g. on the psychologie historique of Ignace Meyerson. The classification analyses of Mary Douglas, as well (Natural Symbols, 1970), emerging from British social anthropology, can be listed in another movement of thought, structural in the broadest sense.

In parallel with Lévi-Strauss, Roland Barthes (1915–1980) generalized linguistics to a general theory of signs, which he called sémiologie. His efforts concerned with the 'myths of the everyday' are some of the most stimulating texts of a currently developing cultural semiotics. For want of substantial labors, it is true, the component of religious studies belonging to the latter, the 'semiotics of religion' has been unable to reach the status of an actual discipline. Semiotics became well known, however, with the pioneering works of Umberto Eco (b. 1932), who ultimately transferred his theoretical considerations to successful popularization in his novels. Novels of his, such as the 'monastery detective story,' The Name of the Rose (Ital., 1981), a piece of popular semiotics, together with their reception are themselves to be listed as modern religious history.

§10. Macrosociology: Sketches/Outlines of System Theory

Niklas Luhmann

Owing to the comprehensiveness of his work, its degree of differentiation, and its systematic intent, the Bielefeld social theoretician Niklas Luhmann (1927–1998) became one of the most influential German-language sociologists, after Max Weber, of the twentieth century. Luhmann's ambitious labors at first continued the 'system theory' of Talcott Parsons (1902–1979). However, at the beginning of the 1980s, with his chef-d'oeuvre Soziale Systeme (Ger., "Social Systems"), he discovered a 'self-referential turn.' Then—like the representatives of 'radical constructivism,' but with different conclusions—Luhmann took up the 'theory of living systems' of the bio-cybernetic scientists Humberto R. Maturana and Francisco J. Varela (autopoiesis and Cognition, 1979). He re-invigorated system theory, and thereby focused it on the aspect of continuing self-reproduction (autopoiesis) of systems—thus re-emphasizing the self-referential identity-formation which they generate. Luhmann has set forth his viewpoint in a series of monographs on various social systems such as 'law,' 'art,' and 'science.' Having presented a much-discussed theory of religion in 1977 with his Funktion der Religion, Luhmann could no longer complete a monograph on the 'religion of society.' In 2000, it appeared posthumously (Die Religion der Gesellschaft). Luhmann's abstract conceptual cosmos divides opinions. Today, incontestably, his influence can be felt in the fertility of individual studies, such as those by P. M. Spannenberg in literary history. It has yet to become apparent in the area of religious studies whether Luhmann's sketch of society and religion will come to be regarded as simply an idiosyncratic language game, or whether it can serve to explain religious thought and religious action.

§11. Anthropology of Religion II: Clifford Geertz's 'Interpretative' or 'Symbolic Anthropology'; Victor Turner's Theory of Ritual

Clifford Geertz

Anthropology of religion at the close of the twentieth century was dominated by two quite different researchers, both of whom shone in neighboring disciplines, and decisively influenced scholarship in religious studies: Clifford Geertz (b. 1926) and Victor Turner (1920–1983). In 1973, Parsons's student Geertz, in his volume of essays, The Interpretation of Cultures, proposed the 'culture is text' metaphor as a heuristic model and circumscribed his method with a formula of Gilbert Ryles, 'thick description.' This, unfortunately, occasioned the birth of slogans that were subsequently parroted and generally abused. Clifford Geertz developed his technique of analysis and interpretation with field work in Indonesia (Java, Bali) and Morocco. Geertz's publications have had both good and bad consequences. On the one hand, with his designation of religion as a 'symbolic system,' he opened up, especially to religious studies, the way to ethno-hermeneutic and semiotic analyses; and with his observation that what ethnographers did was to write, he made a solid contribution to the debate about the writing culture (see §7)—the discussion of the scholarly 'intextualization' of ethnographic observations in the field. On the other hand, the latter process precisely promoted ethnographers' (as well as historians', cultural researchers', et al.) proclivity toward reflexive navel-gazing. These scientists, it seemed to Geertz, thought more about themselves than about the life and activity of the people right where they were. The quest for tropes and constructs of one's own, and the obstinate attempt to 'deconstruct' the devilish power-web of all-sufficient discourse was in danger of supplanting concern for the other. But reasonably, researchers in religious anthropology and science ought to be aware of both sides of the epistemological coin: the fictive and constructive elements in their interpretations, as well as the social (actions, etc.) reality 'out there,' and local knowledge. And this can only be taken in by precise observation and attention to perception—at least as far as the decisive source, the will of the ethnographical subject, permits.

Victor Turner

Victor Turner, the other influential anthropologist of the last three decades has published a polished theory of → ritual, which, after an interim structuralism, drew the attention of religious scholars once more to religious behaviors. Turner, a Scot, grew up in the tradition of 'social anthropology,' a British version of ethnology (the North American is generally designated 'cultural anthropology'). His conception of rituals was determined by his field work at the beginning of the 1950s with the tribe of the Ndembu, in what was then called Northern Rhodesia (today Zambia) but also by his Catholicism. He was interested in the 'social drama' of ritual presentations, especially → rites of passage, which symbolically accentuate the social breaks and thresholds (→ Marginality/Liminality). Turner did not abandon this social drama to the theater metaphor. Instead, working closely with Richard Schechner, in off-Broadway in New York, as well as, like Peter Brook, on extended journeys to India and elsewhere, in sacred drama and ethnic theater, he afforded impulses and stimuli for a dramatic aesthetics that would outstrip the European oral stage. Schechner, meanwhile, has published a theory of ritual performance of his own. Although Turner's theoretical concept occasionally resembles a theoretical passkey—nevertheless, without his and Schechner's work, today's intensive discussion of the description and function of rituals would be unthinkable. (→ Initiation; Theater; Drama [sacred]; Ritual)

§12. From Text to TV: The Challenge of the Philologies of Religion from the Science of Communication and Media

Most work in religious studies today is still done on texts. The unspectacular, and frequently denounced, editions, translations, and materials with commentary, discovered in written sources, are the traditional and vital center of effort in the academic study of religion. Although the philological method remains indispensable and texts still shape an important and meaningful approach to the religions, scholars nevertheless have begun to understand—not without the force of factual changes in technology and society—that written testimonials (modern: print media) constitute only one 'codification form of religion' (F. Stolz), and at that, not even a universal one. The banal fact that religions are built on communication(s), and that, in all cultures, their representatives must make use of means of communication → media (be it 'only' language, or bodily gestures; → Symbol/Sign/Gesture), in order to carry their message to man and woman—this fact drove its way into broader scientific consciousness only as, since the mid-twentieth century, Western (and now also non-Western) societies have become awash in an ever-increasing wave of 'new media.' In the interval, religion scholars and theologians have addressed this challenge in ever greater numbers, and they thematize the problem on four levels:

- Religion is now perceived as a symbolic system (C. Geertz), or as 'essentially a communicative social phenomenon' (→ Communication).
- The question is posed as to how religions use the media, from the printed book to the → TV church and the Internet, as means of communication, and what forms of communication are found in religious practice—an inquiry that religious organizations themselves, in the wake of an aggiornamento, are forcing on this 'media society.'
- More or less polemically, discussion continues on the possible function tantamount to religion of the (mass) media, their capacity for a conferral of meaning, community formation (in a fan club, for instance), and for the ritualization of everyday life.
- An investigation is being conducted into the operation of individual media, their respective particularity as a means of communication and a source of religious material—its respective special qualities, for mediating religion-related content, its religious or political exploitation or utilization.
- The valences of the media, in religious, class, and cultural functions, shift into view. Philological concentration on written media has all too strongly channeled research into testimonials of the culture of elites and of religious → specialists. When image-sources, material culture, or (audio-) visual media are included in the investigation, then not only do religious agents emerge from the light of religious history, but another image of religion, its materialization (→ Materiality), and its achievements, arises. One need think only of anthropological, historical, and sociological research on religious 'folk culture' and everyday religiosity.

The sociopolitical dimension of studies of this kind is clearly to be seen. All one needs to do is open the newspaper or switch on the TV news. In future, then, contact between scholars of religion and journalists will be of growing importance, in practical collaboration as well as critical confrontation. Scholarly or scientific reflection on this key area of the impact of public communication—not to mention institutional cooperation—has scarcely begun.

§13. The Academic Study of Religion Today: Cultural Studies as Chance

The science of religion, like any science, is 'of this world.' The scholars who practice it and convey it are entwined in the 'concrete epistemology' of prevailing interests, and its layering and its politics, in the good as in the bad. Their future, their development, and their individual religious experiences, as well as their personal and generation-specific experiences, enable them to adopt (or hinder them from adopting) a conceptualization of 'the religious.' Thematic and methodological approaches to the religious field are therefore always conditioned by time, a fact that is often perceived only by a later generation, with its temporal and mental distance. That need not diminish its value. Indeed, in many cases, it testifies to an alert contemporary milieu, a sense of socio-religious fields of tension, alterations, and 'trend changing,' by which all are moved and turned. Thus, anthropologists and sociologists of religion went along with nineteenth-century optimism about progress, with ever new models of religious 'development.' Thus, the 'religious phenomenologists' of the 1920s and 1930s, in the values crisis after the First World War, devoted themselves to their quest for the 'essence' of religion. Thus, a young generation of scholars in the 1970s and 1980s adopted the impetus of an alternative culture, to pose provocative questions regarding the irrational in science. And so today's investigators turn to media and communication structures. True, the disadvantage of such time-bound alertness is that it can enter the service of the interests of political power, as was the case with the 'Aryan research' of Jacob Wilhelm Hauer, in the Germany of the Nazi State (→ National Socialism).

The achievement of contemporary and future study of religion will be able to be measured by whether that achievement perceives and adopts the challenges of the time—and these always include the conceptualizations, actions, and sentiments of the persons who live in that time. Their 'adoption' means the attempt by scholars of religion to accompany them critically, to develop them, and to reflect upon them. This effort is all the more important as religions and religious systems continue to influence the citizens of a (post-) industrial society, to lead their actions and direct their beliefs. And in the process of globalization, a further dynamic has developed that, while sometimes frightening, calls for a response.

Religious Studies as a Cultural Science

An opportunity to confront these challenges is offered by the culturalistic turn that the psychological disciplines (including religious studies) have taken since the 1980s. The value of that turn will depend on the degree of comprehension and explanation that it will offer with regard to the transformation of the conditions of everyday life. The methods available for coming to terms with the new questions concerning religious facts are far from being consolidated in a 'factual canon.' Instead, foundational approaches, such as those of the philological sciences, stand alongside those of philosophical speculation. Examples of the latter would be the theory of → discourse and the 'archaeology of knowledge' of Michel Foucault, or the 'deconstruction' theory of Jacques Derrida. Other elements in the 'mix' will be elaborated theoretical models (such as the semiotic model of Umberto Eco or Thomas Sebeok), or comprehensive theories of culture, supplied by Norbert Elias (1897–1990, in the form of an evolutionary theory of civilization and a dynamic of 'figurations') and Pierre Bourdieu (in the form of an ethno-sociological description of complex societies). When religious studies move into the discursive field of cultural studies, their practitioners gain several advantages. For one thing, they can use one or more theories of culture as frames of reference. For another, they can render the field of research in religion available to interdisciplinary connection. Finally, they can adopt that reflexive distance from their object, draw those basic lines of distinction between observer and object to be able to withstand the pressures of a subject so extraordinarily engaged by emotions and ideologemes as is religion—thereby to move a little nearer to that ideal of engaged 'value-free research' that Max Weber himself first appreciated and practiced.

Another opportunity to react to the changes of the religious environment, and to refine their strategies of reflection, consists, for religious studies in the formation of subordinate disciplines, as a means of broadening, deepening, and objectifying its discourse on religion. Analogously with the received subjects of partial areas, such as the sociology of religion, or anthropology of religion, surely an 'economics of religion' could be established that would research the economic side of religious activity; or an 'aesthetics of religion' directed at art, perception, and the production of signs; a specialized 'pharmacology of religion,' or a 'political science of religion.' Political concepts, after the lethal assaults of September 11, 2001, could help the academic study of religion meet the need of public opinion for explanations. Otherwise, there is the risk that it may fritter away its scholarly life as a 'leftover science' of the topics the theologians leave—ludicrous little groups and sketches of private religion. Or it might be sucked up once more into the philologies and 'culture area studies' that it has already grown out of. Thus, its standpoint is comparative and integrating. For example, it investigates the history of Christianity as part of the → European history of religion—not vice versa. Granted, it would be just as counterproductive for its theoretical cultural direction to flow into a kind of vague 'super-scholarship,' without a solid subject area. An awareness of this threat, however, must not be taken as a call to the academic study of religion to entrench itself behind a received concept of religion. On the contrary, as is shown precisely by recourse to the history of science and reception, it seems necessary to plumb, and to determine, ever anew, the field of the religious object. But here as well, lies the competency of a science of religion determined by cultural history: to connect factual knowledge of religious organizations, texts, systems of belief, and worldviews, with observable social relationships, and with transmission at the hands of the media, with believers' everyday behavior, with 'inborn culture,' with society's knowledge and sciences. That competency will be invoked to increase it, by describing more exactly, by understanding more precisely—and indeed, where possible, to conceive, radically anew, with respect to the twenty-first century—such manners of effect, phenomenal forms, and the functions of those social practices, understandings of the world, and patterns of orientation that we call religion. Only in this way might a 'securing of evidence' of the religious be promised in this century, and one that might be prolonged into the past. It is true, 'redemption' falls to the responsibility and creativity of the individual researcher, man or woman. After all, the same ethos is valid for religious scholarship as for its subject, the religions: by their fruits will you know them.

4. Chronological Overview: Important Writings on the Theory of Religion and the Self-Concept of Religious Studies (1873–2000)

1873	Friedrich Max Müller: Introduction to the Science of Religion: Four Lectures Delivered at the Royal Institution, with Two Essays on False Analogies, and the Philosophy of Mythology, London
1887	Edmund Hardy: Die allgemeine vergleichende Religionswissenschaft im akademischen Studium unserer Zeit. Eine akademische Antrittsrede, Freiburg
1889–1893	Friedrich Max Müller: The Gifford Lectures (Natural Religion, 1889; Physical Religion, 1891; Anthropological Religion, 1892; Theosophy or Psychological Religion, 1893)

1889	William Robertson Smith: Lectures on the Religion of the Semites. First Series: The Fundamental Institutions (^{2}1894)
1890	James George Frazer: The Golden Bough, first ed. in two vols.
1896	Frank B. Jevons: An Introduction to the History of Religion, London
1901	Adolf von Harnack: Die Aufgabe der theologischen Facultäten und die allgemeine Religionsgeschichte. Rede zur Gedächtnisfeier des Stifters der Berliner Universität, Berlin
1902	William James: Varieties of Religious Experience
1903	Wilhelm Bousset: Das Wesen der Religion. Dargestellt an ihrer Geschichte, Halle
	Jane E. Harrison: Prolegomena to the Study of Greek Religion
1904	Thomas Achelis: Abriß der vergleichenden Religionswissenschaft, Leipzig
1909	Arnold van Gennep: Les rites de passage, Paris
1912	Émile Durkheim: Les formes élémentaires de la vie religieuse: Le système totémique en Australie, Paris
1912/13	Sigmund Freud: Totem und Tabu. Einige Übereinstimmungen im Seelenleben der Wilden und Neurotiker
1912–1929	Aby Warburg and Fritz Saxl publish the “Kulturwissenschaftliche” Vorträge der Bibliothek Warburg and the complementary series Studien der Bibliothek Warburg, Hamburg
1917	Rudolf Otto: Das Heilige. Über das Irrationale in der Idee des Göttlichen und sein Verhältnis zum Rationalen, Munich
1920	Nathan Söderblom: Einführung in die Religionsgeschichte, Leipzig
	Max Weber: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, Tübingen (incl. Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus, a study written by Weber already in 1904/5 and revised for publication in 1920)
1924	Joachim Wach: Religionswissenschaft. Prolegomena zu ihrer wissenschaftstheoretischen Grundlegung, Leipzig
	Raffaele Pettazzoni: Svolgimento e carattere della storia delle religioni, Bari
1925	Marcel Mauss: “Essais sur le don,” in: Année sociologique, Nouvelle série 1: 30-186
1933ff.	Eranos-Jahrbücher, ed. by Olga Froebe-Kapteyn
	Gerardus van der Leeuw: Phänomenologie der Religion, Tübingen (^{2}1956)
1944	Joachim Wach: Sociology of Religion, Chicago
1948	Ernesto de Martino: Il mondo magico. Prolegomeni a una storia del magismo
1949	Mircea Eliade: Traité d’histoire des religions, Paris (rev. English version: Patterns in Comparative Religion, New York 1958)
	Idem: Le Mythe de l’éternel retour: Archétypes et répétition, Paris
1958	Claude Lévi-Strauss: Anthropologie structurale, Paris (including the influential essay The Structural Study of Myth [1955])
1959	Mircea Eliade/Joseph M. Kitagawa (eds.): The History of Religions: Essays in Methodology, Chicago
1960	Kurt Goldammer: Die Formenwelt des Religiösen. Grundriß der systematischen Religionswissenschaft, Stuttgart

1961	Mircea Eliade: "History of Religions and a New Humanism," in: History of Religions 1: 1-8
	Friedrich Heiler: Erscheinungsformen und Wesen der Religion, Stuttgart (vol. 1 of the series Religionen der Menschheit)
1964–1971	Claude Lévi-Strauss: Mythologiques I-IV, Paris
1965	Angelo Brelich: Introduzione alla Storia delle religioni, 3 vols., Rom (also important the postumously edited collection Storia delle religioni, perché?, Napels 1979)
1966	Clifford Geertz: "Religion as a Cultural System," in: M. Banton (ed.): Anthropological Approaches to the Study of Religion, London, 1-46 (printed also in the influential volume The Interpretation of Cultures, New York 1973)
1967–1969	Victor Turner's main works are published: The Forest of Symbols (1967); The Drums of Affliction (1968); The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure (1969)
1969	Geo Widengren: Religionsphänomenologie, Berlin
1970	Ugo Bianchi: "Indroduzione," in: G. Castellani (ed.): Storia delle religioni, Turin 1970 (Engl. as The History of Religion, Leiden 1975)
	Mary Douglas: Natural Symbols: Explorations in Cosmology, London (2nd, rev. ed. 1973)
1973	Ninian Smart: The Phenomenon of Religion, London
	Michel Meslin: Pour une science de religion, Paris
1975	Eric J. Sharpe: Comparative Religion: A History
1977	Niklas Luhmann: Funktion der Religion, Frankfurt/M.
1978	Jonathan Z. Smith: Map Is Not Territory: Studies in the History of Religions, Chicago
1981	Hans Peter Duerr (ed.): Der Wissenschaftler und das Irrationale, 2 vols., Frankfurt/M.
1982	Ronald L. Grimes: Beginnings in Ritual Studies, Washington (rev. ed. Columbia 1995)
	Jonathan Z. Smith: Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown, Chicago
1987	Dietmar Kamper/Christoph Wulf: Das Heilige. Seine Spur in der Moderne, Frankfurt/M.
1988	Fritz Stolz: Grundzüge der Religionswissenschaft, Göttingen 1988
1988–2001	Hubert Cancik/Burkhard Gladigow/Karl-Heinz Kohl/Matthias Laubscher (eds.): Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe, 5 vols., Stuttgart
1992	Kurt Rudolph: Geschichte und Probleme der Religionswissenschaft, Leiden
1998	Mark C. Taylor (ed.): Critical Terms for Religious Studies, Chicago
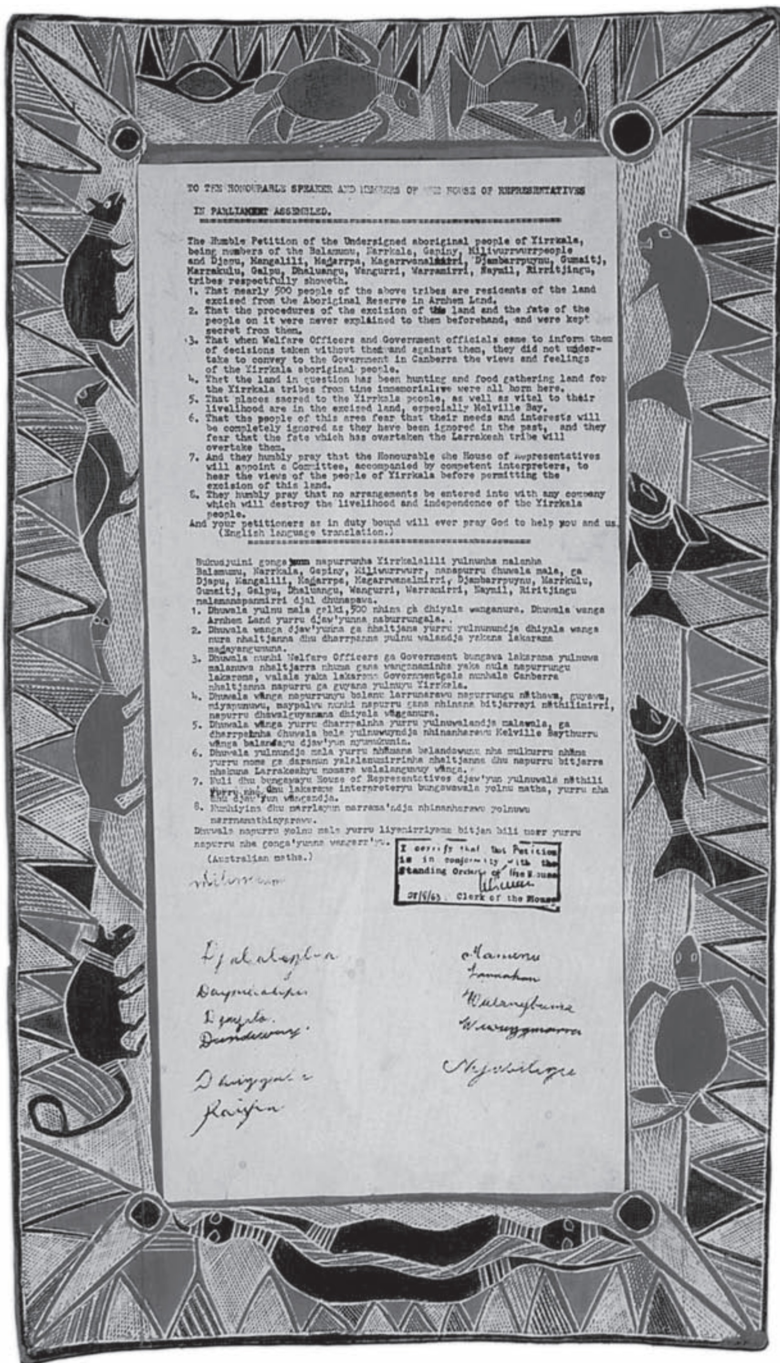
2000	Willi Braun/Russell T. McCutcheon: Guide to the Study of Religion, London
	Niklas Lumann: Die Religion der Gesellschaft, posthumously ed. by André Kieserling, Frankfurt/M.

Aborigines

1. One hundred fifty thousand years after the arrival of the original Australian people, the first colonization of Australia began with Captain Cook. The 'natives,' from now on all called Aborigines, had so little interest in Cook's paltry presents, his material gifts, that Cook wrote in his journal: "All of the things that we gave them, they left lying on the spot and paid no attention to them. On my view, this means that they believe themselves to be provided with all of the necessities of life." The key to the Aborigines' behavior, so astounding to Cook, is to be found in their religion. In the Australia of the Aborigines, a different worldview held sway from the one on the English ship. These people were not technologists, but cosmologists. Mastery of the world through material proficiencies—and they, too, possessed these proficiencies—were counterbalanced by inner abilities.

Myths of Origins: The Totem Ancestors



2. Once upon a time, as recounted by the Aranda and other groups of central Australia, the earth was uncreated and timeless. In the beginning there was only a bare, flat surface, without form and without life. But the moment arrived when a great number of supernatural beings, the totem → ancestors, emerged from their everlasting sleep beneath the surface. Each of these supernatural beings was coupled with a particular animal or plant. Now they proceeded over the plane, and with their creative power began to shape the world, which had existed from all eternity, but without form or order. Mountains, hills, mud holes, plains, springs, rivers are all signs of the deeds of the ancestors of the totems. Here, in the totem-ancestors, were the exemplars and prototypes of plants, animals, and human beings. They erected religious and social institutions, such as the procedures for marriage and initiation, they taught crafts, hunting, and fishing, they regulated natural phenomena such as the tides, seasons, and stages of vegetation. As the totem ancestors went about establishing all of their creative signs in every place, they bestowed on the world its inviolable order.

The myths of the Aborigines identify all of the places where the totem ancestors exercised their activities, as they passed through them or performed ceremonies there. The wanderings of the totem ancestors are to be understood very concretely. Their passages, today as of old, can be retraced. The places where they paused—mountains, rock formations, water holes, and so forth—really exist, and it was these that became sacred by their presence. Their routes overrun the entire land, especially the sacred places of the totems—the special places of the mythical ancestors. And so, as the myths relate, a consistent web arose, analogous to the network of modern streets. Over these pathways, the most divergent groups were mythically united, frequently from great distances, and when the seasons were good and fruitful, these peoples would gather in grand ritual feasts, and these could last for weeks.

Sacred Land

3. Thus, the root of the Aborigines' solidarity with their land is religious. It is the intimate bond between human beings and the environment of their one-time existence, the existence of their ancestors, who continue to live in them. Were the people to be taken from this land, whether by displacement, enticement, or expulsion, they would lose themselves, their culture, their spiritual existence. Were they to be driven from their familiar land

In 1963, the Australian Parliament decided to excise 360 km² from an Aborigine reservation for bauxite mining, in the vicinity of Yirrkala, Northeast Arnheim Land. With their country already settled through decisions of religious and military authorities, the hunting and gathering cultures of the North Australian tribes were now threatened in their daily life and subsistence by the economic sector of Western industrial societies. The operative factor here was the particular structure of Aboriginal religion: the local myths were, among other things, titles to possessions, and only owners might commemorate and recite them. In October 1963, members of the Gumatj tribe, of the Yirritja group, reacted, and dispatched a bilingual petition (the "Bark Petition"), inscribed on eucalyptus bark and painted with ocher, to the Parliament in Canberra, in which they observed that "places sacred to the Yirrkala people [. . .] are in the excised land." The figured lath frame was intended as evidence of the tribe's right to its places of worship and its land. It presents the mythical totem ancestors in the form of creatures of land (below and left), and water creatures (right and above). In times of great demand for raw materials, the myths have of course lost much of their power: In 1968, after a brief delay, a contract was signed between the government and a mining firm in the matter of the mining of bauxite. (Hubert Mohr)

TO THE HONOURABLE SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The Humble Petition of the Undersigned aboriginal people of Yirrkala, being members of the Balamumu, Narrkala, Gapiny, Miliwurrwurrpeople and Djapu, Mangalili, Madarrpa, Magarrwanalmirri, Djambarrpuyngu, Gumaitj, Marrakulu, Galpu, Dhaluangu, Wangurri, Warramirri, Maymil, Rirritjingu, tribes respectfully showeth.

1. That nearly 500 people of the above tribes are residents of the land excised from the Aboriginal Reserve in Arnhem Land.
2. That the procedures of the excision of this land and the fate of the people on it were never explained to them beforehand, and were kept secret from them.
3. That when Welfare Officers and Government officials came to inform them of decisions taken without them and against them, they did not undertake to convey to the Government in Canberra the views and feelings of the Yirrkala aboriginal people.
4. That the land in question has been hunting and food gathering land for the Yirrkala tribes from time immemorial; we were all born here.
5. That places sacred to the Yirrkala people, as well as vital to their livelihood are in the excised land, especially Melville Bay.
6. That the people of this area fear that their needs and interests will be completely ignored as they have been ignored in the past, and they fear that the fate which has overtaken the Larrakeah tribe will overtake them.
7. And they humbly pray that the Honourable the House of Representatives will appoint a Committee, accompanied by competent interpreters, to hear the views of the people of Yirrkala before permitting the excision of this land.
8. They humbly pray that no arrangements be entered into with any company which will destroy the livelihood and independence of the Yirrkala people.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray God to help you and us.
(English language translation.)

Bukudjulni gonga yuwa napurrunha Yirrkalalili yulnunha malanha Balamumu, Narrkala, Gapiny, Miliwurrwurr, nanapurru dhuwala mala, ga Djapu, Mangalili, Madarrpa, Magarrwanalmirri, Djambarrpuyngu, Marrakulu, Gumaitj, Galpu, Dhaluangu, Wangurri, Warramirri, Maymil, Rirritjingu malamanapanmirri djal dhunapawa.

1. Dhuwala yulnu mala gelki, 500 nhina ga dhiyala wanganura. Dhuwala wanga Arnhem Land yurru djaw'yunna napurrungala.
2. Dhuwala wanga djaw'yuna ga nhaltjana yurru yulnuwundja dhiyala wanga nura nhaltjanna dhu dharrpanna yulnu walandja yakana lakarama madayangumana.
3. Dhuwala nunhi Welfare Officers ga Government bungawa lakarama yulnuwa malanuwa nhaltjarra nhuma gana wangunaminha yaka nula napurrungu lakarama, walala yaka lakarama Governmentgala nunhala Canberra nhaltjanna napurru ga guyana yulnuyu Yirrkala.
4. Dhuwala wanga napurrunyu bolanu larrunarawu napurrungu mathawa, guyawa, miyapunuwu, maypalwu nunhi napurru gana nhinana bitjarrayi mathilimirri, napurru dhawalguyanana dhiyala wanganura.
5. Dhuwala wanga yurru dharrpalnha yurru yulnuwalandja malawala, ga dharrpalnha dhuwala bala yulnuwuyndja nhinanharawu Melville Baythurru wanga balanda yu djaw'yun nyumukunin.
6. Dhuwala yulnundja mala yurru nhamana balandawuny nha mulkurru nhama yurru nome ga daranun yalalanumirrinha nhaltjanna dhu napurru bitjarra nhakuna Larrakeahyu nomare walalangumuy wanga.
7. Nuli dhu bungawayu House of Representatives djaw'yun yulnuwala mathili yurru nha dhu lakarama interpreteryu bungawawala yolnu matha, yurru nha dhu djaw'yun wangandja.
8. Nunhiyina dhu marrlayun marrama'ndja nhinanharawu yolnuwu marrnamathinyarawu.

Dhuwala napurru yolnu mala yurru liyamirriyama bitjan bili nuur yurru napurru nha gonga'yunna wangarr'yu.

(Australian matha.)

I certify that this Petition is in conformity with the Standing Orders of the House of myth, the new land on which they would have to live would no longer be sacred land. No longer would they know the name of each place, or what had once transpired there. They would be ignorant of the myths connected with it. Their own myth and the foreign place would not be connected. The clan or family that had migrated to a specially prepared locale would become literally disoriented, and the hereditary myths would now be meaningless. The collapse of the traditional, mythically rooted social order would now be but a question of time. The older generation, which had once experienced the conjunction of myth and land, could no longer hand down, to new generations, this connection between the two.
Clerk of the House

Collapse of the Aboriginal Culture

4. Here we have an important cause of the rapid disintegration of the Aborigines' cultures and religion. This is the result of two hundred years of European colonization, along with the devastation of fields and calculated genocide. The world is no longer the same. Aborigines no longer hunt for their own sustenance—they get their meat and vegetables out of cans now—and have gotten used to eating bread from plastic bags. Their old disdain for all that is material, their enthusiasm for the invisible deeds of the invisible totem ancestors, has given place to the desire for their own automobile, their own television, and the latest fashion. And not only the Aborigines' diet and values have changed, but their perceptions, as well. Now the rain comes down without the rain ritual. Of course, this situation scarcely relieves the 'whites' of their obligation to study the mythic rights demanded by the Aborigines, and at times to recognize them.

Phenomenon of Reception: The 'Dream Time'

5. The cultures of the Aborigines, as with so many other indigenous groups and peoples, are subjugated to the need of the West for its own bestowal of meaning. And a concept like that of the 'dream time' is especially well calculated for the restoration of a little color to the dreamless everyday. And yet few concepts are the victim of such fundamental misunderstanding as that of the 'dream time.' The original word of the Aranda, altjira, means "eternal," "uncreated." The Aranda know no delimited 'dream time,' in the sense of a past or particular age. For them, altjira is a world that has begun in eternity, but whose end is impossible to predict. The mythical totem ancestors—so it is believed—live today just as they have from all eternity, and just as they will do everlastingly. Of course, the exploitation of indigenous cultures is not limited to their original, spiritual property. In particular, indigenous music is submitted to availability for a price, in a billion dollar enterprise of big industry. And so it is no surprise today that a didjeridoo-player sits at nearly every street corner, making hopeless attempts to get a bit of Australia into the spaces between the shops and the consumption fetishists with their wild plunges.

Literature

Berndt, Ronald M./Berndt, Catherine H., Man, Land and Myth in North Australia, Sydney 1970; Kolig, Erich, The Silent Revolution: The Effects of Modernization on Australian Aboriginal Religion, Philadelphia 1981; Schlatter, Gerhard, Mythos.

Streifzüge durch Tradition und Gegenwart, Munich 1978; Strehlow, Theodor G. H., Aranda Traditions, Melbourne 1968.

→ Ancestors, Animal I, Colonialism, South Sea

Gerhard Schlatter

Abortion / Contraception

1. Unplanned pregnancies, family planning, and the limitation of fertility and births have posed a problem for all cultures and eras. Abortion—the termination of an already existing pregnancy—as well as contraceptive means and methods intended to prevent a new pregnancy, are attempts to respond to this human problem, and as such are anthropological universals. In a historical perspective, and in an intercultural comparison, an important role has been played with respect to unwanted or illegitimate offspring by infanticide, exposure of infants, and prescriptions of sexual abstinence during lactation (post-partum taboos). The moral attitudes and legal rules that persons of various religious confessions have formulated at various times with regard to these practices cover a broad spectrum of acceptance and legitimization, from taboo to torture and capital punishment. Characteristic of the history of abortion and contraception in Europe is a constantly recurring discrepancy between an everyday attitude toward judicial and moral concerns, and the official opinions of religious elites (just as, later, toward the arguments of legal determination and medical experts). In the course of the twentieth century, abortion and contraception in Europe, the United States, and Israel repeatedly sparked debates on basic questions, in which conflicting positions in the area of morals and → ethics, theological and religious stances, and politico-juridical demands were in mutual opposition.

On the History of Abortion and Birth Control in Europe

2. It is evident that all eras had hosted a broad folk knowledge of abortive and contraceptive drugs and practices, partly of a magical nature, before abortion gradually penetrated, in the eighteenth century, the fields of scientific medicine. Since the nineteenth century, contraceptive products have increasingly become industrial commodities, to be dealt with as merchandise.

Patriarchal motives for proscribing abortion date from → antiquity, when exposure of infants, contraception, and abortion were considered morally and ethically neutral in themselves. The fetus was regarded simply as part of the mother's innards. The concept of a fetal right to life in the modern sense was nonexistent. Roman law provided no protection for the developing life. What was protected was the patria potestas, the power of the male head of the family to rear and rule. Hence the only abortions punished were those performed against the will of the male.

→ Christianity set conception and pregnancy in a religious context. The right of life and death over one's dependents was transferred from the earthly father to the divine, and human existence was shifted from the state of its mere appearances to a transcendence related to God. Contraception and abortion were now characterized as sin, and prohibited. Books dealing with confession and penance, however, present, over centuries, a contradictory picture of actual attitudes and behaviors. The ancient Church battled a long while over the exact point in time of the 'ensoulment' of the fetus, and thereby over the degree of culpability attaching to abortion. The theological disputants embraced the notion, originally ascribed to Aristotle, of a 'successive ensoulment': the gestating offspring was endowed with a rational soul, as well as differentiated by gender, only after a vegetative and a 'sensitive' (or animal) stage of development. Only in 1869 did Roman Catholic dogma affirm the simultaneity of conception and a specifically human ensoulment. Charles V's Carolina (1532) was the first civil law book to attach penalties to abortion, and this only for the case of an abortion performed during the second half of gestation. This determination corresponded to the ordinary person's common-sense view, inasmuch as a 'pathological interruption of menstruation' in the early months of pregnancy could scarcely be distinguished from an actual pregnancy, nor a spontaneous stillbirth from a planned abortion. Subsequently, and gradually, the supervision of the population, and punishment for abortion, were transferred to the hands of the state. In 1871, in Germany, paragraph 218 of the Imperial Book of Civil Penalties forbade all abortion, irrespective of the stage of pregnancy. In the public controversies conducted during the time of the Weimar Republic, abortion was thematized less as a question of conscience than as the problem of a national policy of population and society. The era of National Socialism showed the true dimensions of the terror that can be unleashed by an adroit technocracy that serves the interests of policies of → eugenics and population control. While abortions performed on themselves by "Aryan" women were punishable by death, women who failed to meet the racist and eugenic standards of the powerful of the time had to submit to abortion and sterilization against their will.

Jizo Bodhisattva figures in front of a Buddhist temple (Kofu, Yamanashi Prefecture) in Japan. Jizo Bosatu is the patron saint of children, and is especially venerated by family members who have had an abortion, miscarriage, or stillbirth. The figures are gently and attentively provided with caps and bibs as if they were babies. Usual offerings are vegetables, baked goods, sweets, and toys. In so-called 'abortion temples' (e.g., Hasedera, Kamakura), those concerned find guest books in which they may inscribe prayers, testimonials of gratitude, or confessions to obtain inner peace. (S. Beyreuther)

Positions of Other Religions

3. Different religions have made varying assessments of abortion and the status of the embryo. In 1955, an anthropological investigation of four hundred indigenous non-European cultures concluded that, despite the dangers and physical pain involved in abortion, almost all of those cultures researched practice abortive techniques.[1] The overwhelming majority regards an aborted fetus not as a human being, but as a (good or threatening) preternatural being, or as a lifeless object.

In Islam, in Hinduism, in Buddhism, and in the belief of the Parsis, there have been prohibitions against abortion, but they are frequently more leniently formulated and interpreted than in Christianity. The Qur'an formulates no explicit prescriptions. The Islamic jurists and physicians of the Middle Ages gave straightforward and abundant information concerning contraceptive drugs and coitus interruptus. Time limits for abortion, as well, are known in Islam. A 1964 Jordanian fatwa, for instance, permits the removal of the conceptus from a woman's body during the first 120 days. But such relatively moderate pronouncements are interpreted more restrictively in law even today.

The condemnation of abortion in → Buddhism rests on the basic moral position that assesses any destruction of sentient life as a moral transgression. However, for example, in Japan mechanical and medicinal abortion procedures, along with infanticide, were widely practiced, and de facto permitted, beginning in the seventeenth century. In the traditional view, the ideal was three children per family. The appearance of an ensouled life was indicated by the first cry of the newborn. Even in Japan today, abortion is a customary means of family planning. It is considered morally neutral, and is lawful up to the twenty-third week of pregnancy; from then on, however, the law punishes it as murder.

Ethic Conflicts Today

4. In Western industrial countries, as also in many non-Western societies, contraception is widely practiced as routine, and accepted. This seems also to be the case in traditional Catholic regions, although the Catholic Church itself rejects mechanical, chemical, and hormonal contraception even in marriage, permitting only natural methods (Knaus-Ogino, rhythm). Protestant churches view contraception and birth control as issues to be decided by employing situational ethics for each individual case. Birth control is a matter of debate in a context of the policies of population control in 'Third World' countries.

The World Health Organization (WHO) estimates the annual number of abortions worldwide to be between thirty and fifty million. Despite legal prohibitions, approximately one-half of these are performed in 'unlawful' circumstances. In Europe and the United States, more recent conflict and controversy over abortion has continued to be maintained in a spirit of volatility and emotion. In the 1970s, the → women's movement came forward with vigorous demands for the rights of women over their own bodies, and in many countries more liberal time limits and other conditions have been introduced in the regulation of abortion in penal law. Today, meanwhile, Protestant → fundamentalists and members of evangelical Free Churches in particular have ranged themselves, in a context of the pro-life movement originating in the United States, on the side of the Catholic Church, in favor of a strict prohibition of abortion. At the center of the controversy stand considerations on the moral and juridical status of the fetus. Developments in human genetics and in the medical treatment of reproduction have optically (especially with the use of ultra-sound) and practically (e.g., with in vitro fertilization) detached the fetus from the mother's body (→ Genetic Engineering). Such developments are gradually focusing attention on the special and unique nature of pregnancy in the sense of a psychic and physical symbiosis. Juridically, abortion is perceived as a conflict of interest between two apparently autonomous subjects. In these terms, the fetus may be owed protection even against the interests of the mother. Critics of this position claim that to ascribe an independent status to the fetus undermines the personal rights of the woman, and contradicts the feminine experience of pregnancy. Thus, the discourse upon a 'conflict of interest' is by no means morally and metaphysically neutral; rather it reflects the influence of a socially atomized culture.

1. Devereux 1976.

Literature

Bennet, Belinda (ed.), Abortion, Aldershot 2004; Bock, Gisela, "Racism and Sexism in Nazi-Germany: Motherhood, Compulsory Sterilisation and the State," in: Signs. Journal of Women in Culture and Society 8/3 (1983), pp. 400-421; Boyle, Joseph (ed.), Abortion and Christian Ethics, Philadelphia 2005; Devereux, George, A Study of Abortion in Primitive Society, New York 1976 ([1]1955); Duden, Barbara, Disembodying Women: Perspectives on Pregnancy and the Unborn, Cambridge 1993; Eser, Albin/Koch, H.-G., Abortion in International Comparison: Findings, Insights, Proposals, ed. by the Centre for Ethics and Law in Medicine, Freiburg 2000; LaFleur, William, Liquid Life: Abortion and Buddhism in Japan, Princeton 1995; Mohr, James, Abortion in America: The Origins and Evolution of National Policy, 1800–1900, Oxford 1987; Riddle, John M., Contraception and Abortion from the Ancient World to the Renaissance, Cambridge 1992; Siegel Watkins, Elisabeth, On the Pill: A Social History of Contraceptives, 1950–1970, Baltimore/London 1998; United Nations, Department of Economic and Social Affairs, Population Division (ed.), Abortion Policies: A Global Review, New York 2001–2002.

→ Death and Dying, Ethics/Morals, Eugenics, Euthanasia/Assisted Suicide, Family, Fundamentalism, Gender Stereotypes, Sexuality, Sin, Women's Movement/Spiritual Feminism.

Michaela Knecht

Academic Study of Religion

Religious Studies and Theology

1. The academic study of religion (Religionswissenschaft), or religious studies, appeared only in the last third of the nineteenth century. Being of such recent date, and disposing of such a limited number of academic chairs, it is not well established in the public consciousness. Not infrequently, the 'new' discipline is confused with Christian theology, and it can easily happen that, when its students are asked what it is they study, they are confronted with the additional question: Protestant or Catholic religious studies? Quite against this presupposition, the discipline of religious studies is to be distinguished vis-à-vis their subject ('object') from → theology, and, in view of its methodology, should instead be listed under the umbrella of cultural and social sciences. Christian theology is first and foremost the 'science' or 'study of the faith,' and works from 'Christian faith premises,' namely, from premises given in biblical revelation. Only in consequence of distinct truths of faith can there be a Protestant, Catholic, or, indeed, Islamic or Jewish theology. The academic study of religion, on the contrary, stands outside religious systems. It concerns itself not with 'God,' but, as its very name declares, with → religion, and this only insofar as the latter can be considered empirically. Reflections, or, rather, ontological speculations upon whether, and in what manner, the reality believed in the several religions as 'supernatural' indeed manifests itself, remain a nameless topic, as far as human naming is concerned, but are not part of religious studies. (Actually, the Belgian Count Goblet d'Avila proposed in 1908 that this 'nameless' subject be denominated "hierosophy," as noted approvingly by Henri Corbin in his 1948 lecture The Voyage and the Messenger.) An academic study of religion that was itself religious, and resting on articles of belief, would be a self-contradiction.

Pre-History and Influences

2. The origins of a scientific or scholarly attention to religion are to be found in the era of classical antiquity. As early as the sixth century BCE, the Greek philosophy of nature concerned itself with a more rational relationship to the world of the gods. The Homeric epics and other texts in religious mythology were gradually understood as such, and no longer as representing historical reality. Various religious theories arose in which the central focus was no longer on the gods and their pretensions, but on the human beings, with their conceptualizations and requirements (Xenophanes, Epicurus, Democrites). Views of this kind were readily open to the suspicion of an → atheism that would be inimical to the state, and their representatives were punished for it. Nevertheless, the reflection on religion that was perceived by so many as desecration represented an essential prerequisite for the understanding of nature and its causal connections. Thus it formed an indispensable component of the ancient foundation on which stands the whole of the Western scientific tradition. The leading Roman thinkers also took up the intellectual impulses grounded in objectivization of religious thought, and developed them in their works of religious philosophy and ethnography (Varro, Cicero, Lucretius, Caesar, Tacitus). After Christianity had succeeded to the legacy of the Roman Empire, confrontation with non-Christian religions was waged first and foremost under the sign of a repulse of → 'paganism.' Here, church apologetics beginning in the early Middle Ages was directed especially against Islam. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, numerous voyages of discovery enlarged Europe's geographical field of vision, and allowed a series of 'new' religions to come into view, unbounded by Christian horizons. The narrow attitude of the Middle Ages dissolved, and a secular conception of Christianity gradually appeared. In their reflections on antiquity, the humanists set up rules for a critical philological analysis of religious texts, thereby contributing to the emergence of a scholarship that could be independent of the dogmatic primacy of the Christian religion (→ Renaissance; Text). But it was only in the era of the → Enlightenment that the autonomy of human reason, and its emancipation from religious thought, had progressed to the extent that a purely scientific treatment of religion could begin. Like all recent scientific disciplines, religious studies, as well, had its point of departure in the Enlightenment, and in the fundamental discrepancy, maintained by the French encyclopedists, British deism, and German philosophy, between the knowledges arrived at through faith and through scientific understanding.

'Phenomenology of Religion'

Finally, Enlightenment thought made its way into theology as well, and led to serious confrontations over the relation of rationalism and revelation. Arising from the effort to compose reason and feeling with religion, an influential line of the scholarly religious tradition proceeded through F. D. E. Schleiermacher (1768–1834), and that line, by way of Rudolf Otto (Das Heilige. Über das Irrationale in der Idee des Göttlichen und sein Verhältnis zum Rationalen—Ger., "The Holy: The Irrational in the Idea of the Divine and Its Relation to the Rational"; 1917), led to the appearance of a 'phenomenology of religion.' Even though the latter direction, which frequently represented liberal theological views, saw one of its goals in a defeat of the Enlightenment, it had nonetheless become impossible for the academic study of religion to retreat behind a particular position of reflection. The great achievements of biblical criticism, or of the religionsgeschichtliche Schule, render eloquent testimony to the success that can be expected from a historicization of Christianity through a comparison with its neighbor religions. Far more important for a genuinely scientific knowledge of religion was the development of classical and oriental philologies, whose representatives undertook the mighty task of collecting, translating, and classifying the religious tradition of all of the peoples of the earth.

Religious Studies as an Academic Discipline

3. Rather correctly then, the Oxford professor, Indologist Friedrich Max Müller (1823–1900) is regarded as actually the chief founder of religious studies. With his fifty-volume collection of sources of sacred scriptures (Sacred Books of the East, 1879ff.), he engineered an important contribution to research in religious history. Furthermore, he drafted a theoretical program for the new religious studies that he had called for, and that soon blossomed in numerous European universities. Engagement of the results of folkloric and ethnological research made it possible to promote a scientific discussion on developmental thoughts in religious history (→ Evolutionism), on the influence of notions of the → soul in their regard, and on the relation of myth, ritual, and → magic to religion. Scholars tried to order these concepts in a connection with human culture, and then addressed the social function of religion as well. In the interdisciplinary dialogue on the complex question of the anthropological structure of patterns of religious behavior, the notion of progress sometimes at hand in these conversations (occasioning the perception of 'primitive' religions, as well as religion per se as merely the expression of undeveloped civilization) gradually withdrew into the background. In Switzerland, France, and the Netherlands, academic chairs were in place as early as the 1870s, while in Germany it was only in 1910 that an independent professorial position was created at the University of Berlin. After the First World War, Bonn, Leipzig, Marburg, and Tübingen developed into centers of research in religious studies, which—though the fact is often overlooked—enjoyed more and more favor even under the ideological premises of National Socialism. After 1945, the vigorously anti-Christian character of the religious studies of the 'Third Reich,' which had dubbed itself völkisch, or 'Aryan,' inevitably provoked a reaction. Now the attempt was made—except in Leipzig, which gained a special position—to strike a connection with the line of tradition of religious studies typified by theology, or religious phenomenology (G. van der Leeuw, R. Otto, F. Heiler, G. Mensching). This trend did not prevail, however, and was replaced by a progressive self-definition on the part of religious scholars themselves, in the organizational framework of the areas of philosophy.

Social Meaning and Importance

4. As with any other university discipline, certain obligatory tasks in research devolved upon religious studies. Alongside these, however, in the wake of a growing globalization, coupled with a simultaneous decrease in the institutionalization of religion, religious studies came to acquire an amplified sociopolitical meaning and importance. The opportunity is now increasingly at hand of coming to know new religions, in direct or indirect contact with immigrants, on trips, or even in a chair via the Internet, and the number of those seeking their salvation outside the church on the free market of the New Age has climbed into the millions. Whether this comports a growing danger to society is earnestly disputed—rather with occasional exaggeration, with irrelevant sets of questions not infrequently playing an overblown role. A debate less oriented to criteria determined by a worldview, but, instead, to the question of the political rights of religious minorities, or to the relation between state and church generally, would be altogether desirable. On manifold grounds, therefore, there is an elevated need for the communication of a competency in orientation in the area of religion that is not itself guided by a religious interest. Here, tolerance and openness, joined with a scholarly objectivity regarding all religious meanings and interpretations, constitutes the continued importance of an academic study of religion.

Literature

Encyclopedic Works: Betz, Hans Dieter et al. (eds.), Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, 6 vols., Tübingen [4]1998ff.; Cancik, Hubert et al. (eds.), Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe, 5 vols., Stuttgart 1988–2001; Eliade, Mircea (ed.), The Encyclopedia of Religion, 16 vols., New York 1987 (new ed. 2005); Schröder, Christel Matthias et al. (eds.), Die Religionen der Menschheit, Stuttgart 1960ff. (c. 30 vols. until today).

Introductions and History of the Discipline: Braun, Willi/McCutcheon, Russell T. (eds.), Guide to the Study of Religion, London/New York 2000; Filoramo, Giovanni, Che cos'è la religione: Temi metodi problemi, Vicenza 2004; Kippenberg, Hans G., Discovering Religious History in the Modern Age, Princeton 2002; Kippenberg, Hans G./von Stuckrad, Kocku, Einführung in die Religionswissenschaft: Gegenstände und Begriffe, Munich 2003; McGuire, Meredigh B., Religion: The Social Context, Belmont [5]2002; Michaels, Axel (ed.), Klassiker der Religionswissenschaft, Munich 1997; Molendijk, Arie L./Pels, Peter (eds.), Religion in the Making: The Emergence of the Sciences of Religion, Leiden 1998; Taylor, Mark C. (ed.), Critical Terms for Religious Studies, Chicago/London 1998; Warms, Richard et al. (eds.), Sacred Realms: Essays in Religion, Belief, and Society, New York/Oxford 2004; Woodhead, Linda (ed.), Religions in the Modern World, London/New York 2002.

Critical Methodology: Antes, Peter et al. (eds.), New Approaches to the Study of Religion, Berlin/New York 2003; Dubuisson, Daniel, The Western Construction of Religion: Myths, Knowledge, and Ideology, Baltimore/London 2003; Jensen, Jeppe Sinding, The Study of Religion in a New Key: Theoretical and Philosophical Soundings in the Comparative and General Study of Religion, Aarhus 2003; Jensen, Jeppe Sinding et al. (eds.), Rationality and the Study of Religion, Aarhus 1997; McCutcheon, Russsel T., Manufacturing Religion: The Discourse on Sui Generis Religion and the Politics of Nostalgia, New York/Oxford 1997; Sharpe, Eric: Comparative Religions: A History, London 1986; Smith, Jonathan Z., Map Is Not Territory: Studies in the History of Religion, Chicago/London 1978; Idem, Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown, Chicago/London 1982; Idem, Relating Religion: Essays in the Study of Religion, Chicago/London 2004; Waardenburg, Jacques (ed.), Classical Approaches to the Study of Religion, Berlin/New York 1999; Whaling, Frank, Contemporary Approaches to the Study of Religion, 2 vols., Berlin/New York 1999; Wiegers, Gerard (ed.), Modern Societies and the Science of Religions, Leiden 2002.

→ Animism, Colonialism, Evolutionism, Psychoanalysis, Religion, Science, Theology; see also "Introduction: The Academic Study of Religion—Historical and Contemporary Issues" (vol. I)

Horst Junginger

Advertising

1. The term "advertising" denotes a competition-oriented form of mass communication, through various media, for economic, cultural, or religious purposes. Unlike other forms of information transmittal, the → communication content of advertising is usually received adventitiously, rather than being purposely sought by recipients. As a significant factor in the economy, and as a part of popular culture, advertising is more and more frequently the object of analyses on the part of cultural studies, as well as a focus of public controversy. In particular, representatives of the Christian churches hold up their side of the debate over advertising's utilization of religious symbolism, its violation of ethical principles, and its prospective usurpation of religion itself.

Economic Advertising Utilizing Religious Content and Symbols

2. Since the 1960s, and with striking acceleration in the 1990s, economic advertising of goods and services has been calling on the rich store of symbols ready to hand in the usages of the various religions. A basis for this is constituted by the necessity of fixing on, and adapting to, the Zeitgeist. For advertising to gain acceptance and attention, it must feature an orientation to themes of current relevance, as presented, for example, in the spiritual quest beyond institutionalized forms of religion. With familiar elements of Christianity—especially the roles of parish priests, nuns, and so on—being presented more and more disdainfully as a negative foil for the modern lifestyle, Buddhism and ethnic religions such as those that come from India are seen as offering a different, idealistically transfigured world. These religious manifestations begin to function as a screen for the projection of longings, and sometimes fears as well, on the part of an audience wounded by civilization. Advertising, consequently, by continuing to rely on persistent clichés and prejudices, contributes to the spread of stereotyped images of religion. Furthermore, television advertising, as well as that of the more traditional media, more and more frequently portrays individualized and privatized religion. Opportunities available to advertisers provide an especially convenient venue for the presentation of individual self-realization and freedom, those salient themes of modern societies, in a religious context. Any product at all, it would seem, from mineral water to a vacation adventure, can be advertised through an appeal to religious practices like → yoga or → meditation. The application of these and other elements, borrowed from the most diverse religions, reflects two phenomena. For one, it mirrors the developing loss of relevance in the existential, life-regulating properties of daily life that had been institutionalized by the churches, and thus reflects the accompanying turn to other religions. Second, the broad overspill of religious elements into various areas of society is endowed with another expression: Religions now compete not only with other religions, but with components of the mass culture, as well (for example, television, newspapers, pop music), that seek ever more comprehensively to assume traditional religious functions—day-to-day living assistance, for instance, comfort in bereavement, or personal orientation—through a strategy of limitation of alternatives (contingency reduction), in order to consolidate economically profitable bonds with consumers. The adoption of religious symbolism in advertising does not necessarily—as it so frequently does in Western countries—lead to public debates and protests. It can, as we observe in India, experience wide acceptance, and even produce new mythic forms.

3. Scientific investigation into advertising has not as yet produced adequate justification for speaking of advertising as a champion of religion. Certain theologians, by way of apologia, and isolated communications researchers do maintain such a discourse, comparing the reception of product advertising to the veneration of religious objects.[1] But no empirical studies on this question are available in the sociology or psychology of religion. Frequently, advertising—in keeping with outmoded models of communication—is ascribed an immense effect on the (religious) experience of its recipients. Instead, the point of departure ought to be the fact that peripheral social and situational conditions, like the public repertory of value conceptualizations and human experiences, determine the selection, perception, and effects of media.

1. Bolz/Bosshart 1995, 197; Albrecht 1993, 34.

Literature

Albrecht, Horst, Die Religion der Massenmedien, Stuttgart 1993; Bolz, Norbert/ Bosshart, David, Kult-Marketing. Die neuen Götter des Marktes, Düsseldorf 1995; Budde, M. L., The (Magic) Culture of God: Christianity and Global Culture Industries, Boulder 1997; Sauvageot, Anne, Figures de la publicité, figures du monde, Paris 1987; White, J. Daniel, "Sacralizing Consumerism. Advertising in Modern India," in: Visible Religion. Annual for Religious Iconography 7 (1990), 295-307.

→ Media, Popular Culture, Perception, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Private Religion, Symbol, Television

Markus Saborowski

Africa I: Northern Africa Including the Sahel

1. In the course of history, the part of the African continent lying north of the equator has been constantly spliced into the cultural development of its neighboring regions. Favored by the environment of the Mediterranean basin, the valley of the Nile, and the West African coastal region, Northern and Northeastern Africa were periodically influenced by (and at times out-and-out integrated with) the high cultures of their neighbors. The dry desert area of the Sahara and the neighboring caravan zone of the Sahel, bordering on the South, resisted these phenomena until the end of the first Christian millennium as an insurmountable barrier to such exogenous influences. This internal geographical bisection of the North African continent was decisive for the latter's cultural and religious history.

Ancient and Medieval Christianity

The Imperium Romanum knitted the Northern African coastal region into Roman civilization and the confessional politics of the Empire. Thus, Jewish immigrants from Palestine reached Cyrene, Tripoli, and Proconsular Africa. Beginning in the second century, an active Jewish community life developed in the cities of the Roman provinces. The long, meandering history of this Jewish diaspora in North Africa, right through the Islamic era into the present, arrived at a sudden destination—however imperfect—only in the founding of the State of Israel and the immigration there of nearly a million 'African' Jews. Even today, small Jewish communities exist in Morocco, Tunisia, Egypt, and Ethiopia.

The ongoing and sustained Christianization of the North African provinces, first by way of Rome, then through Byzantium, came to expression only in the middle of the third century, with the founding of a distinct African church—that of the Donatists. The Donatist ecclesiastical struggle with Roman Catholics could not, again, be pacified even with the intervention of the doctor of the Church, → Augustine, born at Hippo Regius in Africa. It was not until the beginning of the eighth century that the Islamic caliphate, with its centers in Damascus and Baghdad, annexed the southern Mediterranean lands and Spain in a lengthy process of conquest. It had been Christianity, until then, and with it the Latin language, that had spread out among the indigenous population of North Africa. That religion had organized itself into hundreds of bishoprics, of which the greater number belonged to the Eastern Roman Church in Damascus. A few survived until well into the Islamic era. In the year 1053, Pope Leo IX complained that, 'in all of Africa,' only five bishoprics remained. He ignored the existence of another African Christian church, which in the fifteenth century motivated a second Christianization of Africa, one originating in Europe and enduring to the present day—the Monophysite Nubian Church, which, beginning in the sixth century, managed to establish itself in various political jurisdictions south of the First Cataract of the Nile. Between Meroe, capital of Nubia, and the Ethiopian highlands, a number of Christian kingdoms maintained their sovereignty against the Islamic movements coming from the Sudan in the North and the Somalian coast to the Southeast. In the year 1542, Ethiopian Christians, side by side with Portuguese colonial troops, won a decisive victory against the Muslims from Harat, who were reinforced by Ottoman troops. The myth of Ethiopian king Prester John, and his liberation from the Islamic yoke—an old Crusader notion—was here conclusively replaced with the double offensive of Christian colonization and mission.

The Islamic Permeation

3. With the year 652, and the negotiation of a lasting peace treaty between Muslim troops and their Christian adversaries in Nubia, and the year 710, as an expeditionary force consisting of Arabs and Islamized Berbers occupied the old Roman garrison-city of Tangiers in Morocco, there began, for the Northern African continent, the most pervasive and longest-lasting phase of its cultural and religious development. The special routes and forms of then prevailing Islamic history swept the African peoples uninterruptedly into the Muslim wake as they entered world history. Camel and Qur'an overcame nature's obstacle, the Sahel, and the groundwork was prepared for an immensely varied Islamic-African culture. Giving and taking defined the imprint of the regional cultures. First, these learned to know one another. Commodities, ideas, and proficiencies were exchanged. As early as the tenth century, a black-slave rebellion erupted on the Euphrates. At the same time, Sudanese princes assumed Arabic pedigrees. In Morocco's West, a Berber clan-prophet revealed a "Qur'an" in Berber. The Islamization and development of the regional cultures thereby flowed by altogether different routes in the North and East, as well as south of the Sahara.

Northern Africa (Maghreb)

a) North Africa retained the impress of Roman civilization well into the Islamic era. Muslim religious policy provided protection for Christian and Jewish communities in exchange for political and fiscal support. The political confusion of the early centuries waveringly allowed the rise of an urban Islamic culture, permitted by the assimilation of the predominantly agrarian and semi-Nomadic Berber population. The latter remained organized in clans, only sluggishly adopting what was Arab, and developing specific transitional forms of Islamic tradition. Individual clans and entire regions were converted to heterodox faith and orientations, through which they attempted to be delivered from the central claim to supremacy of the Islamic caliphs. Only beginning in the eleventh century can there be any question of a broad Islamization of the Maghreb (Northwest Africa). In the West, the 'scholarly princes' formed their Berber clans into military federations, with the purpose of subjugating to the true faith the only superficially Islamized, or even frankly heretical, Berbers. The largest of these reform movements, that of the Almoravids (1046–1147; from the Arabic al-murābiṭūn, "border fighter"), was the agent of North Africa's unanimous confession, from this point forward, of the Mālikīya school of jurisprudence, one of the four such schools acknowledged in Islam. This movement and the subsequent Almohads (1116–1269; from the Arabic al-muwaḥḥidūn, "the confessors of unity") were of lasting meaning for the spread of the Islamic religion into the Sahara and the region of the Sahel. The West African "Marabout," the Islamic saint and healer, bears a name related to these Arabic ones. As a result of the regional phenomena under consideration, and with the impulse of the Christian reconquest (reconquista) of the Iberian Peninsula and the beginning of Portuguese colonization—only in 1415 does a North African city, Ceuta, again become Christian—regional Islamic dynasties throughout North Africa waxed in strength. The result was that, through all vicissitudes, they managed to maintain, predominantly, their independence from the European and Eastern powers all the way into the modern age. At the same time, if in an altogether different manner, they legitimated their claim to dominion utilizing Islamic concepts. Descendancy from the family of the Prophet → Muhammad is the foundation of the legitimacy of the Moroccan monarchs (sharifs) even today.

Another trait of the grounding of secular and spiritual authority, and a characteristic one for North Africa, is the → veneration of saints. On the one hand, it led to the foundation of countless so-called Zāwiyas—places, scattered round about, for the activity of scholars who developed Islamic organizations transmitting the teachings and rituals of the founder. At the same time, in the wake of this veneration of charismatic personalities, the movement of the Islamic mystical brotherhoods (in Arabic, ṭarīqa, "ways, paths") could spread elsewhere in North Africa. The most important Eastern source besides the Shāḏilīya was the Qādirīya, which found followers as early as the thirteenth century. From the end of the eighteenth century, the brotherhood movement acquired new momentum. In Tijānīya (Morocco, Senegal, Sudan), Šanūsīya (Libya), and Idrīsīya (Sudan, Somalia), disciples of Islamic scholar-preachers who had been inspired by revelation and now were revered as saints, formed new brotherhoods. In North Africa, as well as far beyond, these have today developed into tight networks. In terms of their religious, economic, and political influence, these associations have the importance of a supra-state phenomenon.

West Africa and the Sudan Belt

b) From the beginning of the ninth century, the region between Lake Chad and the Atlantic was connected with the lands of the Maghreb by routes that crossed the Sahara. On the long towrope of this commerce—this carrier of persons and merchandise in both directions—swept the Islamic confession. The latter guaranteed the status required for contract and trade security in these inaccessible, unsure territories. With Arabic script and the ritual conventions of Islam and its law—the Shar'ia—a bridge was thrown across the desert. Under the influence of Muslim commercial settlements springing up south of the Sudan, African rulers, as we read in the reports of eleventh-century Arab merchants, began to 'convert to Islam.' The 'Islam' to which they converted has often been misunderstood—as it is even today—and this precisely in the nuclear Islamic countries. A timeless trait of concrete African religiosity is the preservation of an African identity within the claim to universal unity mounted by the Islamic religious culture. The first 'Islamic' kingdoms—the one stretching from Ghana to Senegal and Mauritania, the Kingdom of Mali around Timbuktu, the one of the Songhay at the midmost bend of the Niger River, and Kanem-Bornu on Lake Chad—constitute singular evidence of a conviction disseminated by way of trade contacts as late as the sixteenth century: that temporal and spiritual power could be assured only with the assistance of the religious framework and conditions of the Muslim trade partners of the North. True, authentic pilgrim caravans to the holy places in Arabia had been organized even before this time. Nevertheless, it is difficult to speak of an indigenous Islamic religiosity or piety in these regions. This phenomenon appeared only with the emergence as renowned centers of Islamic scholarship, of Timbuktu, and a short while later, of Sinqit in the Western Sahara. Arabic was eventually adopted not only as a religious language, but as the script of the regional literatures. Mosques were built and locally colored Islamic law modeled on Malikite norms, was written, taught, and practiced.

Slavery

Here the lines of conflict between a young African Islamicity and African traditions became visible. Tribal organizational forms of state community that depend on spirit and ancestor worship were at odds with the 'righteous Imām' of a community of believers (umma). Residual doubts accompanied any explanation of the identity of an individual as a Muslim. The question of slavery drew both of these conflicts together in a kind of ongoing African problem. Islamic law prohibits the enslavement of Muslims. In order to safeguard a basic principle of the traditional African economy, a community destined to furnish slaves must be deprived of its 'Islam.' Once identified as polytheistic or unbelieving (in Arabic, kāfir, whence the contemptuous "Kaffir"), these neighbors could be 're-Islamized'—that is, collectively subjugated, or, for that matter, individually enslaved, and 'converted' once more to Islam. Here is the complement of the older principle of individual conversion out of motives of commerce and economics, in the new, incomparably more enduring mechanism of an Islamized justification of slavery. The dynamics of this mechanism become transparent when we consider that it was precisely the declaration of one's own Islamicity that legitimated, indeed commended, the organized enslavement of one's neighbor.

Revitalization

The grounds for the introduction, at the end of the eighteenth century, of an Islamic revitalization movement, which spanned the Sahel zone from end to end, and revised the religious map, are mostly unclear. Resistance to European colonization, and to the accompanying missionary strategy, along with tribal migrations thereby unleashed or intensified, constituted a contributing factor. But so did the Islamic reform movement of the Wahhābi in Arabia, with which country, after all, contact was continuously maintained by pilgrimage. Unanimously persuaded by the call to jihad, Muslim clan-fighters, led mostly by scholars of the Fulbe clan, subdued the Sudanese belt with 'Holy Wars.' The name that these 'schooled princes' used for themselves was mujaddid, 'renewers,' of Islam. The program of their reform movements saw its reciprocal model in black African Islamic history: charismatic figures, deriving their legitimacy from the 'blessing' (in Arabic, baraka) bequeathed to them by prophets or founders of brotherhoods, preached against the syncretistic practices and notions with which the African milieu held its own in the Islam of its co-believers and fellow clan members. The prophets' essential aim was to define the blurry lines of demarcation between 'white' and 'black' magic, between permitted and forbidden techniques for the control of the world of the 'spirits' or jinn (supplications and exorcisms, talismans, oracles). In addition, such movements were directed against French and British colonialism. Again, the thrust of the Salafīya, a reform ideology developing in Egypt and Syria around 1900, and seeking to counter Western supremacy with Islamic authenticity, fell on fertile soil in Islamic Africa. Adopted in the Murīdīya, a brotherhood founded in Senegal by Ahmadu Bamba (1862–1927), these various motives acquired the effectiveness of an exemplar. Through the call to reform and resistance, fresh doctrinal concepts emerged, in which African identity was also discovered. The emphasis on collective service, mystical prayer rituals, and the spiritual authority of the initiated made it difficult for orthodox nuclear Islamic countries to extend the Islamic concept of unity to Africa.

Sudan's Nile Region and East Africa

c) The infiltration of Arab clans into the regions of the upper Nile ensured an early Arab Islamization of the eastern Sudan. The course of religious history in these regions was determined by proximity to the nuclear Arab countries—to which Nile and coastal water traffic guaranteed easy access—and adjacency to Christian principalities. In 1317, Mamelukes helped transform the Cathedral of Dongola into a mosque. On the other hand, a century later Christian Ethiopians subjugated the Islamic kingdom of Shoa.

South of the horn, along the coast of the Indian Ocean, Islam owes its existence to maritime trade with southern Arabia, Ḥaḍramaut, and Oman. Around 1100, a flourishing Islamic island culture flourished from Lamu to Zanzibar (Shirazi culture). In the seventeenth century, immigrant Arabs from Oman erected the Sultanate of Zanzibar, from which the coastal regions (Arab., sawāhīl, whence Swahili) were Islamized. The Bantu language of the natives then began to be written in the Arabic alphabet, and the religious and ritual everyday language came to be defined by Arab and Persian concepts. Influences from Oman are also responsible for the fact, unique for Africa, that it was not the Mālikite, but the Šāfiite School of jurisprudence, and the heterodox teaching of the Ibāḍites, that gained entry into Swahili Islam. The nineteenth century was the scene of the quick spread of this Bantu Islam over the mainland toward Lake Victoria. Once more Islam followed on the heels of commerce, especially of the slave trade. German and British colonization pursued a moderate policy in the area of religion, and thus—apart from the case of the notorious Mission School, which claimed to be developing a religious elite—brought about little change in the religious situation. To be sure, the massive immigration of British Indian Muslims to East Africa shifted local confessional relations considerably. The Bantu religions, which almost always lived in peaceful coexistence with Swahili Islam, contrasted sharply with the Christianity of the colonial overlords. This polarization created conflicts periodically expressed in rebellions (and since national independence, in political rivalries).

Islam in Africa or African Islam?

4. The range of the African continent stretching northward from the tenth parallel embraces nearly twenty countries. Here an Islamic majority predominates, with devotees of tribal religions and Christians in the minority. Relations in the North—in the Maghreb states of Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya, as well as in Egypt—are clearly distinct from those of the so-called Sahel states (from Senegal in the West to Somalia in the East). Like Egypt, the Maghreb states reckon themselves a constitutive part of the Arab and Islamic world, although both regions maintain their solidarity with Africa by way of Berber, or even 'Pharaoh' ideologies. Much the same is to be said in the matter of religious relations. Egypt, however, with its ancient Coptic Church, is a case apart. The coexistence of Christians and Muslims, guaranteed by Islamic law and the national Constitution, is a historical Egyptian peculiarity and attribute. In the Maghreb, no considerable Christian minority survived, nor was the Christian mission successful, for instance at the hands of the White Fathers. Unlike Egyptian Islam, its counterpart in the Maghreb exhibits characteristics that tie it to African history. The Islamization of the Maghreb, its emancipation from Arab rule, and the development of a rural Islamic culture manifesting black African influences, are partly responsible here. The major factor, however, was the colonization that began with the invasion of Algeria in 1830 by France, Italy, and Great Britain. The reformed Salafīya movements, which took place in North Africa beginning in 1920, provided the religious and ideological armament for the nationalistic liberation struggles. The democratic Muslim community devised by the state, the liberation of woman, and anticapitalist 'Islamic' economic configurations, were among the weapons. Furthermore, the tenacious, traditional Islam of the Sufis and Marabouts, organized in Zāwiyas and brotherhoods, fell under suspicion of anti-patriotism and backwardness. This typically 'Maghrebian' conflict is still active today. It was reinforced by imported Islamic fundamentalism, which was able—massively in Algeria—to enlist the heterodox traditions of early Islamic times. It rose up against both the 'literate Islam' of the urban scholar, traditional or reformist, and the populist Islam of the Maghreb countryside.

The history of the Islamization of the Sahel generated an imaginary line of antagonistic demarcation between 'white' and 'black' Islam. From West to East, in Mauritania, Mali, Nigeria, Chad, and the Sudan, conflicts of identity in the postcolonial nations produced an important phenomenon. The collision made the confession of Islam the touchstone of distinction between cultural and political attachment to the African or the Eastern Arab world. The entanglement of politics and religion expressed itself first of all in the language controversy. Some worried that Arabic, the language of the Qur'an, might be expelled from the formation and education of coming generations by the English or the French. Others argued that the Qur'an should be translated as well into the languages of Muslim Wolof, Peul, Hausa, and Swahili. But this development also expressed itself in the growing internationalization of the conflict. By way of political bloc formations, and carefully calculated economic investments, the Sahel states have been swept into the wake of world politics, and have come under the influence of pan-Islamic currents. With the foundation of the organization, "Islam in Africa," in Abuja (Nigeria) in 1989—in which most of the eighteen African countries that professed themselves Islamic (out of a total of 46) joined a common Islamic program—the concept of 'African unity' slipped into the background. As a consequence of this multi-layered internationalization of the identity conflict, the national Islamic majorities reached beyond clan boundaries to split into competing religio-political organizations. In Nigeria, the Yan Izala movement propagated an uncompromising Islam cleansed of all African elements, but altogether open to the world. In the Sudan, the fundamentalist direction kept the upper hand. In Senegal, the "Way of the Murīdīya" and other brotherhood organizations gained an ever greater importance. Intra-national coexistence with religious minorities, as well, and the general programmatic perception of the need not to lose contact with the secular, technologically advanced Western world, pluralized the religious approach to cultural and political self-determination in an unmistakable African manner. The multiplicity of Islamic ways to orthodoxy, and thus to salvation in the world to come, holds the key to the future development of Islamic Africa. Islamic religion once found its way to Africa as an uncomplicated system of ritual and doctrine. There it came to be at home among nomads and farmers, and finds ever more adherents in the new urban centers. Its power of conferral of identity is weakening the old system of ancestry and clan. Islam has adapted to African requirements, and has thereby become unmistakably African.

Literature

Hiskett, M., The Course of Islam in Africa, Edinburgh 1994; Rosander, E. / Westerlund, D. (eds.), African Islam and Islam in Africa, London 1997; Hunwick, J. (ed.), Religion and National Integration in Africa, Evanston 1992; Olupona, J. K. / Nyan, S. S. (eds.), Religious Plurality in Africa: Essays in Honour of John S. Mbiti, Berlin/New York 1993; Otayek, René, Le radicalisme islamique au sud du Sahara. Da'wa, arabisation et critique de l'occident, Paris 1993; Platvoet, J. et al. (eds.), The Study of Religion in Africa: Past, Present and Prospects, Cambridge 1996; Sannek, Lamin, The Crown and the Turban: Muslims and West African Pluralism, Boulder 1994; Trimingham, J. S., The Influence of Islam upon Africa, Harlow ²1980.

→ Africa II, Egypt, Islam, Mediterranean Region

Ulrich Rebstock

F.D.2005
MOROCCO
TUNISIA
ALGERIA
LIBYA
EGYPT
WESTERN SAHARA
MAURITANIA
MALI
NIGER
CHAD
SUDAN
ERITREA
DJIBOUTI
CAPE VERDE
GAMBIA SENEGAL
BURKINA FASO
NIGERIA
GUINEA BISSAU
GUINEA
IVORY COAST
GHANA
LIBERIA
SIERRA LEONE
TOGO BENIN
CAMEROON
CENTRAL AFRICAN REPUBLIC
ETHIOPIA
SOMALIA
UGANDA
KENYA
RWANDA
GABON
EQUATORIAL GUINEA
CONGO DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF THE CONGO
BURUNDI
ZANZIBAR
TANZANIA
Equator
ANGOLA
ZAMBIA
MALAWI
NAMIBIA
ZIMBABWA
MOSAMBIQUE
BOTSWANA
MADAGASCAR
SWAZILAND LESOTHO
SOUTH AFRICA
DISTRIBUTION OF RELIGIONS IN AFRICAN STATES
SHARE OF THE POPULATION Muslim
Christian
Other 360° =100%
Limit of Islamic Area
0
1000
2000 km

Africa II: Central and Southern Africa

1. Unlike Northern Africa, where Islam is the predominant religion, Africa south of the Sahara is mainly Christian. The process of the Christianization of Africa can be divided into four phases, of which the first, that of late antiquity, was limited to Northern Africa (→ Africa I).

Portuguese; the Catholic Mission

2. a) The second phase of Christianization—this time south of the Sahara—occurred in connection with the establishment of a Portuguese trade network, in the late fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, on the west coast of Africa, in the Kingdom of Congo, in the valley of the Zambezi in central Africa, and in the kingdoms of Warri and Benin on the delta of the Niger. The Portuguese protected their port cities from the hinterland, for instance those on the islands of Cape Verde and São Tomé. They were dependent on the cooperation of the native rulers for the accumulation of goods, especially for the most profitable 'goods'—human beings, whom they sold as slaves to North America. When their African trade partners became Christians, it made for economic and political advantages. The Portuguese could then expel rival Muslim merchants, and establish their exclusive right to carry on trade in the area. Wherever the Portuguese flag was raised, Jesuits and other Catholic missionaries appeared at once.

Up until the 1570s, all Portuguese missionary enterprises in Congo, Warri, Benin, and Mutapa exhibited a similar pattern. The baptismal ritual was reserved almost exclusively for rulers. In Portuguese thinking, the religious conversion of a people depended for the most part on a royal decision. Kings and chieftains, and sometimes their sons, were baptized as speedily as could be, and adopted Portuguese names. Without a great deal of thought about the royal motives for this kind of conversion, the missionaries proceeded on the assumption that the subjects would subsequently ask for the ritual as well, and harbored the illusion that they had converted whole peoples to Christianity. This partly explains the failure of these early missionary enterprises. On the whole, efforts at 'Portuguesization' and Christianization left more traces in Congo (if in a somewhat indigenized form) than in Warri, where after two centuries they had come to nothing. In many parts of Africa, there was a lasting Christian presence, but it was always left on the fringes of the African cultures. Catholic mission activity in Africa was closely connected with the Portuguese crown, and as Portugal's imperialistic power dwindled, the missions likewise faded away. The great weakness of the Christian undertaking in Africa in the second phase was its close connivance with the slave trade. Converting Africans and enslaving them at the same time presents a great contradiction.

Dutch, Calvinists

b) From 1652 onward, Dutch Calvinist Protestants entered into competition with the Portuguese. Erected at first as transfer stations to their East Indian possessions, their settlements spread out over all the land around the Cape of Good Hope. After 1685, Huguenots on their flight from France also pushed their way to the colony. Furthermore, a considerable number of their slaves were baptized, and in 1683 all baptized slaves were emancipated.

The Imperialistic Race

3. a) In the second half of the eighteenth century, Protestant missionaries, primarily British, began to ply their mission south of the Sahara—the third phase of the Christianization process. A large number of Protestant mission societies, taking their cue from the Protestant Revival Movement in Europe, saw it as their task to spread the Gospel everywhere before the end of the world (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm). Their endeavors were not confined to Africa, but were maintained on the international level. Still, each society concentrated on one particular region for its mission work. Like their Catholic predecessors, many Protestant missionaries of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were slave traders themselves or otherwise promoters of commerce in African people. Most missionaries, however, were abolitionists, fighting slavery in the name of the Gospel. The majority of the Africans carried into slavery at the end of the eighteenth century were Christians, either by conviction or at least nominally. Many found in Christianity a force that bound them together and made them strong. Thus they played an important role in the battle for the abolition of slavery, as well as, later, in the propagation of Christianity among Africans in Africa itself. Some slaves emancipated in America returned to Africa, for example to Liberia. Among these returnees was Samuel Ajayi Crowther, who led the Yoruba Christians, the Christians of Buganda and Madagascar, and the African Christians of Southern Africa.

b) Between 1880 and 1920, in the heyday of imperialism, the number of missionaries toiling in Africa rose dramatically. The Berlin Congress supported this development in 1878, when the race for the partition of Africa was regulated among the European colonial powers in terms of areas of interest. Missionaries in the field frequently supported the imperialist ambitions of their states. Thus, → mission and colonization came to be understood by many as 'two sides of the same coin' (→ Colonialism). Mission became a synonym for the transplantation of Western civilization to Africa. The baptized were urged to renounce African culture across the board, and to conduct themselves as 'Europeanized Africans.' This dilemma struck to the inmost core of the missionary undertaking: How much of Western civilization should Africans adopt? To what extent must they abandon African culture in order to adopt the 'white man's religion'? In the attempt to resolve this inner dilemma within a Christianity of mission, a new form of African Christianity arose. The expansion of this Christianity in the twentieth century was for the most part the work of African evangelists.

African Christianity

4. Thus, the West African coast was the first home and cradle of the missions in the nineteenth century, as well as of the African churches in the twentieth. African or independent churches can be essentially divided into three groups:

(a) The earliest communities were those that had broken off from the mission churches already in place. They developed especially in Southern Africa (Ethiopian Churches) and West Africa (African Churches) in the nineteenth century. The circumstances of their foundation were all alike: too strict a discipline at the hands of the European missionaries, discrimination against native preachers, dissension over money and power, a new self-awareness among educated Africans, and, of special importance, apartheid in South Africa. The striking thing about these communities is that, while they changed church leadership, they retained the liturgical and hierarchical structures of the mission churches. Many were and are largely dependent on the financial resources of their mother churches.

(b) In the 1920s and 1930s, communities arose that belong to the second group of independent churches, including the "Zionists" in South Africa, the Aladura Churches in Nigeria, and the Spirit or Spiritist Churches in Ghana. They also came to be called the prophetic and charismatic-healing churches. Their worldviews hold essential elements in common, which have contributed to the emergence of an utterly African Christianity. The central position of the Bible, prayer, healing, prophecy, visions and dreams, distinctive rituals, church services with spontaneous elements and 'free liturgy,' and, especially, a charismatic leader ('prophet' or 'prophetess'), are among the fundamental traits of these communities. For them, theology must have to do with practical life and with existential problems, thus becoming the Africans' own religion. Although they strictly reject and spurn the traditional African religions as 'fetishistic' and 'demonic,' their doctrinal systems and the structure of their rituals evince an affinity with African cosmology. Thus, many of their members come not from the 'classic' churches, but from other Christian and non-Christian (Muslim or traditional religious) groups. Although the prophetic communities exhibit similarities to one another, each possesses its own religious dynamics. There are differences in their special doctrines and ritual details, as well as in the traditions they have brought with them. Many communities sprang from home and prayer milieus in the 'classic' churches, and founded their own churches in the 1920s and 1930s. Others have materialized simply thanks to the visionary experience of a charismatic figure, independently of a mission church. Most indigenous churches of the prophetic type belong to an ecumenical movement extending throughout the continent under the name of Organization of African Instituted Churches.

Pentecostal Communities

(c) The third group of independent churches presents the most recent development in African Christianity: the appearance and escalating spread of Pentecostal charismatic evangelical communities, especially since the 1950s and 1960s. Nigeria especially has seen an enormous expansion of New Pentecostal communities in the last two decades. In their efforts to produce ecumenical ties and cooperation, among themselves and with other churches, most of these churches have come under the umbrella of the Pentecostal Fellowship Association of Nigeria. In contrast with the founders of the prophetical communities, founders of the Pentecostal communities have in most cases earned university degrees, and have previously been active in the professions. William Kumuyi, who founded the Deeper Life Bible Church in 1973, was a docent in mathematics at the university in Lagos. In 1987, Chris Okotie, an attorney, founded the Household of God Fellowship. Architects, physicians, and other professionals figure among the leadership elite of these communities, and so speak to an educated audience. However, the Pentecostal communities are not always indigenous and independent. Organizations like the Campus Crusade for Christ, which appear on the scene as products or missions of Pentecostal communities or New Pentecostal groups outside Africa, are dependent on mission headquarters for funds, publications, and sometimes personnel. The native Pentecostal communities, to be sure, have themselves begun to engage in international mission, and have already founded communities in the United States, Canada, Europe, and elsewhere.

A basic characteristic of the Pentecostal communities is an emphasis on the special conversion experience referred to as spiritual rebirth—being 'born again'—and on charismatic gifts like glossolalia or speaking in tongues. Many of these communities aim at 'holiness' and are more interested in religious experience than in ritual. Others are remarkable for their preaching of a 'gospel of prosperity' that is especially popular among whites in Nigeria and Southern Africa. It teaches that God is a rich God and wishes his followers to be successful in all that they undertake in their lives, and it promises that a miracle will lift them out of poverty, unemployment, illness, or handicaps. For the wealthy there is the 'short way,' in which they give one-tenth of their income to the community, as well as make contributions for the poor and underprivileged. Many of these groups have adopted ideas and features of the American Pentecostals, but enthusiasm for the 'prosperity gospel' overspills into the values of traditional African culture, where polished religious rituals are conducted for the acquisition of wealth, health, and protection from evil powers. Such Christian groups as the Pentecostals, the Aladura, or the prophetical communities, which seek to be responsive to everyday, existential concerns, are continuing to expand in the Africa of today. This makes Southern Africa one of the most important stages of the drama of Christianization, especially that of the twentieth century.

Image of Africa

Europe's image of Africa's religion: The Portuguese maintained that the Africans actually had no gods, but only 'fetishes'—that they worshiped rocks and trees. Underlying these conceptions was Paul's negative image of pagans and their nature religion (Rom 2). It was F. Max Müller, founding figure of the study of religion, who—despite his strong colonial attitude—corrected these mistaken notions in the 1878 Hibbert Lectures. With the appearance of Leo Frobenius and Carl Einstein, early in the twentieth century, archaic Africa began to leave abiding traces in art and pop music of an image in contrast to a decadent Christianity. Today, reacting to representations of African religion exclusively as opposite or kindred to Christianity, postcolonial Africa raises the protest of a properly African self-awareness, beginning with blackness.

Okot p'Bitek, poet and social anthropologist of Uganda, has sharply criticized the prevailing interpretation of African religions, and has refuted their alleged 'anonymous Christianity.' He has applied his methodical approach in an exemplary investigation of the Luo religion. A new African self-awareness is also reflected by the work of E. Ikenga Metuh, and, in the 1990s, of J. Olupona, of Nigeria (on the religion of the Ibo and Yoruba respectively). Furthermore, D. Chidester analyses African religion as a 'colonial frontier' that significantly formed Western concepts of religion.

What is significant is not whether African religion is akin to, or stands in contrast with, the European: the important thing is Africa's own way—where, when all is said and done, even the imposed religions are the germ and wellspring of a Christianity authentically African.

Literature

Chidester, D., Savage Systems: Colonialism and Comparative Religion in Southern Africa, Charlottesville/London 1996; Falola, T./Jennings, Chr. (eds.), Sources and Methods in African History: Spoken, Written, Unearthed, Rochester 2003; Isichei, E., A History of Christianity in Africa: From Antiquity to the Present, London 1995; Hastings, A., The Church in Africa 1450–1950, Oxford 1994; Iliffe, J., Africans: The History of a Continent, Cambridge 1995; Lye, K. (ed.), Encyclopedia of African Nations and Civilizations, New York 2002; Oliver, R./Atmore, A., Medieval Africa, 1250–1800, New York 2001; Olupona, J. K., Kingship, Religion and Rituals in a Nigerian Community: A Phenomenological Study of Ondo Yoruba Festivals, Stockholm 1991; Olupona, J. K. (ed.), African Spirituality: Forms, Meanings and Expressions, New York 2000; Oosthuizen, G. C., Post-Christianity in Africa: A Theological and Anthropological Study, London 1968; P'Bitek, O., African Religions in Western Scholarship, Nairobi 1971; Ranger, T., "The Invention of Tradition in Colonial Africa," in: Hobsbawm, E. J./ Ranger, T. (eds.), The Invention of Tradition, Cambridge 1983, 211-262; Sundkler, B., A History of the Church in Africa, Cambridge 2000.

→ Africa I, Afro-American Religions, Ancestors, Apartheid, Christianity, Colonialism, Mission, Prophet, Voodoo

Afe Adogame

Africa: Time Chart

1. Pre- and Ancient History (c. 4 million–5000 BCE)

c. 4 million BCE	Australopithecus Afarensis	Skeletal finds suggest that the 'cradle of humanity' lies in Africa.
c. 70.000	Evidence of burials in Southern Africa
from c. 26.000	Earliest African rock paintings, in Southern Africa (today's Namibia)	The rock paintings document the experience of ritual specialists; the painted places are 'power centers' at which contact may be had with the supra-terrestrial world.
from c. 20.000	Clay figures in Algeria, carved objects in Southern Africa

2. The Ancient Kingdoms (c. 6th millenium BCE–1st millenium CE)

c. 5000–3000	Pre-dynastic Egypt	Erection of temples (Horus, Seth); early pyramid construction.
from c. 3000	Egyptian kingdoms; Nubian kingdoms	At the time of the New Kingdom, failure of Akhenaton's (1364–1347) monotheistic reform (exclusive veneration of the god Aton); spread of the Egyptian pantheon into the regions south of Egypt.
from 9th cent.	Berber states, Punic: Carthage (founded 814 BCE)	Veneration of Fertility Goddess Tanit.
from 4th/3rd cent. BC	Greek/Roman conquest of North Africa	Tanit becomes Roman Juno Coelestis.

3. African 'Traditional' Religions I: Expansion of African Religions in the Context of Continental Migratory Movements (c. 5th cent. BCE–10th cent. CE)

c. 5th cent. BC–6th c. CE	Immigration of the Yoruba into the Niger-Benue region	Formation of local orisha cults
c. 500–1000	Expansion of the Bantu traditions to Southern, Eastern, and Central Africa	Key meaning of ancestor worship in connection with the important position of community and extended family among the Bantu vis-à-vis conceptualizations of spirits and gods. With the Nilotic peoples, the role of age groups of common initiates.

4. Beginning of the Jewish Diaspora, and First Phase of the Christianization in Northern and Northeastern Africa (1st–6th cent. CE)

from 1st cent. CE	Expansion of Judaism from Alexandria into the Roman provincial capitals of North Africa	The Egyptian port and metropolis of Alexandria shelters the largest Jewish community on the African continent (trans. of Septuagint). North Africa receives a Jewish diaspora, which is still present in the twentieth century. Only the undertow of emigration occasioned by the founding of the State of Israel has finally decimated the number of Jews in North Africa.
from 3rd cent. CE	Expansion of Christianity to Northern Africa and into the Maghreb	By 325, there are already fifty-one Episcopal sees in Europe. The third-century persecution of the Christians appears especially in the Berber regions under Bishop Donatus. The Donatists' particular church lasts, despite prohibition (411) and persecution, and survives even after the end of its persecution by Christians.
312	Christianity becomes a tolerated religion in the Roman Empire	By the end of the fourth century, ninety percent of the population is Christian. Rise of the monastic movement (hermits) as counter-movement to the growing establishment of Christianity as the state religion.

from 4th cent.	Axum in Ethiopia becomes Christian	The multi-religious state (including, since the first century, Christianity) becomes Christian, although governed in ecclesial matters by Alexandria (even to the present day).
535	Nubia becomes Christian	'Official' date of Egyptian Christianization, prohibition of the blessing of Nubian harvests through the invocation of a statue of Isis brought from Philae in Egypt.
539	Split of the Egyptian and Byzantine Churches	In Egypt, in the wake of dogmatic quarrels the Christology of the Monophysite faith (belief in a single nature of Christ) with a 'national' Coptic Church arises, with its own papacy.
5. First Phase of Islamization—Northern Africa (7th–11th cent.)
from 639	Conquest of North Africa by Arab troops	The Muslim conquerors are temporarily greeted by the Christian population as 'liberators from the Byzantine yoke.' Important dates for the framework: in 652, a peace treaty with Christian Nubia inaugurates the continuous presence of Christianity until the fifteenth century; in 710, the siege of Tangiers by Muslim troops ensures Islamic predominance in the Maghreb.

from 740	Insurrections of Kharijite groups in the Maghreb	The radically egalitarian movement of the Kharijites, arisen in a framework of the first civil war, mounts to the pinnacle of the separatist movements against the Umayyad Caliphate (657–750).
from 910	Fatimid Dynasty in North Africa	The Shiite Dynasty predominates in Egypt from 969 onward. It is under it that the renowned University of al-Azhar is founded. In 1171, Saladin overthrows the Fatimids.
1046–1147 1116–1269	Almoravid Dynasty in the Maghreb Almohad Dynasty in the Maghreb	From the eleventh century onward: broad Islamization of North Africa; unification through the reform movement of the “Border Fighters” (Almoravids), under the juridical school of the Malikiyya; propulsion of Islam into the zone of the Sahel by the “Confessors of Unity” (Almohads).
1317	Transformation of the Cathedral of Dongola into a mosque	Islamization of the region of the upper Nile; successful resistance by Christian Ethiopia.

6. African ‘Traditional’ Religions II: Consolidation of African Religions in a Context of the Formation of Great Realms (7th–16th cent.)

7th–15th cent.	Realm of Greater Zimbabwe	Flourishing: 13th century.
15th–16th cent.	Flourishing of the Congo Realm

10th–15th cent.	Flourishing of the Realm of Ife	The orisha cults find expression in the sacred realm, and are universalized. The oracle cult of Ife expands nevertheless, just as does the divine Triad Olorun (Olodumare), Orunmila (Ifa), and Eshu (Egbara), in the entire region.
14th–17th cent.	Fall of Ife, and rise of various succeeding realms	Superimposition of universalistic orisha cults (Storm-God Shango in Oyo; Edo religion in Benin) over local cults.
7. Second Phase of Islamization—Sub-Saharan Africa (c. 11th–18th cent.)
from 1100	Shirazi culture in the Eastern African coastal regions	A mixed culture, of Persian, Southern Arabian, and African elements is generated by sea trade, and by Arab settlements that actually date from pre-Islamic times.
from 11th cent.	Islamization of the Western African Sahel and Savanna regions; rise of the Sudan states	Beginning in the eighth and ninth centuries, Islam spreads along the great trans-Sahara routes. Erection of Muslim trade-colonies, later the conversion of rulers, and the appearance of a 'duality': of the preservation of an African identity within a universal Islamic religious culture. Establishment of 'Islamic' realms: Ghana (in today's Senegal and Mauritania), Mali, Songhay, Kanem-Bornu, the Hausa states. In succeeding centuries, the appearance of centers of Islamic scholarship (esp. in Timbuktu).

1529–1543	Jihad of Ahmad Gran in Ethiopia	Conquest of wider regions of Ethiopia by Ahmad Gran, and consequent centuries-long enfeeblement of the Christian Ethiopian realm.
End of 15th/beginning of 16th cent.	as-Suyuti and al-Maghili	Royal counselors Jalal ad-Din as-Suyuti of Egypt and Abd al-Karim al-Maghili of North Africa demand of Songhay a purification of Islam from African elements, but do not (as yet) prevail.
16th–18th cent.	Conquest of Ethiopia; establishment of the Sultanate of Fung from 17th cent.	Growing influence of the Islamic Brotherhoods	From the beginning of the seventeenth century, the brotherhoods begin formally to organize, especially in the case of the Qadiryya, which then gain greater importance for Islamization.
	Flourishing of the 'classic' Swahili culture, in East Africa	After the ejection of the Portuguese, Muslims from the Oman build the Sultanate of Zanzibar. This presents an opportunity for the Shafi'itic juridical school and the heterodox teaching of the Ibadites to enter the region.
	Beginning of Islamic Presence in South Africa	Migration of laborers from Southeastern, and later from Southern, Asia, from mid-seventeenth century.

		Now there is a constantly waxing Islamic presence in Southern Africa, especially in the Southeast of that country.

8. Christian Interlude and Second Phase of Christianization—South of the Sahara (15th–17th cent.)

from 15th cent.	Flourishing of great African realms	Empire of Zimbabwe; realm of the Congo.
from 15th cent.	Beginning of the Reconquista; Portuguese colonization and Catholic missions	In 1415, the reconquest of the North-African Ceuta; the erection of several trade stations, fortified coastal posts, and some rather small colonies. Object of the mission (esp. in the Congo, in Warri, in Benin, and in Murapa) is limited to the native noble class, and is without deep-reaching success, as the Christian presence is confined to the margin of African cultures.
from middle of 17th cent.	Dutch colonization	Presence of Calvinist Dutch, and later the French Hugenots, in the Cape colony. Emancipation of baptized slaves.
end of 17th/beginning of 18th cent.	Kimpa Vita and the Antonian Movement in the region of the Congo	A young noblewoman named Dona Béatrice assumes her African name, Kimpa Vita, and sets forth a claim of omnipotence. As the incarnation of Saint Anthony, she means to erect the bygone kingdom of the Congo as the eschatological paradise. The movement is obliterated, and Kimpa Vita is publicly burned alive in 1706.

9. Third Phase of Islamization: Reform Movements (18th–19th cent.)
from end of 18th cent. until end of 19th/beginning of 20th cent.	Era of the great Jihad movements	Militant movements of revitalization, e.g., for the purification of Islam from non-Islamic, i.e., African, practices—esp., (1) the "Fulani Jihad" in Hausa, under Usman dan Fodio, beginning in 1785, leading to the erection of the Sokoto Caliphate; (2) the Jihad under Ahmad b. Muhammad, from 1818, as well as under al-Hajj Umar al-Futi, from 1851, in the region of the former Songhay Realm; (3) in Somalia, from 1897/99, Jihad under Sayyid Muhammad Abd Allah Hasan. Most famously: the Jihad of "Mahdi" Muhammad Ahmad ben Abd Allah, from 1881/83, in Sudan.
from end of 19th cent.	Expansion of the Tijaniya Order	In the wake of the Jihad under al-Hajj Umar al-Futi, from 1851, the Tijaniya order enters into competition with, especially, the already well-established Qadiriya Order in the Realm of Sokoto.

10. African 'Traditional' Religions III: Transformation and Gradual Diaspora of African Religions between Later Pre-Colonial Phase and Post-Colonial Age (from 16th. cent.)

from 16th cent.	Beginning of formation of → Afro-American religions	In the wake of transatlantic slavery spreading of the orisha cults, the vodun cults, and other African traditions in America from 17th cent.	Rise of the vodun cults in Dahomey	Local vodun cults are established on the area of the later realm of Dahomey; from the 18th century integration of vodun cults in the political system of Dahomey; in the 20th century restitution of power of local vodun priests, after the French colonial regime had destroyed the empire
from middle of 20th cent.	New religious movements; 're-discovery' of African religious traditions	Transformation of African religious traditions in 'new religious movements'; revitalization of traditions (e.g., of the Yoruba religion by Susanne Wenger)

11. Third Phase of Christianization—Modern Missionary Movement at the Time of the Colonization and Imperialist Partition of Africa (18th–20th cent.)

from middle of/end of 18th cent.	Beginning of organized missionary work south of the Sahara by mission societies	Taking their inspiration from the Evangelical Awakening Movement in Europe, Protestant missionaries have extensively combated slavery, whose gradual abolition after 1807 (decision of the British Parliament to prohibit the transatlantic slave trade) was finally legislated—especially because of the engagement of African Christians (the majority of the kidnapped African slaves were Christians).

from 19th cent.	Missionary activity of returning freed slaves	Samuel Ajayi Crowther, as African bishop, stands at the head of the organized missionary undertakings in Nigeria. In East Africa, Madagascar, and Southern Africa, similar projects are to be found, again under the leadership of Africans who have returned to their continent.
from c. 1880	Intensification of European missionary work	It is especially after the Berlin Congress on Africa, in 1884/85, that the division of the continent followed; under the colonial powers the activities of European missions grow, mission and colonization not infrequently go hand in hand, and Christianizing is often tantamount to (Western) "civilizing."
12. Fourth Phase of Islamization—in the Colonial and Post-Colonial Contexts (19th–20th cent.)
from end of 19th cent.	Expansion of Islam in the colonial context	A widely successful extension of Islam along new colonial trade routes (e.g., in East Africa) is favored, to an extent, by the concept of 'indirect government.' In some degree, non-Islamized areas are associated with Muslim emirates, and Christian missionary activity is possible only within limits, if it is not indeed prohibited. Islam, to an extent, becomes the frame of reference of anti-colonial resistance. Examples would be the movement of the Mourids in Senegal, under Ahmadu Bamba, or the Salafiya movements in North Africa.

from middle of 20th cent.	Islamic reformism and internationalization in post-colonial Africa	Projects of intentional Islamization, to some extent supported by international organizations, aim at a repression of traditionally African elements in African Islam in Africa. (Cf., here, Islam in Africa, founded in 1989 in Nigerian Abuja.) Under the influence of reformist, at times radical, groupings, a secular consensus, seemingly universal at the time of the earlier independence, is increasingly called into question. (Compare the introduction of Islamic law in a number of northern federal states of Nigeria since the end of the year 2000).
13. Fourth Phase of Christianization: Rise of an Independent African Christianity
from end of 19th cent.	First separation of independent African churches	In Southern ("Ethiopian Churches") and Western Africa ("African Churches"), churches now split off from the mission or mission churches. This shifts church leadership to African hands. The religious practice inculcated by the 'mother churches,' however, continues largely to be maintained.

from the 1920s	Appearance of 'prophetic' or charismatic-healing churches	The 'Zionist Churches' of Southern Africa, or the Aladura ('of Prayer') Churches of West Africa, are the most important examples of a new type of African churches. These are conspicuous not only by their administrative independence and self-reliance, but also by their series of independent common practices vis-à-vis the mission churches: prayer healing, visions, charismatic leaders, 'prophets,' elements of African cosmology (and yet a sturdy criticism of traditional African religions, as well). Most important in terms of numbers is a new popular church, the Church of Jesus Christ on Earth through the Prophet Simon Kimbangu.
from middle of 20th cent.	Appearance of Pentecostalist charismatic churches	Especially, although not only, in West Africa, Neo-Pentecostal communities appear. One is the Deeper Life Bible Church, founded in 1973. These are not, however, all of African origin, but are at times sprigs and shoots of North American or European communities. Basic traits commonly manifested are: conversion, spiritual experience of being born again, gifts of the Spirit (speaking in tongues), belief in miracles.

Klaus Hock

Afro-American Religions

Name	Gender	Function/ Sphere of Activity/ Sphere of Responsibility	Color for Worship	Day of the week	Christian Analog
Exú	m	Revelation / Foretelling of good or evil	Reddish brown	Monday	Devil
Ogum	m	Air, energy, activity, war	Sea blue	Tuesday	St. George
Xangó	m	Thunder and lightning	White and red	Wednesday	St. Jerome
Inhansã	f	Wind and storm	Red and brown	Wednesday	St. Barbara
Oxóssi	m	Forest, hunt, vegetation, fertility	Light blue	Thursday	St. Sebastian
Oxumaré	f/m	Water and air, rainbow	Yellow and green	Thursday	St. Barbara
Oxalá	m	Supreme divinity, Lord of Starlight	Pure white	Friday	Jesus
Oxum	f	Fresh water, waterfalls	Golden yellow	Saturday	St. Ann
Iemanjá	f	Goddess of the Sea	Light blue	Saturday	Virgin Mary

1. Afro-American cults alloy a number of cultural and religious traditions. They constitute a sequel to the kidnapping and enslavement of millions of West African tribesmen and women to Brazil and the islands of the Caribbean (→ Afro-Caribbean Religions) from the sixteenth to the end of the nineteenth century. This long and difficult episode brought various worldviews and diverse cultures into mutual contact: the Christianity of the Spanish and Portuguese colonizers, West African tribal religions, and the new religion of the spiritism of Western modernity. The result is a religious syncretism, as found particularly in Brazil. In the Caribbean area, however, we find similar phenomena, as in Cuban Santería and Haitian → Voodoo.

2. Of the manifold forms of traditional African religiosity to be found in Brazil, two have developed with exceptional strength: Candomblé and Umbanda.

Candomblé

a) Candomblé is Brazil's most extensively studied religious manifestation of African origin. Candomblé comes originally from the Yoruba people of Nigeria. The word "Candomblé" is probably from the three root words can ('rope'), dom ('eject'), and bla ('tie up'), which belong to the Adsha-Ewe language group (Kingdom of Dahomey), and may offer a symbolic description of cultic praxis, or it may simply mean 'dancing place.' In the Yoruba religion, the world of earth (aiye) is apprehended as a reflection of the world of the divinities (orun). To achieve a harmonious condition, persons must possess a reciprocal relationship with their personal deity, their Orixá (pronounced "oreeshá"). The word Orixá comes from the Yoruba language and means 'copy.' Orixás have very human particularities: they smoke cigars, drink-sugar cane liquor, love bright, multicolored clothes, demand their favorite foods, and are recognizable by distinct character traits. Only when a person presents his or her personal Orixá with the appropriate foods, and observes all of its commands and prohibitions, can he or she receive magical powers (axé) from it. The Orixás' operation and activity is assured only in this basic mutual relation. Their very existence is dependent on human beings' ritual veneration. In worship, each Orixá has a personal drumbeat, personal dance steps, personal songs and color symbolism (see schema).

The phenomenon of the trance, or possession, is one of the most important features of Afro-American religion. In the course of a Candomblé ceremony in a private locale reserved for worship, the Babalorixá (high priest), in a state of trance, incarnates an American Indian spirit of the forest. The green color of his cloak symbolizes the forests. (C. Mattes)

Together, all of this yields a kind of magical tableau of the complex Yoruba mythology, with its numerous legends. The Orixás manifest themselves through → trance. All Afro-American cults attach an importance to possession by the spirits. For believers, the trance ritual affords the only opportunity to enter into direct contact with the Orixás.

The Afro-American religions also include Christian elements, especially in equating Christian saints and Orixás. In addition, the Christian calendar was taken over from the African slaves.

Umbanda

b) The Umbanda religion has its origin among the West African Bantu people, whose relatives were settled as slaves in the Southeast of Brazil. In general, the term Umbanda ('High Priest') is derived from its Bantu synonym, kimban-da. In Brazil, the Bantu cult is called macumba, after the tree under which the Bantu held their religious gatherings. Macumba, then, in the narrower sense, denotes the place of worship itself, often a private home. The religion of Umbanda is a pure cult. Cultic acts and rites enclose and imprint the entire life of its followers. Everything is concentrated on the cultic center, called the terreiro. Umbanda has little doctrinal consistency, and each cultic center and each high priest (Pai-de-santo, 'Father of the holy thing') is relatively autonomous in a given area. As a result, cultic acts and rituals differ from one cultic center to another.

Umbanda was founded on the occasion of the incipient urbanization and industrialization of Southeastern Brazil at the end of the nineteenth and beginning of the twentieth century. In contrast with Candomblé, Umbanda developed as an urban phenomenon, precisely in the two metropolises, Rio de Janeiro and São Paulo, which registered the greatest population increases. Umbanda gained no foothold in the Northeast. With the urbanization of Brazil came the spread of the teachings of European → spiritism, which was enjoying ever greater popularity with the 'white' middle class. The spiritist direction that became especially popular in Brazil is based on the teachings of Allan Kardec (1804–1869). → Reincarnation, and the possibility of communication between the living and the dead, constitute basic elements, and they are of the same importance in spiritism as in Umbanda. As with Candomblé, here too, Christian elements are to be found, and the Christian calendar was adopted. Chief among the first Umbanda activists were small retailers, skilled workers, and civil servants. Today, journalists, engineers, teachers, military personnel, lawyers, and physicians are found among the adherents. The result is a tendency to a 'whitening' and westernization of African traditions by way of spiritistic influences. Thus Umbanda today has become a typically middle and upper class phenomenon.

3. In Europe, the Afro-American religions, in their variety, are a favorite subject for everything from science to literature and cartoons (→ Zombie). Numerous investigators, such as Mircea → Eliade, the historian of religion, and French sociologist Roger Bastide, have addressed the theme. In an entirely different, sensitive, and intuitive manner and fashion, the literary and ethnopoetic works of Hubert Fichte and Leonore Mau have sought a European approach to the Afro-American religions.

Literature

Bastide, Roger, The African Religions of Brazil: Toward a Sociology of the Interpenetration of Civilizations, Baltimore 1978 ([1]1960); Deren, Maya, Divine Horsemen: The Living Gods of Haiti, Kingston/New York 1983 ([1]1953); Fernández Olmos, Margarite/Paravisini-Gebert, Lizabeth (eds.), Sacred Possessions: Vodou, Santería, Obeah, and the Caribbean, New Brunswick [2]1999 ([1]1997); Hofbauer, A., Afro-Brasilien, Vienna 1995; Pinn, Anthony B., Varieties of African American Religious Experience, Minneapolis 1998; Pollak-Eltz, A., Trommel und Trance. Die afro-amerikanischen Religionen, Freiburg 1995; Simpson, George Eaton, Black Religions in the New World, New York 1978; Idem, Religious Cults of the Caribbean: Trinidad, Jamaica and Haiti, Rio Piedras [3]1980 ([1]1965); Stevens-Arroyo, Anthony M./Pérez y Mena, Andres I. (eds.), Enigmatic Powers: Syncretism with African and Indigenous Peoples' Religions among Latinos, New York 1995; Thompson, Robert Farris, Face of the Gods: Art and Altars of Africa and the African Americas, New York/Munich 1993; Voeks, R. A., Sacred Leaves of Candomblé: African Magic, Medicine, and Religion in Brazil, Austin 1997; Wafer, J., The Taste of Blood: Spirit Possession in Brazilian Candomblé, Philadelphia 1991.

→ Africa II, Afro-Caribbean Religions, Central America, Possession, South America, Spiritism, Trance, Voodoo, Zombie

Claudio Mattes

Afro-Caribbean Religions

The Concept

The category 'Afro-Caribbean Religions' may be defined as religious initiatives by people of African descent in the Caribbean region. They are often characterized by the preservation and development of religious beliefs and practices brought from → Africa during the period of the slave trade, particularly in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries when the majority of enslaved Africans were transported. While each region of the Caribbean presented different patterns of governance, social structure, and racial demography, Afro-Caribbean religions can be understood by certain patterns of adaptation and resistance to the forms of European Christianity that the enslaved Africans were enjoined to adopt. In general, where Roman Catholicism was the established religion of the colony, such as in Haiti or Cuba, Africans created religious traditions that were alternatives to Christianity in that they developed separate and sometimes corresponding ritual and symbolic structures. Where Protestantism, particularly bibliocentric Methodist and Baptist denominations, was present in colonies such as Jamaica or Trinidad, Africans developed alternative forms of Christianity through creative, African-centered interpretations of biblical imagery.

Voodoo

The oldest documented and most famous, if not notorious, of the Afro-Caribbean religions is Haitian Vodou (Vodun, → Voodoo). In 1791 a Martiniquean naturalist named Moreau de St. Méry published an account of a dance among the Haitian slaves from the African city of Arada that combined snake worship, erotic frenzy, and dangerous potential for political rebellion. He called the spectacle 'Vaudoux' (after the Fon word for 'spirit') and the name has remained as a term to cover the diverse African-derived religious traditions of the island. The power of the description might be attributable to its publication in the midst of the Haitian revolution when the slave-holding world, including the newly born United States, looked on with horror as black Haitians waged a successful war of liberation. 'Voodoo' has become seemingly indelibly associated in the popular mind with irrational and malevolent black mischief, and this characterization continues to serve to denigrate African independence and power.

Beyond these politicized images, Vodou might be described as the folk religions of Haiti, a variety of interlaced rites practiced by the great majority of the population and distinguished by their reputed 'nation' of origin in Western Africa. The Rada rite, alluded to by Moreau de St. Méry above, is the best known and features devotions to a pantheon of lwa, invisible personalities or forces whose intercession can bring the devotee success in worldly and spiritual undertakings. Devotees seek to please the lwa through offerings of food, music and dance and they construct elaborate altars to localize this veneration. While the devotee is often asked to offer service to several of the lwa, it is common that one lwa will demand special devotions as the devotee's mèt tèt or 'master of the head.' This relationship is sealed in an elaborate initiation where lwa and human are joined in an intimate ceremony of union. This is usually sealed by the lwa 'mounting' the devotee, as a rider mounts a horse, taking over the personality and using the body of the medium to sing, dance, prophesy, and bless the congregation.

Santería

Vodou's devotional features of call by spirit, initiation that seals an intimate psychological relationship between human and spirit, and the manifestation of the spirit in trance for communal benefit, can be found in most of the African-derived religions of the Caribbean. They are at the core of another 'alternative' Afro-Caribbean religion, Cuban Santería. The name Santería ('way of the saints') comes from correspondences that enslaved Africans made between the orishas of the Yoruba people who were carried to Cuba in great numbers, and the santos of Roman Catholic piety. As in Vodou, Cuban santeros juxtaposed an official Catholic identity with an unofficial and even covert one as devotees of the African spirits. Africans were taken to Cuba well into the nineteenth century and African ethnic identity was subsequently stronger. Afro-Cubans also formed legally chartered mutual aid societies called cabildos that were organized on ethnic lines. In Cuba today there are distinct religious systems of different African origin: Santería or Ocha from the Yoruba/Lucumi; Palo or Mayombe from the Congo; and Abakua from the Efik/Carabali.

The template of spiritual call, initiation, and ceremonial trance also holds in the Protestant Caribbean where Afro-Trinidadians and Afro-Jamaicans might be said to have developed alternative forms of Christianity. In Trinidad the Spiritual Baptists have integrated African forms of divination and worship into their devotion to the Christian Trinity. In Jamaica various Revivalist congregations identify biblical prophecy with a millennial return to an African Zion. Both these groups of Afro-Protestants develop intimate spiritual relationships with biblical prophets, angels, and evangelists who act as guides to discern the signs of the immanent apocalypse.

Rastafari

The affirmation of the Africanity of the biblical worldview gave rise in the 1930s to the well-known Afro-Caribbean tradition of Rastafari. Spurred by news stories of the crowning of the Ethiopian emperor Haile Selassie and his heroic resistance to latter-day European imperialism, a group of spiritually minded Jamaicans saw in these events the dramatic fulfillment of biblical prophecy. They discerned an African messiah (Selassie—Ras Tafari) had been anointed to deliver his oppressed people from captivity in a Caribbean Babylon to new life in an Ethiopian Zion. In anticipation of this deliverance followers of Rastafari were to lead pure lives as natural African men and women. As the true children of Zion they followed many biblical prohibitions and let their hair grow naturally. Their long, striking locks were said to strike dread in the hearts of those who would suppress African pride and virtue. In the 1970s a number of Jamaican musicians professed Rastafarianism and popularized its style and philosophy in the worldwide spread of reggae music. Rastafarianism is now a global religious worldview that has been adapted among many cultures and ethnicities.

Global Spread

The global reach of Rastafarianism is one example of the spread and influence of Afro-Caribbean religions beyond the region. Haitian Vodou and Trinidadian and Jamaican Afro-Protestantism have come with the diasporas of their peoples to the cities of North America and Britain. Cuban Santería has been brought to Puerto Rico, Venezuela, Mexico, and every major city of the United States. Santería in particular has spread beyond its original Cuban exile community and has been enthusiastically embraced by black and white Americans and many Europeans. In 1993 a Santería community in Hialeah, Florida won a unanimous decision from the United States Supreme Court overturning a local ordinance that prohibited animal sacrifice. Inspired by this victory, many practitioners are assuming public identities as devotees of the African orishas. Many would discard the name Santería, as it connotes a forced relationship with Catholicism from which the religion may now declare its full independence. 'Orisha Religion' may indeed claim to be a world religion in its own right with millions of devotees in Africa, Europe, and the Americas.

Literature

Barrett, Leonard E., Soul Force: African Heritage in Afro-American Religion, New York 1974; Brandon, George Edward, Santeria from Africa to the New World: The Dead Sell Memories, Bloomington 1993; Brown, Karen McCarthy, Mama Lola: A Vodou Priestess in Brooklyn, Berkeley 1991; Chevannes, Barry, Rastafari: Roots and Ideology, Syracuse 1994; Glazier, Stephen D., Marchin' the Pilgrims Home: A Study of the Spiritual Baptists of Trinidad, Salem 1991; Murphy, Joseph M., Working the Spirit: Ceremonies of the African Diaspora, Boston 1994; Simpson, George E., Black Religions in the New World, New York 1979; Thompson, Robert Farris, Flash of the Spirit: African and Afro-American Art and Philosophy, New York 1983.

→ Africa II, Afro-American Religions, Ancestors, North America, Possession, Spiritism, Trance, Voodoo, Zombie

Joseph M. Murphy

Age

In a modern understanding, the concept of age refers either broadly to one's life span, or in a narrower sense to its last phase. The commencement of the latter can be marked in various fashions, depending on the social context. However, it is often reckoned in terms of discharge from important formal social functions, especially from the labor process (retirement), and the loss of the capacity for sexual reproduction. Age is therefore always 'social age,' as well, and—as with gender—an essential dimension of the structure of society. While an orientation to chronological age is the usual norm for Western industrial societies, a like concept is missing in many non-industrial societies. Here, instead, the pivotal notion is an orientation to age, class, and an individual's generation, as well as to one's place in the family unit. Age, then, is frequently connected with ritual power and social prestige, as reinforced with the more intimate association that may be ascribed the elderly with the powers of the world beyond (→Marginality/Liminality).

Age has emerged as a key consideration in contemporary surveys of European religiosity. Older persons, especially women, are stronger believers, and are more frequent and more faithful church members, than are the young. Here a close connection is evinced between religiosity and one's location in the → life cycle.

Literature

Bernardi, B., Age Class Systems: Social Institutions and Politics Based on Age, Cambridge 1985; Elwert, G. et al. (eds.), Im Lauf der Zeit. Ethnographische Studien zur gesellschaftlichen Konstruktion von Lebensaltern, Saarbrücken 1990.

→ Death and Dying, Initiation, Life Cycle, Prestige

Monika Wohlrab-Sahr

Agrarian Religion / Agrarian Magic

Agrarian Ritual and the Formation of a Nation

1. In 1865, folklorist Wilhelm Mannhardt (1831–1880), through the use of questionnaires, undertook extensive research in the cultural usages of various agricultural groups. The study of harvest customs in particular, he anticipated, ought to yield information on vestiges of Teutonic paganism—relics that would have survived as testimonials of earlier stages of culture among farming people. He tied this to an investigation of the Romantic myths, thereby seeking to reconstruct traces of the creation of nations—traces of a pre-Christian store of ideas characteristic of the people. Inspired by Jacob Grimm's Deutsche Mythologie ("German Mythology"; 1st ed. 1835, 4th ed. 1875–1878), Mannhardt went further, investigating rural customs and rites by way of questionnaires. Here he claimed to have rediscovered the paradigms of usage and rite that had prevailed in an agrarian culture until mid-nineteenth century, relatively untouched by history. These paradigms he contrasted with those of the educated social class. With all of the material

Rice-planting Festival (Ta-ue-matsuri) in the field of the Fushimi-Inari Shrine in Kyôto, Japan. Celebrated in June in honor of Inari, Goddess of Rice and Nourishment, this festival invokes her blessing on Japanese rice farming. The celebration commences in the Shrine, where a Shintô priest consecrates rice plants. These are then borne in procession on wooden trays to a field belonging to the shrine, where the shoots are solemnly planted. Traditional music, and dancing over the field in honor of Inari make up part of the ceremony. Along with its cultic function, the festival has become a tourist attraction, drawing many visitors. (Benita von Behr)

he had collected, Mannhardt tried to introduce such picturesque figures as vegetation and crop demons, or the rye wolf and the rye dog, into the scientific interpretation of agrarian customs.

Agrarian Cults and Magical Rites

In the wake of Mannhardt's writings, English ancient historian and cultural anthropologist Sir James George Frazer (1854–1941) drew the agrarian cults under the broader concept of → magic rites, and distinguished them from religion. (In fact, this was the beginning of a scholarly differentiation between 'religion' and 'magic.') In the framework of an evolutionary model, Frazer thought he could use the concept of magic to identify an early form of thought still identifiable in European agrarian societies and non-European tribal cultures. Untouched by the progress of civilization, which was speedily traversing the religious stage and arriving at science, magical thinking was a 'bastard child of science,' recognizing that nature had its own laws, but seeking to influence it by incorrect means. Unlike Mannhardt, who had reconstructed the agrarian rites as guarantors of the project of the formation of the (German) nation, Frazer's concept of a persistent magical thinking in the German rural way of life saw civilization threatened with savagery in its own country.

The Farmer as Witness to the Past

A disregard of the processes of societal change was common to both of these antithetical interpretations of 'rural culture' on the threshold of the twentieth century. The changes in agricultural knowledge and methods entering the scene with industrialization, the social class comprising day laborers and farmhands that appeared with the agrarian reform, trade unions beginning to materialize in the cities, now formed a background of contrast with the image of the farmer as witness to the past. A hundred years later, Ingeborg Weber-Kellermann reviewed Mannhardt's material, and came to the conclusion that harvest customs had spread precisely in regions where the new social group of farm workers had already replaced the traditional rural village communities in cultivating the fields. Obviously, harvest rites precisely do not reflect 'ancient Teutonic paganism' (→ Reception).

National Socialist Ideology and the Agrarian Phenomenon

2. The National Socialist ideology politicized the folkloric, pre-Christian thematics emerging from the Romantic period. Agrarian society, in terms of which the social order was to be 'naturalized,' returned to Blut und Boden ('blood and soil'), to its original authentic roots. The introduction of the National Socialist Calendar of Feasts harmonized with the reinterpretation of the feasts of the church year as rural Teutonic worship celebrations, for which folklore furnished the reading template. Easter and Pentecost were 'restored' as Teutonic festivals of spring and reinterpreted as deformations of the festival of the summer solstice celebrated on June 21. The celebration of the First of May underwent the same Teutonization. The farmers of the countryside assembled on the Bückeberg, in the vicinity of Hameln, for the State Harvest Holiday, to confer the Harvest Crown on the Führer as a symbol of the bestowal of the harvest on the 'community of the people' (→ National Socialism).

Development Model in Terms of Cultural Anthropology

3. Studies in cultural anthropology refer various kinds of religion to various types of economy. They work from a general, ideal-typical, developmental model, in which the transition from hunting to farming culture (Neolithic revolution, c. 8000–6000 BCE) is described in parallel with a corresponding change in religious ideas and practices. For rural cultures, characterized by sedentary and cyclical cultivation of the land, concepts of the gods as a central element can be composed that are bound up with the fertility of seed, farmland, and persons. However, the notion of rural religion is too imprecise to provide a basis for comparison when it comes to religions of altogether diverse historical coinage.

Research Interests

To be sure, inquiry by the sociology of religion into the connection between religion and economic configuration is justified. It can be fruitful even under the conditions of technological and economic modernization. Thus, we find in contemporary Indonesia the attempt to invoke a traditional fertility ceremony both against and in favor of a market-oriented production: with the rice farmers of the Rejang society (southwestern Sumatra), state officials exploited the ceremony performed before the sowing to promote support for modern harvesting techniques by way of a conventional religious framework. Traditional religious specialists were excluded from the presentation of a training film on the adoption of modern high-yield techniques. The religious specialists—altogether with the approval of Rejang, which preferred to hold to subsistence-oriented production and the corresponding social structures—then carried out a counter-ceremony in the name of rice-goddess Nyang Serai, patroness of traditional rice farming.

Literature

Frazer, J. G., The Golden Bough, London 1890; Kippenberg, H. G., Discovering Religious History in the Modern Age, Princeton/Oxford 2002, 81-97; Mannhardt, W., Wald- und Feldkulte, Darmstadt [2]1963 ([1]1875–1877); Smith, J. Z., "When the Bough Breaks," in: Idem, Map Is Not Territory: Studies in the History of Religions, Chicago/London 1978, 208-239; Weber-Kellermann, I., Erntebrauch in der ländlichen Arbeitswelt des 19. Jahrhunderts, Marburg 1965.

→ Economy, Evolutionism, Magic, Regeneration/Fertility

Claudia Naacke

Altar

In order that a gift may be offered in such a way that no others may use it for themselves, but rather be given—as a rule—to a god, a holy place is required. Normally the place is an elevated one, so that it can display the offering to the eyes of all. It may be a rock, for example, or a board or slab, or an arrangement of stones. Altars erected by the Greeks for their animal sacrifices stood outside the temple. They had to stretch far enough to accommodate a hundred beasts at once on the occasion of great feasts at which a hecatomb (the sacrifice of a hundred animals at once) was offered, and they had to be provided with a drainage gutter for the flow of blood. The transmission of the gift to God (→ Sacrifice) can be accomplished through destruction, for example by spilling or burning, or indeed by consumption at a community meal. In the latter case, the altar is erected

A woman strews flower petals on the crimson altar in a temple of Dakshinkali in Nepal. Thus she offers a sign of her reverence for the goddess, who is represented by a picture, and at the same time beautifies the sacred space here, as have others before her and as others will after. She has taken the petals from a bowl on the stone. The red part of the altar is enclosed, and functions as a conduit for offerings. The sacred image over the altar is that of the dark-blue Kali, standing at a cremation site dedicated to the god Shiva. In Tantrism, Shiva and Kali embody the tension between the static and the dynamic, essence and vitality. For the believers, Kali, because of her destructive force, can be a terrible person; but she is mighty and one may well place oneself under her protection. (Christoph Auffarth and Kirsten Holzapfel)

In his house in Lomé, Togo, priest André Kunkel has set up a room for a Voodoo ritual to be performed over the telephone. As persons can use this modern medium to carry on conversations with one another, so here the priest inserts coins into imaginary slots, and then, through the handset, makes inquiries of the guardian spirit, represented by the figure, into possible solutions to his clients' problems. The traces left after preliminary rituals, usually drink offerings, remain at the altar, thus testifying to the importance of the protective spirit, while orderliness and aesthetics withdraw into the background: what is asked is 'mighty deeds.' (Christoph Auffarth)

A simple table as the central point around which the 'people of God' gather for their common celebration, was introduced in the Catholic Church in 1965 through the reform of the Second Vatican Council. Now the community of the laity are no longer observers at the offering of a Mass in a foreign tongue, celebrated at a distance at the high altar by a priest with his back to the people. Instead they are participants in the event. Here we see the consecration of such a table in the Cathedral at Frankfurt. New altar tables are ordinarily placed before the high altar as a second altar. In the ninth century, Christian churches began to observe the consecration of an altar with incense, which here burns at the four corners and in the middle of the table. Catholic altars are places of sacrifice and entombment at once: each altar contains relics of the body of a saint. (Christoph Auffarth)

An altar of sin—an utter contradiction, presented in the Munich Bohemian style of the turn of the century. This "assassination attempt" on "everything Christians held sacred" was commissioned by 'artist prince' Franz von Stuck (1863–1928) for his pomp-and-program villa of 1898, which he had ordered in the Pompeian style. A Russian icon lay against the altar, while the retables presented symbolic figures of vitalism and self-creation: Man = Atlas = force, and woman = maenad = dance. The celebrated (or notorious) 1893 "Allegory of Sin" had, of course, already prepared observers to appreciate this artwork. A provokingly self-aware, goes-without-saying sexuality, radiated by a new Eve in oil, reflects the hedonistic feeling for life in newly arisen big-city Munich and its anti-bourgeois aesthetic culture. Like many of his contemporaries, Stuck reached back to the ancient myths (Titan Atlas) and cults (worship of Dionysus), with this sort of 'pagan' stockpile of images (→ Paganism/Neopaganism), in order to justify life conceptions and styles calculated to leave a Christian 'program of duty' in the dust. Was it any wonder that, in response to such frivolities, Thomas Mann staged a Savonarola who rigoristically draws his Gladius Dei ("Sword of God"; 1893) and cries after the stake? (Hubert Mohr) as a table, and God symbolically 'partakes' of the meal. The Christian high altar, before which the priest must turn his back to the gathering, contains relics of a saint, and is in the form of a grave, and only the priest's select assistants are allowed to approach it. Thus, it serves not as a community table or place of transmission of the gift, but merely as a ceremonial altar. In its artistic form, or in the sweet odor that wafts from a censer, it is perceived by those visiting it as the 'beautiful' central point of a sacred place, and as a sign of the invisible God.

→ Materiality, Sacrifice, Orientation

Christoph Auffarth

Amazons

Myth and Fantasy

1. Rarely has an ancient myth fired the fantasy as has that of the Amazons. Those warlike women, men's equals, even play a key part in modern discussions of gender roles, which of course fails to do justice to their significance in the framework of Greek culture. The Amazon people, descended of Ares, god of war, and the nymph Harmonia, constitute in a number of respects a 'nonsociety': one either made up of women alone or at all events dominated by women. They perform activities otherwise reserved to men—hunting, horse breeding, the art of war. In order to be men's physical equals, and lest they be hampered in combat, they burn out their right breasts. They tolerate no men in their society, then, except physically disabled ones. They mutilate their male offspring—when they do not expose or even directly kill them, to prevent a development of their physical strength. In concrete life, the enslaved males, with whom the Amazons develop no very intimate emotional relationship, serve only for purposes of propagation. The other method of conceiving children is through ritual, anonymous copulation with the males of neighboring peoples.

2. a) The head of state in this gynecocracy (rule by women) is the most valiant warrior, who wears a (sexually connotative) belt in token of her queenly rule. Although warlike women accepted in male societies appear repeatedly among other peoples, or in later literature (as does Camilla in Virgil's Aeneid, or Clorinda of Torquato Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata), the Amazons' governmental organization sets them apart as a special case. This might also be the reason why it is precisely they who have stood at the center of feminists' attention and scholarly research.

Rule by Women—the 'Nonsociety'

As a 'nonsociety,' whose extreme configuration includes no males, the Amazon state is only a part of a society, from the standpoint of real relationships, while posing as a complete one,[1] and is 'contrary to nature.' True, the facts that they neither conclude marital contracts, nor demonstrate legal subordination to a patrilinear kinship, indicate the exercise of a free, untrammeled (masculine) sexuality. Still, their behavior is stamped by unrestricted destruction of themselves and others. This negative image served as a bolster for the prevailing societal system in ancient Greece: the other side of the Amazonian coin was emphasis on the exclusion of women from political activity and the waging of war, and their assignment at the same time to a 'natural' task in the framework of the family—a task inalienable in a civilized state. On the level of myth, the Amazons symbolized an unsettling, inconceivable alternative to prevailing society. After all, not only do they arrogate male rights, but they despise both family ties and the bodily integrity of the human being. This makes them a predestined 'other,' and in antiquity they fell under the competency of the ethnographers. Indeed, by means of its separation in time and space, this 'nonsociety' is imagined as living at a safe distance, so to speak, from one's own society. Even in the earliest texts, it is either projected into an antiquity shrouded in legend and story, or exiled to various locations at the ends of the then known earth—to the mythical city of Themiskyra, on the Thermidon in Asia Minor, to Thrace, to Scythia, to Libya. From this position on the periphery, the Amazons mount pillaging expeditions into the Greek world.

b) In epic poetry, where individual female warriors like Antiope, Penthesilea, or Hippolyta are assigned more specific traits, the Amazons are present from the outset. They are almost always defeated, and slain, by great heroes like Bellerophon, Achilles, Theseus, and especially Hercules, who according to various traditions is responsible for their collective demise. It may be part of the fascination of these androgynous, mighty women that they die 'beautifully,' and that, in the amalgamation of beauty and death, they become the projection of manly, otherwise repressed or inexpressible fantasies. In addition to the function of the Amazons as the justly slain adversaries of a justly equilibrated society, the unquestionable eroticism of the battles with the Amazons contributed to the perpetuation of their myth, which presents a battle of the sexes of a special nature. Achilles, for example, falls in love with Penthesilea as he deals her her deathblow, and with shock and longing, recognizes that she is a woman, who under other circumstances could have been his partner and equal.

Reception

3. Over the course of the centuries, the function of the Amazonian myth undergoes an observable alteration. In antiquity, it served the reinforcement of and law and order and male superiority. In later centuries, it has served woman as an alternative female image, and one that has come to constitute a tradition. Modern attempts at a reconstruction, oriented to social reality, nevertheless often stand in stark contrast with the ancient conceptualization. Johann Jacob Bachofen's influential work, Das Mutterrecht ("Maternal Law"; 1861)[2] has been decisive in this development. Behind the myth, Bachofen postulated the historical core of an actual gynecocracy, which, to be sure, he regarded as a primitive and appropriately transcended preliminary step in the direction of authentic societies. It is not only against this background that it must be regarded as a fatal error on the part of early feminists when, contrary to Bachofen's intent, they enlisted the Amazons as a prehistoric matriarchate, and thus as an endorsement of their own claims. Modern Amazon mythologies, too, are especially striking examples of the productivity and magnetic power of myth, which acquires a new meaning in another society and in another time, and can serve societal processes as a catalyst. Nevertheless, it would seem that the warlike, devastating Amazons can scarcely serve as a representation with which one would seek to identify in traversing the path to equal rights for women. In his tragedy Penthesilea (1808), in which he reverses the tradition of antiquity, Heinrich von Kleist makes the Amazon the unintentional murderer of the Achilles she loves. After the revelation of the deed, Penthesilea slays herself. True, requited love is in the foreground here, but the artist develops the impracticability of 'Amazonia,' as well, which he presents as an attitude to be overcome in a genuinely emancipated society.

1. Dowden 1997.
2. Bachofen, Johann Jakob, "Das Mutterrecht," in: Idem, Gesammelte Werke, vols. 2-3, Basle 1948.

Literature

Blok, Josine, The Early Amazons: Modern and Ancient Perspectives on a Persistent Myth, Leiden 1995; Devambez, P./Kauffmann-Samaras, "Amazones," in: Lexikon Iconographicae Mythologicae Classicae 1.1. (1981), 586-653; Dowden, Ken, "The Amazons: Development and Functions", in: Rheinisches Museum 140 (1997), 97-128; Graf, Fritz, "Women, War and Warlike Divinities," in: Zeitschrift für Papyrologie und Epigraphik 55 (1984), 245-254; Lefkowitz, Mary R., Women in Greek Myth, Baltimore 1986.

→ Antiquity, Eroticism, Gender Stereotypes, Sexuality, War/Armed Forces

Christine Walde

Amulet

By way of the French or the Italian, the words 'amulet' (Arab., hammālāt, 'necklace') and 'talisman' (arab., tilsamān, 'magical images') were adopted in European languages in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The character of the amulet tends rather to be protective and resistant (apotropaic), while that of the talisman is more positive and fortifying. The quality of an amulet, to be sure, depends on the 'material' (precious stones, noble metals, rare minerals, or striking appearance), but such quality is always overlaid with symbolic content through its inscribed or pictorial representations, as through its ritual engagement and dedication. The amulet is acquired as a good luck charm, or as a 'magical stone' with healing powers. It is frequently engraved with script: excerpts from the Babylonian poetry of Erra, god of the epidemic, were used as a protective amulet; a biblical text, affixed as a Mesusa to the door of a Jewish home, likewise serves as a protective amulet. Concealment or secrecy prevents the cancellation of the amulet's protective quality by an 'antidote,' and at the same time shrouds it in mystery. Amulets are de facto used worldwide, and in all religions. When officially discountenanced, their utilization migrates to the realm of personal piety. On the other hand, when they are encouraged or tolerated, they are frequently endowed with a theological reinterpretation. For example, the symbol of a hand as a protection against the evil eye has the function of an amulet in Near Eastern and North African popular Islam, where it is conceived as the "hand of Fatima"; in theology, however, it is reinterpreted as a symbol of the Five Pillars of Islam.

Literature

Bonner, C., Studies in Magical Amulets Chiefly Graeco-Egyptian, Ann Arbor 1950; Faraone, C. A., Talismans and Trojan Horses: Guardian Statues in Ancient Greek Myth and Ritual, Oxford/New York 1992; Gager, J. G. (ed.), Curse Tablets and Binding Spells From the Ancient World, Oxford/New York 1992; Marqués-Riviére, J., Amulettes, talismans et Pentacles dans les traditions orientales et occidentales, Paris 1972; Naveh, J./Shaked, Sh., Amulets and Magic Bowls: Aramaic Incantations of Late Antiquity, Jerusalem [2]1987.

→ Evil Eye, Magic

Manfred Hutter

Anarchism

Rule without State

1. Walter Benjamin's celebrated statement—that there has been no radical concept of freedom in Europe since Bakunin (1814–1876)—goes to the heart of anarchistic theory and praxis: anarchism is a freedom movement. Its goal is social order without the rule of human beings by human beings. Like the other revolutionary currents of the nineteenth and twentieth century, anarchism, too, seized on the emancipation of the middle class and the thinking of the → Enlightenment, and proposed to go beyond them radically. Of course, while the Social Democratic and Communist Party component of the labor movement inscribed its banner with conquest of political power, the anarchists struggled with the state as the most powerful amassment of organized force. It was to be replaced by free association: a network of voluntary, always terminable, agreements, among sovereign individuals and groups. The goal of (Gk.) 'an-archism'—the absence of rule—corresponded to an anthropological optimism: only let the organs of oppression and ideologies of authority be dismantled, anarchists were convinced, and human beings would regulate their relationships in spontaneous solidarity. Not only the state, but every form of organized compulsion came under anarchist fire, especially religious dogmas and the system of capitalistic wage-earning. A closed canon of anarchist doctrines is of course nonexistent—it would be a self-contradiction—rather, anarchism comes forward as a heterogeneous, direction-switching movement, between individualism and collectivism, nonviolent and militant, destructive and constructive, unified only by its single goal of the complete dismantling of the state. The rejection of ecclesiastical and civil authority alike ultimately bespeaks an ideal of equality and siblingship, to be realized in a communistic community of goods. Thus, anarchists are at home in bohemian enclaves as in radical union organizations, settlements and communes, just as they are in secret societies that bind themselves by oath. It was not in appeals and petitions, nor in parliamentary participation, that the anarchists placed their hopes for society's deliverance, but in direct action and egalitarian organizing. It was a resounding voluntarism of praxis that begat the moral pathos of anarchistic writings: when all is said and done, everything is to depend on the decision of the individual to join forces in revolutionary association with those of the same mind, and to organize the disintegration of power.

Critique of Religion and Christian Anarchism

2. a) The anarchist critique of religion, formulated most sharply in Mikhail Bakunin's God and the State (1871), attacked religious convictions as a 'renunciation of human reason,' and the 'most decisive rejection of human freedom'—and thereupon concluded, "If God did exist, He would have to be eliminated."

b) Leo N. Tolstoy's (1828–1910) social ethics is frequently denoted a 'Christian anarchism.' Tolstoy began with an understanding of Christianity strictly oriented to the Sermon on the Mount, to conclude on a wholesale condemnation of any application of force, and therefore called for disobedience to civil laws, especially to military conscription. Hope for a revolutionary overthrow of the state power structure, of course, was self-deception in the eyes of the social philosopher, as violent rebellion could only reproduce evil, and further spin the spiral of violence. Deliverance from the cycle could be attained only through inner change, and rejection of all un-Christian demands of the state, especially of that of military service. Tolstoy's postulate of universal freedom from physical constraint, however, stood in sharp opposition not only to doctrines of the state, but to the social teachings of the Christian churches, as well.

c) Notwithstanding the thrust of its thoroughgoing anticlerical and preponderantly atheistic route, the anarchist movement exhibits parallels to Ernst Troelsch's 'sect type' category in his sociology of religion. After all, like the religious sects, anarchist 'free association' is likewise a 'community of volunteers in conscious connection,' and thereby the contrary image of an 'institutional' organization type. In anarchism's implicit anthropology, we witness the return, in secular form, of the doctrine of the 'primordial condition' of an 'unspoiled nature,' a nature without violence, compulsion, law, war, power, or private property (→ Garden/Paradise; Utopia).[1]

Historical Development

3. The first to denominate himself an 'anarchist' was Pierre Joseph Proudhon (1809–1865). In his writings he advocated a type of federative community organization (mutualism) that would be erected on just and fair laws of exchange. Ecclesiastical and civil authority alike would necessarily collapse, in his conviction, if income corresponded to time expended, and income without work were excluded. Under the influence of Mikhail Bakunin, anarchism developed into a movement of social revolution. Beginning in the 1860s, in sharp differentiation from the 'authoritarian state capitalism' of Marx and Engels, Bakunin propagated the concept of collectivist anarchism. Means of production, capital, and land ought to be transferred to the ownership of workers' associations, organized as federations, and the right to inheritance should be abolished. Bakunin rejected any political activity on the part of the proletariat, especially participation in elections, and called for the seizure of the means of production, and the destruction of political power, in a social revolution. Peter Kropotkin (1842–1921) countered Proudhon's call to a full work output with the principle, "To each according to his needs, from each according to his capacity." Kropotkin's writings amalgamated scientists' conviction of the reality of progress with a backward-looking idealization of the medieval guilds or Russian village communities. To him, these constituted a model of the coming free society.

After 1880, the anarchist movement was gradually sidetracked, owing not least of all to a series of successful and attempted assassinations, and the accompanying state harassment. Only its alliance with the unionizing component of the labor movement brought a new heyday. The anarchists attained their greatest historical influence in Spain, where, after the 1936 revolution, they undertook short-lived attempts to create free-communist social organizations. Anarchistic ideas were revived, at times with an explicit appeal to historical roots, in the anti-authoritarian student movement of 1968, as in the alternative movements of the 1970s and 1980s.

1. Troeltsch 1912, 372, 379.

Literature

Bakunin, Mikhail, Selected Writings, ed. by Arthur Lehning, New York 1973; Idem, Statism and Anarchy, ed. by Marshall S. Shatz, New York 1990; Idem, The Basic Bakunin, ed. by Robert M. Cutler, Buffalo 1996; Carter, April, The Political Theory of Anarchism, London 1971; Crowder, George, Classical Anarchism: The Political Thought of Godwin, Proudhon, Bakunin, and Kropotkin, Oxford/New York 1991; Guérin, Daniel, Anarchism: From Theory to Practice, New York 1970 (Fr. 1965); Heider, Ulrike, Anarchism: Left, Right, and Green, San Francisco 1994; Joll, James, The Anarchists, London 1980; Lehning, Arthur, From Buonarroti to Bakunin, Leiden 1970; May, Todd, The Political Philosophy of Poststructuralist Anarchism, University Park 1994; Nettlau, Max, Anarchy Through the Times, New York 1979; Newman, Saul, From Bakunin to Lacan: Anti-Authoriarianism and the Dislocation of Power, Lanham 2001; Troeltsch, Ernst, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, Chicago 1981 (Ger. 1912).

→ Conflict, Criticism of Religion, Group, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Utopia

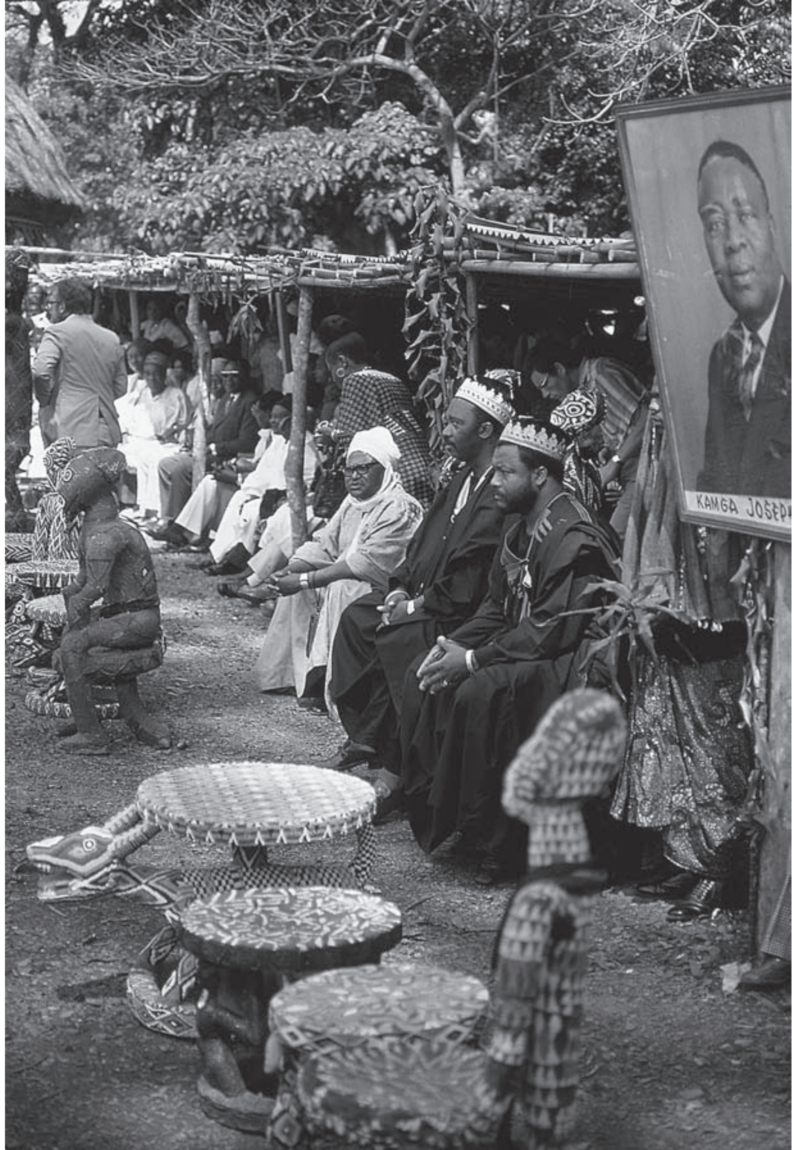
Ulrich Bröckling



Ancestors

Ancestors as Culture-Specific Figures

1. Ancestors are figures of immortality, specific to a given culture, who stand in a strong, identity-bestowing relationship to an individual and/or group. They may be 'mighty,' deceased, direct relatives, now reverenced and remembered by a family in ancestor worship. But they may also be personalities of high status (such as rulers) who are important to the community and whose veneration is characterized by periodically recurring rituals. A conceptualization of ancestors who, fortified with their experiences, assume protective, normative functions vis-à-vis the life journeys of the individual and the community, is a broad, multi-layered phenomenon finding its forms of expression, specific to a given culture, in Africa, Eastern Asia, southern Asia, and Oceania (for example, in → initiation). The recollection of ancestors in worship festivities can be expressed by way of material objects, as → masks or steles.

Concepts of the Person in Tribal Societies

2. The figure of the ancestor indicates not only a community's notions of the 'beyond,' but also the concepts of the person, and the forms of society, associated with these other notions.[1] In tribal societies, ancestors are indeed beings of a world beyond, but they are also part of the present world, and the living charge them with concern for their well-being. In order to ensure their beneficence, descendants must adhere to their instructions and laws most exactly, as they learn them in, for example, myths and ritual songs. In exchange for prayers, meals, and other gifts, the living receive the ancestors' protection and blessing. In rites of initiation, in which young members of the tribe are familiarized with the rules and obligations of adulthood in this society, the new initiates are vouchsafed by their elders an introduction to the skills and wisdom of the ancestors. This ritualized recall of the wisdom and knowledge of the ancestors is bound up with a differentiation of social status among the living. It renews, for one thing, the social order of the community (through a hierarchy of status) in periodically recurring rituals. For another, it renews the moral integration—the reciprocal association—of the individual in this community. Recalling the memory of the dead instills individuals with the relationship that confers their identity upon them; it also transmits to the group the binding norms, values, and expertise in their trades that have been found to be existentially necessary for the survival of this particular community.

Bandjun, Cameroon: Festival of the Dead for deceased King Kamga Joseph (closing ceremony). Nine weeks after the funeral, the notabilities assemble once more. Chairs in the foreground represent the presence of the ancestors. The latter, it goes without saying, belong to the community. The figure (left) at the middle of the row represents the founder of the dynasty. Behind it sit the regent and the new king, along with the chief of the neighboring tribe. While the chiefs present themselves in traditional raiment for this occasion, the photographic portrait shows the deceased king in Western dress. (Benita von Behr)

European Reverence for the Dead as the Cultivation of Reminiscence

3. Ancestors are figures of a collective → memory. It is as such that they function as intermediaries and vehicles of a system of values. The system of values in question is the one attaching to the culturally specific tradition of a given time and space. The veneration of ancestors in tribal societies is not the same as the memorial culture (→ Monument/Memorial Places) of the modern European political reverence for the dead. In the latter case, the secularized figure of the ancestor emerges in two ways. For one, it is presented by way of public reverence for important political personalities (in the Pantheon in Paris, for instance, or at the Mausoleum of Lenin in Moscow). For another, it is presented in the form of military monuments, erected to ensure that the collective memory is engraved with the death of each individual for the political community (the 'republic,' the 'people,' the 'nation,' the 'fatherland').[2] Thus, the mythologizing of individual personalities contributes to the rise of new national communities. How faith communities or families reconstruct themselves through the veneration of spiritual or family ancestors is evident from Christian feasts like All Saints and All Souls. One aspect here is that believers recall and venerate the saints as their 'advocates.' Another is that family members remember their departed in cemetery visits and in their tending of graves on those occasions. Christian Penance and Prayer Day is intended to purify the guilt of a community, a people, or the Church, through common fasting and penance; and the collective confession of sins accomplishes an individual reformation within the community.

4. In the various models of the ancestor, a given community's concepts of past, future, and transcendence become clear: through 'ritualized remembering,' the continuity of the collective takes precedence over the individual's experience of transience. The members of a society interiorize its underlying system of values in the form of a collective remembering. This process can also be called → tradition. Through an individual's referral to his or her ancestors by recollection, there arises a relationship to the past that confers a meaning and an identity on this individual. In these terms, the conceptualization of a life after death has consequences on emotional, intellectual, and social organizational models in the world of the living. The abstract idea of ancestors is carved into the individual memory as a trace of the collective memory, and thus creates a psychic and value-oriented social continuity. It remains an open question which developments in this area will draw the attention and aim of modern industrial societies, where a strong tendency to individualization is observed, and yet where the need abides for the construction of new collective identities (for example, in new religious groupings).

1. Carrithers et al. 1985.
2. Koselleck et al. 1994, 14.

Literature

Carrithers, M. et al. (eds.), The Category of the Person: Anthropology, Philosophy, History, Cambridge 1985; Durkheim, É., The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, New York 1995 (Fr. 1912); Koselleck, R. et al. (eds.), Der politische Totenkult. Kriegerdenkmäler in der Moderne, Munich 1994; Newell, W. H. (ed.), Ancestors, The Hague 1976.

→ Mask, Memory, Monument/Memorial Places, Spirits/Ghosts/Revenants, Spiritism, Tradition, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

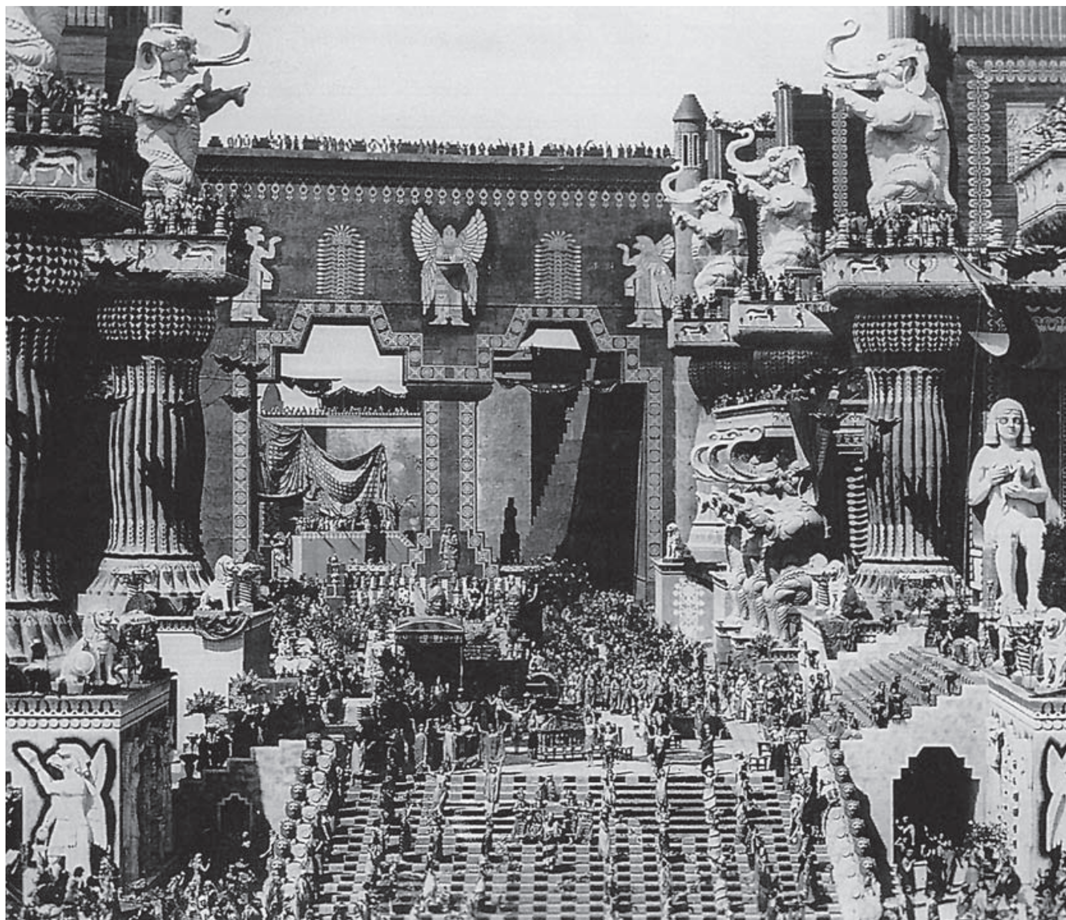
Lidia Guzy

Ancient East



1. a) In extensive parts of the East, in the 'Fertile Crescent,' just enough rain falls for farming. By contrast, the culture of the Mesopotamian lowlands relies on a supraregional irrigation system. This achievement of civilization is fundamental to the Mesopotamian worldview. Still, it places laborers and planners in a class society that must be controlled by a (city) kingdom. Creation narratives, then, are not by and large accounts of first beginnings; instead, they establish the prevailing order and permanent relations of power, which guarantee the building of cities and places of worship and thereby the worship of the gods.

The Ruler and His God

b) The religious concept we first encounter in the Sumerian city-states is orientated to a society of a multiplicity of gods (Pantheon), who, like human beings, stand in a genealogical or societal relationship with one another in the form of a courtly state. Their liturgical images were served and honored in the temple daily, with sacrifices and new attire according to the particular time of day. Standards, emblems, and steles (pillars, found principally in the region of Anatolia and Syria) represented the image to be worshiped, whether according to need or by legal decree. Festivals popularized theological systems of interpretation, through for instance the processional order in which the gods were presented. Here too, the population could enter into contact with the image to be worshiped, which otherwise remained hidden and unapproachable in the temple. Regardless of its rank, any divinity could be chosen as one's personal deity, to enter before the other gods as mediator and advocate, as well as functioning as protector from all deadly powers. Unlike the gods, the → demons had a mixed image, and threatened human beings with illness, death, and misfortune. Positioned before the entries to buildings, however, or engaged through the use of an → amulet hung about the neck, they might also be constrained to lend their power to ward off misfortune.

The Formation of Empires

2. a) The independence of the Sumerian city-states, resulting from the conditions of water distribution, determined the introduction of a city god, whose principal functions consisted in guaranteeing fertility and offering protection to the city. Political dependencies were presented in family relationships, reflected ritually in the visitation of gods of lower rank to the temples of higher, city gods. The case was the same later in Babylon, when

David W. Griffith's monumental film Intolerance (1916) is Hollywood's first bible film. Two parallel plots refer to material from the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament—the decline of the Babylonian Empire with the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus (539 BCE) and four episodes from the life of Jesus. Griffith's film stands at the beginning of epic treatments of biblical themes in the new medium of → film. It is based on new academic images of the Ancient East that resulted from detailed research in the disciplines of archeology and biblical literature in the second half of the nineteenth century. At the same time, the film reveals fantastic images of the 'Orient' (→ Orientalism/Exotism), formed by colonial experiences of France and England with the contemporary Islamic cultures: Belshazzar's banquet (Dan 5) is a prototype of the 'orgy,' the symbol of 'oriental' voluptuousness, vice, eroticism, prodigality, enormity—a bizarre dream of decadence. (Hubert Mohr) the relation between the cities of Babylon and Borsippa was presented as Marduk's relationship to his son, Nabû.

As Semites came in, in early Sumerian times, they equated their own gods and goddesses to those of the Sumerians, so that the number of divinities remained substantially unchanged. On the other hand, the equivalence of a particular god with other gods, or with aspects of a god, was an expression of theological speculation or personal piety. Each of the two phenomena, however, is to be appraised not as a tendency to → monotheism, but rather in context (in a hymn, for example) as an emphasis on and laud of a particular deity.

'Divine Kings'

b) With the development of the Babylonian and Assyrian empires in the course of the second millennium BCE, Babylon and Assyria not only attained the status of political capitals but became religious centers as well, in which cultic specialists, singers, exorcists, astrologers, and soothsayers generated and wielded their knowledge in the temple and palace libraries, for the protection of their identity and rule.

A god-kingdom (thus J. G. Frazer) did not exist in Mesopotamia. Naram-sin alone had himself venerated during his lifetime, since Akkad, his newly founded city of residence, needed a city god, and he raised himself to that status. To be sure, the Sumerian age attests the worship of statues of still-living rulers, as well as the deification of deceased rulers in ancestor worship.

New Years Festivals and Rituals of the King

As Babylon became the political axis of worship, and Marduk the supreme god of the Babylonian pantheon, a change was needed in Babylonian theology, and in a corresponding worldview. The theology of Nippur, city of the worship of the once supreme Assyrian god Enlil—namely, the notion of that city as the cosmic center—was now transferred to Babylon. On the occasion of the Babylonian celebration of the New Year, the visitations of the gods to the once important cities of worship were, for all cultic and political purposes, connected to the capital city Babylon. The recitation of the king's statement of account ('negative confession of sins') before Marduk, and his participation in the New Year's Procession, functioned as the annual renewal of the sacralization of the royal authority, an element later adopted in the repertoire of invading Assyrian, Greek, and Persian rulers as well.

As early as the Mari era (first half of the second millennium BCE), communication with the gods in the form of divining practices such as oracles, dream oracles, the auguries in the entrails of birds, and later, → astrology, was not only of service to the legitimization of the ruling authority. It was also installed as a general means of coming to political determinations, and of authorization for various acts. By contrast with the prophecies of Israel, oracle praxis in Mesopotamia was pro-royalty. The rare critical exceptions were accounted 'false prophecy.'

When a religious statue fell into enemy hands, it was ascribed to the wrath of, and to abandonment by, the god in question, provoked by transgressions on the official level, or by ethical misconduct in the private sphere. Evil omens and royal illnesses were to be countered with cathartic rituals.

'Export' of Religion

3. Trade with, and military/political expansion into, Syria and Anatolia favored export of the Mesopotamian cultural store. Mythic and ritual texts, series of divinatory exercises, knowledge of tricks and deceptions, together with cuneiform writing, were adopted, without, however, the suppression of the strong local elements betraying Hurritic, Hethitic, and Aramaic contributions. The policy of deportation, practiced especially by the Assyrians, led to the expansion of Mesopotamian cults into other cultures as well. Thus, with the deportation of Chaldaean Aramaic tribes from Southern Mesopotamia, the cult of the Nanaja , beginning in Uruk, reached Bethel in → Palestine, and, from there, Elephantine in Egypt. In contrast with the Yahwist religion of ancient Israel, the polytheistic system of Mesopotamia was sufficiently tolerant to integrate the cult of the enemy gods into its own worship after a conquest.

Literature

DALLEY, Stephanie (ed.), The Legacy of Mesopotamia, Oxford 1998; SASSON, Jack M. (ed.), The Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, 4 vols., New York 1992.

→ Antiquity, Astrology, Divination, Egypt, Image/Iconoclasm, Mediterranean Region, Monarchy/Royalty, Palestine/Israel

Beate Pongratz-Leisten

Angel

Rush of Angels Today

1. Despite the extensive loss of importance and meaning that marks the overall situation of Christian piety in post-war Europe, angels have anything but fallen out of fashion. In secular and neo-religious contexts, representations of angels have been the subject of an extraordinary renaissance. Independently of church traditions, and to some extent in direct competition with them, a significant 'reception' has occurred of the notion of the angel as a benign, efficacious manifestation of transcendence. True, angels in this sense, especially in esoteric circles, are understood less as the 'emissary' of a far-away God. Rather, they are seen as independent spirits, who, as invisible forces of succor, or as nature spirits, or beings resembling human persons (except for their supernatural quality), protect and guide individuals or groups.

Angels in Films

By contrast with traditional and neo-religious concepts of angels, in which the supernatural existence of these beings represents an unquestionable fact, the quantitatively overwhelming extra-religious popularity of angels has led to a different manifestation of angels: terrestrial and tangible, they are now 'visible' to earthly eyes. Their presentation becomes low-key—as hand-carved or painted 'cherubs,' as poured chocolate figures, as the graphic and literary content of a publishing boom that can no longer be ignored, or as the main or accessory character in any of a multiplicity of films and television series. Angelic figures of this sort reflect private piety in only a relatively small number of cases. They are more often utilized aesthetically (in interior or exterior home design), positioned as sales-oriented eye-catchers in → advertising (especially before Christmas), or above all, reinterpreted in literature and film as codes for human nature—symbolic figures of the human being's quest for meaning and orientation in the world. Conceptually combined with this last notion is a decided upward revaluation of the human condition, replacing the contrasting incontestable, sublime transcendence of the heavenly messenger in the religious tradition. The new, secular angels are drawn into the focus of this world, and are caught up in its contradictions—in the ups and downs of the sensible world.

Pre-Christian Angelic Figures

2. Already in the most ancient textual strata of the Hebrew Bible, an important role falls to certain divine emissaries of revelation—entities in YHWH's heavenly court. Following the terminology of the Septuagint, Christian theologians designated these figures 'angels.' Post-Exilic Judaic

A good example of a new interpretation of angels is Wim Wenders's eminent film, "Der Himmel über Berlin" (1987). It is based on Peter Handke's story of the voluntary transformation of an angel into a human being: invisible until now to human eyes, an angel forsakes his celestial world for the love of a trapeze artist, a 'mere' mortal. Thus, he abandons his heavenly role as a compassionate, but often helpless, bystander for an 'earthbound,' human life. Now he discovers joys and enchantments from which he has ever been excluded: human sensory perception (colors, scents, and so on), feelings, and emotions. (Hubert Mohr) theology smelted these presentations together, stylizing angels as key figures in a new, rather apocalyptic, anthropology and cosmology. The tradition of the Hellenistic period classifies the angels hierarchically, and gathers them in various groups. Angels comprise an independent coterie of heavenly (but not divine) beings, who deliver and expound divine messages, function as human beings' escorts and protectors, serve as companions of the dead and guides of souls, or act as 'popular angels' in charge of the history of humanity.

Early Christian literature and painting took up these conceptualizations of angels and combined them with the winged-deity motif of Greek-Hellenistic iconography (Hermes, Nike, Tyche). Apart from certain developments in the history of the motif, belief in angels has remained stable in all Christian confessions until our day, if in the most widely varying degrees of intensity. Here, angels have been understood as supernatural beings charged with a key role as intermediary between a transcendent, distant God and human creatures, benignly intervening in the lives of individuals as 'guardian angels.'

3. In terms of the history of religions, the language-game 'angel' is the particularly powerful expression of any of a number of concepts deriving from the sphere of Christian theology. As such, it functions as a medium of discourse upon that theology. Islamic angelology, for example, rests on material borrowed from Jewish and Christian traditions, sometimes to the extent of adopting angels' individual names (Mikha'il = Michael, Djibril = Gabriel). Somewhat as does the Hebrew Bible, the Qur'an presents angels as the courtiers of the one God, Allah, and as his couriers and conveyers of revelation. True, an essential conceptual modification occurs in the Qur'an in the diametrical opposition of the two classes of 'angels who stand by God' and the 'keepers of the fire' (Suras 4:172, 74:31).

We observe a crass depreciation of Jewish and Christian concepts in gnostic texts of late antiquity (→ Gnosticism). Here, angels appear as assistants to a hybrid demiurge, in whose service they have the task of binding to matter the rays of light that compose human beings' actual self, thereby keeping these latter from the pursuit of their authentic destiny of becoming one with the divine in a transcendent world of light. In this devaluation of the demiurge and his angelic associates, he and they are appropriately assigned negative traits, like those attributed to the 'fallen angels,' the demons, in Judaism and Christianity.

In the investigations conducted in comparative religions, a discipline that straddles defined cultural radii, neither category, that of 'angel' or that of its contrary, → 'demon,' is particularly helpful. The principal reason for this is that, while the intermediate beings of polytheistic cultures cannot be interpreted as hierarchically ranked emissaries of a transcendent monotheistic God, neither do they fit the thought pattern of a strictly dualistic ethic. Hermes, for example, the Greek courier of the gods, ranks among the Olympians, the highest deities, while the sensual message of the love-god and daímon (!) Eros is worlds apart from the communication of the Angel Gabriel to Mary. Just so, neither can the seductive arts of the 'Apsaras,' messengers of the Hindu gods, whose machinations are designed to sustain the cosmic order, be evaluated by the norm of a dualistic ethic; and even the Tibetan Dakini, often coming in terrifying, 'demonic' apparitions, can eventuate as symbols and reflections of the human being's inner powers of meditation and enlightenment, and (feminine) dispensers of initiation. What all of these figures have in common is not their character as angels, but merely their general function as ligaments between an earthly world and a reality pointing beyond it. Angels, then, insofar as they fulfill the function of messengers and intermediaries, form a kind of subspecies of a descriptive category that would be called something like 'religious border-crossers'—a category calling for more precision in terms of the history of culture, and, indeed, standing in need of a more appropriate description.

Literature

Ahn, Gregor/Dietrich, Manfred (eds.), Engel und Dämonen. Theologische, anthropologische und religionsgeschichtliche Aspekte des Guten und Bösen, Münster 1997; Davidson, Gustav, A Dictionary of Angels, Including the Fallen Angels, New York 1967; Davidson, M. J., Angels at Qumran: A Comparative Study of I Enoch 1-36, 72-108 and Sectarian Writings from Qumran, Sheffield 1992; Guiley, Rosemary Ellen, Encyclopedia of Angels, New York 1996; Peers, Glenn, Subtle Bodies: Representing Angels in Byzantium, Berkeley 2001; Sullivan, Kevin P., Wrestling with Angels: A Study of the Relationship between Angels and Humans in Ancient Jewish Literature and the New Testament, Leiden etc. 2004; Wilson, Peter Lamborn, Angels, New York 1980.

→ Channeling, Communication, Demon/Demonology, Dualism

Gregor Ahn

Animal I: Hunting Societies

1. In the way of life maintained in hunting societies, which owe their economic support to the activities of the women who gather wild fruit, roots, and so on, as well as to the male hunt for wild beasts, animals occupy a most important position. Here, hunting is not just a way of securing the wherewithal for nutrition; it is bound up with religious concepts, as well. Despite the unquestionable multiplicity and variety of the religious notions characterizing the hunting cultures, certain general, basic attitudes can be attributed to them.

Notions of Human Being and Animal

2. As a western observer, one might be struck by the relatively unimportant distinction between the human being and the animal: animals behave as human beings, have souls as human beings do, and frequently owe their origin to a transformation undergone by the people's → ancestors; human beings can be transformed into animals. The idea of a mystical identity of forest, animal, and human being is characteristic here. With the Aché Indians of Paraguay, for example, the soul of an ancestor passes through forest animals and plants into the body of a newborn child. Bestowal of a name is connected with the hunting and killing of an animal: The meat last eaten by the mother in her pregnancy forms the body (the meat) of the child. It is especially in hunting cultures that we find concepts of an identical life in human beings and in animals. Part of every human being's soul is in a particular wild beast: If a person's 'double' or 'sacred self' (alter ego) is killed, then that person will die as well. The hunter therefore avoids this species of animal, lest he put at risk either his own life or that of his fellow. The idea of an alter ego can yield to that of an exchange of lives, as in the case of the Bolivian Sirionó, among whom, on the occasion of the birth of a child, a hunter attempts to bring down an especially powerful animal (tapir, jaguar, peccary), thereby releasing that part of the animal's

The Maya of Yucatan, Mexico, hold a hunting ceremony, at which they entreat of Sip, Lord of the Animals, permission to hunt the beings in his charge: the animals felled will be a welcome supplement to the everyday diet. For ceremonies, red deer and wild boar are sought. After every thirteen animals taken, the hunters offer thanks, and a sacrifice is made to the Lord of the Animals for the generous gift of these animals. Now the hunters ask the gift of another thirteen, as well as the soul that is bound up with its name. Now this component helps the child to reach its social position.

3. All animals (or else only certain species) have a spiritual owner, the Master of the Animals. The Desana of the Colombian Amazon region, a planting culture among whom hunting is much esteemed as a male concern, imagine the Master of the Animals as a red-skinned, phallus-like dwarf, or else in the form of a lizard. The Lord of the Animals lives in sacred caves in rocks, or else, as lord of aquatic animals, at the bottom of deep, dark ponds. In → caves, the Indians' Birthgivers of Nature—the prototypes of the various animal species—hang on the walls, to be multiplied through the sexual activity of the Master of the Animals (Reichel-Dalmatoff 1971). In mythology, animals may arise from body parts of the Master of the Animals. The Eskimos believe that the water animals have sprung from the severed fingers of Sedna, Mother of the Animals (Duerr 1984). Common to all of the different elaborations of the Master/Mistress of the Animals (Sedna, forest deity of the African Bambuti Pygmies, ancient Greek Artemis, and ancient Roman Diana) is the notion that they protect their animals from human beings. The latter dare bring down only those that have been given to them in an understanding with the Mistress/Master of the Animals. He or she punishes excessive hunting with disease or by a hunting mishap to come.

4. Hunting is ritualized. The hunter must observe practices of purification (dietary prescriptions) and purity (sexual abstinence, the shunning of menstruating women, and so on): Hunting comprises a powerful erotic element, and animals, or lords of animals, could grow jealous, and cause a long string of bad luck in the hunt.[1] Hunters of the Sirionó sink into a deep meditative mood on the morning of the hunt, and entice the beasts with singing. The Aché must keep the 'rules of politeness' in dealing with the beast they intend to fell, 'greet' it, and convince it in conversation that, in the intent of a higher order of things, it is better that it die. Hunting means more than simply the killing of animals, which, after all, have more value than their sheer worth as meat.[2] The meaning of this 'comedy of innocence' (K. Meuli) lies in the attempt to forestall an offense to others of its kind: After all, a testimonial of respect is being offered to the animal to be killed. The hope is that this will bring these others, as well, to a willingness to be killed. Besides, the fear reigns in hunting cultures that vengeance may be wrought by the animal to be killed, or by its protector, the Lord of the Animals. The notion of a 'power of revenge' ensures the special handling of certain power-charged animal parts (blood, innards), which one will prefer to leave unscathed, if not indeed to integrate them into oneself.[3] And even the Master of the Animals must frequently receive his pay: a Desana shaman enters into communication with him through the ingestion of drugs, and promises the souls of human dead in exchange for animals to be hunted and killed. This exchange is supposed to even out the cosmological and ecological imbalance of energy occasioned by the killing.

boon of their own safety. The hunters' firearms and dogs receive a blessing. The 'evil winds' that have been gathering while the men hunted, threaten harm, and are scattered. Using a hyssop of Sipilche leaves, the Mayan priest sprinkles ceremonial wine on the guns lying in a row before him, from a bowl fashioned of calabash leaves, and pronounces the prescribed prayers. (M. Gabriel)

Distribution of the Meat

Along with the killing, the distribution of the meat is ritually regulated. With the Aché, the one who delivers the lethal blow must not eat of the animal felled: fear of the beast's power of vengeance, or of unluckiness in hunting, plays a role here. This dietary prohibition has the social function of keeping the group together instead of running free, since the individual must hunt for the others, and receives his own sustenance from them.[4]

Pressure is eased on the process of allocation of the meat by the ecological abundance or scarcity of the prey, according to codified rules of distribution dictated by social or family requirements. Thus the social cosmos receives its acknowledgment. Not least of all, hunting rites of this kind point to the praxis, doubtless first deriving from them, of animal → sacrifice. Burial of the skull or bones—the 'bone soul' (bear ceremony among the Tungus)—ensures reconciliation with the beast, compensation for the kill, and the → regeneration, the rebirth, of the animals which have died.

5. Since the demise of the hunting cultures, for which no niche remains in modernized lands, basic traits of the hunter's way of thinking are still to be found in the cultures of fruit and vegetable planters, grain farmers, and shepherds: The hybrid sedentary people of the Brazilian Amazon region (Cablocos), for example, still sacrifice to Compira, of Tupi Indian mythology, who is the guardian spirit of wild animals and rain forest, as well as to Water Mother Tabak, for her bestowal of hunting prey or fishes.

Hunters as 'Ecological Saints'?

6. Today's ecological movement (→ Environmentalism) frequently cites the hunter's attitude as a model for an alternative set of behaviors with animals. The romanticized reception of the 'universe of the shaman'—a world actually reticulated with documented religious sociological and ecological contexts—leads ecological programs of Western modernity to neglect the fact that the primary interest of the hunting cultures is to maintain the specific foundations of their life. Thus, an interpretation of hunters as 'ecological saints' would doubtless constitute an inappropriate, spiritualizing representation.[5]

1. See Smith 1996, 101 ff. for the Brazilian Caboclos' panema.
2. Clastres 1984, 104.
3. Baumann, Hermann, in Paideuma, vol. 4 (1950), 191-230.
4. Clastres 1984, 187.
5. For a critique of the spiritual eco-movement, see Grevrus, Ina-Maria, Neues Zeitalter oder Verkehrte Welt? Anthropologie als Kritik, Darmstadt 1990; and the highly controversial Krech III, Shepard, The Ecological Indian: Myth and History, New York/London 1999.

Literature

Baudy, Gerhard, "Hierarchie oder: Die Verteilung des Fleisches," in: Gladigow, Burkhard/Kippenberg, Hans G. (eds.), Neue Ansätze in der Religionswissenschaft, Munich 1983, 131-174; Clastres, Pierre: Chronicle of the Guayaki Indians, London 1998 ([1]1972); Duerr, Hans Peter, Sedna oder die Liebe zum Leben, Frankfurt/M. 1984; Malotki, Ekkehart (ed.), Hopi Animal Tales, Lincoln 1998; Marinatos, Nanno, The Goddess and the Warrior: The Naked Goddess and the Mistress of Animals in Early Greek Religion, New York 2000; Reichel-Dolmatoff, Gerardo, Amazonian Cosmos: The Sexual and Religious Symbolism of the Tukano Indians, Chicago 1971 ([1]1968); Smith, Nigel, The Enchanted Amazon Rain Forest, Florida 1996.

→ Animal II, Animism, North America (Traditional Religions), Sacrifice, Shamanism, South America, Vegetarianism

Josef Drexler

Animal II: World Religions

Relation of the Animal to the Human Being

1. The relation of the human being to the animal is ambivalent. Animals are both superior to human beings, and inferior; they are endowed with human capacities, yet remain foreign to human nature. Like human beings, and yet unlike them, animals receive a place in belief and ritual, and are part of a world of religious conceptions. Since the development of an asymmetrical relation between animals and persons in the course of history, the commonalities and distinctions have been described anew time and again and frequently defined by allusions to religious categories. Whether the accent is on biological similarity, or biological and cultural dissimilarity, the indirect theme of the interchange is always the prevailing self-definition of the human being.

Use and Commodification

Some 10,000 years ago, the 'Neolithic revolution' produced the transition to the farming economy. With the success of domestication, a part of the animal world came to be regarded as a human possession. Complementing their cultivation of plants, people raised domesticated animals, which gradually became different from the untamed forms. Profitable animals became economic goods. In view of their significance for human beings, animals are classified by the latter into groups, such as 'game,' animals for 'profit,' 'farm animals,' 'pests' or 'predators,' and 'pets.' Their bodies are used for nourishment and clothing, their strength as mounts, beasts of burden, and draft. The utilization of animals includes their function in battle (military use of, for example, horses or elephants), exhibition in zoos for the purpose of pleasure, and simple possession as a status symbol. Under the special conditions of animal husbandry—reliability and proximity, selection and availability for breeding, slaughter without risk to human beings or the opportunity of flight—specific uses result that are distinct from those of a hunting way of life (→ Animal I).

Religious Status in the Scriptural Religions

2. a) The sacred scriptures of Jews, Christians, and Muslims reflect the circumstances of the societies in which they have appeared. A particularly important role in these societies falls to the raising of profitable animals. The relationship between human beings and animals is partly defined in terms of creation myths. Here the concepts of a common creatureliness (animals and human beings as God's creations) and God's injunction of stewardship come into confrontation. The use of wild and domesticated animals by human beings is legitimated in Gen 1:28, and animals are seen as subordinated to human beings by God's decree. In the Hebrew Bible, there are loci in which concern for the welfare of cattle is uttered with emotional detachment, for example, the Sabbath injunction regarding work animals in Ex 20:10. In the Qur'an, God is praised as having created animals for the good of human beings (sura 16:5-8). Less frequently, voices are heard in an emphasis not on the difference, but on the similarity. Thus, in the Book of Qoheleth we read: "For the fate of humans and the fate of animals is the same; as one dies, so dies the other. They all have the same breath, and humans have no advantage over the animals" (Eccl 3:19). In the translation of human piety to the world of animals, the latter may be perceived as religious subjects: "Every [being] knows how it has to pray and to praise [God]," we read in the Qur'an (24:41).

A temple elephant, representing the god Ganesha, whose image appears in the left background over a doorframe, attends to its visitors with an attitude of blessing. The animal's hide is artistically painted and decorated. Next to the elephant stands its mahut, who guides, feeds, and cares for it. The wild Indian elephant (Elephas maximus bengalesis) once roamed the whole subcontinent. India has a millennial tradition of the domestication and use of elephants. Indian rulers often kept elephants in great numbers, not only for 'show,' but also as beasts of battle. Even in the economy of the forest, elephants were introduced as work animals. Herds of wild elephants were encircled in battues, roped one by one, and then subjected to hunger, thirst, noise, and touching, to break their resistance. Subsequently came the mahut, to train them with the help of sugar cane and thorny goads. Today, there are still wild herds living in remote areas—at the foot of the Himalayas, in Orissa, and in the mountains of South India. Many elephants fell victim to large-scale hunting or to ivory traders. They are now rarely used as work animals, but tame elephants are still objects of prestige or tourist attractions on reservations or in temples. Temple elephants must be gentle, and not easily 'stressed,' since they often are together in a small space with a great number of persons. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Ganesha: everything starts with him. The elephant-headed god is invoked for protection, whenever a new project is in store: a change of domicile, the celebration of a wedding, the conclusion of an agreement, when examinations are in the offing, and so on. He is regarded as the remover of all obstacles. Crowned and adorned in gold, he reigns over his devotees in a royal posture (lalitasana). The occasion here is the festival of Ganesha Chaturti, which is held, according to the Indian calendar, on the fourth Shudi of the month of Bhadrapada (August/September). To celebrate the day, the participants in the festival have showered one another with red powder. It is customary, on this occasion, to carry temporary cultic images of the god, of clay for instance, through the city. At the end of the festival, they are immersed in a pond, or, as here in Bombay, in the ocean. His name, Ganesha or Ganapati, glorifies the god as 'Lord of Hosts' (pre-Hindu deities and beings). He owes his fat belly to the sweets that he chews so gladly, extended up to him as special offerings. Legend has it that he wrote the monumental epic Mahabharata with the tusk that he has broken off. In a myth, Ganesha's form as a composite being is explained as follows: Parvati, wife of the ascetical god Shiva, lamented that her husband had left her without a son. So she fashioned Ganesha for herself. As Shiva, jealous, encountered the child, however, he struck off his head. Then, at Parvati's sorrow and rage, he promised her that he would get him a new head—that of the first living being to come by. It happened that that was an elephant. Like every Hindu deity, Ganesha has his companion (vahana)—in this case, a rat. The rat, like the elephant, brooks no hindrance to her course. She just gnaws her way through it. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

This motif of the 'praise of the creatures' is also found in the Hebrew psalms and in Christian hymns.

In Europe, with its past of a Christian culture, the attitude toward animals is imbedded in the notion of an unbridgeable, essential difference between animal and human being. In the Middle Ages, behavior with animals was governed by the interests of human use, interests bolstered by the notion that animals were the slaves of human beings. The thought that behavior with animals neither could nor should be the subject of moral considerations acquired the underpinnings of theological argumentation. The question of an animal → soul was answered variously in Christianity. The possibility of a solution was found in the notion that animal souls could be mortal. For the theological authority Thomas Aquinas (1224/25–1274), animals (and plants) would be superfluous in the world to come, since their function (to serve human beings as food) would no longer be needed. More rarely, tendencies to include animals in the expectation of salvation arose, based on the eschatological vision of their peacefulness in Isaiah (11:6-8), and the 'waiting' of all creation in Paul (Rom 8:19-33), for whom "creation itself will be set free from its bondage to decay."

Hinduism and Buddhism

b) As religions that include belief in → reincarnation, Hinduism and Buddhism posit a distinction between human beings and animals that, in principle, is temporary and changeable, in the perspective of a continuing existence after death. Rebirth as an animal often is regarded as a birth to suffering and the result of evil deeds performed in a previous life. To be sure, animals are presented in abundant animal fables—for example, in the Brahmanic Pañcatantra and the Buddhist Jātaka (Pali, 'birth histories')—as religious and ethical subjects, and attain to a 'good rebirth' if they comport themselves in exemplary fashion.

Ethics: The Concept of Ahimsa

In an examination of ethics as relating to animals, we must consider a special concept arising in India—that of the aḥimsā (Sanskrit, 'not to injure,' 'non-violence')—in a context of the possession and use of animals. The economic viability of the tribe will dictate a limited, temporary prohibition of the killing of animals among cattle-raising nomads. Here the intent is the protection of the supply of beef, and later, in the transition to farming, the maintenance of the supply of work and milk animals. Extended to a comprehensive proscription of the killing of animals, aḥimsā is of central importance for the reform movements of Jainism and →Buddhism, in the context of a criticism of Brahmanic sacrificial worship (→ Sacrifice). Both movements reject animal sacrifice as being without utility, and as entailing untoward karmic consequences. The Brahmanic tradition took up the aḥimsā ideal once more. → Vegetarianism, or at least abstinence from beef, is admired as the sign of a very high degree of purity. In these societies across the board, a general, religiously motivated abstention from killing—as formulated in, for example, the first self-obligation of Buddhist morality—is always bound up with attention to the interests of animal use. By transference, not to kill is obligatory for the members of an order who are not involved in economic activities. It is true that a vegetarian tradition has appeared in Buddhism only within East Asian Mahayana. When belief in ill karmic consequences from the slaying of animals comes in conflict with economic forms—as with cattle farming among Tibetan nomads—compensatory rituals of exoneration are accessible. Animal dealers and butchers, who, from a Buddhist viewpoint, pursue a dubious calling, are often of a different belief, and it is to them that animal slaughter is committed (if in strictest secrecy). The same holds true for India, where the 'not to injure' cattle are consigned to Muslim slaughterers. Doubtful consequences of this legalistic ethic include a sheerly ritual ransom of animals for the accumulation of karmic merit, and recourse to indirect forms of killing (death in extreme distress). By contrast, Buddhist vegetarian principles emphasize a compassion for all living beings.

Animals in Cultic Praxis

3. A special use of animals occurs in cultic connections. From a ritual standpoint, animals may be regarded as unclean, clean, or sacred, and as fitting sacrificial victims (→ Sacrifice). These classifications can occasion dietary prescriptions, which distinguish between permitted and prohibited animal foodstuffs (→ Eating/Nourishment). Pigs, which are unclean in Islam (and Judaism), in countries of Islamic influence are scarcely kept even by non-Muslims. Sacred animals can be regarded as representing divinities, and thus can receive reverence and sacrificial gifts. Their special status can lead to a limitation of any profit from them to immaterial, religious benefit—as, for example, with India's sacred monkeys, which are seen in a connection with the god Hanuman, and fed by members of the community. On the other hand, as shown in reverence for cattle, the sacred animal can serve the economy, and at the same time have their products applied to cultic uses (→ Penance/Penitent). The bloody animal sacrifice attained to high importance in ancient cultures of the Near East and the Mediterranean basin—for example, at great state festivals, where a hecatomb (lit., 'one hundred animals'; i.e., a large number) was slaughtered and consumed. One of the important new departures of Christianity was the eviction of the bloody sacrifice from worship. Now animals were slaughtered in a secular ambience, even on the occasion of festal meals. Animal sacrifice is to be found today in, for instance, the → Afro-American religions, → Voodoo, in Islam, and, here and there, in Hinduism. Food offerings and cultic meals that make use of slain animals are more widespread. Finally, religious uses include that of the → oracle, in which responses are sought in animal behavior or by inspection of their internal organs.

Mythological Animal Forms

4. Animal-like divinities and epiphanies, animals as attributes and companions of the divinities, animal myths and symbols, occupy an important place in the store of religious expression—and it is not always completely clear with which of these categories one is dealing in the case of a given animal figure. Only knowledge of the real or ascribed peculiarities of a given animal makes an interpretation (specific to the culture at hand) possible. In India, snakes, and mythical serpentine composite beings (nagas), are associated with water: During the rains, snakes indeed come to the surface of the earth, to keep from drowning.

Divinities in Animal Form

Gods represented either as composite beings or as altogether animal in their form (theriomorphic, zoomorphic), are known especially from ancient → Egypt. In Greek antiquity, a hierarchy prevailed between the high, anthropomorphic gods and lower deities, or demons, of theriomorphic traits, although individual local cults retained the divine animal image throughout. Among the deities of Hinduism today, Ganesha, who has the head of an elephant, and the monkey god Hanuman both enjoy great veneration and popularity. Zoomorphic presentations may also refer to mythical → epiphanies, as for example in the descents (Sanskrit avatāra) of the Indian God Vishnu as a fish, a tortoise, a boar, and a composite lion and human being; or, in the four Christian gospels, the descent of the Holy Spirit as a dove at the baptism of Jesus (Matt. 3:16 and parallels).

Animal Companions

In many religions, animals are present as companions of certain divinities, and the traits connected with them contribute to the characterization of the deity in question. A pair of ravens (Hugin, 'Thought,' and Munin, 'Memory') perch on the shoulders of Teutonic god Odin, and report to him what they have seen in the world. Athena's owl companion is pictured on ancient coins, where it represents the goddess. The like is to be observed in Hinduism, where gods and goddesses are assigned their respective animal mounts and companions (Sanskrit, vahana, 'vehicle'). Shiva's bull Nandi can be pictured either together with, or representing him. The boundaries among divine animal form, animal companion, and symbol are fleeting here.

Symbols

Animal forms as symbols can refer to (mythical) persons, abstract concepts, or occurrences. In Buddhist art, the hog, snake, and cock symbolize the driving power of the passions of greed, hatred, and blindness respectively. Gazelles recall the Buddha's first sermon in the animal park near Benares. Having rejected the worship of animals, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam have reduced representations of animals to a symbolic function. In Islam they come little into account, owing to the prohibition of images: exceptions are, for example, figures of animals in calligraphy. The rich Christian symbolism of late antiquity and the Middle Ages is now only partially understood by Christians. A central image of Christ is the innocent sacrificial Lamb of God, also referred to in the liturgy.

Demonic Animals

All claims to superiority and control notwithstanding, animals are repeatedly regarded as the bearers and representatives of murky, fearful powers (→ Fear/Dread). In the time of the European witch crazes, for example, many animals were looked upon as the → witches' companions and guardians. 'Border crossers' (witches that transform themselves into animals, as, for example, werewolves or vampires) were regarded as menacing.

Wondrous Tales

Unusual events in the lives of holy persons are at times reported as having involved animals. These persons' special quality is attested by the animals' behavior—especially when it is a matter of the calming of dangerous animals, as, for example, the taming of a wolf by Saint → Francis of Assisi, or the → Buddha's pacification of Nalagiri, the elephant that had been set upon him. Ascetics in particular, as outsiders of a culture, are ascribed a special familiarity with wild animals (and the powers of the wild that they embody). This holds for Christian hermits as well as for tantric yogi Milarepa, from Tibet, for example, of whom the story is told that his words of wisdom once calmed a fleeing deer, the pursuing hound, and finally the hunter himself. The longing for a peaceable common life of human being and animal, without eating and being eaten, finds its utopian expression in the wishful fantasy of the already mentioned peacefulness of the beasts, in a 'golden age' when the unmolested lamb takes its rest at the wolf's side.

Modern Times

5. a) Especially productive for the allocation of a place to animals in modernity has been the philosophical proposition that it is not the human image of God that constitutes the essential difference between animals and human beings, but the gift of reason; and this will legitimate the right of human beings to make use of animals. Indeed, if the question of sensation is bracketed a priori, and understanding is reserved to the human being alone, then the animal is but a → machine, however perfect, constructed by God (Descartes). Since the Enlightenment, animals have represented a (usually negatively evaluated; less often, positively) 'state of nature,' and were set over against a perfected (or defective) race of human beings. With the advent of the theory of evolution in the nineteenth century (→Evolutionism), the difference that had until now been regarded as essential was relativized, and animals were shifted into an—uncomfortable for so many—proximity to human beings.

Current Views and Debates

b) The keeping of profitable animals in today's industrialized countries has subordinated them, to an extent hitherto unknown, to the principle of economic growth. Features of the intensification of animal keeping include: a shortened individual life span for the sake of the highest possible degree of exploitation; increased numbers kept per unit space with reduction of freedom of movement and social contact with other members of their species; the routine medication of disease-prone, long stressed animals; the subsequent industrial keeping, slaughtering, and processing of animals out of the sight of consumers; animal carcasses processed, beyond recognition, as hamburger or fish sticks. Not only profitable animals, but wild animals in Western cities are withdrawn from direct perception, except in artificial presentations in the captivity of the zoological garden. Human estrangement from animals, and the deprivation of any existential or emotive contact with them, goes hand in hand with the anthropomorphization of animals in fiction (children's books, Disney Films; → Trickster) or in pampered pets, to which—at times as a substitute for human contacts of any depth—an emotional bond is referred, and which, after their death, may even have a grave in the pet cemetery. Still the possibility of observing animals without assuming control over them does find some advocates. In these circumstances, symbolic animals are sometimes extensively perceived as dissociated from living animals. The white dove in church, representing the Holy Spirit, is scarcely perceived as in any way akin to the doves whose presence in the yard is an annoyance. Nevertheless, for example in → advertising, but also in the area of religion, symbolic animals remain present.

Animal Protection and Animal Rights

With the relegation of wild animals to spaces afar and the ever more efficient exploitation of profitable animals (to the point of genetically 'optimized' test-tube breeds, or the torture of animals in experimentation supposedly in the interests of human emolument), deeper and more serious reflection has begun on the relationship between animals and human beings. In reaction to the extermination of species, the preservation of species, under the umbrella of the preservation of nature, has been adopted as a theme in → environmentalism, and animal ethics is present as a subdivision of →bioethics in the media and in public debates. For a long time, the animal preservation movement made use only of secondary arguments (monetary advantages to animal keepers, threat to human beings in the form of a brutalization of the animal-torturers, respect for the Creator). But with the animal rights movement, animals have come to individual and societal attention as potential subjects of pain and suffering, and as actually having their own needs and interests (as in the 'biocentric' environmental ethics of 'deep ecology'). Positions previously held regarding the relationship of animals and human beings, including precisely the positions of the traditional religions, are being subjected to critical reflections on their anthropocentrism, or indeed of their 'speciesism' (an a priori preference for the interests of the members of one's own species). The legal institutionalization of the notion of animal preservation, provided in Parag. 1 of the German Animal Preservation Law, was complemented in 1986 with the concept of 'fellow creatures'—a religious notion drawn from the area of secondary arguments for animal protection, thus nullifying (at least nominally) the ancient Roman Law definition of an animal as a 'thing.'

Religion and Animal Protection

Conflicts can arise between modern animal protection and religious usage, as for example in the question of whether ritual slaughter (slaughtering by venesection), according to ritual prescripts of Jewish and Muslim tradition, without antecedent anesthetization, ought to be permitted. This triggered an intrareligious debate as to when meat is kosher or halal, ritually pure. In some European countries, slaughtering according to Jewish and Muslim rights without anesthetization must be licensed as an exception. Questions of → bioethics and animal protection have sparked debates of principle among representatives of various religions. Such questions have been taken as the occasion of a review of the attitude toward animals maintained in the respective theological systems of these religions, and of taking positions based on religious arguments. The wide spectrum of current attitudes and behavior vis-à-vis the animal world, ranging from its unreflected devaluation to the vision of a development that the ultimacy of the human position in the universe is itself relativized, has been described by Peter Høeg in his novel The Woman and the Ape (1996).

Whales and Dolphins, the New Sacred Animals

c) Also in the present, many animals are objects of an upward revaluation under the auspices of religion. The → New Age has discovered whales and dolphins as sacred animals. As species threatened with extinction, they stand indirectly for human survival anxiety as well. The strange, remote world of the seas, a world charged with the living experience of their special sensory abilities, and their outfitting with qualities so highly prized today (intelligence, communicative and social competencies), confers upon them something akin to the status of mythic beings. The urgent task of rescuing threatened species fuses with a yearning to come in contact with beings that might—possibly—be ready with a message of salvation for human beings. While their populations, in the seas of the world, continue to be decimated, their voices have been preserved on CDs, and heard as incorporeal communications for human beings' spiritual needs. These voices, it is hoped, will have positive effects on our own psyches, even though—or precisely because—we do not understand them.

Literature

Campbell, Joseph, The Way of the Animal Powers, San Francisco 1983; Clark, Stephen R. L., The Moral Status of Animals, Oxford 1977; Dinzelbacher, Peter (ed.), Mensch

und Tier in der Geschichte Europas, Stuttgart 2000; Frey, Raymond G., Interests and Rights: The Case against Animals, Oxford 1980; Hultkrantz, Åke (ed.), The Supernatural Owners of Nature: Nordic Symposion on the Religious Conceptions of Ruling Spirits (genii loci, genii speciei) and Allied Concepts, Uppsala 1961; Lonsdale, Steven, Animals and the Origins of Dance, London 1981; Lopez, Barry Holstun, Of Wolves and Men, New York etc. 1995 ([1]1978); Morris, Brian, Animals and Ancestors: An Ethnography, Oxford 2000; Münch, Peter/Walz, Rainer (eds.), Tiere und Menschen. Geschichte und Aktualität eines prekären Verhältnisses, Paderborn 1998; Pollard, John, Birds in Greek Life and Myth, London 1977; Regan, Tom, Animal Rights and Human Obligations, Englewood Cliffs 1976; Regan, Tom (ed.), Animal Sacrifices: Religious Perspectives on the Use of Animals in Science, Philadelphia 1986; Werness, Hope B., The Continuum Encyclopedia of Animal Symbolism in Art, New York 2004; Zimmerman, Michael E. et al. (eds.), Environmental Philosophy from Animal Rights to Radical Ecology, New Jersey [2]1998.

→ Animal I, Animism, Bioethics, Cosmogony, Composite Beings, Devil, Eating/Nourishment, Environmentalism, Evolution, Genetic Engineering, Nature, Nature Piety, Regeneration, Sacrifice, Trickster, Vegetarianism

Kirsten Holzapfel

Animism

The concept and theory of 'animism' are linked to the name of religious anthropologist Edward B. Tylor (1832–1917), who, in his Primitive Culture (1871), thus designated any belief in the ensoulment of nature and the existence of spirits. Tylor sought to answer the question of how human beings came to develop the concept of a → 'soul.' He supposed that the religious conceptualizations of the primitives had their origins in dreams or hallucinations, through which they must have arrived at the conviction of having an alter ego, a 'second I.' The latter departs from the body in sleep and dreams, as well as in illnesses. At death, it does so definitively. Then it lives on as an independent soul-spirit. Since →animals and plants, as well, live and die, they too have souls. Even stones, sticks, weapons, or clothing are alive, since they too appear in dreams. Tylor derives the development of religion from this soul concept. In his evolutionistic approach, religion begins with the notion of the soul-spirits (→ Evolutionism). Spirits are the cause of all apparitions, and exert influence on human lives. Subsequently, in a later stage of development, they become gods.

Animism no longer plays an important role in the literature or debates of religious studies. The originally progressive theory that prepared the ground for the reactionary degeneration theories, directed against Darwin's discoveries, soon became reactionary itself, in that it supported the evolutionistic schema of the development of religion in human history as the lowest stage of that schema. Today scholars reject speculation on the development of religion by stages is just as they reject the emergence of religion from belief in souls and spirits. To be sure, the concept repeatedly surfaces in popular scientific contexts, as well as in scholarly milieus that do not take into account advances in the study of religion. It is put forward as a name for tribal religions, or magical belief in spirits among 'nature peoples.' Nor has animism been expelled from an (in part trivial) connection in the art world or from writings inspired by missionary theory and practice.

As a positively charged concept of self-identification, 'animism' is used in → neopaganism, 'neo-shamanism' (→ Shamanism), ecological movements, (→ Environmentalism) and in 'nature-based spirituality' (→ New Age).

Literature

Tylor, Edward B., Primitive Culture, London 1871; Schlatter, Gerhard, "Animismus," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 1 (1988), 473-476.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Evolutionism, Neopaganism, Religion

Gerhard Schlatter

Antichrist

The expression "Antichrist" (Gk., 'Counter-Anointed') occurs in the Bible only five times, and exclusively in the two Letters of John (see 1 John 2:18 and 22, 4:3; 2 John 7). There it denotes enemies (plural!) who deny that Christ is the Messiah, or indeed that he ever lived. From there the concept was set in connection with other biblical loci that make the Antichrist (singular), as the devil, Christ's all but equal adversary in the universal combat to be waged at the end of the world.

What the very different concepts of the Antichrist hold in common is opposition to Christ. Thus, in the years 950, Abbot Adso of Montier-en-Der defines the Antichrist as the 'antithesis of Christ in every way,' and presents his vita in a series of descriptions and events exactly contrary to those of the life of Christ. A Christology therefore finds its correspondence in an Antichristology, so that we have what doubtless must be accounted the most overt form of Christian dualism. To look for equivalencies of the Antichrist in non-Christian religions is less than meaningful, then, despite the coinciding of individual traits.

The advent of the Antichrist is generally understood (following Rev 12 ff.) as the commencement of the end of the world. This does not mean, however, that that time is thought of as impending. On the contrary, the imminent expectation of the Antichrist must be regarded as exceptional. Furthermore, it usually accompanies a polemic seeking to identify the Antichrist or his precursors in unwelcome emperors (e.g. Frederick II) or popes (e.g. John XXII), or in entire collectivities ('heretical' groups or enemy peoples). Beginning in the high Middle Ages in particular, conceptions of the Antichrist have enjoyed a broad currency, particularly by way of sermons, plays, church painting, and pamphlets. At the time of the Reformation, its use was downright inflationary.

The concept of the Antichrist took a new turn at the end of the nineteenth century, in philosopher Friedrich → Nietzsche's critique of religion.[1] In his last, no longer self-published, writing, Nietzsche attempts a 'revaluation of all values.' He characterizes Christianity as a life-rejecting compassion, as weakness, disease, and suffering, and understands it as an 'exponential Judaism.' Over against it he sets an Aryan-Hellenic religion of the peoples of the North ('Hyperboreans') distinguished by health, strength, and a natural difference.

1. See Cancik, Hubert, Nietzsches Antike. Vorlesung, Stuttgart 1995, 134-149 and 194-199.

Literature

Emmerson, Richard Kenneth, Antichrist in the Middle Ages: A Study of Medieval Apocalypticism, Art, and Literature, Seattle 1981; Fuller, Robert C., Naming the Antichrist: The History of an American Obsession, Oxford 1995; MacGinn, Bernard, Antichrist: Two Thousand Years of the Human Fascination with Evil, San Francisco 1994; Nietzsche, Friedrich, The Antichrist, repr. New York 1972; Rauh, Horst-Dieter, Das Bild des Antichrist im Mittelalter. Von Tyconius zum Deutschen Symbolismus, Münster [2]1979; Wright, Rosemary Muir, Art and Antichrist in Medieval Europe, Manchester 1995.

→ Antiquity, Apocalypse, Devil, Dualism, Millennarianism/Chiliasm

Achim Hack

Anti-Cult Movements

The anti-cult movement was born as a reaction to the rise of new religious movements (also known as cults; → New Religions) in the United States in the early 1970's. The initiators of the movement were parents concerned about their children joining non-conventional religious groups. The movement remained local at least until the events in Jonestown, Guyana, where in 1978 a new religious group called The People's Temple committed a widely publicized mass suicide. After these events the largest national anti-cult organization, the still-operational American Family Foundation, was formed.

The anti-cult movement has been from the beginning a secular movement, as opposed to the counter-cult movement, which distinctively has its roots in conservative Christianity. Whereas the counter-cult movement's claims center on the doctrinal evils of new religions, the anti-cult movement's concerns are focused on the ill effects that non-conventional religious groups have on the unsuspecting youth that join the groups. Consequently, the anti-cult movement's claims against cults are of secular nature, most important of these being the notion of 'brainwashing.'

'Brainwashing'

Brainwashing has been a central concept in the activities of the anti-cult movement. The often-repeated claim of the anti-cultists is that 'normal' youth do not willingly join deviant cults, but that they are mentally manipulated, e.g. brainwashed to join. The method of brainwashing includes techniques like sleep and food deprivation combined with suggestive rhetoric to recruit new members. The allegations were often bolstered up by the testimonies of ex-cultists who affirmed the anti-cultists' claims. Although proponents of → freedom of religion opposed the concept of brainwashing, and professional psychiatrists and psychologists soon abandoned the concept, it has been regularly used in popular discourse and the media.

'Deprogramming'

The premise of brainwashing also offered the anti-cult movement a guideline for action. The most controversial of the methods used to combat cults was so-called deprogramming. The aim of deprogramming was to have cult members renounce their new faith and way of life and return to their former values and faith, which were invariably their parents' values and faith. The procedure included suspect techniques such as interrogation and strong psychological pressure, some of which are depicted in the popular 1990's film Holy Smoke.

Serious criticism by secular and religious parties concerned about the procedure led the anti-cult movement to abandon deprogramming as a strategy. The movement then shifted its focus to influence legislation. Despite multiple attempts and several hearings, the regulation of cult activities by law did not succeed.

Anti-Cult Movement and the Courts

However, failure to influence legislation did not hold the anti-cult movement back from the courts, where parents of cult members tried to obtain conservatorships to get their children out of the groups. These cases rarely proved fruitful as most decisions were reversed on appeal, if not earlier. Moreover, soon the cults themselves started taking advantage of the court system. Attempts at deprogramming etc. were becoming increasingly risky as the cults started having success at counter-cases against the anti-cult movement.

Although concrete attempts to stop the cults in the United States have not been very successful, the anti-cult movement nevertheless influences public opinion greatly with its extensive publication and information dissemination campaigns. Testimonies of ex-members and journalistic exposés of cult activities have been published as popular books and pamphlets. The Internet has also become a major medium for disseminating anti-cult information. The mainstream media have also largely upheld a negative picture of non-traditional religious groups which has affected their activities in many ways.

The Cult Awareness Network

The American anti-cult movement suffered a major blow when the Cult Awareness Network (CAN) went bankrupt in 1996. The property of the 'old CAN' was purchased by a member of the Church of → Scientology and a 'new CAN' was formed, this time headed by a coalition of groups the 'old CAN' had targeted in its publications and communications. Nevertheless, despite the setbacks and the relative diminution of its influence, the anti-cult movement continues to be active in the United States.

Europe

In Europe the anti-cult movement was a relatively unknown phenomenon until the end of the millennium. Before that, visiting American anti-cult activists were usually responsible for anti-cult activities in Europe, especially the UK. This has radically changed since some governments, namely France, have passed laws against non-traditional religious groups, usually referred to as 'sects' in French. Where the anti-cult movement has failed in influencing legislation in The United States, it has succeeded in the aforementioned countries and also in Russia and some other eastern European countries. The French law has made discrimination against so-called sects possible and has also again invoked the notion of brainwashing under the label of 'mental manipulation.' Although the law was applauded at the time in the French media, many observers, both secular and religious, claim that it violates international statutes concerning freedom of religion and conscience.

Even if the anti-cult movement is diminishing in influence in the USA, it has gained a new weapon against the cults with the example of the French legislation. It remains to be seen what the effects of the French legislation are, and not only in Europe, but also in other countries, which have shown interest in it but do not have the history of respect for human rights that France has.

Literature

Beckford, James A., Cult Controversies: The Societal Response to the New Religious Movements, London 1985; Bromley, David G./Shupe, Anson D., Jr., The Great American Cult Scare, Boston 1981; Hervieu-Leger, Danièle, "France's Obsession with the 'Sectarian Threat,'" in: Lucas, Phillip Charles/Robbins, Thomas (eds.), New Religious Movements in the 21st Century, New York/ London 2004; Introvigne, Massimo, "The Secular Anti-Cult and the Religious Counter-Cult Movement: Strange Bedfellows or Future Enemies?," in: Towler, Robert (ed.), New Religions and the New Europe, Aarhus 1995; Jenkins, Philip, Mystics and Messiahs: Cults and New Religions in American History, Oxford 2000; Melton, J. Gordon, "Anti-cultists in the United States: an historical perspective," in: Wilson, Bryan/Cresswell, Jamie (eds.), New Religious Movements: Challenge and Response, London/New York 1999; Idem, "The Fate of NRM's and their Detractors in Twenty-First Century America," in: Lucas, Phillip Charles/Robbins, Thomas (eds.), New Religious Movements in the 21st Century, New York/London 2004; Shupe, Anson/Darnell, Susan E./Moxon, Kendrick, "The Cult Awareness Network and the Anticult Movement: Implications for NRM's in America," in: Davis, Derek H./ Hankins, Barry (eds.), New Religious Movements and Religious Liberty in America, Waco [2]2003.

→ Fanaticism, Fundamentalism, Freedom of Religion, Group (religious), New Religions, Scientology

Titus Hjelm

Antiquity

Biases of Periodization

1. a) The Protestant humanists accustomed us to a tripartition of history: geographically into old world, new world, and third world; and historically into antiquity, Middle Ages, and modernity.[1] This determination also provides a help in practical ordering, especially in our method of counting by centuries (saecula), as it expresses an assessment of our times. Our enumeration of centuries begins with the 'birth of Christ,' runs forward and backward, and, with 'new world'—or 'new age'—indicates the hope of an era 'according to the will of God.' In the Reformation image of history, the present returns to the primordial (reformatio), and then goes on building: The humanists return ad fontes, to the 'pure springs' of first beginnings. Contrariwise, they look down on the in-between time, the 'middle age' (medium aevum), along with the Third World, with all contempt, as if peering down into a blind gully.

Classical Antiquity

b) An even stronger value judgment attaches to the delineation of 'classical antiquity' as the exemplary epoch 'for us.' This denomination denotes the Ancient religion can be beautifully comical—only for the innocent bystander, of course. The actors who staged a festive masquerade at the Munich home of poet Karl Wolfskehl (1869–1948), Leopoldstrasse 51 in 1903, mounted their attempt to revive the pagan orgiastics of Dionysus in bitter earnest. Wolfkehl, with the beard, as Bacchus, is crowned with ivy. Franziska zu Reventlow (1871–1918), reclining at Caesar's (Stefan George, 1868–1933) side, is a god-possessed maenad, and holds the Thyrsus staff (a stalk of narthex—giant fennel—crowned with ivy and tipped with a pine cone) in her left hand. Granted, unlike the ancient cult, no goat was torn to shreds and the pieces gobbled down raw (sparagmós, omophagía), nor did anyone fall into a trance. And in any case the entire time stretching from Homer up to the year 529 CE, when pagan philosophy in the quality of an institution, the Academy of Plato, shut its doors for good and all—and as, in the same year, Christianity founded the institution that laid out its route to the future, Benedict's monastery on Monte Cassino. The new foundation of Plato's Academy at Florence by the Medici in 1470 was hailed as the 'rebirth' ('Renaissance') of antiquity. First of all, the Latin language stands as an example: It conveyed clarity of thought differently from church Latin, a clarity to be striven for. Then there were the exemplary free scholarship undetermined by Christian dogmatics; a dogma-free, non-repressive religion (→ Paganism/Neopaganism; Polytheism); and political self-determination, which found in tyrannicide, and in the symbol of ancient emancipation from slavery, its model for the revolution, the 'republic,' and → 'democracy.' Here the supreme splendor was to see oneself as 'standing on the shoulders of giants'—small, it is true, but superior to them by virtue of one's elevated vantage.[2] After 1870 there was a switch in criteria. Now ancient times were dubbed 'archaic' in respect of any creativity, and seen as the antithesis, the anti-exemplar, the other extreme, of ossified modernity. Now at last the dark side of antiquity, for example the Dionysiac, manages to break out of its prison of the present (→ Nietzsche). It was at about this time that the state of the question began to change. The alien quality of antiquity when compared with foreign cultures (rather than its continuity with our own) no longer permitted antiquity to be regarded as a self-evident exemplar. Formulae like 'the neighboring foreign' were an attempt to integrate both.[3] production, to be on the safe side, was put off until Carnival (Fasching). It was Reventlow who, as chronicler of the Schwabing bohemian in her novel Herrn Dames Aufzeichnungen (1913), described—with appropriate complacency—the efforts to revitalize the Kosmiker (the "Cosmics"), as the group was called. (Hubert Mohr)

c) 'Classical antiquity' was also regarded as exclusive. It transferred the ideal of 'Western rationalism' to antiquity, simultaneously projecting an exonerated irrationalism on the East, and conceptualizing Christianity as an Eastern religion of deliverance. → Orientalism as a negative identity in the eyes of the West became the new thought pattern, especially in the age of imperialism and anti-Semitism. The higher cultures of the East could be labeled decadent, limp and brutal, petrified, hopeless: India, with its 'Indo-Germanic' primitive religion; China, which knew script, books, the compass, and gunpowder long before they were invented in the West; and Islam, which cultivated antiquity and passed it on to Europe; the towering development of Judaism. All of these were to be replaced with a Europe youthful and fresh. However, Oswald Spengler logically extended the thought pattern to Der Untergang des Abendlandes (1918; Engl. as The Decline of the West)—a shock for Europe after the catastrophe of the First World War.[5]

Epochs of the World

d) Another perspective on world history with an Oriental coloration was opened by Max → Weber. Arnold Toynbee set himself in opposition to it, as did Karl Jaspers with his concept of the "axial age" in antiquity, positing a rational thrust in the great world cultures around or after 500 BCE and since—a drive that included the founding of the great world religions and philosophical systems. While the concept affords little intellectual advance, it did break away from the prevailing Eurocentrism.[6] 'Antiquity,' then, can be conceived in three models: (1) The narrowest model extends only to classical ancient times. (2) A broader one also embraces the high cultures of the Mediterranean region and the Near East. (3) The broadest model sees antiquity as a cultural stage of humanity worldwide. The second of these models expresses the purview of the present entry of this dictionary.

Early Antiquity

2. a) The first cities: After a lengthy phase in which human beings lived in small groups of hunters and gatherers, the cultivation of grain, animal products, and fruit crops occasioned a cultural leap that entailed larger settlements, and the specialization of skills: the 'Neolithic revolution.' The slaughter of animals, however, remained one of the central elements of the ancient religions—the bloody → sacrifice—along with other forms. This feature is a possible continuation of the behavior of the hunting cultures (→ Animal I), as the latter offer atonement for the killing, outwardly reproducing it, in skin and skeleton, with their sacrifices. Still, God is drawn into the slaughter of the animals and the consumption of their flesh. After all, God, too, partakes of the sacrificial meal in which sacred and profane nutrients are reciprocally transformed. The concern that seed sprout into plants has never enjoyed a like religious importance. Not only there (with Çatal Hüyük and Jericho being the oldest cities not built on rivers), but especially on the great rivers, cities merge into realms—on China's Yellow River, on India's Ganges and Indus, on the Euphrates and Tigris in Mesopotamia, on the Nile in Egypt.

Egypt

b) Egypt: The thin stretch of fertile land, ever threatened by the desert, unless the river overflows its banks as the year begins, seems to demand of nature itself a dualism of order and chaos, friend or foe, life or death, paradise or hell. And yet such a division, crisp and clean, fails to hold. Thus, the mythic enemy of Osiris, Seth, is at once an adversary and the god of an expanse of land. → Egypt's typical representation of the gods in the form of birds and beasts is a manifestation of their strength, swiftness, and difference vis-à-vis human beings, while elsewhere in antiquity the deities are often conceived anthropomorphically.

Mesopotamia

c) Mesopotamia: An irrigation system that stretched beyond the immediate oasis of the river into an otherwise sterile wilderness stood in constant need of maintenance. The latter must be organized and overseen by a pyramidal command that can compel labor for community profit even after the death of the ruler. The index of continuity consists in the immortal gods, who are presented as clients of the king. Inasmuch as the king maintains contact with these, he can represent his commands, his campaigns, and his calls for funds, as the decrees of God. Ritual procedures identify him as God's 'servant,' and everything from the daily nourishment, clothing, and bathing of the idol, impetration of counsel, and petition for consent, to written endorsement in historiography can be said to have gone forward in accordance with the will of God. Failures are reckoned as signs that God has withdrawn his friendship. But God is compassionate, as well, when 'his people' are vanquished in war: he must accompany them into exile, as booty, and receive his daily nourishment ('sacrifice') no longer. But it may also occur that he be gallantly received as a guest in the house of the victorious god. Through aggressive policies of the imposition and extension of power, for which the Assyrians were particularly notorious, but also by way of trade, the realms of Mesopotamia expanded their outlook on the world. Through the medium of (cuneiform) script, tales of the gods entered neighboring peoples' store of thought. Images of palace revolts, in which a younger god would expel the elder ones from their 'hegemony in heaven,' images of the journey to the underworld (not of 'death and resurrection'), images of the parliament of the gods on the Mountain of the North, images of the 'Isle of the Blessed,' became model recitations, to be recounted around the Mediterranean, even in societies without palaces: in great realms like that of the Hittites, in city states like Ugarit, or in regularized anarchies as in early Greece.

Israel

d) Israel abundantly illustrates acceptance and resistance. On the one side stands the institution of royalty (which follows authoritarian procedures of divine appointment; → Monarchy/Royalty), priests, ceremonial prophets, and Zion in Jerusalem—the last named demonstrating its religious institution in the fact that the king in his palace and God in the Temple reside together on the Mount. Over against the same stands another image of God, of a God who would have no kings, who dwells not in the City but in the wilderness, and who, from Mount Sinai, communicates his commandments to nomads. Men rise up who are 'called by God,' who resist the king, and who transmit 'God's words.' Especially when City and Temple have been destroyed, and the people of God have been abducted to Babylon and exile, the image of the God who resides in the wilderness receives new meaning. Independent of the Temple, he can move about freely, on a throne with wheels. He dwells no longer where the King dwells, but where his social program is a matter of ongoing experience, and where there is no alternative to him, the one sole God (→ Monotheism). The ideal condition is a retrojection to the time when the people had been freed from exploitation under the rich Egyptians, in the departure (exodus) to the wilderness. Plans for the 'new Jerusalem' (Ezek 40-48) require the equality of all ('siblings'), a condition safeguarded by regular release from guilt, on the Sabbath and in the Year of Jubilee. The royal government is assumed by God himself, in a 'theocracy'—on the level of social reality, by a government by the priests.

Middle Antiquity

3. Phoenicians, Greeks, Romans: Around 1000 BCE, a new focal point in ancient history appears. Seafaring peoples ply the coastal waters and settle on suitable river-mouths. Now they are peoples connected like islands, across the sea, and having no contact with the geographic interior or the native population. Any such contact came only with the Phoenicians, predominantly on the southern and western Mediterranean; then with the Greeks, on the northern and eastern coasts. The Romans ruled the waves only from the second and first centuries BCE on. The → Mediterranean region became the trade hub, and remained so until the close of the sixteenth century, when Atlantic trade assumed central importance. Religion turned equally mobile, and spread to remote regions—into Etruria, for example, where it took on a quasi-regional character.

Phoenicians

a) From its port cities on the eastern Mediterranean, the Phoenician and Punic culture spread abroad, and Carthage became a great city. As we know them largely by reports from foreign observers—and only in recent times has archaeology altered the picture—a god of the character of Moloch stamps the image: now a god is said to require the firstborn children, who, in his honor, are burned to death. The Israelites recounted anti-myths, to the effect that their God did not want the sacrifice of the firstborn (Gen 22; Exod 11), and transformed the name of the spot where a temple to Moloch had stood to 'hell' (gehenna). The sacrifice of children may have been a kind of 'abortion' of the handicapped at birth. On the other hand, their highly developed culture was a model for which to strive: the Greeks believed that they had learned the alphabet from a Prince Cadmos of Phoenicia, and also that Zeus had taken to mistress a Phoenician princess by the name of Europa. The Greeks knew Eastern religion in the formative phase of their culture, as they had annexed the Hittite and Phoenician city-states.

b) After an unsuccessful phase in the Minoan-Mycenaean palace culture, the Greeks formed a very different culture of self-assured city-states, which were willing to have any political arrangment except for monarchy. Religion reflected the self-confidence of the individual states, inasmuch as it brought to expression an adaptation or a detachment from neighboring states in the selection or rejection of gods. The number of gods to be worshiped was limited: 'New gods' must be officially invited in. The society of the gods (the pantheon) reflected the social groups at hand (men, mothers, laborers, girls, boys), each group having its particular god, who was not subordinated to any supreme god, to represent it. Zeus was the mythical 'Father,' although his decisions were frequently overridden. In worship he was seldom chosen as a city's principal god. Religion did not aim for an ultimate principle or single truth. Myths were ambiguous, and were not that which one must believe, nor were they a sacred justification of the institution ('charter myth'). Rather they were the narrative experiment of their inversion.[6] Thus, Greek religion was not suitable as the foundation of a general ethics and set of laws. Unification, and, later, philosophical rules, fulfilled this function.

c) The Romans formed their religion in immediate contact with developed religions: the Etruscan in northern Italy, and the Greek in the South of that peninsula. Accordingly, non-Roman religious specialists were accessible for the reconnaissance of the divine will: Etruscans with their oracle of birds' innards, and Greeks with their oracles of the Sibylline Books or temple healings at the hands of Asclepius. The Romans kept under control the possibility that the foreign cult-specialists might manage to cripple political life. When rituals produced the divine prohibition of a scheduled assembly or military campaign, they had to be repeated until they endorsed the desired project. The official state religion guaranteed the traditional acceptance of the state gods along with that of the ruling families (→ Family Cult). The latter knitted together the various social groups (each with its own worship). Religion, especially, proved to be a clamp of unity between Rome's upper classes and the military, which was increasingly composed of social drifters. An oath (sacramentum) bound soldiers to loyalty to the Romans and their gods. There was no room in the state religion for the wishes and needs of the individual; numerous private cults were available for this; these were viewed with suspicion by the government, however, and frequently prohibited as magical or Oriental or placed under censure. They were often organized into associations to which one might be admitted only through an initiation, also called sacramenta and mysteries. At critical moments, the Romans found them as convenient targets to be incriminated and contested, as 'criminal organizations' planning an assassination of the Emperor: Christians, astrologers, Manichaeans. Ultimately, in 341 CE, sacrifices were outlawed, because they might yield up a prophecy concerning the Emperor. Christianity, having become the state religion, simply continued these persecutions. Nearly eight hundred years later, circa 1200, the Roman Church appealed to Roman imperial authority to justify the execution of persons merely for their beliefs, even though they had committed no crime. Heretics and witches were supposed to have 'assaulted the majesty' now no longer of the Emperor, but of God, and must be found out (inquisitio) and put to death.

Christians

d) Ancient Christianity, emerging from Judaism, and surviving conflict with the Romans, was not constantly at odds with the Imperium. The fierce polemic voiced in, for instance, Rev 12, is counterbalanced by pronouncements that see the Imperium as a God-given protection (Rom 13; Luke 22-25; Acts 25:16). Persecutions were almost unexceptionably local and short-lived. True, the survival of the Christian religion was less assured by men than it was by women, as the latter were less career-oriented; and later, as the religion of the Empire, it emerged as a new religion: ancient 'Catholicism.' Monotheism conveyed the monarchical ideal to religion. Out of egalitarian communities arose hierarchically organized churches. Roman law became the foundation, and the Empire the warranty, of religion. As Christian Rome was nevertheless destroyed (430) in the course of the great migration, North African →Augustine solved the identity crisis with his outline of a double 'citizenship': both in Rome and in the Kingdom of God (civitas terrena, civitas dei). The Constantinian turn became current once more in twentieth century thought, in the modern discussion maintained in 'political theology'

(Carl Schmidt; Erik Peterson, 1932/33) between the form and content of the Kingdom.

Late Antiquity

2. a) Late antiquity must be understood as an era of its own: as a transformation, and not simply a breach and destruction. The change came both from within and from without (migration of the peoples). The ideal of the community as a 'communion of saints' gave way to that of the saint—first of all of the 'God-Man' (theíos anēr). Other than the few 'top athletes' (Gk., askétes; lit., the 'person trained'), no one could any longer live in a holy manner: one must fetch salvation: make pilgrimages to holy places, drink at holy springs, touch holy persons. The ascetics became 'producers of salvation,' far from the city, out in the 'desert,' living on a pillar and walled in, while the rest became 'consumers' of salvation. On the other hand, massive 'Christianization' required the legally based emergence of a homogeneous organization. To this end, Roman laws were adopted. The Catholic Church arose with a strict hierarchy of offices. Local and regional churches lost their independent status and proper traits. Opposition was suppressed by force, and opponents were driven back into the Church. In parallel, city culture, with its manageable community size, crumbled.

Fall of Rome

b) When and why antiquity (Rome) fell has been Europeans' question from early modernity onward. And yet the inquirers regarded themselves as its heirs, and deluded themselves into looking at antiquity as having been resurrected in the 'Renaissance.' Later, confronted with the (Italian) Renaissance, they discovered ever more 'renaissances'—continuity in interruption. Just as the 'youthfully' brutal Teutons—the 'fresh blood' that was needful—were promoted to the status of model for Europe's rescue and renewal, Belgian Henri Pirenne (1937) suggested that it was not the Teutons who had put an end to antiquity, but Islam, inasmuch as the Mediterranean had now switched from connection to barrier, and that, in the North, Islam had indirectly helped Charlemagne (the European, not German 'Karl the Great') to the throne. But the Arabs and Sassanids, along with the remainder of the Roman Empire of 'Byzantium,' preserved far more of ancient culture than did the 'Christian West.' The eastern Mediterranean nourished the ancient centers of communication through their 'city culture,' and did the same for various stores of scholarship, along with literature, economics, and foreign trade. Beginning in the twelfth century, the ancient cultural current flows back into the West, first through contact with the Islamic cultures, and then thanks to refugees from Constantinople, which fell in 1453.

Religion of Late Antiquity

c) Despite all their difference, the Judaism, Christianity, and Islam of antiquity were, to a great extent, of a piece. They shared one another's towering respect for theo-logy, their monotheism with its dualistic stamp, the position of their Holy Book, their locally approved city religion, their application of the law of the Roman Empire, their close bond between ruler and religious leader. In the West, on the other hand, and in the regions of Europe that had never been Romanized, a cultural variant of the Christian religion developed ('Iro-Scottish mission'), rooted in feudal culture. Only Jewish communities and Christian monasteries continued to be models of the old city culture.

Presence of Antiquity

5. a) Through the European system of 'formation,' with its high regard for a linguistic and philosophic 'intelligence,' ancient learning became present in modern times. Even the authorities of the Christian religion learn ancient languages, know the images of myth and the concepts of ancient bestowal of meaning. Beginning in the Renaissance, and especially in the nineteenth century, the Christian religion was seen with 'ancient' eyes; but it was also criticized for elements of antiquity that served as a counter-model of the European present, and these elements furnished the criticism with a historical justification: → Prometheus versus God the tyrant, Dionysus versus theology, Stoic pantheism versus a humanized God (→Paganism/Neopaganism; Religion; Reception).

Antiquity as a Model?

b) In this manner, Greek → polytheism supplied a pattern of tolerant multiplicity, as over against the fanatical intolerance of monotheistic religions. These wholesale classifications, however, are inadequate. Only when state and religion come to form a single unit does religiously motivated repression materialize, and then only temporarily. Islamic rulers were usually tolerant, Roman emperors occasionally very intolerant. Jewish precepts of exclusivity, in a context of other religions, and in a minority situation, are a path of survival, particularly after Jews had lost their political autonomy. One of the characteristics of antiquity, of course, is the multiplicity of religious identities, which can accept 'individuals,' in groups or one by one, along with their social group, without the need to convert them. The difficulties of finding and keeping one's own religious 'choice,' in a plethora of religious bestowals of meaning, against a background of ancient polytheism, appear as a problem only if and when the choice is to be exclusive. Modernity's polytheism seems rather to be the normal case with religion.

1. Koselleck, Reinhart, Vergangene Zukunft: Zur Semantik geschichtlicher Zeiten, Frankfurt/M. 1979, 38-66, 300-348; Löwith, Karl, Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen, Stuttgart 1953.
2. Merton, Robert K., On the Shoulders of Giants: A Shandean Postcript, New York 1965.
3. Cancik 1995, 35-49, 170-174.
4. Said, Edward W., Orientalism, London 1978; Cancik 1995, 122-133, 191-194.
5. Jaspers, Karl, Ursprung und Ziel der Geschichte, Munich 1949; Eisenstadt, Shmuel N., Kulturen der Achenzeit, 5 vols., Frankfurt/M. 1987–1992.
6. Auffarth 1991, 1-37; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Mythische Experimente—experimentelle Mythen," in Schlesier, Renate (ed.), Faszination des Mythos, Basle 1985, 61-82.

Literature

General: Auffarth, Christoph, Der drohende Untergang, Berlin 1991; Burkert, Walter, The Orientalizing Revolution, Cambridge 1992; Cancik, Hubert, Nietzsches Antike. Vorlesung, Stuttgart 1995; Dodds, Eric R., The Greeks and the Irrational, Berkeley/Los Angeles 1966; Graf, Fritz, Greek Mythology: An Introduction, repr. Baltimore 1996; Grant, Michael/Kitzinger, Rachel (eds.), Civilizations of Ancient Mediterranean, 3 vols., New York 1988; Griffiths, J. Gwyn, The Divine Verdict: A Study of Divine Judgement in the Ancient Religions, Leiden 1991; Johnston, Sarah Iles (ed.), Religions of the Ancient World, Cambridge/London 2004; Versnel, Hendrik S., Inconsistencies in Greek and Roman Religion, 2 vols., Leiden 1990–1993.

Specific Cultures: 'Neolithic Revolution': Childe, Gordon V., Social Evolution, London [3]1952; Gellner, Ernest, Plough, Sword and Book: The Structure of Human History, London 1988; Harris, Marvin, Cannibals and Kings: The Origins of Culture, London 1978—Phoenicians: Bonnet, Corinne et al. (eds.), Religio phoenicia, Namur 1986; Markoe, Glenn, Phoenicians, London 2000; Moscati, Sabatino, The Phoenicians, Milan/London 1988—Greece: Bremmer, Jan N., Greek Religion, Oxford 1994; Burkert, Walter, Greek Religion: Archaic and Classical, Oxford 1985—Rome: Beard, Mary et al., Religions of Rome, 2 vols., Cambridge 1998; Liebeschuetz, J. H. W. G., Continuity and Change in Roman Religion, Oxford 1979; Rüpke, Jörg, Die Religion der Römer, Munich 2001; Scheid, John, La religion des Romains, Paris 1998. See also the references in → Judaism, → Rome, and → Christianity.

→ Amazons, Christianity, Egypt, European History of Religion, Judaism, Late Antiquity, Mediterranean Region, Reception, Rome, Sacrifice, Theocracy

Christoph Auffarth

Antiquity (Graeco-Roman Ancient World, Ancient East, Late Antiquity): Time Chart

a) Ancient Near East, Greek Mediterranean (Christoph Auffarth)

Era 1: The First Cities and Realms

around 8000	Cities (Jericho, Çatal Hüyük)	The 'Neolithic Revolution' makes it possible to store nourishment all year long. This is the basis for the sedentary condition, and the maintenance of rulers, the military, and laborers.
around 3000	Realms (Egypt, Mesopotamia)	Civilizations on the great rivers extend their living space by irrigation, but this functions, in the long term, only through close organization.
1351–1334 around 1200	Monotheistic revolution of Akhenaton in Egypt	Pharaoh revolutionizes religion by prescribing that veneration be rendered to the sun (Aton) alone. The project ultimately fails.

		According to biblical accounts, an Egyptian prince, Moses, later leads the Hebrews through the wilderness, to the promised country, and gives them the Ten Commandments of the One God.
	Destruction of the palaces	The 'Sea peoples' destroy the foundations of the luxurious culture of the palaces at the shores of the Mediterranean Sea (Crete around 1500, Hittites and Ugarit around 1400; Mycenae, Egypt). Commerce, luxury goods, plantations for oil, wine, figs, grain, all perish.
Era 2: Prophets and Judge-Arbitrators (1000–500 BCE)
since 1000	Colonization of the Mediterranean world by Phoenicians and Greeks	Instead of the realms, with central palaces, decentralized nets form, which stand in cultural and commercial exchange with one another, and which establish their religion as a model for local cults—e.g. the Phoenicians/ Punics with the large city of Carthage, and the Greeks with Naples or Marseille.
	Delphi	Large sanctuaries, such as the oracles in Delphi, become communications centers for all of the peoples of the Mediterranean world, who fetch counsel and news there.

around 750	Social criticism of the Prophets of Israel in the name of God	Amos, Hosea, Isaiah: criticism of large landholding, exploitation, war profiteering. Religion becomes the opposition mounted by the 'men of God.' JHWH becomes the social program (Ps 82). Hesiod provides parallel social criticism.
594	The law is 'the King'; Solon in Athens	In conflicts in the Greek cities, an impartial judge, such as Solon in Athens, is sent for to decide the case. For protection against the more powerful side, laws are written down and sacralized.
6th cent.	Ionian philosophers	The world comes from a single principle or origin (Thales, Anaximander). Parmenides's Two Worlds, the false one of experience and the true one of philosophical vision.
622	Monotheism in Israel	In 622, destruction of rural sanctuaries by the King (Josiah), and centralization of worship in Jerusalem alone.
586 520/515	Jerusalem Temple destroyed: Israel's exile in Babel Building of the Second Temple	The process is radicalized by the fact that the only remaining place of worship, the Jerusalem Temple, is itself destroyed. Where is God dwelling now? Response of the Deuteronomists:

		God lives in the midst of his people, and thus can be reverenced even in Exile. Restoration of the Temple notwithstanding, now religion can also be lived and experienced without Temple worship. In its place comes written Law (Deuteronomy).
Era 3: Conceptualization of the Afterworld (6th–5th cent. BCE)
?	Zarathustra in Persia	Dualism, Last Judgment and resurrection, heaven and hell.
539	Persians overcome Babel New Year festival in the universal realm of the Persians as a 'religious market'	At the royal court of the Persians, peoples gather from all parts of the earth, and become acquainted with one another's religion. Israelites learn of resurrection and life after death, Greeks of the transmigration of souls (from the Indians). Persian magi offer their religious techniques to the entire world.
490/480	Persians fail to subjugate the Greeks	Greek decentralized culture places itself in opposition to the central rule of the Persian realm.
450/400	Eleusis and its Mysteries	The Athenians build Eleusis into the central sanctuary of their maritime realm. Eleusis, the mystery cult, cuts through political and social structures rooted in kinship.

	Orphics: Free entry into the Afterworld for members of the group	Life after death is no longer tied to rituals to be performed by family members, or to a particular social position, but neither is it thought of as depending on a good life.
399	Socrates's trial for 'atheism' ends with death sentence	Socrates (c. 470–399) declines to save his life, since he believes that through death the soul is delivered from captivity.
	Plato's State sketches a constitution with a religious hierarchy	Socrates's disciple Plato (427–348/7) calls for justice, instead of honor and wealth, as the highest goal in life. A glimpse of the afterworld justifies his ideal of a philosophical asceticism. Until late antiquity, his intellectual authority persists as an outsider.
after 400	Rulers reverenced as gods	For the first time, a Greek ruler is honored in cult. The Greeks had rejected the ancient Eastern connection between power and divinity.
Era 4: Universalization of Religion
324	Mass marriage in Susa	Alexander the Great overcomes the lands from Mesopotamia to India. He seeks to produce his universal realm by mixing the peoples and adopting all great cults in one religion.
304–330	Ptolemies in Egypt; Alexandria becomes	The Greek (Macedonian) dynasty

	cultural and economic metropolis	founds, in the city on the Mediterranean, a cultural capital in which Greek religion and cult are no longer necessarily combined.
297	'Rescue' of Delphi from the Gauls	Delphi is saved from the Gauls by a miracle. In thanks-giving, a 'Festival of Rescue', the Sotéria, is instituted. 'Savior' becomes a key con-cept of the history or Hellenistic religion, with which rulers are honored.
163–161	Maccabean crisis in Judaea	Antiochus IV erects a religious image of Zeus in the Temple of Jerusalem; the Jews, already deeply impregnated by the Hellenistic culture, rise up against this religious affront. The Temple is dedicated anew. The Jewish Feast of Hanukkah commemorates this event.
44 respectively 7 BC	Sidus Iulium, and 'Star of Bethlehem'	After Caesar's murder, his followers see the dictator as a star in heaven, immortally ravished. The Star of Bethlehem, as a sign of the birth of the Ruler of the World, answers this claim of the Romans.

b) Chronology of Antiquity II: Rome and Late Antiquity (Hubert Mohr)

	Note: The dates of early republican time, to the beginning of the third century, are frequently legendary or tendentious. Thus, scholarly opinions and temporal estimates frequently differ considerably. For the reception of antiquity in the European history of religion during modern times, see → Paganism/ Neopaganism.

Era 1: Early History and Republican Period
753 BC	Legendary founding of Rome by Romulus	The history of the Roman religion is broadly identified with the state cult of the city of Rome. The Roman cult is spread by way of the political and military power of 'colonies,' but adopts the cults of the conquered. Along with the ancient traditions of the city of Rome (e.g. the cult of Janus; the triad Jupiter, Mars, Quirinus), Etruscan and Etrusco-Greek (seventh to sixth centuries BCE), Hellenistic Greek (third to second centuries), and Hellenistic—Near Eastern influences (beginning second century BCE) go into the melting pot of the history of Roman cult.
7th–3rd cent. 6th cent. (traditionally 616–509)	Etruscan necropolises in Central Italy Rome an Etruscan city under kings	Belief in the afterworld: tomb as dwelling; journey to the realm of the dead (Greek and Ancient Eastern influences).

509	Dedication of the principal temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus on the Capitoleum	Legendary date. The Temple is supposed to have been begun by Etruscan King Tarquinius Superbus, and dedicated by Consul M. Horatius Pulvillus. In the cultic space (cella), the triad of gods Jupiter, Juno Queen, and Minerva are venerated (Capitolian Triad).
311/302	A Templum Salutis (Lat., 'Temple of Salvation'), of 'public pilgrimage,' is 'praised' (dedicated) during the Samnite Wars.	The state religion consisted of, among other things, a system of personified values of civil religion reverenced in cult. A further example consists in the temple and cult of the 'Loyalty'—the fides publica, or fides populi Romani (258–247 BCE)—on whose walls the treaties with other states were recorded.
293–291	Cult of Greek god of healing Asclepius is brought from Epidauros to Rome.	The translatio [Lat., 'transfer'] occurs after consultation of the libri Sibyllini, a collection of writings or scriptures. Romanized Aesculapius is given a temple on the Island of Tiber (today Saint Bartholomew of the Island, with hospital).
264	Gladiator games first held in framework of burial ceremonies	The usage was adopted from the Etruscan culture, where the games functioned as bloody death offerings (e.g. to Phersu, god of the dead).

228	Introduction (?) of human sacrifice in Rome	A matter of an extraordinary sacrificial ritual in military emergencies: two pairs of Greeks and Gauls are buried alive in the Forum Boarium. The rite is also attested to in 216 BCE (Cannes) and 113. It was prohibited in 97 BCE, but perhaps performed later, despite the prohibition.
205/4	Introduction of the Cybele/Magna Mater cult from Pessinus (or from Mount Ida?), together with the Ludi Megalenses (Lat., 'Megalese Games'), in Rome	The deity was venerated in the form of an aniconic stone of worship, perhaps a meteorite (cf. the Black Stone of the Ka'aba, of → Mecca).
since beginning of 2nd cent.	Cult of Dea Roma (Lat., 'Goddess Rome') in the subjugated provinces	The Roman realm (imperium) is consolidated not only by military and bureaucratic means, but with sacred elements, as well, and centrally bound to the capital, Rome. Along with the cult of the Goddess Rome, there existed personal cults of the Emperor, as well as the cult of the Populus Romunus. In all cases, it is a matter of a form of civil religious veneration of the central political power.
186	Scandal of the Bacchanalia	Celebrations of the mysteries of Bacchus in Rome are suppressed in blood.
139	Astrologers first driven from Rome	Further expulsions: In 33 BCE, as well in the 1st century CE (on the basis of a fear of unauthorized and subversive prophetizing).

second half of 2nd cent.	Monumental terrace-temple of Fortuna Primigenia (Lat., 'Fortune the Firstborn') in Praeneste	The Latin goddess was venerated as Goddess of Birth (presentation as the 'one nursing the child' (Kourótrophos) and Goddess of Oracle. Her temple came into a competition of cults at Rome that was to be taken earnestly.
89	Magical practices fall under Lex Cornelia de Sicariis et Veneficiis (Lat., "Cornelian Law of Assassins and Traitors")
59	First persecution of Egyptian cult of Isis in Rome	E.g. destruction of places of worship; broader persecutions in 58, 53, 50, and 48 BCE, as well as under Augustus and Tiberius.
c. 47	Marcus Terentius Varro (116–1227 BCE) composes Antiquitates Rerum Divinarum (Lat., "Ancient History of Philosophical Theology"), in 41 books	The encyclopedic "Religious Antiquities," influenced by Stoicism, are the most influential works of Roman theology; unfortunately, only fragments survive.
Era 2: Cult of Persons and Religious Restoration: Early Principate (46 BCE–14 CE)
46	Gaius Julius Caesar (d. 44 BCE) represented in a statue as 'Companion in Cult,' and Deus Invictus (Lat., 'Unconquered God'), in the temple of Romulus Quirinus at Rome	Formation in Rome of an 'Emperor Cult,' with deification of the ruler and posthumous apotheosis (consecratio): in 42 BCE, Caesar is posthumously assumed among the state gods as Divus Julius, and is given a temple, with personal (cultic) statue, personal cultic personnel, and sacrificial service (dedicated in 29 BCE).

27 BCE–14 CE	Religious restoration by Caesar Octavius ('Octavian'), since 27 BCE Imperator Caesar Divi Filius Augustus (Lat., 'Emperor Caesar, Son of the Divine Augustus	The reconstitution of Republican cultic buildings and colleges of priests, along with an expansion of the Emperor Cult (which now includes a cult of Genius Augusti).
27	M. Vipsanius Agrippa founds the Pantheon in Rome, the Temple of All Gods
17	Secular Celebration	Ludi Saeculares, to open an originally Etruscan era of 110 years (saeculum). Poet Q. Horatius Flaccus writes a hymn for the festal liturgy, the Carmen Saeculare.
Era 3: Multi-religious Empire
c. 30 CE	The Roman Prefect of Judaea, Pontius Pilatus, permits the execution of Jesus of Nazareth	Jesus's discipleship constitutes itself as 'the Way,' or the 'Christians,' as an independent faith community, and splits off from Judaism (→ Christianity).
64	First persecution of Christians, by Emperor Nero	Execution of Christians as scapegoats for the burning of Rome.

81–96	Emperor Domitian	Permits himself to be addressed as Dominus et Deus Noster (Lat., "Our Lord and God"), and, during his lifetime, is given a temple in Ephesus. After Domitian's death, cultic rededication of the temple, with the deletion of his name (damnatio memoriae, Lat., 'deletion of [his] memory').
130 ff.	Emperor Hadrian's Antinous Cult	After his beloved, Antinous, had drowned in the Nile, Hadrian not only had the city of Antinoupolis built on the site of the accident, but ordered that Antinous receive quasi-imperial consecratio, with temple service and numerous cultic statues, and established solemn games (agones).
180–220	Strong expansion of Persian-influenced Mystery Religion of Mithras	From the second century onward, this cult, influenced by Iranian and astrological doctrines, spreads especially in military circles and is practiced in subterranean meeting places called "Mithraea."
249/51 and 257	Persecution of Christians under Emperors Decius and Valerian	More persecution under Diocletian, 302–305; the background is the attempt of the central government to popularize a unitary → civil religion for all citizens.

253–268	Under the influence of his advisor, Plotinus, Emperor Gallienus promotes Greek Philosophy, and the Mysteries of Eleusis	Egyptian Greek philosopher Plotinus (205–270) develops the Platonic doctrine into the religio-philosophical system called 'Neo-Platonism.'
c. 271 ff.	'Desert Father' Anthony (251–356)	founds Christian eremitical monasticism, on Mount Kolzim, in the eastern Egyptian wilderness.
274 (?)	Emperor Aurelian elevates Sol Invictus (Lat., 'Unconquered Sun') to the status of God of the Empire
276	Mani (b. 216), founder of Manichaeism, dies in a Persian prison	Despite being subjected to repeated persecutions, → Manichaeism subsequently spreads along the Silk Route to Northern China, and outlives antiquity.
279	Persecution of Manichaeans under Emperor Diocletian in the Roman Empire	More persecutions: 372, 379, and after 388, based on the polemics of → Augustine. Thus, Manichaeism arrives at extinction in the Mediterranean region.
Era 3: Constantinople and Byzantium: Christian Empire of Late Antiquity as the 'New Rome' (330–1453)
312 (October 28)	Battle at the Milvian Bridge before Rome: Constantine I defeats rival Maxentius	Turning point in governmental policy regarding Christianity, which, within one century, burgeons to become the only state religion.

321	Constantine issues a law concerning Sunday rest	Sunday becomes the weekly day of rest (Codex Theodosianus II, 8, 1). In Constantine's syncretistic court religion, Dies Solis, 'Sun's Day,' the day of Sol Invictus is celebrated with a Christian sacred service.
325	First Ecumenical Council of Nicaea (today Iznik, in Turkey)	The general (worldwide) council was convoked on the initiative of Emperor Constantine, and conducted under his supervision; condemnation of Arianism as a heresy. Councils are instruments of imperial policy, for safeguarding the unitary religion of the Empire.
330 (May 11)	Constantine dedicates Constantinople as 'New [Christian] Rome'	The political, cultural, and religious center of gravity shifts to the Eastern Mediterranean. The state of Greek-speaking Rhomaioi ('Romans') develops a decided Christian identity. Its Constantinian model of a Christian antiquity lives 1100 years more, until, in 1453, on the threshold of modernity, it is annihilated by Islamized Turks.
361–363	Pagan restoration under Emperor Julian the 'Apostate'	An attempt at the institutionalization of a pagan 'state theology' and 'state church,' on the Christian model, and in competition with the latter, is ineffectual. The 'pagan reaction' fails to survive its originator.

382–384	'Conflict of Altar of Victory' in Roman Senate	The decision of the Emperor Gratian to remove the statue of Victoria from the Curia, the meeting room of the Roman City Senate, stirs the patriciate's last official resistance to Christianization. For Gratian, it had been a 'heathen' symbol, but now it tumbled. State Prefect Symmachus, adherent of the Old Roman religion, cannot prevail over the opposing party, Christian Bishop Ambrose (at the Imperial Court in Milan).
391	Emperor Theodosius I prohibits all state and domestic cult, including bloody sacrifices and the practice of divination	Christianity becomes the state religion, the Greco-Roman cult of the gods a crime of lèse-majesté (Codex Theodosianus XVI 10, 10ff.). For implementation of the decree, Pretorian Prefect Cynegius acts as plenipotentiary extraordinary in the Eastern provinces. Iconoclastic attacks and riots of Christian monks against centers of pagan cult. In Egypt, widespread pagan opposition, with bloody street battles (including destruction of the Serapion in Alexandria).

396–430	→ Augustine is Bishop of Hippo Regius (Province of Africa, today Tunisia)	In church policy, as in theology, Augustine becomes the most influential Church Father of the Western, Latin Church.
497	Legendary conversion to Christianity of Frankish King Clovis I (466–511)	Founding myth of the French nation.
590–604	Pope Gregory the Great	Through successful management of the latifundium, lays the groundwork for the patrimonium Petri (Lat., 'legacy of Peter'), the Papal States.
596	Gregory initiates the mission to the Anglo-Saxons and Irish	This initiative leads to a blooming monastic culture, which bequeathed its ancient legacy to medieval Europe (Anglo-Irish mission in the seventh to eighth centuries).
632–732	After the death of its founder Muhammad (ca. 570–632), rapid expansion of → Islam and its Arabic culture	End of the religious and political unity of the Mediterranean area, which Greco-Roman antiquity had defined since Hellenism.
1453	Fall of Constantinople	End of the last ancient state, the Christian Roman Empire of Byzantium. The Christian thrusts are borne forward by the Orthodox Churches of Russia ('Third Rome') and the Balkans, while the pagan impulses through Pletho and Cardinal Bessarion (1439, Council of Ferrara) inspire Florentine humanism ('Academy' under Marsilio Ficino, founded 1459).

Antiquity: Festival Cycles

a) Festival Cycle of the Greek Religion: Example of Athens

Festivals and Work in Ancient Greece (Commentaries)
In ancient Greece, each city had its own festal calendar. Despite regional commonalities, each city received its identity with its selection of gods and heroes, and its festivals. Here the calendar of Athens is presented. Greek calendars are lunisolar. Lunar months are reconciled with the solar year at irregular intervals. The months usually have their names from their principal feasts. These names reflect the religion. The seasons determine two lengthy annual interstices, when little work is done. It is in these spaces, then, that most festivals fall. The summer interval extends from the wheat harvest until just before the wine harvest (still the case today—with the festal season climaxing on August 15, the Assumption of Mary), from the Skira festival to the New Year feast of the Panathénaia. On the latter feast, the whole city turns out. Great festal processions mount the Acropolis, with its Temple of Athena. The perpetual fire that burns in Athena's lamp there is extinguished, and in nocturnal torch procession it is rekindled by young men now received among the adult citizens. The other interval falls in winter, after the sowing, when the rains have begun, and the hardest work, that of the olive harvest, is to be accomplished—the reaping of the fruit from which the whole pride of Athens, its olive oil, is pressed. But then follows a time of little work. In these months, Dionysus 'visits' the city—as God of Wine for the men, God of the Maenads for the women, and as God of the Theater for all, in tragedy or comedy. At the Anthesteria, the 'Festival of the New Wine,' there is a kind of carnival. The women's feast, the Lenaia, drives the female 'insane'—makes her leave her husband and break the daily rules to which she is accustomed. Theater is presented especially at the Dionysiacs. As with all of the festivals, the dramatic, festive play opens with a sacrifice to a god. The play preserves ancient rituals, such as choral singing and dancing, but is not strictly bound to a ritual or religious service. Dionysus is addressed in the play, in his sanctuary stands the great theater, with an altar in the midst, but the pieces are spontaneous, and each is free to develop in its own way. They are not strictly bound to a religious service. Characteristic of these is that they are not to be celebrated in the daily order patterned by the family. On the contrary, it is precisely at seasons of festival that women separate from their spouses; that men celebrate among themselves; that the young men, then in turn the young women, take central position; that the winegrowers celebrate their own festival, and the soldiers, the fishermen, each quarter of the city, each for themselves. The festal calendars, chiseled in stone, determine which social group is to finance the festival, along with the size and kind of the sacrificial animal. This sort of data is a measurement of social degree: persons who have more, for instance in prosperous years, can contribute beyond their obligation, and thereby demonstrate their wealth. In poor years, there is a minimum that can be unpleasant to have to present. Everyday and holiday, toil and celebration, belong together, but each has 'its time'; work does not devour life. The time of enjoyment has to be earned, and well prepared. Each festival gives one group the opportunity to present itself before the others, but not the individual stands in the foreground—rather, the group. Those who do not wish to are compelled to do the financing. There is always the chance, however, to make a name for oneself.

Christoph Auffarth

b) Festal Cycle of the Roman Religion

Carmentalia (January 11 and 15): Feast of Goddess of Birth, Carmentis.

The Calends of February (February 1) were the foundation festival of Juno Seispes (Sospita), Mater Regina in Lanuvium (Alban Mountains), at which the consuls brought her a sacrifice. Further, at this festival, a serpentine oracle was performed. A virginal girl was made to offer food to a serpent, in the cultic cave, and, by whether or not the serpent accepted it, a fruitful or unfruitful year was foretold.

Between February 13 and 21, at the former Year's End, families commemorated the divi parentum (Lat., 'gods of the ancestors'), their own departed, at the Parentalia. Family members prayed at the hearth, and, at the graves or cremation sites, sacrificed fruit, bread, wine, salt, and garlands. Meals were set on the streets for the circulating souls of the dead (who were perhaps represented by masked persons). The private celebration of the dead was incorporated into the state cult in such a way that a sacrifice to the supreme Vestal, the Vestalis Maxima, was performed on February 13, to begin the celebration, and a state festival, the Ferialia, was held on February 21, to conclude it. At least on this last day, in token of mourning, temples were shut, sacrifice was suspended, state officials doffed their uniforms, hearths in the houses were left unkindled. Strikingly, the mood of the next days, those of the Feast of Friendship, the Caristia (February 22), is altogether different. Gifts were exchanged, and on the Terminalia (February 23), a neighborhood celebration was held, at which people went to the stone fences of the courtyards. There the dedication of the soil was repeated: the stones were crowned with flowers, and salted, a lamb or chicken was slaughtered, and puls, a brew of beans or spelt, was offered.

Still within the mourning period of the Parentalia, fell the Lupercalia, on February 15. This was a shepherds' feast from the time when Rome was first being settled, and it combined carnivalesque activities and bustle with rough sexual symbolism and archaic rites. A she-goat or buck and a dog were sacrificed, then the luperci ('wolf repellers') charged in—young fellows who rushed about the Palatine, flogging with their goatskin scourges any women they encountered, which was supposed to render them fertile.

Things were just as lively at the Festival of Goddess Anna Perenna, on the Ides of March (March 15). Here, in the cultic glade at the first milestone of the Via Flaminia, in tents and leaf huts, persons drank as many cups of wine as they hoped they had years left to live, as well as uttering obscene words ('aischrology').

March was the month to bring the military forces up to condition for bearing arms. Originally, the war season fell between spring planting and the October harvest. The end of February was the moment of ritual preparation for marching off, especially for reviews or inspections, and for purifications (lustrationes). On February 27 and March 14 were held the Equirria, at which the horses were inspected. On March 19, the Quinquatrus Maiores, the feast of the Goddess Minerva on the Aventine, both priesthoods, of the Salii Palatini and the Salii Collini, performed military dances. On March 23, there followed the ritual purification of the trumpets (tubae), the tubilustrium.

In April, the season of the 'Games' (Ludi) began, merry popular entertainment and grand ritual presentation, all rolled into one: the Ludi Megalenses, to the honor of the Magna Mater of Pessinus (April 4–10, introduced 204 BCE)—the 'patrician games'—and the Ludi Ceriales, in honor of Ceres, Goddess of Agriculture (April 12–19, introduced in the third century BCE, if not indeed in the fifth, with its principal feast on April 19), the games of the plebs. This cycle ended with the Ludi Florales, in honor of the goddess of (grain) blossoms and spring, Flora, held from April 27–29 annually (established 238 BCE; from 173 BCE annually), with its chief festival on the twenty-eighth. These featured 'light entertainment'—stage presentations and erotic dances by the courtesans. Further important games were the Ludi Apollinares, in July (5–13; the main festival on the thirteenth), that had been established on grounds of divination warnings during the desperate time of the Second Punic War. Here there were horse races, as well as presentations of tragedy.

All ludi were opened by the pompa circensis, the procession to the Circus as the place of the games. Images of the gods and their attributes were drawn on floats, accompanied by teams of horses and by the athletes, from the Capitol through the city.

The Festival of the Matrons (Lat., matronae) was celebrated by these latter on the Matralia (June 11), as the feast of the Latin and Italian Goddess of Light, Mater Matuta. Here, married women prayed for their sisters' children, thus functioning ritually as maternal aunts (materterae) and so all the kinship were consolidated. In the households, a female slave, as having no right to any descendancy, and potential rival of the mother of the house, was punished ritually and chased from the house.

Nonae Caprotinae (July 7) was a farmers' festival, on which leaf huts were constructed under wild fig trees, and sacrifices offered there. Young women slaves and maidservants, dressed 'in reverse,' as matrons, presented sham battles, then struck out through the city, flailing with roots anyone they encountered.

In October, the army returned from the field. The end of the 'war season' was celebrated with a number of festivals. On October 14, there were the Equirria, a horse race on the Champs de Mars. On the fifteenth, the feast of Equus October, a battle steed (equus bellator) was sacrificed. Finally, the inhabitants of two Roman city quarters battled for the horse-head, in a 'fight' resembling that of today's Italian quartieri. Finally, the Armilustrium, the mustering of the weapons, was on October 19, at which, as in spring (March 19), the Saliers danced.

December 17 saw a carnivalesque festival, the Saturnalia. To the honor of the god Saturnus, the differences in social status between lords and servants, free and slave, were canceled for this day (although probably not 'reversed'). There was banqueting in common, and gifts were exchanged in the form of candles and clay figures (sigillaria). The exemplar was perhaps that of the Greek Kronia.

The year closed with the Compitalia, a festival at the end of December ('a few days after the Saturnalia'), determined anew each year according to the status of the field work. It was celebrated at its own 'compital chapels,' at intersections and 'trivia' (where three roads met), where domains met, as the neighborhood's community sacrifice to the guardian spirits of locality, the Lares Compitales. They were celebrated in company with the slaves. Over the previous night, the chapels had been hung with wool products, 'one per person.' This simultaneously provided a publicly visible census of the neighborhood. On the feast day, cakes were sacrificed, and there were private dinners, with guests and public games (Ludi Compitalicii).

Hubert Mohr

Anti-Semitism

1. Today the concept 'anti-Semitism' denotes any historical form of hostility toward Jews. The word's first publication, however, in 1879 (and doubtless first employed in the milieu of journalist Wilhelm Marr), was by German anti-Semites. They were seeking to denote a new form of antipathy toward Jews, intended to be understood scientifically, and to be grounded in racism, as distinguished from the old 'naïve,' religious hostility. Today, Christian hostility toward Jews is denoted by the specific concept of anti-Judaism. 'Anti-Semitism' has become a more comprehensive term, specified by complements such as, respectively, 'ancient,' 'Christian,' 'folk,' or 'racist.' The etymology of 'anti-Semitism' is based on distinctions developed in linguistics and anthropology at the close of the eighteenth century. Here, 'Semitism' was a concept employed in the effort to grasp and disparage the 'spirit' of the Semitic peoples, in contradistinction to that of the Indo-Germanic. What was expressed in this reorganization was an altered, secularized view of the

During the night of May 17, 1990, all of the graves were desecrated in the little Jewish cemetery of the Swiss village of Villaret. In the photograph, Daniel Gurtner attempts to remove the spray-painted swastika from his brother's gravestone. This desecration was part of a wave that swept Europe immediately after a particularly hideous deed in French Carpentras. The toppling of grave markers, and their defacing with symbols and slogans of the extreme right, represent a common form of anti-Semitic activity, committed with impunity in out-of-the-way cemeteries, and arousing public attention as the violation of a double taboo.

Jews, who were now defined no longer in terms of their religion, but as a people, nation, or race. Anti-Semitism as a political ideology can be understood as a protest movement in modern national states that seeks to revoke, in its legal, religious, and political aspects, the emancipation of the Jews. As a part of modern bourgeois society, 'the Jews' were to be combated and excluded. Nevertheless, even modern anti-Semitism has a religious dimension.

Hostility toward Jews in Pre-Christian Antiquity?

2. Scholars dispute whether and from what point in time one may speak of hostility specifically toward Jews in pre-Christian antiquity, or whether we are dealing with an attitude of general xenophobic 'anti-barbarism,' as the latter prevailed in respect of other peoples as well. Those who speak of a specifically ancient anti-Semitism, on the basis of literary sources, emphasize that it is only the Jews that Egyptian and Greek writers reproach with a general misanthropy and xenophobia, as well as with unbelief and superstition. The most important themes in this anti-Jewish literary polemic are the origin of the Jews in Egypt (interpreted as the expulsion of lepers), their special religious concepts, and their way of life 'under the Law' (monotheism, abstinence from 'impure foods,' the Sabbath, circumcision), with their consequent withdrawal from gentile environment; further, their worship in the Temple at Jerusalem (allegedly the worship of an ass, involving human sacrifices); as well as, in Roman times, the reproach of proselytism, expressing fear of the destruction of Roman customs by the Jewish minority.[1] The origin of anti-Judaism in ancient times was partially located in Egypt, especially in the multicultural metropolis of Alexandria, and partly a result of the conflicts in Syria and Palestine (Maccabean revolt, Jewish War).

New Testament

3. Those who contest the existence of a pagan anti-Semitism, and understand it as a manifestation of how a general anti-barbarism played out, see the inception and principal causality of the development of Western anti-Semitism in early Christianity. The Christians, who had emerged from Judaism themselves, at first denied the imputation of core causal elements of ancient hostility toward the Jews. As a breakaway Jewish sect, Christianity was in competition with Judaism, which by and large rejected Christian teaching. From this ambivalent position of succession and competition, an anti-Jewish tradition sprang up that is discernible in the New Testament itself.[2] Christianity's self-image as the 'New Covenant' and 'true Israel' induced it to deny the Jews, as the hopelessly 'stubborn' people of the 'Old Testament,' membership in the New (Acts 28:25-28; Gal 4:21-31; Mark 12:9-12). Anti-Jewish reproaches centrally featured an evangelical overemphasis on the part played by the Jews in the history of Jesus's suffering. The Gospels downplay the actual responsibility of the Roman authority (Mt 27:25, 'His blood be on us and on our children!'). Last, Christian texts accuse the Jews of the 'murder of the Christ-Messiah': "Who killed both the Lord Jesus and the prophets, and drove us out" (1 Thess 2:15). There is also a negative description of the Pharisees and scribes as hypocrites (Matt 23:13-29), as advocates of a purely outward piety (Luke 16:15), and as the enemies of Jesus (Mark 3:6; 12:13). The Johannine gospel characterizes not only the Sadducees and Pharisees, but the Jews per se as Jesus's enemies, and charges them with having the devil as their father (John 8:40-44).

Early Christianity

4. Across the spectrum of early Christian church literature (in polemical and exegetical writings, sermons, and Christian historiography) there developed, from the early second century onward, a self-consistent anti-Jewish position that far outran any pagan anti-Semitism in its disparagement of the Jewish people and faith. This position became an integral component of official teaching. In the form of "Adversus Iudaeos" texts, Christianity was seeking reinforcement by discriminating against and battling with the Jews. These texts grew into a literary genre, intent on handing down anti-Jewish polemics and arguments. In the Church Fathers of the fourth century, we encounter the anti-Jewish ideology as a consistent system. They represented the Church as the legatee of God's promises, with the task of creating a specifically Christian interpretation of the Hebrew Bible. Now the Hebrew Bible could be employed as 'evidence from Scripture' against the Jews. All negative pronouncements—such as the prophets' criticism of Israel—were now applied to the Jews generally. Alongside their use of the Hebrew Bible, they appraised historical events, such as the destruction of the Temple in 70 CE, as God's retribution for the Crucifixion, and thus proof of Israel's rejection. The development of the basic repertoire of Christian anti-Semitism was realized: God's rejection of the Jews, the murder of Christ, hostility toward Christians. (Only from the thirteenth century onward were components based on popular piety added.) Then, with the formal establishment of Christianity as the state religion (→ Late Antiquity), the fourth and fifth centuries were the scene of the devastation of synagogues and anti-Jewish riots—mainly led by clerics, and not by the populace as later in the Middle Ages. Subsequently, this theologically founded anti-Semitism seems to have presented no obstacle to Jewish coexistence with the society of the Christian majority before the high Middle Ages, even though the theologians of the early Middle Ages, in their commentaries, carried on with the anti-Jewish tradition of the Church Fathers, and even though synodal determinations sought more and more to isolate the Jewish communities.

Middle Ages

5. Only after the Christianization of the West was complete, in an environment of intraecclesial reform, did matters come to such a pass, in the course of the First Crusade (1096), that violent riots erupted against Jewish communities.[3] This event marked the beginning of the spread of hostility toward the Jews beyond the circle of theologians to the laity, to become one of the components of popular piety. A frank deterioration of the social position of the Jews is to be observed after the twelfth century. While (in 1237) they gained a special position as servants of the Emperor, they were nevertheless refused admittance to the guilds, which thought of themselves as Christian brotherhoods. From the side of the Church, through the determinations of the Fourth Council of the Lateran (1215), they were marked off as a particular group, to be identified by their clothing and excluded from public office. Further, with the promulgation of the doctrine of transubstantiation at that Council, they became a demonized minority, to be incriminated with capital offenses (legends of ritual murder and the allegation of profanation of the host), along with, later, the reproach of the poisoning of springs and the slanderous campaign against the Talmud led by the mendicant orders (1239–1247, with the first public burning of those writings in Paris in 1242). In connection with Jews' circumstance-driven specialization as financiers of the feudal lords and the cities, and as large-scale merchants, they were accused of usury (Innocent III), which made them convenient victims in political conflicts. Coupled with a deep-seated fear of these 'enemies of Christians,' this religious and social stigmatization led to the great waves of persecution of the fourteenth century (the Rindtfleisch und Armleder persecution, 1298, 1336–1338), as well as to the so-called plague-pogroms of 1348–1349, in which many Jewish communities in Eastern Europe were exterminated wholesale. The Jews had already been driven from England (1290) and France (1306), and this was followed in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries by their expulsion from Spain (1492) and Portugal (1497). Of course, an economic motive accompanied religious components in the matter of hostility toward Jews. In any event, in the wake of the massive conversion of Jews (the so-called Conversos) under pressure of their Christian environment, a form of anti-Judaism developed in the fifteenth century that, measured by today's standards, would be understood as racist: Through the establishment of descendancy (in conformity with new estatutos de limpieza de sangre, 'purity-of-blood statutes'), it was sought further to distinguish between the Conversos and Christians, as the former were suspected of 'clandestine Judaizing.' The Conversos now received the differentiating name of Marranos ('swine'), and they and their descendants were denied access to certain professions.

Reformation

6. Religious confrontations with Judaism continued in the fifteenth and sixteen centuries (establishment of a Jewish ghetto in Rome in 1555, introduction of the 'compulsory sermon' in 1584). Even the Reformation brought no changes here. At first, Luther had hoped for missionary success among the Jews—despite his constant, caustic expressions of disapproval of the fact that the Torah was still the Jewish legal text—and had pleaded for their gentler treatment. But as the Jewish mission failed, and Christians began to be converted to Judaism, he published vehemently anti-Jewish writings (such as "Of the Jews and their Lies," 1543). Here the usual theological condemnations were accompanied by a demand of civil authorities that synagogues and Jewish homes be burned, and Jewish writings confiscated; further, that a prohibition be imposed on the exercise of their professions by rabbis and itinerant Jewish merchants. Other Lutheran theologians, as well as those of the Reformed Church, pursued less harsh a course, although they too classified the Jews as uneducated, unteachable, and corruptors of Holy Writ. In the seventeenth century, the Protestant return to the Bible produced a kinder, 'philosemite' current, and disapproved of any general condemnation of the Jews.

Enlightenment and Emancipation

7. The philosophy of the → Enlightenment adopted an ambivalent position vis-à-vis the Jews. In the name of tolerance, and spurred by their anticlericalism, some Enlightenment figures opposed the persecution and oppression of the Jews, such as Toland, Rousseau, Montesquieu, and Lessing. Others, however, with Judaism as the root of their own rejection of Christianity, criticized the Jews for backwardness, religious → fanaticism, and a 'spirit of usury'—Voltaire, Diderot, d'Holbach.

With the transition from the hierarchical, feudal society to a middle-class one, the question of the position of the Jews arose in a political context, as well. Until now, the Jews had, in many respects, lived in Christian societies as an autonomous, separate minority. In the context of other social reforms (emancipation of the serfs, freedom of profession), the French Revolution ultimately entailed radically revolutionary (in France), or gradual (in the rest of Europe), promotion of the Jews to equal legal rights. The Christian goal was their 'civil improvement' as a backward, discriminated religious minority.[4] Thus, the 'emancipation of the Jews' was less a philanthropic measure than one taken by national bureaucracies in the interest of order. In France, the revolutionary solution indeed led to legal equality for the Jews, but the latter were soon opposed, especially on the Catholic side, as champions of a secular modernity, and as authors and beneficiaries of the 1789 revolution. Here we have a seam running between traditional anti-Judaism and the anti-modernist anti-Semitism of the churches. Now a previously recessive anti-Jewish conceptualization was thrust to the fore: the notion of a secret Jewish conspiracy to gain control of the whole world. In Germany, Russia, and Austria (Austria-Hungary), a process of Jewish emancipation, interrupted by setbacks, ultimately got under way, accompanied by everything from the 'dark side' of the Jewish debates to violent injustices (as in the hep-hep unrest of 1819). This produced anti-Semitic prejudices and stereotypes: the Jews as a state within a state, their corrupting effect on society and the economy, and their 'national' characteristics. This in turn provoked corresponding recommendations for action in the form of state counter-measures, from legal discrimination and plans for their expulsion and resettlement, to proposals for their annihilation.[5] Thus, one may designate this phase as early 'anti-Semitism' in the modern sense. With few exceptions—for example, in the empire of the Tsars, where until 1917 Jews had still not attained full equality—the process of the legal integration of the Jews was launched around 1870 in Europe. This was no obstacle to their exclusion from certain positions in public service, in education, and in the military, unless they had been converted to Christianity. At least in Western and Central Europe, the process of emancipation led to the swift social ascent to the middle classes of a Jewish minority that, in the eighteenth century, had been a widely impoverished group.

Modern Racial Anti-Semitism

8. It was this ascent—interpreted in the light of long anti-Jewish tradition—that motivated the radical, sectarian late nineteenth-century movement for the repeal of the emancipation laws and the closure of the entire process. 'The Jews' now stood as a symbol of a modernity to be rejected across the board. They must answer for the excesses of capitalism and for the consequent social question, for the collapse of culture, for a too speedy urbanization with its dark side, for secularization, for materialism. For broad social circles, anti-Semitism became a 'cultural code,'[6] distinguishing modernists from anti-modernists. In the Berlin controversy over anti-Semitism (1879–1881), unleashed by an anti-Semitic article of Heinrich von Treitschke, renowned historian of national liberalism, the 'Jewish question' was indicted as the most pressing social and national problem facing the Germans. The 'rich German Jew' and the poor immigrant Eastern Jew stood, on the one side, for a fear, on the part of the (educated) citizenry, of the looming society of the masses. On the other side, they represented a threat to the nation of an over-foreignization, and proletarization. A popular racist, self-styled scientific anti-Semitism was mounted that appealed to social Darwinism, cultural criticism, and racist interpretations of history (A. de Gobineau, Houston St. Chamberlain), and which grew to be the ideology of a nationalistic integration. It also became the ideological basis of a politico-cultural movement that, in several congresses (1882, 1883, 1886), sought to establish an international network. In Germany, to be sure, the movement was ideologically divided, into a conservative, national Christian anti-Judaism (under the leadership of court preacher Adolf Stoecker) and an anti-Christian and racist anti-Semitism of politically more radical forces (Otto Böckel, Ernst Henrici, Hermann Ahlwahrdt, among others), a division that presented an obstacle to organizational unification. Alongside of these efforts on the part of the anti-Semites to organize in political parties, and to spread their ideas through publicity and advertising, we find, throughout Europe toward the end of the nineteenth century, a revival of allegations of ritual murder (the Buschoff affair in Xanten, 1891; Konitz in West Prussia, 1900; Tisza-Eszlar in Hungary, 1982–1983; the Beilis matter in Russia, 1911–1913), anti-Jewish tactics of violence (Pomerania and West Prussia, 1881 and 1900; a wave of violence in France, 1898; the waves of Russian pogroms, 1881–1883, 1903–1906), and scandals (for example, the Dreyfus affair). These had at first led to a surge of anti-Semitism, which, however, subsequently lost much of its importance in the political life of France with the victory of the republican Dreyfusards. During and after the First World War, anti-Semitism waxed in intensity, especially in the states that had lost the war, Germany, Austria, and Hungary: Here the völkisch right made the Jews responsible for the war, the defeat (the stab-in-the-back legend), the loss of regions, and the 1918 revolution (the 'November criminals'): Jews were the secret instigators of an all-inclusive 'plutocratic-Jewish-Marxist' conspiracy. This connection with anti-Bolshevism gained anti-Semitism a wider ideological dimension.

National Socialism

The anti-Semitism of the early Nazi Party (NSDAP) of the years 1919–1923 only represented a concentration and radicalization of popular imperialistic ideas stemming from the time before 1918, and was in no way distinct from that of other popular unions. Hitler propagated an 'anti-Semitism of reason,' based on an understanding of the development of world history as a struggle of races, which itself was built upon a pseudo-scientific literature.[7] The 'Jewish question' was formulated as a racial problem: racism could amalgamate hostility toward Jews with a racial utopia, social biology, and racial purity (→ Eugenics). This Manichaean system of thought assigned the Jews a special role: unlike any other non-Aryans, who found themselves on the lowest rung of a racial hierarchy, the Jews were demonized as a mighty 'anti-race,' and set over against the ideal Aryan type. (The Christian conceptualization of the Jews as the anti-Christ, and a soteriology of the expectation of a final combat, entered the process.) Definition by 'blood,' however, was joined to the supposition of a specific 'Jewish spirit,' that, in liberalism, capitalism, Bolshevism, and Freemasonry, had fashioned itself an instrument of international domination. The National Socialists saw 'International Judaism' as the driving force behind all internal and external political problems, and their view appeared to be verified in the "Protocols of the Elders of Zion," an anti-Semitic falsification of the Russian Secret Service whose authenticity was promptly accepted in the NSDAP. In Hitler's view, this 'world conflict' between Jews and Aryans was to be solved only by the 'wholesale removal' of the Jews. This conception of a struggle for existence was based partly on the connection between anti-Semitism and the notion of a racial utopia, together with the colonial concept of Lebensraum ('room to live'). National Socialist anti-Semitism was not only based on racial myths, however, but had incorporated all of the motifs of the anti-Semitic tradition, and had concocted a mixture of utterly inconsistent ideas. Thus, the picture of the Jew oscillated according to the occasion at hand—between the image of a super-powerful, demonic enemy, and that of the parasitic inferior person.

In the beginning, there was no concrete plan of action, and National Socialist Germany at first saw the 'solution to the Jewish problem' in emigration. Still, genocide lurked in the logic of this anti-Semitism, whose goal was a complete, even physical, 'removal of the Jews.' If by no means in a rectilinear process planned in advance, this was the way National Socialist Jewish policy ran, from emigration to deportation to Ghettoization (→ Ghetto), and finally, to the murder of the European Jews.

The → Shoah, the murder of some six million Jews and the annihilation of German and Eastern Jewish culture, did not mean the end of anti-Semitism. Political and pedagogical efforts abounded, along with a critical review of anti-Judaism in the churches (Stuttgart Declaration, 1945; "Word of Guilt [addressed] to Israel," Evangelische Kirche Deutschlands, Berlin and Weißensee, 1950; Declaration of the Rhineland Synod, "Toward the Renewal of Relations between Christians and Jews," 1980; appeals of the World Council of Churches, 1948, 1962; Second Vatican Council, 1965). But anti-Semitism lives on, as a prejudice, in parts of the population of Europe and the United States. It is still partly motivated by Christianity, but it continues to be most at home in the ideological arsenal of organizations of the extreme right, which deny that the Holocaust ever occurred, and represent its concept as a means of 'Jewish exploitation.'[8] Alongside the older forms of anti-Jewish activity, such as the desecration of cemeteries, graffiti, and the distribution of pamphlets and handbills, right extremism today also uses the Internet for the propagation of its virulent campaigns. Of course, anti-Semitism has lost its political mobilization, and is publicly ostracized. But with the founding of the state of Israel, and the Near East conflict, it has expanded also in Arab states. A variant of anti-Semitism has appeared with anti-Zionism (→ Zionism), which has played a role as late as the 1980s, especially in the policy of Communist states and extreme leftist groups. In some Eastern European countries, especially in Russia, with the collapse of Communism, we observe a recrudescence of traditional anti-Semitism, now presenting itself in a nationalistic coloration.

1. Schäfer 1997.
2. Gager 1983; Menninger 1994.
3. Good survey in Gilomen 1996.
4. Programmatic title of influential document on emancipation: Christian Wilhelm Dohm, Über die bürgerliche Verbesserung der Juden, 2 parts, Berlin/Stettin 1781/1783; see Rürup 1975.
5. See Erb/Bergmann 1989.
6. Volkov 1990, 23.
7. Graml 1988, 94.
8. Straus et al. 1980.

Literature

Abulafia, Anna Sapir, Religious Violence between Christians and Jews: Medieval Roots, Modern Perspectives, New York 2002; Anidjar, Gil, The Jew, the Arab: A History of the Enemy, Stanford 2003; Ariel, Yaakov, Evangelizing the Chosen People: Missions to the Jews in 1880–2000, Chapel Hill 2000; Birnbaum, Pierre/Katznelson, Ira (eds.), Paths of Emancipation: Jews, States, and Citizinship, Princeton 1995; Bronner, Stephen Eric, A Rumor about the Jews: Antisemitism, Conspiracy, and the Protocols of Zion, Oxford 2003; Chazan, Robert, In the Year 1096: The First Crusade and the Jews, Philadelphia 1996; Erb, Rainer/Bergmann, Werner, Die Nachtseite der Judenemanzipation. Der Widerstand gegen die Integration der Juden in Deutschland 1780–1860, Berlin 1989; Friedlaender, Saul, Nazi Germany and the Jews, vol. 1: The Years of Persecution, 1933–1939, New York 1998; Gager, J. G., The Origins of Anti-Semitism: Attitudes toward Judaism in Pagan and Christian Antiquity, New York 1983; Gilomen, Hans-Jörg, "Die Judenverfolgungen von 1096 in der neueren Literatur," in: Judaica 52 (1996), 237-292; Graml, Hermann/Kirk,

Tim, Antisemitism in the Third Reich, Oxford 1992; HARROWITZ, Nancy A. (ed.), Tainted Greatness: Antisemitism and Cultural Heroes, Philadelphia 1994; LANGMUIR, G. I., History, Religion and Anti-Semitism, Berkeley 1990; MENNINGER, Richard E., Israel and the Church in the Gospel of Matthew, New York etc. 1994; PERRY, Marvin/SCHWEITZER, Frederick M., Antisemitism: Myth and Hate from Antiquity to the Present, New York 2002; PHAYER, Michael, The Catholic Church and the Holocaust, 1930–1965, Bloomington/Indianapolis 2000; PO-CHIA HSIA, R., Myth of Ritual Murder: Jews and Magic in Reformation Germany, New Haven 1988; RÜRUP, Reinhard, Emanzipation und Antisemitismus. Studien zur "Judenfrage" der bürgerlichen Gesellschaft, Göttingen 1975; RUETHER, Rosemary, Faith and Fratricide: The Theological Roots of Anti-Semitism, New York 1974; SCHÄFER, Peter, Judeophobia: Attitudes toward the Jews in the Ancient World, Cambridge 1997; SCHRECKENBERG, Heinz, Die christlichen Adversus-Judaeos-Texte und ihr literarisches und historisches Umfeld (11.–13. Jh.). Mit einer Ikonographie des Judenthemas bis zum 4. Laterankonzil, Frankfurt/M. etc. 1991; STRAUSS, Herbert/BERGMANN, Werner/HOFFMANN, Christhard (eds.), Der Antisemitismus der Gegenwart, Frankfurt/M. 1990; STRICKLAND, Debra Higgs, Saracens, Demons, and Jews: Making Monsters in Medieval Art, Princeton/Oxford 2003; VOLKOV, Shulamit, "Antisemitism as a Cultural Code," in: Leo Baeck Institute Yearbook 23 (1978), 25-45; Eadem, Jüdisches Leben und Antisemitismus im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert, Munich 1990; WISTRICH, Robert S., Anti-Semitism in the New Europe, Oxford 1994; YOUNG GREGG, Joan, Devils, Women, and Jews: Reflections of the Other in Medieval Sermon Stories, Albany 1997.

Research Organizations: Vidal Sassoon International Center for the Study of Antisemitism, Hebrew University of Jerusalem; Yad Vashem Archives, Jerusalem; Zentrum für Antisemitismusforschung, Technische Universität Berlin.

→ Conflict/Violence, Judaism, Migration, National Socialism, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Race/Racism, Shoah

Werner Bergmann

Apartheid

1. The word 'apartheid' was introduced in political terminology following the Second World War. It should be translated 'apartness' (etymologically), 'separation,' 'telling apart,' or 'distinguishing,' and expresses the thought of a divided development among various 'races' living in areas of geographical or social division. 'Apartheid' comes from the Afrikaans, the language of South Africa's Boers—immigrants of Dutch extraction and their descendants—and denoted, at the very latest since the signing of the Constitution of the South African Union in 1910, the fundamental principle of white governmental policy in South Africa. Apartheid is a complex concept, consisting of political and economic measures having their foundations in an ideology of racial discrimination. Persons, organizations, and the government, have employed it in striving for domination of the black population by way of cultural control and economic exploitation.

The Apartheid Laws ('Big Apartheid')

2. After 1949, when apartheid was officially raised to the status of state policy, the government of the Boer National Party gradually legislated an avalanche of law—more than two thousand ordinances, decrees, and individual laws—oriented to the division of the various population groups in terms of racial considerations. One of the measures was the detested Population Registration Act (1950), according to which every citizen of South Africa was listed by the Office of Racial Classification as belonging to one of four distinct population groups: 'Black,' 'Colored,' 'Asian,' or 'White.' Further, in 1953, through the Reservation of Separate Amenities Act, the various groups were assigned separate schools, hospitals, and so on. The law prohibited any 'commingling' of 'whites' and 'non-whites.' The Group Areas Act of 1950 had further set out that each individual would be assigned his or her place of residence, by the state and according to group membership. Thus, ten 'homelands' were established, over some 13% of South African territory, in which the majority of the South African population (72%) were required to live. Subsequent laws sought to regulate sexual relations between the 'races': The Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act (1949) and the Immorality Act (1927), which was reinforced in 1950 and 1957, forbade intimate relations among the races. The effects of the above legislation were recognizable in the structure of the churches, as well. The NGK (Netherlands Reformed Church) created 'daughter churches' for blacks and coloreds, strictly separated from the 'mother church,' yet completely dependent upon it. The Evangelical Lutheran Church followed a similar course, segregating its colored and black members. Only the Catholics, Methodists, and Anglicans formed 'mixed race' church communities. Some manifestations of apartheid in everyday life were racially segregated schools, rest rooms, restaurants, buses, passageways, and so on—'little apartheid.'

Little Apartheid

The End of Apartheid

Foreign relations of the black liberation struggle against apartheid were led by the United Nations (Special Committee against Apartheid, 1962), and the domestic policy by Nelson Mandela (African National Congress—ANC), Steve Biko (Black Consciousness Movement—BCC), and Robert Sobukwe (Pan-African Congress—PAC). The national and international fight for liberation was successfully concluded on February 2, 1990, with the lifting of the ban on freedom movements, and on February 11, 1990 with the release of Nelson Mandela from state imprisonment on Robben Island. But the definitive democratization of South Africa came only in 1994 with the first general elections, which were won by the African National Congress led by Nelson Mandela. The homelands were dismantled, and all apartheid laws were rescinded; and one South Africa, for all South Africans, was established.

Apartheid and Religion

3. Apartheid had its ideological roots in the Christian religion. In terms of the history of religions, the Boers are associated with Calvinism, and this view provides them with the doctrine of predestination in justification of their political activities. Afrikanerdom (the totality of the Boer nation and their ideology) is regarded not as the work of human beings, but as the creation of God. The guiding Boer conception is that God has brought them to Africa, given them Afrikaans for their language, and assigned them the task of spreading the Christian religion there. The Dutch Reformed Church, to which more than eighty percent of South Africa's white population belong, defends three fundamental ideas in particular that are regarded as verifying white superiority and justifying white supremacy. One is the notion of their place as a 'chosen people,' with a 'divine mission' to lead and civilize the African peoples. Another is the idea of 'nonmixing' with other peoples, in order to preserve their Afrikaner identity as a 'chosen people.' Finally, there is the conceptualization of their right to claim the land God has given, precisely because the Boers are that chosen people (Acts 7:45; 17:26; Rom 11:1-12). By way of an example of apartheid theology and mythology, we may cite the appeal to Noah's curse of his son Ham, in explanation of black Africans' 'inborn inferiority': "Cursed be Canaan [i.e., as son of Ham]; lowest of slaves shall he be to his brothers" (Gen 9:25). The genealogy that follows (10:6-20), which lists a personified Egypt (Heb., Mitzrayim) among the sons of Ham, therefore serves to make Ham the ancestor of all black Africans. Only a theology of liberation, at the hands of Allan Boesak, Desmond Tutu, Beyers Naude, and others has delivered the Christian religion from the biased interpretations and explications on which it had based its mechanism of oppression, and has conveyed a new consciousness to the mostly black Christian population.

'Apartheid' in International Usage

4. In international usage, 'apartheid' has become a technical term denoting any state-imposed separation of different population groups. Today, the word is also applied to other instances of state racial discrimination—for example, in the media, with respect to the Albanians in Kosovo.

Literature

Boutros-Gali, Boutros, The United Nations and Apartheid, New York 1996; Bunting, Brian, "The Origins of Apartheid," in: La Guma, Alex (ed.), Apartheid: A Collection of Writings on South African Racism by South Africans, London 1970, 23-40; Chidester, David, Savage Systems: Colonialism and Comparative Religion in Southern Africa, Charlottesville 1996; Clark, Nancy L./Worger, William H., South Africa: The Rise and Fall of Apartheid, Harlow etc. 2003; Guelke, Adrian, Rethinking Apartheid: South Africa in the 20th Century, Basingstoke 2004; Theilen, Uta, Gender, Race, Power and Religion: Women in the Methodist Church of Southern Africa in Post-Apartheid Society, Frankfurt/M. etc. 2005.

→ Africa II, Colonialism, Ghetto, Prejudice/Stereotypes, Race/Racism

Ute Kollies-Cummings

Apocalypse

General

The Apocalypse as a text, and apocalyptic as prophetic symbolic disclosure of the ultimate destruction of evil and triumph of good, are elements of a religious bestowal of meaning upon (interpretation of) → time. Every complex religion presents the origin and end of the time of human or cosmic life in mythical images. The original meaning of 'apocalypse' (Gr., 'revelation,' from apokalýptein, 'unwrap,' 'bare') is a terrible and/or joyful uncovering, in the course of an act of Greek-Hellenistic worship, of a picture of the gods. The concept of 'apocalypse' is transferred to the description of sacred occurrences of the last times. Thus, apocalypticism (from c. 200 BCE, first in Judaism, and flourishing into the second century CE) expects the time of the world not to be renewed, and counts on a transformation, whose law and manner are known to God alone, as it ends. Apocalypses measure historical time out of an exclusive interest in → salvation, and thus represent elements decisive for salvation history, metaphorically, as temporally latest and last (eschatology). These last things bear a salvific character. Apocalypses proclaim the divine will with Shuddering, a group of people watches a lowering, menacing, sky. Some have turned away—unless they have not yet dared to look. What are they waiting for? Is the suspense unbearable? Are expectations subsiding? The apocalypse: how will it come? Or has it already happened? Huddled under that sky, the little company stands as a sign of—what? Painting by Richard Oelze, 1935–1936, Museum of Modern Art, New York.

an eye to future, as well as past, salvation. Incorporating formal elements stipulated by the genre (prophecy, dream, ascension, testament), and stylistic means calculated to enhance verisimilitude, such as predating, they ply their orbits around the future of the saints, that is, of the just, of the elect of God, whose destiny will be unveiled in the end-time presently dawning. In its status as a bridge to the absolute future, the apocalypse anticipates what will occur at the end of days. It consoles the (small) chosen remnant in its hard lot, announcing to it its salvation, and devastation and destruction to the unsalutary powers of the world. The information is transmitted from the contrasting perspective of matter-of-fact observation, and the highest pathos, the latter compassing a wide spectrum of → emotions. In the United States in particular, this religious interpretation of history—often referred to as 'rapture culture'—is of particular importance today (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm).

The Johannine Apocalypse

2. The history of Christian culture is steeped in the text and symbolism of the Revelation of John, which was received in the New Testament canon (→ Bible; Canon). That disciple is said to have beheld his revelation on the isle of Patmos. The probable time of composition is around 100 CE: "The revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave unto him, to shew unto his servants things which must shortly come to pass; and he has sent and signified it by his angel unto his servant John: Who bare record of the word of God, and of the testimony of Jesus Christ, and of all things that he saw" (Rev 1:1-2; King James Bible). A concentration on Jesus Christ as subject and object of this revelation, as well as on a divine creative Spirit, distinguishes the text of John both from other apocalypses and from the more recent reception of the Johannine text itself.

The powerful inspiration provided by the Apocalypse in the plethora of its long-lasting effects is to be attributed to its catastrophic symbolism of salvation and destruction. Here we have the 'apocalyptic' horsemen, monsters, the whore of Babylon, the Lamb, the trumpeting angels, Armageddon ('Mount of Megiddo'), two final battles, a one-thousand-year reign of the just, the New Jerusalem. In the billowing luxuriance of the history of the text's reception, these symbols form the framework of the coming of the Son of Man, the Christ, and of his adversary (later identified with the → Antichrist). The effect of these symbols on religious art is scarcely to be overrated. However, it reaches far beyond.

The Apocalypse as Poetical Material

3. In the epochal crises in the history of European Christianity, the Apocalypse ceases to be merely a text: it becomes literary material, or 'fabric.' It serves as a pattern for the interpretation of the phenomenon of the world in terms of salvation history, for the purpose of overcoming crises by 'reading' them. The text is appropriated by the most divergent social groupings. The hierarchical or anarchical attempts at various legitimizations in the name of eschatological salvation nevertheless remain elements of a quasi-infinite history of interpretation. While, for example, in the Middle Ages emperor, pope, and dissidents, in alternation, counted as embodiments of the Antichrist, Christ became the antithetical figure of all authority across the board. In the medieval sense, the Apocalypse is the fabric utilized in, for example, Dante's Divine Comedy. Here the poet highlights, to be sure, his vision of the next world; but he also designs, with the help of citations from the Apocalypse, a just society of earth.

The Apocalypse in Modernity

4. The transformation of the Apocalypse into poetical material explains the tenacious presence of its elements coming into play in modern testimonials of culture whose concern for Christology and eschatology has long since evaporated. Thus arises an artificial style steeped in anguish and predicting catastrophe—a style with which the buzzword 'apocalypse' makes para- and post-religious history, partly on the coattails of biblical piety, partly as a code for 'end of the world' simply. In modern times, the human person is conscious of being the subject of history, and agent of life's span. It is true that certain images of history retain apocalyptical elements, inasmuch as, for instance, the history of the world can be read as a judgment upon that world. But the subject of the secularized apocalypse is the human being, not God, and its matter is the old world, not a new existence. The recasting of apocalyptical elements leaves the dynamics of the poetical material intact—only, the catastrophes of human society in the twentieth century are no longer interpretable as the agonized echoes of a celestial world. After all, the apocalypse can now be realized: Human beings usurp it. A plethora of artistic materials absorbed these dynamics, and gave them form, at about the time of the First World War. For example, we have Karl Kraus's drama, Die letzten Tage der Menschheit ("The Last Days of Humanity," 1918/19), or expressionist painting, with its spiritual abstraction of ways the world might end. The catastrophe of the Hitler phenomenon can be understood as the pinnacle and crisis of the real dynamics here. One individual now seeks to subordinate the world age to his span of life (Hans Blumenberg). Not arbitrarily, then, did Christian anti-Fascists see Hitler as the Antichrist. The battle against that murderous experiment led, for its part, to the open-ended, critical installation of a world-annihilator in the form of nuclear weapons—a notorious subject for the artificial critical style that finds new objectivity in satire and grotesque caricature, or that issues in the trivialization of homemade end-of-the-worlds. Eco's The Name of the Rose indicts, with broad effect, an apocalyptic frenzy as fundamentalist obsession. In film, Coppola's Apocalypse Now (1979) portrays the pitfalls and deviations of human self-preservation as a war-spawned 'sacrifice' offered by ambiguous human life as such.

Literature

Amanat, Abbas/Bernhardson, Magnus T. (eds.), Imagining the End: Visions of Apocalypse from the Ancient Middle East to Modern America, London/New York 2002; Baumgarten, Albert I. (ed.), Apocalyptic Time, Leiden 2000; Collins, J. J., The Apocalyptic Imagination, New York 1984; Cunningham, Andrew/Grell, Ole Peter, The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse: Religion, War, Famine and Death in Reformation Europe, New York 2000; Frykholm, Amy Johnson, Rapture Culture: Left Behind in Evangelical America, Oxford/New York 2004; Gruenwald, Ithamar, "Jewish Apocalyptic Literature," in: Aufstieg und Niedergang der Römischen Welt II, 19.1 (1979), 89-118; Hall, John R. (with Philip D. Schuyler and Sylvaine Trinh), Apocalypse Observed: Religious Movements and Violence in North America, Europe, and Japan, London/New York 2000; Hellholm, David (ed.), Apocalypticism in the Mediterranean World and the Near East, Tübingen 1983; McGinn, Bernard/Collins, John J./Stein, Stephen (eds.), The History of Apocalypticism, London/New York 2003; Robbins, Thomas/Palmer, Susan J. (eds.), Millennium, Messiahs, and Mayhem: Contemporary Apocalyptic Movements, New York/London 1997.

→ Antichrist, Bible, Canon, End/Eschaton, Fundamentalism, Millenarialism/Chiliasm, Monotheism, Myth, Prophet, Secrecy, Salvation, Time

Christian W. Senkel

Apologetics

In order that theologians might be provided with arguments for the 'defense' of church teaching in discussions with 'unbelievers,' apologetics was taught as part of their education. First, in the debate with 'scientific atheism,' and then, in Germany, in that against National Socialism, apologetics experts gathered reports and distributed them to the pastoral clergy. Here it was, and is, necessary, first, to know the objections of opponents, and then the apposite responses to them. This process gave rise to ecclesiastical institutes, which today observe the religious scene altogether critically, but at times also with the intention of giving neutral information.

→ Conflict/Violence, Polemics, Theology

Christoph Auffarth

Apostasy

General

1. Originally, 'apostasy' (Gk. apostasía, 'defection') was a political concept for a rebellion against the established order. In Hellenistic Jewish literature, it was charged with religious connotations, and since then has denoted a defection from the faith. Thus, an apostate is someone who abandons her or his religion to embrace another religion or worldview. But apostasy also denotes a failure to acknowledge certain dogmas, or means the rejection or alteration of actions prescribed for worship within a religion. Voluntary or constrained, apostasy is often regarded by the forsaken religion as a high crime, to which severe penalties will attach. Apostates and those who seduce them into apostasy are excluded from the community, deprived of rights, and dispossessed or even put to death. The allegation of apostasy was often employed for the fortification of ecclesiastical power, and, by way of the collaboration of the state, used for the liquidation of political adversaries.

Apostasy in Judaism

2. In Judaism, apostasy means desertion of God and his laws. Here, the observance of moral obligations and the execution of religious actions are more important than the acknowledgement of particular faith formulas. The concept of apostasy included worship of 'pagan' gods, or adoption of Greek philosophies like Epicureanism. This changed with the advent of Christianity. Paul was an apostate in the eyes of the Jews, as he introduced norms and behaviors that ran counter to the Mosaic Law. Beginning in the fourth century, Christianity had civil power on its side in Europe, and numerous Jews became Christians out of fear, or under duress. Such apostates received temperate treatment if and when they returned. Many baptized Jews died at the stake during the Inquisition in sixteenth-century Spain, accused of secret abandonment of a Christianity to which they had been compelled to submit (Marranism; → Anti-Semitism).

Apostasy in Christianity

3. Emergent Christianity immediately mounted its polemics against the apostasy that consisted in a relapse into Jewish law (Heb 4-6). The closeness of the two religions fostered an ongoing struggle in the matter of (actual and putative) apostasy. In times of persecution, apostasy seriously threatened the existence of the Christian community, as the steadfast and the fallen (under threat to their lives) stood in irreconcilable opposition. → Augustine defended the fallen against the ethical rigorism of fourth-century North African 'Donatists,' who had remained steadfast and who now refused to readmit to the fold those who had fallen. In the European → Middle Ages, the imputation of apostasy became a means employed by the clergy to eliminate critics or adversaries and to multiply their own power and wealth. Thus, as the fourteenth century dawned, pope and French crown used the allegation of apostasy (or else of homosexuality) as a pretext for exterminating the prestigious and influential Knights Templar in France, out of considerations of political power. Apostasy to atheism came to be regarded in the Middle Ages as a mental illness, and → conversion was rare, seeing that abandonment of the state religion meant surrender of privileges and community.

Muslims in England demonstrate against the writer Salman Rushdie, who, according to them, had incurred the charge of apostasy with his The Satanic Verses. The photograph leaves little doubt as to the punishment they find appropriate for the demonized renegade. After 1989, when the Ayatollah → Khomeini pronounced sentence of death upon him (→ Fatwa), Rushdie lived in fear of his life, a long time closely concealed from the public. (Benita von Behr)

Apostasy in Islam

4. In lands of Islamic culture, the conversion of Christians, and even of Jews, was no rarity. In the Qur'an, any Muslim who falls away from Islam is threatened with severe retribution in the world to come. But even there, Allah's forgiveness is possible after a complete change of heart. In practice, however, men found guilty of apostasy were frequently sentenced to death—the judgment that, in recent times, has been pronounced on Anglo-Indian author Salman Rushdie (The Satanic Verses, 1988; → Fatwa). Women under suspicion face prison or the lash. Apostasy under compulsion is not seen as a transgression.

Apostasy in the Present

5. In the Western world, due to the separation of hurch and state, the concept of apostasy is no longer of social importance. The church has lost its location as central point in the life of Christians and society, and no longer has any purchase on means of civil power. Personal choice in the 'religion market' has become one's private affair. Thus, threatened punishments for apostasy no longer have any social or legal consequences in Western societies of a previously Christian complexion. It is otherwise in parts of the world where Islamic law molds society. In Shiite → Iran, persons professing other faiths, such as → Baha'i, are prosecuted and put to death even today. In the area of the new religious movements, fundamentalist-oriented groups sometimes place their members under severe psychological and economic pressure in case of their departure. But likewise problematic, because of the constraint and manipulation required for the success of the undertaking, is the occasional practice of the radical dissolution of believers' bond to their group by relatives who compel their exodus with the involvement of so-called religious specialists ('deprogramming'; → Anti-Cult Movements).

Literature

Bromley, David G. (ed.), Falling from the Faith: Causes and Consequences of Religious Apostasy, Newbury Park 1988; Idem (ed.), The Politics of Religious Apostasy: The Role of Apostates in the Transformation of Religious Movements, Westport 1998; Endelman, Todd M. (ed.), Jewish Apostasy in the Modern World, New York 1987; Rahman, S. A., Punishment of Apostasy in Islam, New Delhi 1996; Saeed, Abdulla/Saeed, Hassan, Freedom of Religion, Apostasy and Islam, Aldershot 2004; Wilson, Stephen G., Leaving the Fold: Apostates and Defectors in Antiquity, Minneapolis 2004.

→ Anti-Semitism, Conversion, Group, Inquisition, New Religions

Nils Grübel

Apostle

In antiquity, 'apostle' (Gr. Apóstolos, 'emissary,' 'messenger') denoted the act or agent of a mission. Herodotus occasionally used the word in the sense of a 'courier.'

Traditionally, with reference to the twelve 'Apostles,' the word denotes any of Jesus's twelve closest disciples. As witnesses of the Resurrection, they are regarded as the plenipotentiary proclaimers of the Gospel. The gospels also name other apostles, however, such as Paul, who has not been one of the 'twelve Apostles,' but who has been called to be an Apostle through a vision of the risen Jesus.

A univocal understanding of the concept is not available. Essential elements would be a mission from God, the proclamation of the Gospel, the founding of communities, and the perseverance of these communities in their attachment to the testimony of the Apostle. Conflicts among divergent directions of belief led to a definition of the content of the 'true' faith. An appeal to the (supposed) authenticity of the testimony of the Apostles was regarded as, on the one hand, evidencing the 'truth' of the faith, and on the other, identifying the Church, by virtue of the 'apostolic succession' of bishops, as the 'true' locus of the faith. The pope, regarded as the successor of the Apostle Peter, occupies the highest place. According to the understanding of the Orthodox and the Catholic Churches, both the Church in its totality and the bishops through the apostolic succession are the legitimate legatees of Christ and the guarantors of a binding interpretation of revelation. The views of the churches of the Reformation are at odds with this position, especially in the matter of the apostolic succession.

→ Apologetics, Christianity, Mission, Pope, Reformation

Babett Remus

Archaism

With the crisis of the belief in progress, in the 1880s, came a change in the models of history. Instead of an evaluation of the progress of the ages as a progress from primitive beginnings to ever loftier rungs on the ladder of humanity, one encounters a complete reversal of the conceptualization of this development. First, archaeologists came to understand that pre-classical art is more than a 'not yet'—the incapability, so to speak, of presenting anything worthwhile at this early stage—which →Nietzsche conceptualizes as anticlassicism. Then Europeans discovered the altogether different possibilities of expression in, for example, the art of Africa. In the conception of religion, a preference for the archaic rises up against modernity, and middle-class Christianity. Mircea → Eliade's soaring praise of the archaic religions, herald a critique of civilization like that later demonstrated in the ecology movement.

→ Evolutionism, History, Modernity, Progress, Religion

Christoph Auffarth

Architecture, Sacred

If religion is to be a vital institution in society, buildings are needed: from a walled approach or entranceway to a cave, to pieces of architecture reserved exclusively for religious use. Buildings for worship are places where gods are thought of as dwelling, where their images are displayed, and where persons show their reverence through gifts. The altar is not always the central point. The Greek temple is rather a treasure house for votive gifts, while the sacrifice is offered on the altar in front of the house of God. The construction is altogether different in Judaism and Islam, where it is conceived as a space in which the community gathers for the reading of Scripture, for its explanation, for prayers, and for songs. Synagogues or mosques must always face the holy city or the direction of the sunrise (→ Orientation), but they are not sacred themselves. In Catholic Christianity, alongside its main function as a place where the community comes together, there also is the sacred character of the → altar, enhanced by relics, which makes holiness transportable all over the world.

→ Altar, Art/Aesthetics, Cave, Materiality, Orientation, Place (Sacred)

Christoph Auffarth

Aristotelianism

As a comprehensive concept, Aristotelianism designates the reception of the Greek philosopher Aristotle (383–322 BCE) in the medieval theology and philosophy of → scholasticism. The authoritative Church Father → Augustine having clearly preferred Plato's competing philosophy (→ Platonism), the course of Aristotle's reception in the West was very slow prior to the work of Albertus Magnus (1200–1280) and his pupil Thomas Aquinas (1525–1570). The writings of Aristotle were discovered and used in Christian theology only in the wake of the intellectual theology of the medieval universities, where they had come thanks to the legacy of the commentaries of Arab Muslim scholars Averroes and Avicenna, along with the translation schools of Toledo and Palermo. Until then, in the main, only the "Categories," in Boethius' Commentary thereon, had been available.

The comprehensive systematics of Aristotelian thought worked its inspirational effect in the production of the great theological "summas" (Thomas Aquinas's Summa Theologiae), which—despite initial opposition—established themselves as the great scholarly creations of Western theology. A plethora of Aristotelian and pseudo-Aristotelian writings found entry into scholastic thought. The compositions in physics (e.g., De Caelo, "On the Heavens"), like the "Metaphysics" that followed (ethics, theory of understanding, logic, theory of being), essentially contributed to the development of medieval sciences and philosophy.

The papal Church sought to restrict the reception of these 'pagan writings,' their growing influence in the European universities, and the displacement of the patristic Platonic traditions. Thus, one sees in the thirteenth century the continuously renewed prohibitions (in vain) of the study of Aristotle. Since the issuing of an encyclical of Leo XIII in 1870, Aristotelianism in its interpretation by Thomas Aquinas, even its neo-Thomistic presentation, has become one of the official bulwarks of Catholic theology.

Literature

Barnes, Jonathan, Aristotle's Posterior Analytics, Oxford 1985; Blackwell, Constance/Kusukawa, Sachiko (eds.), Philosophy in the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries: Conversations with Aristotle, Aldershot 1999; Kassim, Husain, Aristotle and Aristotelianism in Medieval Muslim, Jewish, and Christian Philosophy, Lanham 2000; Leijenhorst, Cees et al. (eds.), The Dynamics of Aristotelian Natural Philosophy from Antiquity to the Seventeenth Century, Leiden etc. 2002; Nederman, Cary J., Medieval Aristotelianism and Its Limits: Classical Traditions in Moral and Political Philosophy, 12th–15th Centuries, Aldershot 1997; Peters, F. E., Aristotle and the Arabs, New York 1968.

→ Metaphysics, Platonism, Scholasticism, Science, Theology

Stefan Hartmann

Ars Moriendi

Ars moriendi (Lat., 'the art of dying') denotes a genre of edifying literature come down from ancient times (Cicero), and intended to prepare persons for 'right' or 'correct' dying. It has its high point from the late Middle Ages (fifteenth century) to the Baroque period (seventeenth century).

In the thoughts and feelings of the Middle Ages, the hour of death was the moment of the struggle of the powers of good (→ Angel) with those of evil (→ Devil) for the soul of a dying person. Ars moriendi, in this mythic representation, means the soul's readiness for this final battle. Accordingly, timely provision must be made for the struggle, and medieval and Baroque edifying literature sought to foster this preparation through images in the spirit of a memento mori (dance of the dead, miniature coffin for meditation), by formulae for confession, and with ethical recommendations. Ars moriendi therefore includes instruction on a worthy, upright life as an existence oriented to death. The contrast between the medieval conception and the modern ideal of death is startling: modern persons express the wish for a quick and painless death; in the Middle Ages, a collective terror of 'sudden death' prevailed, a death that creeps up and 'catches' the unprepared one, depriving him or her of the opportunity for appropriate recollection or for spiritual consolation by way of confession or the presence and succor of others of the faithful.

The disappearance of the ars moriendi is due primarily to an 'expulsion of death' from today's industrial society (Philippe Ariès). The contrary phenomenon is represented by the omnipresence of the images of violent death to be encountered on all channels of that society's media. Moreover, the abundance of works published on so-called border experiences between life and death (Elisabeth Kübler-Ross) testifies to an unremitting interest in this question. Ethical viewpoints bearing on all of this are currently subjected to discussion under the heading of 'euthanasia,' where considerations of human dignity, of the 'right to die,' are weighed against those of the employment of medical apparatus applied with a view to the 'prolongation of life.'

Literature

Ariès, Philippe, Western Attitudes Toward Death: From the Middle Ages to the Present, Baltimore/London 1975; Atkinson, David William, The English Ars Moriendi, New York etc. 1992; Imhof, Arthur E., Ars moriendi: Die Kunst des Sterbens einst und heute, Vienna 1991.

→ Death and Dying, Euthanasia/Assisted Suicide

Stefan Hartmann

Art / Aesthetics

Art

1. Art, in both its general and its special meanings, is a compound concept. First, it refers to any capacity of a person that presupposes a special knowledge and formative practice. The Latin word ars comprehensively denotes skills, crafts, arts, sciences. Only since the eighteenth century has 'art' more restrictively denoted the totality of only and all works created by formed or trained specialists called artists—although certain ideas moving in this more specific direction can indeed be found in the ancients and in the Renaissance. A great proportion of the art that has come down to us is of a religious nature, although it is found mostly in secular contexts today (→ Museum). Several kinds or 'genera' (genres) of art are recognized: → literature, → music, the 'fine arts' (→ architecture, painting, sculpture, design, drawing), dramatic and performing arts (→ Dance; Film; Drama), which can be combined, and have been presented together in many ways, especially since mid-twentieth century.

Aesthetics

The concept of aesthetics (from the Gk. aisthánomai, 'perceive with the senses,' or as in aisthetiké epistéme, 'the science having to do with the senses') means, first of all, reflection on human perception, which consideration finds its place in many of the sciences, as psychology, sociology, or theory of information (semiotics). In a context of art, including its production and reception, the concept of aesthetics is applied from a quadruple point of view. (1) Aesthetics embraces a specific profound 'knowledge' potential on the part of human beings: the potential for the aesthetic, the sensory-and-sensuous. (2) It includes the science and theory of art, which were defined thanks to the philosophical aesthetics established in the eighteenth century. As theory of art, philosophical aesthetics takes full cognizance of the universally present distinction and difference between objects and reflection on them, that is, between objects and works of art. (3) The concept of aesthetics emphasizes the emancipation of art from any ecclesial, political, or other obligations that may have been imposed upon it. (4) If the concept of aesthetics points to the fact that the communication-yield of the artwork, through which output an appropriating, senses-addressing clarity and vividness occurs on the heels of the work of art, then the aesthetic dimension presents the most general criterion of art. The questions accompanying these specifications refer to the relationship of art to other → media, for instance, film, the press; and further, to the relation of the aesthetic function of art to the representational, mimetic, political, or religious function. These questions will now be discussed primarily in terms of the example of formative, educational art.

A 'Theological Art Encounter'

2. A linkage of a religious and an aesthetic function of art was the goal and objective of the exhibition Entgegen. ReligionGedächtnisKörper in Gegenwartskunst ("Against: ReligionMemoryBody in Contemporary Art"), presented on the occasion of the Second European Ecumenical Assembly in Graz (May 23–July 6, 1997). More than forty artists presented their works in various locations—the House of Culture, the galleries, the Catholic seminary, churches. Comparable to other art events of the time, it is striking here, as well, that the art works are no longer unambiguously to be categorized in genres of religious art (such as plastic, or one-dimensional painting) transmitted by the history of art. With the abundance of art forms (sound and video installations, the room as image, photographs, and so on) and the most varied materials (for example, automobile lacquer, lipstick on silk velvet, paper, or wood) the themes of body, religion, and memory are reflected. This 'theological art-encounter' was directed against the determination of art's 'aim' or 'target' on the part of the Church—stressing the autonomy of religion and art alike, in the sense that it is the works of art themselves, and not their expected message, that ought to stand front and center. Appealing to Hegel's dictum that we no longer bend the knee to art, furthermore the art of the second half of the twentieth century, is interpreted in terms of its religious content; art appears here as a "sensuous, worldly religion—or as nothing at all"[1] (→ Art Religion).

As for the currency of this process, the question must remain open concerning the extent to which the effort to escape the centuries-old Christian understanding of art can be maintained—art as illustration and instruction, art as a means of rendering the normative word present to the senses.

Autonomy versus Dependency

3. a) The multiplicity of art forms and materials applied today, especially since mid-twentieth century, shows the degree to which art is becoming an autonomous quantity, nor beholden to any target-fixing but the one selected by the artist. And speculations on how art is scored by the art market to the point of manipulation, fail to justify a comparison of these mechanisms with the old dependencies. With this discovery, the question of the functions of art is posed anew, and demands a historical assessment. It is unquestioned that the art of today, considered in terms of most of the time span of its existence, has followed the prescriptions of → theology. On the basis of its sensory/sensual qualities, art has been employed to convince and to instruct; it has been determined in the selection of materials, often precious materials, for application to objects allied with prestige; and thereby it operates in the presentation of ecclesiastical, monarchical, princely self-conceptions. Time and again throughout history, it has been entangled in these functions by religious institutions and secular political ones alike, for instance in the development of the European national states (→ Museum), right up into the twentieth century. Meanwhile, at least in Western industrial nations, a society-dominated religious or political function of art is seen as passé. The decision for a religious or political engagement on the part of art, and thereby for a further connection to existing specific understandings of religion and politics, and/or a documentation of the same, rests with the artist.

b) The representational function of art, as well, stands in need of a relativization. The claim to paint what one sees finds its outward caesura with the invention of photography. The long history of art, however, itself demonstrates altogether diverse ways of coping with this claim. It shows approaches that supply information on the conditions of the artist's techniques, on her or his acquaintance with nature and the human body, and on the priorities of artistic endeavors; it thereby affords a view of the simultaneous availability of various possibilities of form in the past as well. We may make a rough distinction among the following interests, which, historically considered, can exist in one another's company, detach themselves, and step forward anew. These interests have been:

'Representation'

1. To reflect and echo nature, the human being, and individual things with as much precision and in as much detail as possible (for example, Greek art in the fourth century BCE, Dutch art in the fifteenth century).

2. To document conceptions and ideas (for example, Egyptian and Christian art, "concept art").

3. To idealize, 'typologize' the human being and nature (for example, the Renaissance, the Romantic period).

4. To stage new themes and forms (for example, genre painting in the seventeenth century, realism in the nineteenth).

In the sense of an interest in an escape from church conditions, the aesthetic function of art is generally associated with the → Renaissance, and interpreted as art becoming self-conscious. Once again, we have the achievements developed (and, to an extent, anticipated in antiquity): perspective, sfumato (the technique of representing more liveliness in persons with soft focus and atmospheric colors), oil painting, the introduction of light and shadow, a more exact presentation of the movement of the human body—all in the service of the quest to match the world. The discovery of ever new resistances—for instance, learning that nature can 'look different,' minute by minute, under the influence of light and wind—accompanies development, and is decisive for impressionism. The claim to 'match,' to reflect, consequently, always indicates reflection, even criticism of one's basic understanding of reality. If, on the one hand, reflection and criticism lead to the development of new forms of presentation, on the other hand they attest the growing multiplicity of art's forms of function.

The dizzying progress of the natural sciences throughout the twentieth

A man and a half-wild coyote called 'Little John' are spending three days together in a room. The man is completely covered in thick felt. For protection, he wears brown gloves, and he has a walking stick and a flashlight. The man sleeps on felt strips, the coyote on the pile of straw in the background—unless it is the other way around, since, after three days, as the action comes to an end, they have become accustomed to each other. Thus we have Joseph Beuys's performance (Aktion) "I Like America and America Likes Me," produced May 21–25, 1974 in the René Block Gallery in New York City. The German action artist has created a particularly compact, pregnant setting here, and one with multiple religious characteristics: the action is ritually century, making reality appear as shattered and multi-layered, is answered by artists with objects trouvés (items that one 'comes upon' in daily life), 'ready mades,' montages, and abstract art, all of which document a renunciation of any interest in 'copying' objective reality. In a concrete reality of the age of the machine, the computer, and the media, especially since mid-twentieth century, a room, a city, nature, shift into the field of artistic activity at an accelerating pace.

c) Joseph Beuys's (1921–1986) broadened concept of art (erweiterter Kunstbegriff), with its 'social plastics,' made for a different view of the everyday. Simultaneously, Beuys sought a 'knot with the spiritual.' Further, Beuys interpreted his broadened concept of art in this sense: as the 'reshaping' of the old Gestalt, the principle of Resurrection, into a "living, pulsating, life-fostering, soul-fostering, spirit-fostering Gestalt" and shape.[2] First taking his point of departure in traditional, Christian motifs (the Pietà, the Man of Sorrows), he finally drew elements of → shamanism into his action art—for instance, in his action "Coyote," which he produced and performed in New York.[3]

Further examples of the possibilities of the contemporary artistic formation process:

- Happenings, reflecting what is taken for granted socially;
- Installation as the form of a general space, blurring the boundaries of painting, sculpture, and drawing;
- Performances, splicing representational art with other genres, such as music, literature, or theater.

With a view to an appropriate processing of the complexity of reality and society, the traditional techniques of color, canvas, drawing, sculpture, and lettering are complemented with other forms of speech, with the inclusion of sight, sound, movement, scent, and touch. Thus, by virtue of the inclusion of reflection—on social phenomena, on itself, and on art theory—art accordingly grows ever more aesthetic, in the double sense of 'autonomous' and 'sensual.'

Philosophical Aesthetics

d) The uses of art have expanded, and have scarcely anything to do with ideal beauty and the reflection and echoing of nature. The theoretical reflection conducted by philosophical aesthetics around 1800 belongs necessarily to the route taken by contemporary art. Considerations upon human sensitivity, upon the arts, such as tragedy, in its relationship to truth and beauty, upon the human gift of invention, which creates what nature has not produced and thereby complements it, are familiar in antiquity (for instance, Plato and Aristotle), the Middle Ages (for example, Thomas Aquinas), the Renaissance (for example, Leon Batista Alberti, Leonardo da Vinci), with English and French scholars of the eighteenth century (for instance, A. Shaftesbury, the Abbé du Bos, E. Burke). With Alexander Gottlieb Baumgarten (1714–1762), aesthetics was finally established as an independent academic, philosophical discipline, brought further by Moses Mendelssohn (1729–1786), K. P. Moritz (1756–1793), Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), Friedrich Schiller (1759–1805), G. W. F. Hegel (1770–1831), and Friedrich von Schlegel (1772–1829).

With the process of reflection on art, which liberates it and at the same time proposes other conditions, the position of art today is that of a vehicle of multiple functions and object of various interpretations.

4. Any attempt to construe art as a universal phenomenon of history is a construction interpretable as reaction to its pluralism of form and style. Not least of all, with respect to the history of religions, and the place of art in these religions, this construction calls rather for a point of departure in a great, multi-layered complexity. Here, for instance, recourse must be had to the long religious tradition of Western art, to which belong the theological discussions over the veneration of images, and the iconoclast controversy (→ Idol; Image/Iconoclasm).

The prohibition of images that seized early Christianity and, later, the Reformation, emerges from Jewish religion, and is formulated in the Book of Exodus (20:4; 32:4.8; 34:17). It refers to the representation of the one God, and ordinarily to the representation of the human being as well. Reports conveying the sharp reproach leveled by the rabbis, however, suggest the commission of transgressions. The prohibition of idols or other images that can become the object of veneration means that art is not to be introduced as a means of the adoration of God. This limitation in no way excludes works of art. Thus, we hear of sculpture and artistic bronze works at the Temple of Solomon (1 Kings 6:29). The décor of synagogues offers rich ornamental decoration: mosaics with the presentation of animals, wall paintings, or certainly the Polish synagogues of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The illustration of books and the decoration of the Torah (for example, the curtains and cases) indicate that, saving the presentation of God, artistic forms are customary always and everywhere.

The relationship of early Christianity to the image presents two series of characteristics: It could be surmised through the Hebrew Bible's prohibition of images and through the renunciation of ancient worship praxis, the concrete manners of the carrying, the arraying, and the 'nourishment' dense: at his arrival at the airport, he has had himself covered in felt and brought to the gallery in an ambulance, in order to exclude all perceptions other than those of the ritual room. His ritual partner, an →animal, recalls shamanistic praxis and mythology: The coyote is one of the divine beings of the Pueblo Indians (→ Trickster); shamans work with animal visualizations and helpers (→ Shamanism). Finally, Beuys's performance mounts a symbolic protest against the persecution and humiliation of the North American Indians, their culture, and their religion. (Hubert Mohr) of idols. Only with Christianity's elevation to the status of religion of the state around 380/90 CE do these characteristics change. Gregory the Great brings the sixth-century Christian understanding of art to the point that he can identify the image as the literature of the laity. This didactic function of the image survives the most intense image conflicts, especially in Byzantium from mid-eighth to mid-ninth century. Thomas Aquinas (1225–1274) expresses himself not only on the appropriate production of a work (Assunto speaks here of the medieval 'aesthetics of materials'[4]), but also of the religious function of the image: it should serve the stirring of meditation, recollection of the example of the saints, and the instruction of the ignorant. His position shows that the function of the image as a substitute for writing and as narration in images is complemented with the generation of feelings. Typology, the method of interpreting persons and events of the Hebrew Bible as foreshadowing (as 'prefigurations' of) the New Testament, connoted the possibility of reworking Sacred Scripture's entire stock of images. Roger Bacon (1214–1294), a member of the Franciscan Order which had been founded in the thirteenth century, likewise grounds the application of the just-acquired knowledge of optics on Scripture's capacity for presentation: Scripture leaves many things in the dark that can be illuminated only through a form of painting in accordance with reality, with the help of the various instances of new knowledge. The form in accordance with reality gradually comes to include the presentation of forceful movements of the heart. Religious art in the Middle Ages exists altogether in a realm midway between theology and popular piety, a circumstance leading repeatedly to the admissibility of a presentation of Christ and the saints. Not only the veneration of images, but also that of → relics, and relics themselves, play a role here. As 'salvific fragments,' relics call for a special presentation in the space of the Church, in precious reliquaries or in sculptures. Plausibly, the theological justification of sacred sculpture rests to a great extent on, for example, a 'symbiosis of relics and sculpture.' The claim to afford the opportunity of an inner, emotional rehearsal of the story presented approaches art from various directions: in the opposition to the clergy with the Franciscans, as instruction to the artist with Leon Battista Alberti.

Veneration of Relics

Modernity

With the → Renaissance rediscovery of the ancient high cultures of the Mediterranean basin (Rome, Greece, Egypt), the spectrum of image themes expands: ancient and Christian motifs, as metaphor of the world, image as metaphor of art, and so on. A subjective religiosity emerges that corresponds to the speedy spread of the painting as an object of veneration, the altar retable, and private images for meditation, with representations of the benefactor worked into the picture. In the wake of the → Reformation, the old confrontations over the function of religious art broke out anew. Luther introduced pamphlets intensively, as illustrated polemics against the papacy, and founded a limited, religious application of the image: The human need for illustration, he indicated, is met by God in visible signs, along with the word, and that this form of revelation legitimates representational art as a means of proclamation; the nature of resemblance and sign, to be sure, must be safeguarded. Other Reformers, Zwingli and Calvin in particular, reacted more sharply, even completely excluding images from church space. The attempt to win back "everything produced into the Church's aesthetic sphere of influence" is a hallmark of the Counter-Reformation.

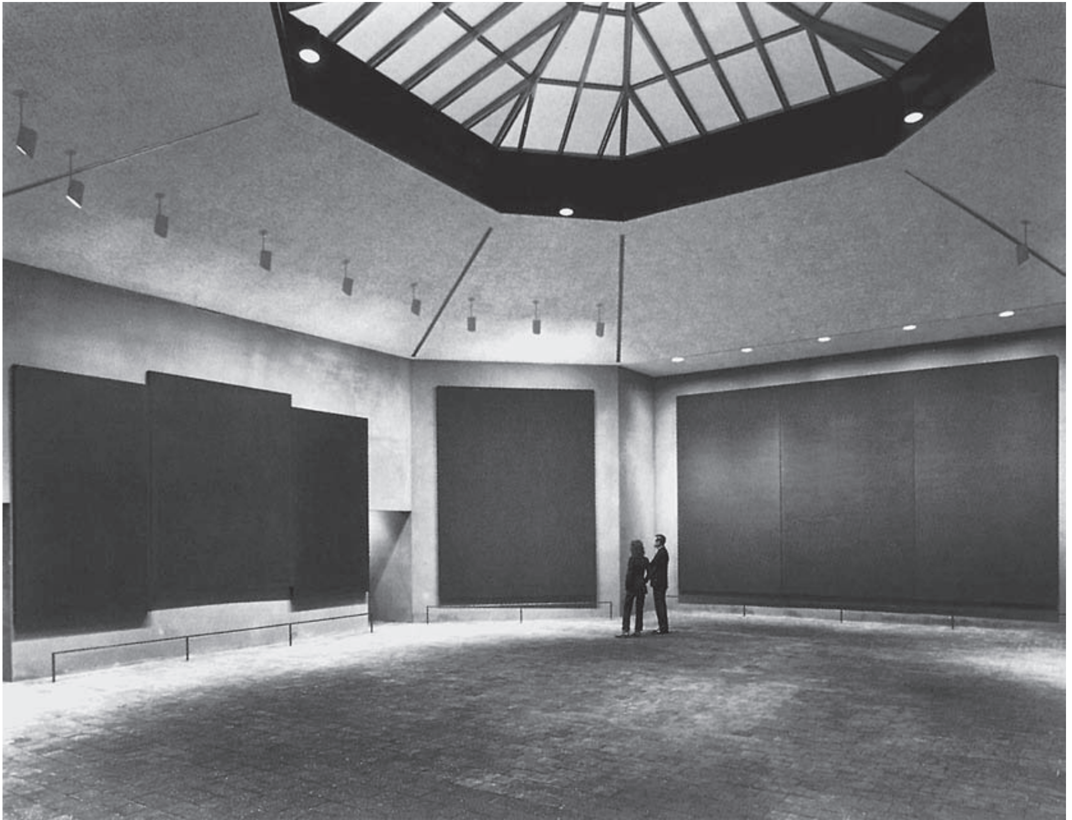
Apart from theological legitimizations of the image, art benefits the presentation of societal and economic might: in the twelfth century, with Saint Denis, the first structure created in the Gothic style. This is the case in the sixteenth century, with the Medici's Italy, during the development of the European national states, and in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries with the classicist temple façade of financial institutions. Artworks document the self-concept of the religious and/or political instances that summon them to service; they document the public to be addressed, they document any current social conflicts and how these are brought to presentation or banned (→ National Socialism, socialist realism).



An Example from Beyond Europe: Zimbabwe

5. Different processes at work in the development of the functions and meanings of artistic expression can also be recognized in the example of Zimbabwe. In the religious system of the Shona, one of the ethnic groups of Zimbabwe, → possession by a spirit plays an important part. The spirits of a family's → ancestors are regularly reverenced in order to assure their further protection, and to purify the worshipers from small transgressions. These acts of reverence are accompanied by dancing to the music of the mbira. The ability to play the mbira is ascribed to possession by the mashave, the spirits of strangers. As a historical forerunner of an art of sculpture, we may cite the Zimbabwe-birds, which have been promoted to the status of sign of national identity: that is, statuettes of onyx found in the Great Zimbabwe, a large stone mass assembled in the twelfth century. The bird also plays a role in the myths surrounding the art of sculpture. The spirit of an ancestor who conveys the art of carving frequently 'appears' in the form of an eagle, Chapungu, that circles the house. Moreover, certain mission schools of the 1950s and the workshops of the National Gallery of Zimbabwe had a sustained effect on contemporary art. Thus, in the School at Serima, content has been prescribed—exclusively Christian image themes—but with the formal elements left to those who are to execute the prescriptions. The wood and stone sculptures of Zimbabwe's artists, meanwhile, range in a broad spectrum of content and form. These may be cited in any documentation of the confrontation of art with Christian and traditional faith concepts, as well as with current problems such as AIDS; they can be pointed to as a demonstration of a powerful swerve to the indigenous social and religious tradition, even while they become marked with purely cubist, abstract, objective, and naturalistic forms.

Memory

6. At the beginning of the twentieth century, art historian Aby Warburg (1866–1929) discerned in works of art, as in other elements of tradition, a great treasury of memories: a cultural recollection on the part of a humanity now expressing its successful and less successful experiences—for example, its encounters with fear and passion. This approach renders every interpretation of an image a component of a work of → memory. As the twenty-first century dawns, as well, art is being discussed as a reliable space for reflection, resistance, and memory. A product of this opportunity for experience can be the possession of political dimensions vis-à-vis the mass media and a consumer society.

In addition, the relationship of art to other media becomes an object of reflection: Art now forms an independent subsystem within the broader Paradoxically, one of the most important works of art of the twentieth century is a sacred one: the ensemble of the chapel of the Institute of Religion and Human Development, in Houston. It conjoins two extraordinary pieces of art. Before the chapel stands Barnett Newman's Broken Obelisk, dedicated to Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Its interior accommodates a chef d'oeuvre of abstract art, Mark Rothko's (1903–70) monumental plate pictures. The fourteen plates, of which a series is to be seen here, are arranged in an octagon, citing the form of the baptistery of Torcello (in system of social activities. It owes this independence not to a 'heroic self-liberation' on the part of art and artists—in the spirit of Romanticism, for example—but to the fact that the attempt to meet a need for images in modern society is being taken over by new reproductive media. Art is presently being tested as to its delineation or potential for reflection, and the actualization of memory, aesthetical components, and public space. Research into what is today often referred to as visual culture, link the areas of art, → publicity, and religion together in one complex system.

1. See "Kunst und Religion," Theologische Realencyclopädie (1990), 336.
2. Beuys 1986, 29, 34.
3. Weber 1990, 108ff.
4. Assunto 1963, 179.

Literature

Sources: Assunto, R., Die Theorie des Schönen im Mittelalter, Cologne 1963; Beuys, J., im Gespräch mit F. Mennekes, in: Beuys, Joseph, Zu seinem Tode. Nachrufe. Aufsätze. Reden, Bonn 1986, 29-34; Kölbl, A. et al. (eds.), Entgegen. ReligionGedächtnis Körper in Gegenwartskunst, Cantz Verlag 1997.

Secondary Literature: Belting, Hans, Giovanni Bellini – Pietà. Ikone und Bilderzählung in der venezianischen Malerei, Frankfurt/M. 1985; Idem, Bild und Kult. Eine Geschichte des Bildes vor dem Zeitalter der Kunst, Munich 1990; Benjamin, W., Illuminationen, Frankfurt/M. 1977; Eagleton, Terence, The Ideology of the Aesthetic, Oxford 1990; Gombrich, Ernst H., The Story of Art, 14th ed., Oxford 1984 ([1]1950); Idem, Aby Warburg: An Intellectual Biography, London 1970; Lanwerd, Susanne, Religionsästhetik: Studien zum Verhältnis von Symbol und Sinnlichkeit, Würzburg 2002; Sturken, Marta/Cartwright, Lisa, Practices of Looking: An Introduction to Visual Culture, Oxford 2001; Walker, John A., Visual Culture: An Introduction, Manchester 1997; Weber, C., Vom 'Erweiterten Kunstbegriff' zum 'Erweiterten Pädagogikbegriff,' Frankfurt/M. 1990.

→ Architecture (Sacred), Art Religion, Film, Dance, Idol, Image/Iconoclasm, Literature, Materiality, Media, Museum, Music, Myth/Mythology, Relics (Veneration of), Renaissance, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Susanne Lanwerd

the vicinity of Venice). They are partly gathered as triptychs (threefold retables). Rothko's refined exploitation of color leads to an almost corporeal graphic impression, of powerful emotional effect: "What I'm interested in is only how I can express human feelings. . . . The people that cry when they look at my paintings are having the same religious experience that I had myself when I was painting them." Rothko's nonrepresentational art, just as Newman's, can be grasped as the consistent translation of his Jewish faith: "You shall not make for yourself an idol [or sacred picture]" (Deut 5:8; cf. 4:15-20). In addition, the chapel is a symbol of the interreligious dialogue: It was dedicated by representatives of various confessions and religions, acting in common, in 1971, and is available for the divine services of the groups. (Hubert Mohr)

Art Religion

1. The concept 'art religion' was developed by G. W. F. Hegel, in his Phänomenologie des Geistes (1807; "Phenomenology of Mind"), where he presents, in his system of the three realms of absolute Mind—Art, Religion, and Philosophy—a specific form from the past: "The Greek Religion is the religion of art itself."[1] Furthermore, the concept of art religion includes the reflections of the relation between art and religion. These reflections, around 1800, with the division between artists and clients that followed, constitute a contribution to the religious exaltation of art. The questions discussed in this connection refer, on one hand, to the replacement of the social functions of religion, with the help of art, or the aesthetic sense; at the same time, they lead to a discussion of artistic achievements in religious vocabulary, to the point of the elevation of art to the status of a religion. At the beginning of the twentieth century, the confluence of the socially heterogeneous systems, art and religion, was once again explained programmatically.

2. In his Über Religion (1790; "On Religion"), in the interest of general 'freedom of thought,' and bearing in mind altered social relations, Wilhelm von Humboldt divided religion from morality and a 'faith in authority.' The person's inner development, Humboldt holds, leads from the sensory feeling, to the aesthetic feeling, to the moral feeling; art and aesthetic feeling ought to take over the functions of religion.[2]

Romanticism

Friedrich Schleiermacher discusses educated persons' aesthetic feeling in relation to the Christian religion under the concept of art religion in his Reden über Religion (1799; "Addresses on Religion"). Defining religion as the 'feeling and view of the universe,' involves asking how the feeling for the universe can be awakened. The 'sense of art,' with the beholding of great works of art, can be the answer. This 'art religion' is not reserved for the past: it is heading for the future. Art, then, serves the engendering of religious feelings.[3] While F. von Hardenberg (Novalis) directly takes up Schleiermacher's concept of art religion, F. W. J. Schelling and Friedrich von Schlegel also discuss art as a possible medium of → revelation. Schlegel is credited for an early reception, from 1809 onward, of the group of artists known as the Nazarenes (among whom were F. Overbeck and J. Schnorr von Carolsfeld, for example), who practiced a conjunction of religion and art. The concept of the "word of 'art' as another kind of theology" is acknowledged in the work of Caspar David Friedrich, with reference to Schleiermacher.

As further representatives of a romantic art religion we may cite L. Tieck and W. H. Wackenroder (Herzensergießungen eines kunstliebenden Klosterbruders (1796; "Outpourings of the Heart from an Art-loving Monk"), who likens the enjoyment of works of art to prayer.

Reception of Antiquity

Decisive for the development of the concept of art religion, again, is the perception of this kind of religion in antiquity. J. J. Winckelmann labels "Homer as the noblest source from which the artists drew," and announces that they ought to draw from it anew (1776).[4] In the Vorlesungen über die Ästhetik (from 1818; "Lectures on Aesthetics"), Hegel develops a 'science of art,' while also naming its conditions. From the side of its highest determination, art is a thing of the past for us. The artist, now delivered from the previous limitation of being restricted to a certain form of art, "moves in personal freedom, independently of the content and viewpoints of a former consciousness of the Holy and Eternal."[5] In the Phänomenologie des Geistes, Hegel develops the thesis that art has once been the loftiest expression of the Absolute, and cites the Greek religion. Here, art religion—the religion of the moral people and of Mind—according to Hegel, produces its own shape and form: In its presentation of the pillars of the image, it manifests the "incarnation of the divine essence." Only this "simple content of Absolute Religion" comes detached from other forms of Mind: from the Christian religion, and ultimately from philosophy.[6]

Twentieth Century

As the twentieth century opened, a sign of the 'new romanticism' arose, in the attempt to discuss art and religion from the aspect of a 'profound similarity of form.' G. Simmel first presupposes a "dualism of the directions of thought and life" and identifies the "essence of aesthetic meditation and presentation" as a unifying instance. He approaches this from a soul resting in itself, which, he says, is identical with the essence of a great work of art.[7] Sigmund → Freud offers an implicit criticism of this construction in his discovery of the specific manners of expression and presentation of the unconscious. In another example, Max → Weber expressly criticizes modern 'art religion' and the accompanying veneration of great, historic artists like Rembrandt.

3. Against the background of an ever escalating functional differentiation within modern societies, for example of art and religion in the period discussed here, these approaches of a merging of art and religion manifest the wish to enter into confrontation with the complexity, contradiction, and open potential of religious and artistic expressions with clear stipulations. The postulated unity or similarity of form and essence is thus projected mostly on past art works and artists. Art—contemporary at any given time—loses, in these constructions, its slowly acquired, critical potential, and its capacity to bring to view, for instance, history in its characteristic structure. This tendency has been evident over and again throughout the twentieth century, in the conception of the → museum as a space of homage and experience, or in the discourse of a power of the aesthetic, out of the reach of human history, and destined to be shared only by a few.

1. Hegel 1990, 26.
2. Humboldt 1960, 26, 12, 18.
3. Schleiermacher 1993, 111-112.
4. Winckelmann 1964, 9.
5. Hegel 1990, 235.
6. Idem 1993, 512ff.
7. Simmel 1992, 198.

Literature

Sources: Hegel, G. W. F., Vorlesungen über die Ästhetik, vol. 1 and 2, Frankfurt/M. 1990/1994; Idem, Phänomenologie des Geistes, Frankfurt/M. 1993; Humboldt, W. von, "Über Religion," in: Idem, Werke in fünf Bänden, vol. 1, Darmstadt 1960, 1-32; Schleiermacher, F., Über die Religion. Reden an die Gebildeten unter ihren Verächtern, Stuttgart 1993; Simmel, Georg, Soziologische Ästhetik, in: Idem: Gesamtausgabe, vol. 5, Frankfurt/M. 1992, 197-214; Winckelmann, J. J., Kunsttheoretische Schriften IV, Versuch einer Allegorie, besonders für die Kunst, Baden-Baden 1964 (facsimile reprint of the Dresden 1766 edition).

Secondary Literature: Faber, Richard/Krech, Volkhard (eds.), Kunst und Religion. Studien zur Kultursoziologie und Kulturgeschichte, Würzburg 1998; Heinrich, K., Das Floß der Medusa: Drei Studien zur Faszinationsgeschichte, Basel 1995.

→ Antiquity, Art/Aesthetics, Romanticism

Susanne Lanwerd

Asceticism

Concept

1. a) By 'asceticism' (from Gr., áskesis, 'exercise') is understood, in today's usage, a conscious, prolonged, systematic diminution in the quality of one's life wherein the religious element continues to be involved only peripherally. A life of asceticism is distinguished by the exercise of renunciation in one's → everyday life, and the subordination of all daily living to the dictates of that renunciation. Transitory restrictions, such as those customary in Muslim → Ramadan, or in the Catholic practices of Lent, do not fall under the concept of asceticism. It is an essential characteristic of asceticism that it determines everyday life, but with occasional interruptions punctuating that everyday, and with the moment of this suspension of asceticism being consciously regarded as an exceptional situation.

Forms and Practices

b) The historical forms of asceticism are manifold. The most common, however, are: renunciation or restriction of nourishment (→ Fasting), sexual abstinence (→ Sexuality; Celibacy), renunciation of possessions (or at least restriction to the bare necessities), seclusion from society, self-inflicted → suffering, and a general renunciation of everything that might be conducive to joy. It is clear from these examples that asceticism is to be explained only in terms of a general rejection of material existence. The → body (and the earthly desires therewith allied) becomes an enemy, to be overcome. Religiously motivated renunciation of the world renders the appearance of ascetical movements possible only within religions. However ascetical practices may present themselves in the concrete, they all have one thing in common (for the peculiar form of asceticism in →Protestantism, see below): asceticism means the observance of certain patterns of behavior that, in society, are at least unusual, if not indeed considered undesirable (by way of example, the unmarried state, or continuous wandering or rootlessness). This conscious divergence from the socially 'normal' and the systematization of that pattern of behavior are the foundation of the ascetic's exclusion of certain elements of his or her environment, leading to a self-demarcation from society or even from his or her religious group. Thus, at bottom, asceticism is essentially elitist.

Identifying Characteristics

2. Gerhard Schlatter has identified the following as characteristic elements of asceticism.[1]

(a) Asceticism is always intentional. An ascetic who renounces anything must at least have had the opportunity of enjoying it, instead, and thus the opportunity of renouncing it. Accordingly, asceticism presupposes antecedent prosperity, and thus, possessions. This also explains why the best known ascetics of the history of religions have usually come from the upper social class (e.g., Siddartha Gautama, the → Buddha; Benedict of Nursia, whose followers eventually came to form the Benedictine Order; and → Francis of Assisi).

(b) Asceticism must be voluntarily embraced. Persons who renounce certain foods because they are allergic to them, or who give up smoking in order to safeguard their health, may be acting reasonably, but they are not acting ascetically. The same holds for a life of poverty: poor persons are ascetics only when they could be living otherwise, and thus are not compelled to spend there lives eking out their living.

(c) Asceticism must be painful. This does not inevitably mean that the ascetical life must procure physical pain, although this can certainly occur in certain forms of asceticism. But the restriction of one's quality of life must be experienced as such in order to be designated asceticism.

(d) The last essential trait of asceticism is that it be undertaken for its own sake, rather than for any concrete purpose. This is not to say that ascetics must renounce the pursuit of all goals in their practices. However, their behavior is not normally directed toward any immediate benefit in the present life; its orientation is to a transcendent goal.

Developments in the History of Religions

3. In the history of religions, asceticism is a widespread phenomenon, and has developed its most familiar forms in → Hinduism, → Buddhism, and → Christianity. It is typical of the notion of asceticism in both Asian traditions that ultimately only the ascetic can attain to salvation, can breach the cycle of rebirths. This makes asceticism a technique of salvation, which can be set in motion only by a specialist. Christian theology, to be sure, offers ascetics no monopoly on salvation. But ever since the appearance of eremitic monasticism in → late antiquity, there have been tendencies to understand and propagate the ascetic life, if not as a prerequisite for the salvation of the soul, and redemption, then in any case as a promising pathway to it. Thus the ascetic becomes—even in the consciousness of those in the world around—a religiously qualified individual.

Although a form of asceticism that ‘flees the world’—its essential trait being the renunciation of all that is earthly—is foreign to Protestantism, even here a form of the ascetic life has materialized , bearing the stamp, especially, of Puritanic Calvinism. Max → Weber and Ernst Troeltsch have described this form as ‘inner-worldly asceticism.’ Here the ascetical achievement consists not in renouncing possessions, but in not taking pleasure in them. The text, “. . . and those who buy as if they had no possessions” (1 Cor 7:30) amounts to a fitting description of their manner of life. While asceticism is otherwise a condition of → specialists, in Protestantism it is seen as a concern of each and every Christian. The distinction, monk or priest versus layperson, is replaced with the difference between a Christian and a person rejected by God.

1. Schlatter 1990, 69f.

Literature

Schlatter, Gerhard, “Askese,” in: Handwörterbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 2 (1990), 60-80; Weber, Max, “Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus,” in: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie 1, Tübingen 1920, 17-206; Wimbush, Vincent L./Valantasis, Richard (eds.), Asceticism, New York 1995.

→ Body, Celibacy, Drinking/Drink, Eating/Nourishment, Everyday Life, Fasting, Monasticism

Markus E. Fuchs

Ascona / Monte Verità

1. Monte Verità (Ital., “Mount of Truth”) was a cultic site frequented by devotees of the European, especially the German-speaking, alternative culture of the first third of the twentieth century. The level elevation overlooking the village of Tessino and today’s tourist center of Ascona, on the Swiss northern bank of Lago Maggiore, received its name from the homonymous sanatorium at the same location. From 1900 to 1920, Belgian industrial heir Henri Oedenkoven (1875–1935) and pianist Ida Hofmann (1864–1926) maintained this institution of ideological → vegetarianism on the hill. The imposition of the name is programmatic: The ‘truth of nature’—and a manner of living according to nature—loftily contrasts with the ‘hypocrisy of the civilized.’ Thus, Monte Verità is to be ranged in the tradition of the European → utopias conceived in the spirit of social criticism. Moving above and beyond its original motivation, it became a point of comprehensive reference, embracing a variegated collection of alternative lifestyles, experiments with settlements, individual mythologies, and sketches for religious projects—all practiced and cultivated by artists and middle-class dropouts, here in the isolated park of Monte Verità, which was so favorable to the creation or elaboration of a world view: theosophy, anarchism and pacifism (Erich Mühsam), reform dance (Rudolf von Laban), and research into myths. We may cite a pair of examples characteristic of the religious history of German modernity: the Naturmenschen-Kolonie (‘nature people colony’) with its vegetarianism and the “Eranos” circle of researchers—and creators—of myth.

Eurhythmic exercises ('running through the dew'), in reform clothing, before a 'cabin of light' on Monte Verità around 1904. Front left, Henri Oedenkoven and Ida Hofmann; center, with the hat, 'anarcho-socialist' Raphael Friedeberg. The sanatorium and its guests were marked with the reform-of-life ideas of the turn of the century: Natural healing procedures, nudism, reform of clothing, of nutrition, of orthography, erotic revolutions. The immediate experience of nature and its elements, an experience undisturbed by the accretions and distortions of civilization, constituted the ideal and program of Monte Verità: Movement in the open not only served the enhancement of one's own bodiliness, but acquired religious traits, as the key to the 'convalescence' of body and society alike.

2. a) The vegetarian settlement of Monte Verità was founded in 1900 by persons disillusioned with the middle-class mores and other cultural elements with which they were surrounded: Oedenkoven and Hofmann, brothers Karl and Gustav ("Gusto") Gräser (resp. 1875–1915, 1879–1958), who had gotten into conflict with the Austrian army, and Lotte Hattemer, daughter of a Prussian government officer. The group divided as early as 1901, and Monte Verità's 'patented' contrast between a commercial lifestyle and a radical praxis took shape. Oedenkoven and Hofmann founded a commercial sanatorium, with 'light and air cabins,' therapeutic baths, and a 'meadow of light' (modeled on the nature-healing establishment of Swiss Arnold Rikli, 1823–1906). On the other hand, a 'nature people colony' rose up that rested on an autarchic principle: instead of currency, a principle of exchange or trading; instead of civilization's aids and materials, a life 'according to nature' as preached by Henry David Thoreau and Count Leo Tolstoy. From the outset, a simple 'Recreation Institute,' in which emotionally stressed citizens might cleanse themselves of the dross and cinders of industrial society, stood over against a 'Society of the Pure,' a 'renunciation elite' (H.-G. Soeffner). Of course, both factions prescribed for themselves strict vegan principles: raw vegetables and fruit, no kinds of animal products, biological cultivation of nutritional necessities, and abstinence from alcohol. After 1920, Monte Verità entered a second phase of activity: it became a meeting point for artists and for scholarly gatherings (see 2b, below). Monte Verità's middle-class trend and commercialization as a luxury resort for—still—the German-speaking middle class, with the concomitant loss of its overarching ideological function, was already on its way.

b) Eranos (Gk., "common meal"): The "Eranos Circle" is still active today, combining research in the study of religion with personal orientation and Seelenführung ("soul-direction").[1] Its origins were in Monte Verità's theosophical environment (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society). Its founder, Olga Froebe-Kapteyn (1881–1962), was close to Annie Besant and Krishnamurti, but also to Catholicizing eccentric Ludwig Derleth. In 1933, with Marburg theologian Rudolf Otto (Das Heilige, 1917) and depth psychologist Carl Gustav Jung as advisers, she initiated an annual nine-day encounter of scholars, whom she entrusted with the task of comparing and reconciling Eastern and Western philosophy and religion. In respect of content, the emphasis of the meetings, which were faithfully documented in a yearbook, shifted after 1946 to philosophical anthropology and exchanges with natural scientists. The new departure was undertaken primarily at the initiative of zoologist Adolf Portmann, who continued to schedule and direct the meetings after the death of Froebe-Kapteyn. In 1986, Portmann's successor, Rudolf Ritsema, plunged the Eranos project into the most serious crisis it had suffered until now. He unilaterally announced the termination of the meetings and sought to lead the circle back to its roots: the transmission of Eastern wisdom, in commentary and translation. This plan led to a division of membership: In 1990, the majority of the participants reconstituted themselves, in the village of Ascona, as 'Amici di Eranos' ('Friends of Eranos'), under the direction of Egyptologist Erik Hornung and political scientist Tilo Schabert. Programmatically, they called their meetings "Resurrection and Immortality." The faction around Ritsema continued to meet, on Froebe-Kapteyn's estate in nearby Moscia, as the 'Eranos Foundation.'

"Eranos" is both a series of scientific meetings and a ritual organization. On one hand, a circle of cultural, as also (in lesser numbers) natural, scientists meets, to consider questions of interdisciplinary interest. It has included Kabbalah-scholar Gershom Scholem, historian of religions and author Mircea → Eliade, and classical scholar Karl Kerényi. On the other hand, "Eranos" is "the annual celebration, conducted in private, of a revival, enlightenment, and burial ritual,"[2] conducted by 'spiritual leaders' with and for disciples. In the quest for a "Western path to salvation" (Froebe-Kapteyn), theories become doctrines, addresses become instruction. Although this spiritual aim is not shared by all participants, often the presenters have found it difficult to escape an "expectation of salvation" (Holz) on the part of their audiences. Hence, religion in the Eranos conferences is at hand almost exclusively in the form of esoteric traditions, myths, or the testimonials of mysticism and magic, and as 'higher' or 'deeper' knowledge that will transcend religious, social, and philosophical and historical particularities (→ Esotericism).

3. The fascination of Monte Verità's social experiment sprang from the fact that it announced to (mostly Middle-European) opponents and victims of modernization a modestly priced exile, and space for experiments in relationships and groups—all in a region on the border of Italy, which, in German tradition, has been ennobled by a literary mythology of yearning and paradise (Jean Paul, Titan, 1800/03). On the model of the 'holy mountain' in historical mythology (Lat., mons sacer; cf. the ancient Roman secessio plebis, 'people's withdrawal' in protest), here was found a frontier between 'civilization and the wild' that provided for the staging of a richly symbolic break with 'normality' and for a consequent revolution in oneself. Middle Europeans sick of civilization could regress to Mediterranean nature and test the role of the 'noble savage'—at least so long as the light/air therapy lasted—or try 'going native,' attempt a return to the state of the cave or hut dweller in an era antedating the arrival of civilization (Karl Vester, Gusto Gräser). Monte Verità's social utopias enjoyed scant success, however, and were soon drawn into the wake of commercial pressures and tourism. Monte Verità has turned out to be more fruitful as a point of exchange for the intellectual and artistic avant-garde, as a melting pot for various ideas, worldviews, and religious praxes.

1. Froebe-Kapteyn, in "Eranos-Jahrbuch 2" (1935), 8.
2. Holz 1984, p. 256. Cf. Wasserstrom 1999 and Hakl 2001.

Literature

Sources: Eranos-Jahrbücher, ed. by Ida Froebe-Kapteyn, Adolf Portmann and Rudolf Ritsema, Zurich 1933–1988; Neue Folge, vol. 1, ed. by Erik Hornung and Tilo Schabert, Munich 1993ff. (The older series is continued, as well).

Secondary Literature: Green, Martin, Mountain of Truth: The Counterculture Begins. Ascona, 1900–1920, Hanover 1986; Hakl, Hans Thomas, Der verborgene Geist von Eranos. Unbekannte Begegnungen von Wissenschaft und Esoterik. Eine alternative Geistesgeschichte des 20. Jahrhunderts, Bretten 2001; Holz, Hans Heinz: "ERANOS—eine moderne Pseudo-Gnosis," in: Taubes, Jacob (ed.), Religionstheorie und politische Theorie, vol. 2: Gnosis und Politik, Munich 1984, 249-263; Szeemann, Harald (ed.), Monte Verità—Berg der Wahrheit. Lokale Anthropologie als Beitrag zur Wiederentdekkung einer neuzeitlichen sakralen Topographie (exhebition catalogue), Ascona 1978; Wasserstrom, Steven M., Religion after Religion: Gershom Scholem, Mircea Eliade and Henry Corbin at Eranos, Princeton 1999.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Body, Environmentalism Intellectual Religion, Nature Piety, Modernity, New Age, Paganism/Neopaganism, Utopia, Vegetarianism

Hubert Mohr

Ashram

1. The Sanskrit word asrama, 'hermitage,' 'residence of an ascetic,' 'monastery,' may be derived from sram, 'exert oneself,' 'make an effort,' 'perform religious exercises.' The ashram is also, in ancient Indian literature and religious praxis, the secluded place where ascetics or hermits can perform their exercises undisturbed. Such ascetics received disciples who performed all necessary services (Sanskrit, seva), and remained for some years. Such small ashrams exist even today, both those of hermits and those of teachers (→ Guru), with a small number of disciples (shishyas).

2. When ashrams are mentioned in today's Western context, what are usually meant are large complexes of buildings, belonging to India's new religious movements, to which hundreds or thousands of people flock on pilgrimage, to hear the teachings of their gurus, to perform exercises in meditation, and to join the community of others. For many non-Indian, Western believers today, the ashram is a place of personal religious experiences, and these persons' sojourns are often referred to with the word 'retreats.' Besides requiring the still customary seva, a stay at a modern ashram ordinarily costs money, as well. Thus it is not usually of lengthy duration, and frequently takes the form of a (brief) vacation. Of course, there are also modern sojourns that last for years. Communities of Indian movements in Western countries are also called ashrams.

Ashrams that have gained a name include that of Baghwan Shree Rajneesh in Poona, where traditional Indian meditation exercises are supplemented with group therapy and group undertakings of Western origin (→ Osho Movement). Another is that of Sri Aurobindo in Pondicherry.

→ Commune, Guru, Osho Movement

Karl-Peter Gietz

Astrology (Western)

The Concept

1. a) Astrology (from Gk., 'science of the stars') belongs to the oldest cultural phenomena of humankind. Its persistence from antiquity to modernity—despite many transformations and various developments—is remarkable. Most generally, astrology engages the suspected correspondences between the heavenly realm (the stars, planets, zodiacal signs, etc.) and the earthly realm. To interpret these correspondences, astrological discourse developed different, and often conflicting, strategies. On the one hand, scholars construed a causal influence of heavenly bodies on the sublunar world, which consequently leads to a deterministic or even fatalistic worldview (→ Determinism; Fatalism). Ancient Greek philosophy—particularly the Stoa—spoke of a hidden power in the cosmos that determined everything (heimarmenê, 'fate'); everything that exists is related in a complex net of correspondences (sympateia, 'sympathy'). On the other hand, astrologers argued that the stars do not exert influence themselves but are mere 'signs' or 'symbols' of something that is going on throughout the cosmos. These alternatives lead to severe questions that have been part of astrological discussion ever since: are the heavenly signs simply accompanying the mundane events—the stars as sêmeia—or are they responsible for them—the stars as poiêtikoi? And if there is a sympathetic correspondence between celestial sphere and earth, does this necessarily imply a deterministic or fatalistic influence?

The answers to these questions evidently challenge religious identities. Particularly in Western scriptural religions, a deterministic interpretation of astrology was seen as problematic, because it runs counter ethical claims of volition, the prerequisite of morally 'good' or 'bad' behavior, and the precondition of redemption, punishment, and 'sin.' Not surprisingly, then, it was the second alternative that gained the upper hand in Western history of culture—the stars were deprived of their divine power and seen as 'instruments of God,' their path was interpreted as "God's handwriting" (Origen, c. 185–255).

Various Fields of Astrological Practice

b) The search for underlying principles in the correspondence between heavenly and earthly realm brought forth several fields of interest that can be distinguished as different fields of astrological practice.

- Already in a very early stage of development, the prediction of agricultural issues and weather conditions was done on an astrological basis; this could mean that eclipses of sun and moon, conjunctions of planets (i.e. when planets 'stand together'; from Lat., conjungere), or the way of individual planets were correlated with climate conditions.

- From the interpretation of (Gk.) katarchaí (Lat., electiones, 'elections,' 'beginnings') a theory was developed that predicted the outcome of an initiative (war, business, foundation of cities, etc.) on the basis of the horoscope that was cast for the moment the initiative was taken.
- The reading of an individual birth chart was a relatively late development (after the fourth century BCE), although in antiquity there already was a complex theory available about this field of astrological practice; usually, however, the 'individual' was the king or another high-ranked person, thus representing not only an individual nativity but the political or religious community, as well.

Although today the main focus of astrological practice is on the interpretation of individual nativities, we should not forget that the move from 'mundane astrology' to 'individual astrology' happened only after the Renaissance and was further fostered by the development of 'psychological astrology' in the twentieth century (see §2e).

Historical Development

2. a) The origins of Western astrology lie in the Mesopotamian cultures of the third millennium BCE. From the fifth century BCE onward, both the zodiacal scheme with twelve equally large zodiacal signs and horoscopic astrology was developed. In this process, the influence of Greek mathematics and astronomy played an important role, as well. Later, certain elements of Egyptian tradition were adopted (therefore, the myth of early Egyptian competence in matters astrological is not attested in the sources; → Egypt). In Imperial Rome, there was a full-blown astronomical and astrological science available that is usually referred to as 'classical astrology.'[1] This tradition was 'canonized' by Claudius Ptolemy (c. 100–178 CE) in his Syntaxis mathematica (for astronomy) and Tetrabiblos (for astrology).

Antiquity

Despite the fact that ancient scholars differentiated between the calculating and the interpreting branch of the science of the stars, the utter devaluation of 'astrology' vis-à-vis 'astronomy' is a modern phenomenon that led—in the aftermath of the so-called 'scientific revolution'—to the dismantling of astrology from the accepted sciences. In antiquity, however, astrology held a key position among the well-reputed sciences (Lat., artes). As ars mathematica closely connected with astronomy, it made its way into the highest political and philosophical orders of the Roman Empire and became the standard model of interpreting past, present, and future events.[2]

Middle Ages

b) In the Middle Ages, astrological theory—both in terms of calculation and with regard to interpretation—was expanded particularly by Muslim scholars. While Christian astrologers usually clang to a few Latin sources of Late Antiquity that were seen as compatible with Christian theology, Muslim and Jewish scholars absorbed theories of Indian astrology, combined them with the Greek and Latin sources of Roman times, and developed complex and mathematically more exact hermeneutical systems. From the ninth century onward, Christian circles increasingly felt the need to catch up with Muslim and Jewish science, and in many monasteries translations of Arabic texts were provided. The interaction between scholars with different religious backgrounds worked particularly well in Spain and Italy, leading to a shared astrological field of discourse in the High Middle Ages.

Renaissance

c) With a new interest in → Platonism and the rediscovery of Greek hermetic texts that became available in Latin translation (→ Hermetism/Hermeticism; Esotericism), the period between 1450 and 1650 can be seen as the pinnacle of astrological research in Europe (→ Renaissance). Astrology played a decisive role in inter- and intrareligious controversies and discussions. One example of this is the debate about the 'cycles' of historical development that were interpreted with reference to the cycle of 'Great Conjunctions' between Jupiter and Saturn; being already part of ancient discourse, the theory of cyclical succession of religions, kingdoms, and powers on the basis of Great Conjunctions was developed by medieval Muslim astrologers. Shiite scholars interpreted these events as indications of the return of the 'hidden Imam,' Jews joined this debate with prognostications of messianic events, and Christians referred to the Great Conjunctions as signs for the second coming of Christ. The interconfessional debate about → Luther's horoscope, for instance, was strongly informed by speculations about the messianic impact of Great Conjunctions. In a highly apocalyptic and millennialist mindset, astrology was a key factor of legitimation of identity and power.[3]

The 'scientific revolution' changed the position of astrology in scholarly discourse. Often it is argued that the crisis of astrology was due to the victory of the Copernican heliocentric model of the cosmos, while astrologers still clang to the Ptolemaic model, with the earth being the center of the cosmos. This is too simple a picture, however. Kepler, for instance, in several treatises argued that the heliocentric model would cause no problem for astrologers, because for them it does not matter how the paths of the planets that they are observing and interpreting from their position on earth actually are to be explained. More important for the crisis of astrology, therefore, was the fact that from the seventeenth century onward radical empiricism gained the upper hand in scientific research. Deterministic empiricism led to a disregard of interpretations that referred to invisible ('occult') powers in nature, and astrologers had severe problems in justifying their concepts of 'sympathy' and correspondences.

Romanticism

d) With the exception of England—where a continuous development of astrology is attested[4]—in the eighteenth century astrology had lost its old reputation as scientific discipline almost completely in Europe (→ Enlightenment). It was no longer part of university programs, a critical factor of the so-called 'decline' of astrology. The result, however, was not a vanishing of astrology from intellectual discourse, but a shift from university and science to literature and art. Even before the era of → Romanticism, astrology entered those cultural areas, for instance in the writings of Schiller and Goethe, who made use of astrological symbolism in order to establish an alternative to Christian monotheism. In the nineteenth century, then, astrology played a role in Romantic concepts of 'living nature,' concepts that critically assessed the standard deterministic worldview of science.

Modernity

e) But it needed the impact of nineteenth-century Theosophists (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society) to reintroduce astrology on the continent. Here, mystical and karmic readings of astrological tradition were developed that ran counter the prognostic interest of older astrological currents. The second major influence on a newly appreciated astrology in the twentieth century was the growth of psychology (→ Psychoanalysis). Now, it was the individual and the inner qualities of the human psyche that stood front and center. Doubtlessly, without Jungian psychology and its adaptation in → 'New Age' culture, the history of astrology in the twentieth century would have been completely different.

Today, the majority of (professional) astrologers cling to a non-deterministic, psychological concept of astrology. In all Western countries astrological societies have been founded that strive for a better reputation of what they see as serious astrology, in a public climate that holds ambivalent views about the science of the stars. While astrology is still almost completely neglected and ridiculed by scholars, a large proportion of the population in Europe and North America believe that astrological hermeneutics might come to coherent conclusions.

1. See Bouché-Leclercq 1899; Barton 1994; von Stuckrad 2005, ch. 3.
2. See Cramer 1954.
3. See Zambelli 1986; Destmann et al. 2005.
4. See Curry 1989 and 1992.

Literature

Aveny, Anthony, Conversing With the Planets: How Science and Myth Invented the Cosmos, New York/Toronto 1992; Barton, Tamson, Ancient Astrology, London/New York 1994; Bouché-Leclercq, A., L'astrologie grecque, Paris 1899; Cramer, Frederic H., Astrology in Roman Law and Politics, Philadelphia 1954; Curry, Patrick, Prophecy and Power: Astrology in Early Modern England, Cambridge 1989; Idem, A Confusion of Prophets: Victorian and Edwardian Astrology, London 1992; Fögen, Marie Theres, Die Enteignung der Wahrsager. Studien zum kaiserlichen Wissensmonopol in der Spätantike, Frankfurt/M. 1993; Garin, Eugenio, Astrology in the Renaissance: The Zodiac of Life, London/Boston 1983; Grafton, Anthony, Cardano's Cosmos: The Worlds and Works of a Renaissance Astrologer, Cambridge 1999; Gundel, Wilhem/Gundel, Hans Georg, Astrologumena: Die astrologische Literatur in der Antike und ihre Geschichte, Wiesbaden 1966; Holden, James Herschel, A History of Horoscopic Astrology: From the Babylonian Period to the Modern Age, Tempe 1996; Howe, Ellic, Urania's Children: The Strange World of the Astrologers, London 1967; Newman, William R./Grafton, Anthony (eds.), Secrets of Nature: Astrology and Alchemy in Early Modern Europe, Cambridge 2001; North, John, The Fontana History of Astronomy and Cosmology, Hammersmith 1994; Oestmann, Günther/Rutkin, Darrel/von Stuckrad, Kocku (eds.), Horoscopes and Public Spheres: Essays on the History of Astrology, Berlin/New York 2005; Samsó, Julio, Islamic Astronomy and Medieval Spain, Aldershot/Brookfield 1994; Scholz, Gerhild et al. (eds.), Paracelsian Moments: Science, Medicine and Astrology in Early Modern Europe, Kirksville 2002; Tester, S. Jim, A History of Western Astrology, Woodbridge 1987; von Stuckrad, Kocku, Das Ringen um die Astrologie. Jüdische und christliche Beiträge zum antiken Zeitverständnis, Berlin/New York 2000; Idem, History of Western Astrology: From Earliest Times to the Present, London 2005; Willis, Roy/Curry, Patrick, Astrology, Science and Culture: Pulling Down the Moon, Oxford/New York 2004; Zambelli, Paola (ed.), "Astrologi halluzinati": Stars and the End of the World in Luther's Time, Berlin/New York 1986.

→ Determinism, Divination, Esotericism, Fatalism, Heaven/Sky, New Age, Occultism, Science, Time

Kocku von Stuckrad

Asylum

Human Right?

1. Asylum, the assuring of protection to strangers, has religious roots. Church asylum, and the sanctuary movement (in the United States), plead this ancient religious tradition. In 1949, the Federal Republic of Germany committed itself to the following human right: "Political refugees have a right to asylum" (Art. 16.2). This formulation goes much further than the (non-binding) United Nations Convention on Human Rights of December 12, 1948: "States may grant asylum to political refugees." Nevertheless, even the German expression of the right to asylum did not create a human right according to which religious or racial refugees might demand the right to asylum. Thus, even today Jews and Sinti (→ Sinti and Roma), who had vainly sought asylum in Sweden or Switzerland from murder at the hands of the Nazi dictatorship, would have no right to protection.

2. The slogans "The boat is full" or "Fortress Europe" characterizes the policy on asylum of the "Schengen Agreement" of June 14, 1985, which, to be sure, opened the interior borders of Europe, but shut the common boundary off from the 'flood of asylum seekers'—the metaphor tacitly suggesting the destruction of the world (the Great Flood) and the ark of rescue for the righteous. No note has been taken of how the Western world causes the poverty of the Southern, and ever fewer refugees have been recognized as eligible for asylum. They have not been persecuted, it is claimed—they could flee within their own countries. They have been rated as 'pseudo-seekers of asylum,' or 'economic refugees,' and ascribed dubious, or even criminal, intentions. The nations of Europe have not opened the necessary alternative in the form of an immigration law, since many persons of the former colonies, among others, might then be able to redeem their claims to legal rights.

Sanctuary Movement and Church Asylum

3. Individual refugees have found protection in church communities. The sanctuary movement in the United States, and church asylum in Europe, make appeal to an ancient religious right: Temples and churches, it is claimed, were safe havens for refugees, who could there enjoy religious protection. In ancient times, we hear, upon entering the sanctuary they had become 'untouchable': a taboo, a magic protection, cloaked refugees upon their touching the altar or a ritual image, shielding them from their pursuers. This is not the meaning of the Greek asylon, however. In early Greek culture, the custom meant that what belonged to a divinity in her or his house, whether treasures or persons, might not be included in the collection (sylan) of a debt. For lack of a power monopoly on the part of the state, injured parties must get their compensation themselves; the border to 'vengeance' cannot be secured. Here in the sanctuary, persons were protected from blood vengeance if only they called upon God or a distinguished person as arbitrator, for protection. No higher power intervened ('intercession'), but a person of respect would call for a respite if the legitimate penalty were to shift to vendetta. In ancient Israel (Lev 35), there was an effort to limit the place of asylum; even more so in the Roman Empire. After all, not just any slave might find cheap liberty in a temple. Asylum, the oldest civil right, long antedating any enlightened liberation, is in constant danger of being restricted and contested. But in the house of God, the very birds of the air find asylum, and human beings ought to be able to profit by the same generosity, we are taught in the narratives. Indeed, in the disguise of the stranger and the foreigner, the very God could be trying the justice of human beings. Simple persons, who share the little that they have, are more generous in this regard than the denizens of the cities.

Huguenots, Dissenters

Among historically important flights to asylum are those of the Huguenots to Prussia and Holland in 1685, of the dissenters (who failed to conform to the Confessions), and later of the 1848 revolutionaries to North America, or the 'authors in exile.' The admittance of asylum-seekers has fetched cultures not only expenses, but a wealth of human beings and cultural blossoming.

A Constitutional State Needs No Asylum

4. But if, since the French Revolution, there are no longer any immune locations, where civil law is suspended, then how is church space for asylum to be explained? Is the Minister of the Interior not correct in saying that law and order is being assaulted here? Human rights stand above the right of law, however, and on occasion call for civil disobedience. The assertion of law and order, or the credibility, or economic power of the state, cannot be measured against a human being's emergency. But another reproach, as well, is made against asylum as an exceptional right: Does it not harbor criminals as well? It is usually specified, however, that, in the long term, asylum protects only one who has killed without intent. And life in asylum means giving up one's native soil, social position, and friendships. It is usually a life in 'misery.'

Anyone claiming that every person is endowed with inalienable rights, purely and simply because he or she is a person, must keep open the doors to the place where those who must fear for their lives in another part of the world are warranted protection. But a world in which millions are in flight must not merely conceal the symptoms, and that indeed reluctantly.

Literature

Sources: Hebrew Bible: Gen 18-19; Ps 23; Aeschylus: Hiketides; Herodotus: Histories 1:153-161; New Testament: Mt 25:31-46; 2:13-23.

Secondary Literature: Arnaout, Ghassan Maârouf, Asylum in the Arab-Islamic Tradition, Geneva 1987; Auffarth, Christoph, "Protecting Strangers," in: Numen 39 (1992), 193-216; Dreher, Martin (ed.), Das antike Asyl: Kultische Grundlagen, rechtliche Ausgestaltung und politische Funktion, Cologne 2003; Goodwin-Gill, Guy S., Asylum, Strasburg 1995; Joly, Danièle (ed.), Global Changes in Asylum Regimes, Basingstoke 2002; Steiner, Niklaus, Arguing about Asylum: The Complexity of Refugee Debates in Europe, New York 2000; Traulsen, Christian, Das sakrale Asyl in der Alten Welt. Zur Schutzfunktion des Heiligen von König Salomo bis zum Codex Theodosianus, Tübingen 2003; Wallace, Rebecca/Brown, Adèle (eds.), Asylum Practice and Procedure: Country-by-Country Handbook, London 1999.

→ Human Rights, Migration

Christoph Auffarth

Atheism

1. Atheism ('godlessness'), linguistically derived from the Greek átheos, is so named only since the sixteenth century. Atheism means the denial of the existence of God or of the gods, as well as of a life after death. It is a radical form of → criticism of religion, and depends on contingent historical and societal conceptualizations of God. Thus, a timelessly valid definition that would specify anything beyond the negation of the existence of God is impossible. Behind the imputation of atheism lurk confrontations concerning the religious tradition of a society.

A prerequisite for atheism is the formation of a theological concept of God. The atheistic critique can be summarized in three principal types: (a) the gods have no interest in the world (Epicurus, deism); (b) gods are human inventions (Critias, Feuerbach, → Freud, materialism); (c) the existence of gods can neither be proved nor disproved (agnosticism). The atheistic critique is accompanied by pleas for alternative systems of explanation of the world, most often of a scientific or psychological kind.

Intellectual Atheism

2. The atheism of Ancient Greece denied God's involvement in the world, just as did later deism, but not God's existence. The position of Xenophon (c. 565–488 BCE), that the human form of the gods consists in abstractions, absolutizations, or denials of human traits (critique of anthropomorphism), was brought forward in modern times against Christian theology, just as was the pronouncement of Epicurus (341–271/270 BCE) that it was fear of the gods that had occasioned the invention of gods. Protagoras (485–415 BCE) had raised the doubt of whether the question of the gods' existence was to be decided at all, and Thomas Henry Huxley (1825–1895) elaborated this doubt into the theory of agnosticism. Anaxagoras's (c. 500–427 BCE) contestation of the divinity of the sun, which set in motion a desacralization of nature, developed into an atheistic theory resting on an acknowledgement of the sciences. The reception of the works of Baruch de Spinoza (1632–1677) was normative here. From his maxim, 'God is substance and nature,' radical Enlightenment thinkers of the seventeenth century formed a naturalistic philosophy. A normative influence was exercised by the English freethinkers on seventeenth-century French (libres penseurs) and German Enlightenment thinkers through the propagation of their atheistic store of thought. Their critique of religion, which they borrowed from the ancient philosophical tradition, found its way into the explication of → human rights in the French Revolution. In eighteenth-century France a societal model was conceived in which, for the first time, atheists enjoyed equality of citizenship (→ Civil Religion), thereby establishing the theoretical basis for the separation of church and state (→ Secularization). An explanation of the world according to the rules of Empiricism, without any reference to God, the refutation by Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) of the arguments for the existence of God, the relegation of religion to the status of a human feeling by Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834), as well as the recognition of religion's social conditioning consequent on the 'discovery' of non-European peoples, readied the way for the atheistic philosophy of Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–1872). Feuerbach made the discourse upon God, or theology, into a discourse upon themselves by human beings, an anthropology.

Organized Atheism

3. In the industrial societies of modernity, the first organized atheism to arise was that of the socialist labor movement of the nineteenth century, which was founded on philosophical materialism. Karl Marx (1818–1883) became important with his 'scientific socialism,' which at first he dubbed 'real humanism,' and later, 'communism' (→ Marxism). With his radicalization of the antinomy between materialism and idealism, he battled all varieties of speculative philosophy and religious piety. In 1881, his supporters organized into the German Association of Freethinkers—the German bloc of the International Association of Freethinkers founded in Brussels in 1880—thereby separating themselves from the Free Religious. The International Association of Freethinkers was the umbrella organization of the English Freethinkers, the French libres penseurs, and the American Unbelievers, who had held national congresses in the United States since 1836.

4. In the twentieth century, the atheism of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels (1820–1895) has produced its own anticlerical culture of activism and propaganda. Socialist states are home to atheistic museums (e.g. Albania) and academic chairs for instruction in atheism, which, in an accommodation to church politics, were partially dismantled in the German Democratic Republic. That which appears as an atheistic cult of the state is partly the product of the strict separation of church and state, where the church is interpreted as a relic of human history whose theories have been vanquished. At the same time, a variety of personality cults have appeared, which have transformed religious traditions. The cult of Stalin exploited the popular piety of the Russian Orthodox Church; Mao made use of Chinese tradition, for example the role of the people as emphasized in the work of Mêng-tsû of the Ch'in era.

5. Atheism as the denial of a personal God is found in → Confucianism. → Buddhism, especially Theravada Buddhism, as also Indian Jainism, knows no god of creation and governance, but their religious characteristics distinguish them from unequivocal atheistic systems like the Indian Lokayata of Charka. Since 1940, an Atheistic Center, committed to the secular state, has functioned in Indian Viyajawada/Andhra Pradesh.

6. The state-prescribed atheism of the socialist states seems to have failed. The unbelief and religious indifferentism of which the church complains, the 'truth' with which cult → films and books are endowed, as also → sports, → music, and leisure pleasures, are not necessarily atheism, as they are missing the constitutive element of a conscious denial of the gods.

Literature

Berman, David, A History of Atheism in Britain: From Hobbes to Russell, London 1987; Ley, Hermann, Geschichte der Aufklärung und des Atheismus, Berlin 1966ff.; Rinaldo, Peter M., Atheists, Agnostics, and Deists in America: A Brief History, Briarcliff Manor 2000; Robertson, John M., A History of Freethought, Ancient and Modern, to the Period of the French Revolution, repr. Bristol 2001 ([4]1936); Stein, Gordon (ed.), The Encyclopedia of Unbelief, 2 vols., Buffalo 1985.

→ Civil Religion, Criticism of Religion, God/Gods/The Sacred, Spirituality, Theodicy

Ulrich Nanko

Atlantis

Plato's Myth

1. Atlantis is the literary fiction of a great empire that sank in the Atlantic. It harks back to the Greek Philosopher Plato (427/8–347/8 BCE), and is said to have served the rescue of the declining state of Athens in the political struggle over that city's future. Plato was from an old aristocratic family and had sought in vain to receive some political office in his home city. He battled the democrats, who were hateful to him, with philosophical teachings. The legend of Atlantis is closely bound up with Plato's myth of the ideal state, and is found in two of the later dialogues, named after his interlocutors, Critias and Timaeus (21e-25d). Plato clad his doctrine in a teaching he claimed a priest had imparted to his ancestor Solon in Egypt. The priest is said to have told of the glory of prehistoric Athens, which had delivered the world from oppression by its victory over world power Atlantis nine thousand years before. Power in Athens in those days was said to have been held by twenty thousand 'guardians,' who lived in full equality, while farmers and laborers, like the slaves, scarcely interested the philosopher. Athens's enemy, the island state of Atlantis, stood on a mighty continent beyond the "Pillars of Hercules" (Gibraltar), and flourished so long as it maintained a monarchical order that pleased the gods. Its army had threatened the entire Mediterranean basin, and only the Athenians, under the leadership of aristocrats, had succeeded in expelling the enemy, whose continent had sunk into the ocean soon thereafter. Athens itself had fallen into decay, but had blossomed once more, on its ancient model.

With his chronicle of Atlantis, Plato was preaching an Attic Renaissance. That glorious past would return, as Athens had once ruled the world. He was following the ancient Persian teaching on the ages, which had limited the existence of the world to thrice three thousand years, with a 'new' age (Gk., aion) to follow the present one. Over against the 'rotten' contemporary democracy of Athens, Plato set original Athens as the ideal model of a state, with an elite aristocracy in a three-tier society, and Atlantis as the ideal, monarchical, state. Plato's (twofold) outline was a copy of the conquering state of Sparta, in which only the strictly reared elite enjoyed political rights, while the working population were without them.

The framework of the narrative is the Attic image of → Egypt. Here was an ancient land filled with miracle and mystery. The model for the great aggressive empire that had threatened Athens was the Persian Achaemenid Empire. A power from beyond the seas—in the fabulous, far away, then—was probably seafaring Athens. The tale of Atlantis, accordingly, does not deal with real events. It is an instructive device, a → myth, which mingles elements of the politics of the day with a state → utopia, teachings about the ages of the world, and transplanted pieces of exotic travel reports. Any attempt to locate the myth of Atlantis historically or geographically, then, is doomed to failure. There is no continent sunken in the Atlantic.

Atlantis in the Utopian Literature of Early Modernity

2. For centuries, even the literary creation of 'Atlantis' disappeared. After Athens had receded into political insignificance with the ascent of Rome, the myth had fulfilled its political function—which, to be sure, was always limited. Nearly two thousand years would pass before the legend of the prehistoric super-empire beyond the Strait of Gibraltar was wakened to new life, having been faithfully handed down in other works. The history of the

The "Opening Festival" of the new Atlantis on Tenerife: Carl Laubin's painting (1987) shows a celebration the like of which will doubtless never be held. It was to be held on the Agora, the marketplace of a city called Atlantis. Belgian architect Léon Krier, together with Hans-Jürgen and Helga Müller, of Stuttgart, were planning this ideal city until the year 2000, on Tenerife. (On the left stands the 'refectory'; in the middle, the colonnaded hall of the 'Stoa'; at the right rear, the pyramidal church tower.) To be executed in the antiquating style of postmodernism, it was conceived as a Platonic Academy, where "persons of high consciousness could meet" (Maurice Culot). The project was a failure from the outset because of its overreaching. (Hubert Mohr) modern reception of the myth of Atlantis commences in fifteenth-century Florence. There, under Cosimo de' Medici, there sprang up an 'Academy,' after the Platonic model, whose head, Marsilio Ficino (1433–1499), believed in the literal reality of the narrative (→ Esotericism). It was in his milieu that Genoan Christoforo Colon (Columbus) seems to have heard of islands in the Western sea that were accounted the remnants of Atlantis. Columbus's 'discovery' of America promoted the old legend to a means of grasping the reality, of the hitherto unknown land beyond the seas, as verified in the writings of the ancients. From now on, Plato's narrative was read in twofold wise: as a historical report, and as a social utopia, the portrayal of a society of justice and equality. Plato's myth underpinned both Thomas More's Utopia of 1516 and the concepts of the radical Baptist movement. Both read the old text as a set of instructions for social reform. Of course, it was overlooked that Plato had foreseen the 'communist' order only for the ruling 'guardians.' English political theorist and philosopher Francis Bacon composed a modern, striking version of the myth, with his Nova Atlantis (1627). Bacon's Atlantis was not an ideal of justice, but a country full of fantasized technological creation, a seminal work of → science fiction literature.

Myth of Atlantis in Modernity

3. After 1850, Greek philosopher Plato's political lesson was the subject of a resurgence. The effects of the tale of Atlantis in trivial literature are a variation on the attempts to reach an utterly wondrous world 'enlightenment.' The—now conservative—social content of the Atlantis story is forgotten. The only things that count are the reputed riches and adventurous collapse—both of them areas into which many mysteries can be read. A variation with enduring effects even today is the Fascist fantasy of an Alfred Rosenberg, who, in the 1930s, sought to lead the 'Aryans,' as the heirs of Atlantis, to the stature of a world power, as Plato had sought to lead Athens out of a fabricated past to greatness. Rosenberg's work still stands behind the dreams of a J. Spanauth (Das enträtselte Atlantis, 1953), who theorized Helgoland (a small island in the North Sea) to be a remnant of Atlantis, in order to link the legend to the Germans. These variations on the myth of Atlantis do without any humanistic thinking. Today's transferred locations are archaeologically oriented, and, with much popular success, shift the mythical place to Thera (S. Marinatos) or Troy (E. Zangger).

Literature

Brentjes, Burchard, Atlantis. Geschichte einer Utopie, Cologne 1993; Castleden, Rodney, Atlantis Destroyed, London 1998; Ellis, Richard, Imagining Atlantis, New York 1998; Sprague de Camp, L., Lost Continents: The Atlantis Theme in History, Science and Literature, New York 1954.

→ Antiquity, Myth/Mythology, New Myths/New Mythologies, Platonism, Private Religion, Science Fiction, Utopia

Burchard Brentjes

Augustine

Biographical Data

1. Augustine was born in 354 in Thagaste (today's Souk-Ahras, Algeria), and died in 430 in Hippo Regius (Northern Africa). Reared as a Christian by his mother, Monica, he lived at first (373–384) as a teacher of rhetoric in Thagaste, Carthage, Rome, and at the Western Roman Imperial Court at Milan. After a conversion experience, he had himself baptized (387), and in 391 was ordained a priest. From 396 until his death Augustine was Bishop of the provincial city of Hippo Regius.

Intellectual and Religious Development

2. Augustine's intellectual career was no less turbulent than his outward life. During his studies in rhetoric, he became acquainted with Cicero's philosophical works. It was especially the latter's dialogue Hortensius, which today is lost, that motivated him to turn to philosophy, which he understood as a spiritual, and at the same time practical, quest for true happiness. In 373 Augustine embraced → Manichaeism. He rejected Catholicism, partly because of the supposedly inferior intellectual level of its teachings, and partly because of the barbaric style of the Bible. Manichaeism, on the other hand, seemed to him an enlightened, philosophically adequate salvation doctrine. Beginning in 382, however, he turned from Manichaeism, precisely because of its philosophical problems, and was converted to Catholicism, the religion of his childhood, under the influence of the Bishop of Milan, Ambrose, as well as of Platonically inclined circles. In his Confessions, Augustine gives a dramatic depiction of his → conversion as an existential transformation of his personhood at the hands of God. The question of whether he was actually converted to Catholicism, or rather to a variety of Neoplatonic philosophy, was long the subject of controversial discussion. Along with his assimilation of the allegorical biblical exegesis cultivated by Ambrose, by which many of the scandals of Christian scripture could be eliminated, three insights were decisive for Augustine: (1) Besides material reality, there also exist purely spiritual things, and in particular, God. (2) The image of God in human beings is not to be understood as an assertion of an image of the human being in God, for instance in the form of corporality, but rather the other way around, as a similarity to God, and thus an immateriality of the human spirit. (3) The root of evil is not a second, divine, world principle, but the human being's free decision of the will. In the confrontation with Pelagianism (beginning in 412) regarding the relation of divine grace and the free decision of the human being, Augustine specified his teaching on the will, to the effect that only in the Garden of Eden had there really existed a freedom for good and evil. As a negative consequence of the Fall, human beings are now no longer in a condition to do good by their own power. Instead, for this they must have the grace of God.

History of His Influence

3. The significance of the enormous extent of Augustine's writings for the history of Western spirituality can scarcely be overstated. He is the most important conveyor of Platonic → metaphysics to the Middle Ages. Medieval mysticism received an essential impetus from Augustine's idea of a seven-tiered ascent to God, as well as from his depiction of his ecstatic experiences. Modern philosophy itself fell back on him repeatedly. Thus, Descartes developed his basic premise, the cogito ergo sum ("I think, therefore I am") in dependence on Augustine's concept of the human spirit, and the authors of German phenomenology and existential philosophy (Scheler, Heidegger, Arendt, Jaspers; → Existentialism) received Augustine as analyst of the self.

Likewise rich in consequences for the history of thought was his conceptualization of history, as presented in The City of God. Against the Stoa's cyclic model of history, Augustine represents a linear conception of the history of the world, which ends in the establishment of the Reign of God in the second coming of Christ. Augustine's point of departure in his philosophy of world history is not the representation of a simple progress, but that of a qualitative leap in its transition to the Reign of God. Still, the attempt may be made to conceive modernity's concept of progress as a secularization of the Augustinian thinking on history (K. Löwith). With his doctrine of the two citizenships (civitas dei, civitas terrene, "God's citizenship, earthly citizenship"), Augustine sets forth a separation, and at the same time a flexible mutual ordering, of church and state. The state is rendered profane and non-moral, but retains the task of producing a relative, earthly justice, limited to the domain of temporal goods. Christians take active part in the life of the state, since they, too, have need of temporal goods; but they are conscious of the provisional and incomplete nature of these goods.

With his Confessions, Augustine is seen as the founder of the literary genre of autobiography (→ Biography/Autobiography). In the main part of this multidimensional work, he portrays his life history, climaxing in his conversion to Catholicism. His interior and exterior biographies become a testimonial to mistaken pathways and successes in the search for true happiness. The Confessions are regarded as a paradigm of interiorization and a forerunner of modern subjectivism, as is to be had, for example, in the Confessions (1763–1770) of Rousseau. It is to be observed, however, that, with Augustine, neither the autobiographical parts of his work, nor the extremely subtle examination of conscience to be had in Book 10, bear their sense in themselves. By contrast with Rousseau, for instance, Augustine is not interested in his soul's peculiarities, but in its typical elements—the Adam in him and in every human being, fallen away from God and struggling to return.

Certain characteristics of Augustine's teaching on grace, especially his doctrine of the damnation of children dying without baptism, were contested from the beginning, and were never fully accepted. It was otherwise with his interpretation of human sexuality, likewise tied to his teaching on grace, which became extensively determinative for church sexual morality. For Augustine, reason's overmastery by appetite in the act of sex is a sign of the human being's fallen state, and an evil in itself; but it can be tolerated in order to accomplish the higher good—corresponding to God's command to propagate—of the conception of offspring, in the framework of matrimony. Sexual intercourse apart from the intent of propagation—and for Augustine this means out of sheer lust—is to be accounted reprehensible. In recent times, this notion is criticized in the Catholic Church, as it fails to take human sexuality into adequate account as an expression of love between persons.

While current discussion of Augustine is in the main historically oriented, he does belong to those authors whose names stand for the most influential deposits of tradition in Western theology.

Literature

Editions and Translations: (a) Latin edition: Corpus Christianorum, Turnhout 1955ff. (not yet completed); (b) Translations: Augustine of Hippo, Selected Writings, trans./introd. by Mary T. Clark, London 1984; Idem, Political Writings, ed. by E. M. Atkins and R. J. Dodaro, Cambridge 2001; Idem, The City of God Against the Pagans, 7 vols., ed./trans. by George McCracken et al., London 1957–1972; Idem, Confessions, ed./trans. by William Watts, Cambridge 1999–2000.

Secondary Literature: Brown, Peter, Augustine of Hippo: A Biography, Berkeley 2000 ([1]1967); Cary, Phillip, Augustine's Invention of the Inner Self: The Legacy of a Christian Platonist, Oxford 2003; Flasch, Kurt, Augustin. Einführung in sein Denken, Stuttgart 1980; Markus, R. A., Saeculum: History and Society in the Theology of St. Augustine, London 1970; Mayer, Cornelius (ed.), Augustinus-Lexikon, Basel 1986ff.; McInerny, Ralph M., A History of Western Philosophy, vol. 2: Philosophy from St. Augustine to Ockham, Notre Dame 1970.

→ Late Antiquity, Christianity, Manichaeism, Mysticism, Platonism

Johannes Brachtendorf

Authority

Concept: Personal and Formal Authority

1. The concept of 'authority' comes from Roman antiquity and essentially designates a relationship of voluntary subordination without direct application of force. The word derives from the Latin auctoritas ('prestige,' 'influence'), embodied in the ancient Roman Senate. The latter was composed of prestigious former officials who stood at the side of the magistrates in office in an advisory capacity. By way of distinction from potestas ('power,' 'control'), which can be imposed by violence or compulsion, auctoritas is a voluntarily attributed quality, connected with control, prestige, authorization, and dignity, which leads to the statements and behavior of the one in authority being confidently accepted. This special trust establishes loyalty, to the point of an unconditional obedience—which, of course, can be refused, once the integrity of the person in authority is shaken and the confidence of the subordinate lost. Personal authority must be earned, and repeatedly confirmed, and in a different manner from power and control, which may be gained and be maintained, if need be, by force. In the case of personal authority, the actual power lies with those who acknowledge that authority, and who, in principle, can withdraw their acknowledgment at any time.

Formal authority materializes when personal authority is transferred to institutions, or to groups of persons, and exercised by their representatives. Examples, in addition to public authorities, are professional groups such as those of teachers, judges, physicians, and priests (→ Specialists [religious]). The larger the formal aspect of authority becomes, the greater the danger grows that authority once acknowledged on the basis of → prestige will grow independent, and, as an 'institutionalized' or 'functional' authority, degenerate into sheer control. Similarly, even in the area of personal authority, a transformation may occur to a mere exercise of power, and issue in authoritarian comportment.

Religious Authority

The pattern of voluntary subordination to the determinations of others is to be found in the area of religion, as well. Here, for one thing, there is → myth, whose truth content is indubitable for the believers, and which advises of a higher, mightier reality. Myths have their authority through those who hand them down, and because they come directly from the gods, just as—especially in the 'founded' religions—sacred scriptures are authorized through their relation with God. The ascription of authority follows in the personal act of faith, in which persons voluntarily submit to this religious authority and its claim to a determined discipleship. The analogy of 'generative authority,' experienced by everyone in common life with the family and family members (see below), is reflected in the religious concepts and their acceptance by individual persons. Conversely, religious authorities also act in the worldly area of a society, and usually gain a high social standing. Aside from the various forms of ecstatic, mystical, or ascetical rapture, it is the religious office holders, especially, who transmit the impression of an intensive relationship with the transcendent powers, and possess authority. This holds especially for shamans (→ Shamanism), → prophets, → gurus, and → priests. The last-named, especially, have developed a professional group of their own, and can be said to be 'imbedded' in a secure, formal authority.

Cooperation between religious and secular authorities: In a village of the rain forest of southwest Cameroon, a police officer seeks advice from the mask of Obasi-Njom. Many persons consult Obasi-Njom in personal or family problems, in sickness, or even in the effort to identify a criminal offender. From the side of the state, this cooperation is frowned upon, especially as Obasi-Njom enjoys great trustworthiness and possesses great power in the eyes of the population. (Benita von Behr)

Authority and the Church

2. To be sure, in most religions authority performs its operation without being explicitly delineated. But the concept of auctoritas gained entry into the terminology of the early Christian Church directly from its use in the Roman political system. Tertullian (160–220; earliest Latin ecclesiastical author, probably originally a jurist), who introduced the concept of auctoritas into theology, and Cyprian (200–280, Bishop of Carthage, originally from the Roman aristocracy and a civil official) saw the triune God as bearer of absolute, unlimited authority—an authority that, granted, needed the counsel of no others. Just as civil law has authority because the regent or sovereign of the people issues it, so the Bible, as 'word of God,' has divina auctoritas ('divine authority'), which extends to the representatives of the Church and to the believers. → Augustine broadened the concept of auctoritas for the Church, investing it with a more profound religious meaning, according to which the authority of God cannot and should not be doubted, and, at the same time, in its transmission by Jesus, is an example and model. These are conceptualizations that lie at the basis of the institution of the → papacy, which presents a prototype for personal and institutional authority, for the reciprocal relationships between these, and for a definitive meaning of the act of voluntary (believing) recognition of an authority.

Importance and Effect

3. The impact of authority lies grounded in the very first experience a person has with others. The child's experience of the helplessness of complete dependency, and the experience that the instructions and dealings of the person to whom he or she relates most closely generally have benign effects on the child, stamp lifelong the basic pattern of authority and of confidence in persons of authority. Only when the behavior and pretensions to respectability and authority of a person who relates to the child on a basis of intimacy fall into a general dissonance, so that this person acts no longer through his or her personal authority but rather through an informal one, does the (informal) authority become mixed with an exercise of power and the child become resistant or subjected. On grounds of the need for orientation and stability, additional, new vessels of authority are sought, who seem more reliable, and these change in the course of a person's life history. This is also the key to an understanding of the attraction of relations of dependency and to the 'doctrine' and spirit of this phenomenon, which we must therefore term authoritarian (Adorno). The less authority is understood as a relationship between autonomous persons in quest of counsel and their counselors, the greater the peril of a dependent control-relationship, with subjugation and absolute obedience. It is not the abolition of authority that is called for here, but an education that would preserve the autonomy of the self and safeguard one's critical intercourse both with oneself and with secular and religious authorities.

Literature

Adorno, Theodow W., The Authoritarian Personality, New York 1950; Bochenski, Joseph M., Autorität, Freiheit, Glaube. Sozialphilosophische Studien, Munich 1988; Habisch, André, Autorität und moderne Kultur. Ekklesiologie und Staatstheorie zwischen Carl Schmitt und James M. Buchanan, Paderborn 1994; Kirscht, John P./ Dillehay, Ronald C., Dimensions of Authoritarianism: A Review of Research and Theory, Lexington 1967; Waida, Manabu, "Authority," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 2 (1987), 1-7.

→ Charisma, Fundamentalism, Socialization/Upbringing

Matthias Pilger-Strohl

Baha'i

1. The Baha'i religion rests on traditions of Iranian Islamic history of religion, as well as on interweavings with the more ancient revelatory religions Judaism, Christianity, and → Zoroastrianism. Thus, its type is that of a monotheistic prophetical religion. The cultural conditions of its appearance in Islamic → Iran in the nineteenth century weigh upon relations between the Islamic world and Baha'i to this day. At present the religion extends across the globe, with some 6.5 million faithful worldwide. Its focal points are in sub-Saharan African countries, on the Indian subcontinent, and in Latin America. Despite repression, some 300,000 live in Iran. They are also found in Europe; in Germany, for example, their number is somewhat over 5,000, living in 100 local centers.

Baha'i Today

2. In the year 1844, Sayyid Ali Muhammad (1819–1850) proclaimed himself, in Shiite Muslim terms, the Bab—the "Gate"—to a new personal vessel of revelation. This development divided him and his followers from Islam, and he was executed in 1850.

Origin

Then Mirza Hussain Ali Nuri (1817–1892), called Baha'u'llah, the "Glory of God," assumed the leadership of the followers of the Bab, and in 1863 declared himself to be the new vessel of revelation announced by the Bab. The 'Twin Revelation' of the Bab and Baha'u'llah, proclaimed the latter, had closed the great cycle of earlier religions. In 1868, persecution and banishment led him, by way of Istanbul and Edirne, to Akka in Palestine. There he lived until his death in 1892. Four decades of activity have produced a voluminous corpus of Scripture, of which the most important writings are the Kitab-i-Aqdas, the "Most Holy Book" and the Kitab-i-Iqan, the "Book of Certitude." Through extensive European and North American journeys in the years preceding the First World War, Baha'u'llah's son 'Abdu'l-Baha (1844–1921), as the religion's authoritative exponent, contributed decisively to its spread outside the Near East. The latter's grandson, Shoghi Effendi (1897–1957), as Guardian of the Faith, translated the Scriptures from Arabic into English, sacred though the former language might be. He also left his imprint on the social and organizational development of the religion. The Universal House of Justice, first constituted, by vote, in 1963, after the death of Shoghi Effendi, is the religion's supreme international governing body. It consists of nine male Baha'i, each elected to a five-year term. Above the city of Haifa, in Israel, along with other installations, stands the building that houses this institution. The tomb of the Bab, and the nearby tomb of Baha'u'llah, make the entire area the center of the religion. On the national level are the so-called National Spiritual Assemblies. The lowest organizational level is made up of the Local Spiritual Assemblies. Unlike those of the "Universal House of Justice," the nine members of these Councils are chosen annually; women can vote and be elected as members of these councils.

"Universal House of Justice"

Further Development

3. Central among the theological teachings stands the one proclaiming a threefold unity: (1) that of the oneness of God maintains the strict monotheism of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. (2) That of the oneness of the Revealer emphasizes that no religions are distinct from one another otherwise than outwardly, in their temporal, cultural, and developmental conditioning. In their essence they form a single unity. Each new Revealer renews a religion paralyzed in its outward forms. At the interior of the religion, the concept of a progressing revelation also relativizes the claim to absolute uniqueness, and leads to efforts concerned with an inter-religious dialogue. (3) By virtue of the oneness of humanity, the sexes, and all races and peoples, are of equal dignity and worth.

Calendar

Baha'i community religious praxis is oriented to the calendar. The year begins with the spring equinox, and is arranged in nineteen periods of nineteen days (with four additional days). The nineteen-day feast at the beginning of each new calendar period, as a regularly recurring event, structures community life. Nine holy days recall important occurrences in Baha'i history—among others, the birthdays and death days of the Bab and Baha'u'llah, the Bab's revelation, the Ridvan festival, and the Now-Ruz. On these days, believers are to rest from their work. The community assembles for the reading of sacred scripture at a brief service, for conversation concerning the community's religious and social interests (consultation), and for a social occasion that includes food and recreation (without alcohol). Baha'i worship knows neither elaborate rites nor religious specialists (priests); instead, each community member is expected to make an active contribution. Individual religious praxis centers on daily prayer. The last Baha'i 'month' is a nineteen-day period of fasting. As in the Islamic → Ramadan, food and drink are renounced during the day. Not having any elaborate rites, the Baha'i religion requires no buildings in which to celebrate formal ritual. Only the "Houses of Worship" could perhaps be considered structures for cultic practice. In 1964, the European House of Worship was erected in Hofheim, near Frankfurt-am-Main. Others are in New Delhi, Panama City, Wilmette, Sydney, and in Uganda.

From its doctrine of the oneness of humanity, Baha'is draw an openness to the world, as manifested in its efforts for the recognition of equal rights for woman. In 'Third World' countries, Baha'is promote development and education projects specifically for women. Baha'i collaboration with the United Nations, as a nongovernmental organization, like its commitment to world peace, is a concrete expression of its aspirations for the actual emergence of the oneness of humanity.

In countries of the 'Third World,' this demand has a positive effect. Here the Baha'i religion realizes its capacity to promote development. In Western Europe and North America, on the other hand, where a strict partition of society and religion is in most cases the order of the day, the prospect of marking society and culture with Baha'i thought collides with basic obstacles. Baha'is enjoy little popularity, then, in these regions of the world.

Literature

Sources: Bahá'u'lláh: Kitáb-i-Aqdas. The Most Holy Book, Haifa 1992; Idem: Kitáb-i-Íqán. The Book of Certitude, Wilmette 1960; Idem: Gleanings from the Writings of Bahá'u'lláh, Wilmette 1963.

Secondary Literature: Buck, Ch., Symbol and Secret: Qur'an Commentary in Bahá'u'l-láh's Kitáb-i-Íqán, Los Angeles 1995; Schaefer, U., Beyond the Clash of Religions: The Emergence of a New Paradigm, Prague 1995; Momen, W. (ed.), A Basic Bahá'i Dictionary, Oxford 1996; Idem (ed.), Scripture and Revelation, Oxford 1997; Cole, J. R. I., Modernity and the Millennium: The Genesis of the Baha'i Faith in the Nineteenth-Century Middle East, New York 1998; Hutter, M., "Bābīs". In: Jones, L. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Religion. Second edition, New York 2005, 727-729; Idem, "Bahā'īs". In: Jones, L. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Religion. Second edition, New York 2005, 737-740.

Series: Studies in the Bábi and Bahá'i Religion; The Bahá'i Studies Review.

→ Iran, Monotheism

Manfred Hutter

Baptism

The Ritual

1. a) Baptism is the celebration of the ritual, common to all Christian churches, that establishes reception into the Church as a religious community. Thus it is a rite of → initiation. → Water, and the Trinitarian formula, "I baptize you in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit," are the twin essential elements of this ritual. At baptism, candidates are immersed, either totally or partially, in water, or water flows over them, or they are sprinkled with water. Luther derives the word Taufe ('Baptism'), with etymological correctness, from tief ('deep').[1]

b) In the first Christian communities, baptism was administered only 'in the name of Jesus' (Acts 2:38; 8:16; 19:5). The new members of the community received a new name, a 'Christian' one. Inasmuch as the candidate is baptized to or for the name of Jesus, or the triune God, she or he is

The Gospels report that Jesus had himself baptized by John in the Jordan (Matt 3:13-17; Mark 1:9-11). The Bible does not give the place, but Christian tradition has specified a site on the riverbank southeast of Jericho, near the Dead Sea. Already in early Christian times, pilgrims came here to be baptized. Later, monks settled at the place to provide lodging for the pilgrims. Still today, at the ancient place of baptism near El Maghtas stands the Greek Orthodox Monastery of Saint John. After this strip of land on the border of Jordan had become an off-limits military area, the Israeli Ministry for Tourism established a new baptismal spot near Bitanya, south of Lake Gennesaret, the Pilgrim Baptismal Site Yardemit. It offers a large parking lot, with access to the Jordan, and shops where pilgrims may purchase souvenirs. Pilgrims may step down into the river in safety on a stair provided with banisters. In churches that practice adult baptism, pilgrims are generally together in groups, who travel to the Holy Land and, as the high point of their pilgrimage, after the example of Jesus, step into the Jordan to celebrate the Sacrament of Baptism. (Kirsten Holzapfel) declared to belong to that God, and simultaneously to be a member of the community of all believers. The element of water, into which the candidate sinks, symbolizes death, the end of a time of life now past; arising from the water stands for birth, the beginning of a new life.

2. a) Baptism was a new ritual, a rite specifically of the primitive Christian community. In Jewish tradition, only John the Baptist's baptism (Matt 3:13-17) could have been its model. Unlike Jewish washings (→ Purification), Christian baptism is received but once. The one baptizing performs Christian baptism, with the candidate participating only passively. It is founded on the baptismal instruction ascribed by biblical tradition to Jesus: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them, [. . .] and teaching them to obey everything that I have commanded you" (Matt 28:19-20).

Infant versus Adult Baptism

b) It cannot be said with certainty whether children were baptized in the early Christian communities (cf. Acts 16:15; 1 Cor 1:16); to be sure, the New Testament concept of baptism does not preclude it. Infant baptism came to be the general praxis in the lands marked by Christianity. Only as the Anabaptists (the 're-baptizers') of the sixteenth century came to require a conscious decision on the part of candidates for baptism, and thus baptized only adults, was the established tradition of baptizing infants called into question.

c) Not only from the institutional side, but also in the consciousness of church members today, baptism is ascribed a special importance as a sign of membership in the Church. As polls reveal, church members typically rank 'being baptized' high above 'church attendance' or 'knowledge of the Bible.'

1. According to Grimm, Jacob and Wilhelm, Deutsches Wörterbuch, vol. 11, I.1 (Leipzig 1935), 187.

Literature

Day, Juliette, Baptism in Early Byzantine Palestine, 325–451, Cambridge 1999; Geldbach, Erich, Taufe, Göttingen 1996; Johnson, Maxwell E., The Rites of Christian Initiation: Their Evolution and Interpretation, Collegeville 1999; Root, Michael/Saarinen, Risto (eds), Baptism and the Unity of the Church, Grand Rapids 1998.

→ Baptists, Birth, Church, Initiation, Life Cycle, Ritual

Jürgen Weber

Baptists

Radical Evangelical Christians

1. The Baptists (originally, German Täufer) base their lives radically on the Bible, refusing all compromise; consequently, they refuse military duty. Unlike other churches, they practice only adult → baptism. Their origins lie in sixteenth-century Central Europe. At the beginning of the seventeenth century, another group appeared, in the Anglo-Saxon region, the "Baptists" (from the Greek, baptízein, 'baptize,' 'immerse'). Owing, presumably, to cultural reservations and differences, there was scarcely any contact between the 'baptist' (Täufer) baptizing movement on the continent and the Baptists in Britain. While in German-speaking regions a distinction is still made between Täufer and Baptists today, in English no such distinction exists. All Christian communities restricting baptismal candidacy to adults are known as 'Baptists' where English is spoken.

Radical Wing of the Reformation

2. a) The Täufer movement dates from the Reformation: For the Täufer, the reforming efforts of Luther and Zwingli did not go far enough. Together with the "Enthusiasts" or "Dreamers" (the Schwärmer) and the "Spiritualists," they constitute what is thought of as the 'left wing' of the → Reformation. Unlike the "Enthusiasts," the Täufer were of the firm conviction that the Reign of God ought not to be attained by violence, and is to be realized in this world only for a small remnant of persons. Unlike the Spiritualists, again, the Täufer, of course, hold to a visible community of the born again.

Zurich 1526-26

b) The Täufer movement had its beginnings in Zurich. A dispute had arisen among the followers of reformer Zwingli (1484–1531) in Zurich. The radical group was dissatisfied with both pace and extent of the reforms being implemented. In the relationship between the Christen- und Bürgergemeinde ('Christian and the civil community'), the radicals wished to be under the control of the secular Council of the city no longer, and demanded that its places, too, be filled by members of the Reform. The definitive break with the Protestantism being established came in January 1525. For Konrad Grebel (c. 1498–1526), infant baptism was the symbol of a Kirche des Herrn Jedermann ("Church of everybody")[1] and irreconcilable with a biblically based model of church. At a time when infant baptism was not only a rite of initiation for reception into the Church, but at the same time symbolized reception into society, a rejection of infant baptism was far more than just a theological consideration or ecclesial matter: it was an affront to society's status quo. On January 17, 1525, a public disputation was held, whose concluding pronouncement was the prescription that anyone failing to have his child baptized within a week of its birth be expelled from the City and Canton of Zurich. Grebel and his fellow disputant Feliz Mantz were placed under an injunction of silence. Four of their fellow-believers were banned. The price was high for the position the 'anabaptists,' who called themselves the 'Swiss Brethren,' had taken. In Zurich itself, in 1526, the Council had introduced the determination that anyone who performed rebaptism was to be drowned.

Persecution in the German Empire

c) In the year 1529, the persecution of the Täufer was extended to the entire Holy Roman Empire of Germany by a decree of the Diet of Speyer. "Re-baptizers and re-baptized, male and female, who have attained the use of reason, are to be taken from natural life to death by fire, sword, or the like, [. . .] without inquisition aforegoing by the Spiritual Judge."[2] Despite the situation of persecution, the Täufer movement gained popularity, and quickly spread in southern Germany, in Tyrol, in Austria and Moravia, in the regions of the upper Danube, in the Rhine valley, and the Netherlands. There was a consciousness within the Täufer movement of the problem of a fragmentation, which led, at a congress of the Täufer on February 24, 1527, in Schleitheim, to the ratification of a confession of faith issuing from the pen of Michael Sattler.[3] The nature of this confession, which was actually more of a set of directions for the attitude and behavior of the believers, was to prevail in all later confessions prepared by groups standing in the Täufer tradition. The misnamed 'Täufer Realm' in Munster (1534/35), where the "Enthusiasts" succeeded in bringing the city under their rule by violence, increased the pressure on the clandestine Täufer groups.

Mennonites, Hutterites, Amish

d) Ex-priest Menno Simon (1496–1561) managed to persuade the quiet, pacifist Täufer of the Netherlands and northern Germany to group together, and succeeded in giving them an identity of their own—one that would distinguish them from the "Enthusiasts." In the course of the sixteenth century, then, the name Mennonites gained currency for all groups of the Täufer movement except the Hutterer ("Hutterites," after Jacob Hutter, burned at the stake in Innsbruck in 1536), a Täufer group likewise springing from the Reformation, which practiced common ownership of goods on their communal farms, primarily in Moravia. At the end of the seventeenth century, the Amish Brethren split with the Mennonites. Persecution spanning the Empire, and an absolutist rule in the area of religion as well (cuius regio, eius religio, "your region determines your religion"), and finally, economic relations (for only very seldom were Täufer permitted to own land), may have been the main reasons for the emigration of the Täufer, to North America especially. In the nineteenth century came a further reason for the nonviolent Täufer to abandon their homelands: universal military service in many of the states of Europe.

In Europe, then, there are only a few communities remaining that can trace their existence to Täufer roots. In → North America, on the other hand, there is a broad spectrum of Täufer communities that go back to the immigration from continental Europe just cited.

Täufer in North America

3. a) The range of the presence of the Täufer in North America today is gigantic. Especially striking is the existence of communities that refuse to assimilate to a modern, secularized world. Besides Mennonite communities not outwardly different from other Christian communities and their members, we find Old Mennonites, Hutterites, and Amish. These last named Täufer groups, with their secluded way of life, in relatively closed off farming settlements, with their strict clothing customs, their own schools, their language ("Pennsylvania Dutch [Deitch]"), their rejection of modern technology (except for the Hutterites), and a rigorous management of their community organization, consciously seek to take their distance from a modern, and in their eyes diabolical, world. The Hutterites practice common ownership of goods in their communities even today. Scant encouragement as these groups, with their opposition to the world, may receive from without, nevertheless the high birth rate in their own communities, coupled with a low rate of exodus, maintains these communities unthreatened in their existence. The Amish population, for example, doubles every twenty years: As the twentieth century dawned, the North American continent was home only to some 5,000 Amish; today their number is 150,000. For outsiders, these unworldly religious groups have become a living museum, and remind many of the seemingly good old days.

Old Mennonites, Hutterites, and Amish Brethren

Baptists

b) Alongside these Täufer communities, with their continental European roots, the North American continent is host to a plethora of Baptist communities of Anglo-Saxon impress. In the New World, Roger Williams called the first Baptist community together in 1639. Three 'awakening' movements (from 1726, from 1800, and from 1870) occasioned a powerful upswing in the number of Baptists and their communities, and by the end of the nineteenth century there were more than 5,000,000 Baptists living in the United States. The twentieth century also saw a great increase in the number of members of these communities. The number of Baptists in the United States between 1920 and the 1980s quadrupled, reaching some 30,000,000.[4] As of today, then, the Baptists have developed the numerically strongest Protestant church in North America. Evangelization is still an essential feature of the Baptists today; the best-known Baptist preacher in the world is Billy Graham (→ Televangelism). The Baptist understanding of church emphasizes the individual, together with easily manageable communities without hierarchical superstructure. This emphasis likewise conditioned the division of the Baptist Church in America into various denominations. The Southern Baptist Convention, founded in 1845, is numerically the strongest denomination in the world, and embodies a union in the 'Bible belt' of the Southern states that exercises quite a centrally organized control.

c) Unlike the Northern Baptist Convention, founded in 1907 (since 1950 the American Baptists), the Southern Baptists tend to → fundamentalism, and also decline to take part in the ecumenical movement. By reason of their social and political commitment, the African American Baptist communities play a central role. After the Civil War (1861–1865), the Baptist communities of blacks received very strong popular support on the part of former slaves. By the end of the nineteenth century, these communities were already forming in their own coalitions. Two-thirds of all blacks belonged to a Baptist community by the middle of the twentieth century, and today one-third of the 30,000,000 Baptists in the United States are African Americans. The important role they discharged under the leadership of Martin Luther King, Jr. (1929–1968), especially in the time of the upheaval that was the civil rights movement of the 1960s, changed society itself.

1. Böhmer, Heinrich/Kirn, Paul (eds.), Thomas Müntzers Briefwechsel, Leipzig 1937, 93.
2. Deutsche Reichstagsakten, 7, 1229; cited in Iserloh 1975, 253.
3. Oberman, Heiko A. (ed.), Die Kirche im Zeitalter der Reformation, Quellen, 3rd ed. Neukirchen-Vluyn 1988, 140-144.
4. Brackney, 1983, 355.

Literature

Brackney, William Henry, The Baptists, New York 1988; Brackney, William H. (ed.), Baptist Life and Thought 1600–1980, Valley Forge 1983; Hostetler, John A., Amish Society, Baltimore [4]1993; Iserloh, Erwin, "Der Kampf um das Verständnis der Freiheit des Christenmenschen," in: Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte 4 ([2]1975), 115-226; Leonard, Bill J., Baptist Ways: A History, Valley Forge 2003; Scott, Stephen, Why Do They Dress That Way?, Intercourse 1986.

→ Baptism, Commune, North America, Reformation, Symbol/Sign/Gesture (with illustration)

Jürgen Weber

Benares (Banāras, Vārāṇasī)

1. The northern Indian city of Benares (in Sanskrit, Vārāṇasī), in the federal state of Uttar Pradesh, is one of the most important Hindu places of → pilgrimage. With a population of 920,000 (1991), it lies, like so many other Indian cities of pilgrimage, on the bank of a river, the Ganges. The bathing areas in places of pilgrimage, like the places themselves, are called fords (tīrtha). The fords here favor the transition to other 'forms of being.' Benares's eminent status among Indian cities of pilgrimage is a function of its special site on the Ganges. The river flows northward along a bend, skirting the city, and the rising sun can be seen over the opposite bank, which is not built up. All along the Benares waterfront are steps (ghat); on these, worshipers approach the river. → Water is an essential element of Hindu ritual. The water of the sacred River Ganges, personified in Hindu mythology as the goddess Ganga, is considered the ritually purest water in existence: its source is in the skies, whence it flows upon the head of Shiva, and finally, channeled by the god's wild hair, that of an ascetic, pours down on the earth. In this water, the Hindu population of the city, along with the large number of pilgrims that come here, carry out their ritual ablutions. Water is also a characteristic element of the entire city area, which is dotted with countless constructed ponds and temple pools.

In Hindu belief, Benares is also the city of a fated, but redeeming, death. Anyone lodging within the sacred areas of the city at death is liberated from the endless cycle of rebirths (saṃsāra), and the picture of bodies being

F.D.2005
Panchakroshi Street
Panchakroshi Street
Varan
Sanskrit University
Varana Sangam
Sanctuary of the Mouth of the River
Omkareshvara Temple
Starting point of a procession
(Ganges)
Ganga
Temple of Mother India
(Bharat Mata)
Chowk
(Market quarter)
Temple of Madhyameshvara
(Lord of the Middle) Shiva Linga in the center of the Panchakroshi procession street
Alamgir-/Auranzgeb Mosque
"Golden Temple" of Vishveshvara/Vishvanatha
(Shiva, Lord of the World)
Gyangapi Mosque
Dashashvamedha Ghat (central bathing station)
Kedareshvara Temple
Starting point of a procession
Harishchandra Ghat
Asi Sangam, Sanctuary of the Mouth of the River Temple of Durga, called the "Monkey Temple" Asi
Sankat Mochan, Temple of the Monkey God Hanuman
Ganga (Ganges)
Panchakroshi Street
Ramnagar Street
Campus of the Benares
Hindu University
Ramnagar Site of the showing of the Ramayana
Epic [(Ramila)]
Ram Nagar Fort
(Residence of the Maharaja)
BENARES
Kund (Temple pool)
Shiva Linga Sanctuary
Temple of Devi (goddess)
Temple of Vishnu
Temple of Ganesha
Temple of Bhairava (a form of Shiva)
Temple of Surya (Sun God) Corpse-burning point Mosque
Area of paved bathing stations

"Rama's Game," the Rāmlīlā, following its version in the Indian epic Rāmāyaṇa, is presented on a boat in the Ganges at Benares. Seated in the center of the picture is the main figure of the epic, royal prince Rama, regarded as the incarnation of Vishnu. To his left sits his wife Sītā, and to his right his brother Lakshman. The three are surrounded by three of their allies, members of the army led by monkey god Hanuman. Young men present the figures. Unlike the renowned month-long presentation under the sponsorship of the ruling Maharaja in the Ramagar Quarter, the producers here are the quarter committees of Benares. They vie with the Ramagar production over the more magnificent presentation of the scenes. (J. Gengnagel) ritually cremated on the bank and their ashes strewn in the river is a familiar one.

History

2. Little is known of the city's early history. From the sixth to the third century BCE, Benares was the capital of the tribal kingdom of Kāśī, and that name ("City of Light") is still frequently used for it today. The city developed into an important locale of upper class, Brahman, courtly culture, along with traditional erudition. Numerous religious traditions and orders have maintained their seats in Benares to our own day. The city is an important meeting point for wandering ascetics (→ Sadhu). During the era of Muslim domination, the city underwent devastation numerous times, beginning in the twelfth century, and culminating in the destruction of important large temples under Aurangzeb in the seventeenth century. Thus, no religious structures remain intact from the time before Aurangzeb. The mosques, sometimes erected on sacred Hindu sites, today represent a considerable potential for conflict, as they do in Ayodhya, as well.

Myths and Cults

3. Benares is the city of Shiva, who appears in the "Golden Temple" as 'Lord of the Universe' (Viśveśara, Viśvanātha). In view of the historical events referred to above, the city disposes of not merely one religious center, but is full of temples, sanctuaries, and shrines, whose meaning varies by season, festal calendar, and sacred procession. Besides sanctuaries dedicated to Shiva, there are temples of Vishnu, places for the veneration of female divinities, temples of Brahma, Hanumān, Ganesha, and the Sun God. Thus, the area covered by the city represents the whole pantheon of Hindu gods. This number and complexity are expressed in the city's various processional routes. Traversing a specific area, believers tread its sacred fields or zones (kṣetra) before going on to the next area. The spectrum of processional paths ranges from the great, five-day route through the city, with its 108 stations (pañcakrośiyātrā), and the walk around the three northern (oṃkāreśvara), central (viśveśvara), and southern (kedāreśvara) districts of the city; to the abbreviated route, which unites all of the stations of the great route in one place (a temple).[1] The city's major festival is held in the part of the city called Ramnagar, which is also the residence of the Maharaja of Benares. Before as many as 100,000 spectators, "Rama's game," the Rāmlīlā, is celebrated, according to its presentation in a poetical appendix to the Sanskrit epic Rāmāyaṇā, for thirty days, at various little theaters. The presenters are children and young persons, who themselves become gods for the celebration, and as such are shown divine reverence (→ God/Gods/The Sacred). As patron and sponsor of the religious drama, the Maharaja is present, seated on his elephant. Since the eighteenth century, the maharajas have used the cult of Rama for the religious legitimization of their rule.

European Reception

4. The outer aspect of Benares is strongly marked by the aesthetics and exotic elements of the foreign and the 'utterly other.' Numberless illustrations and films depict bathers in the Ganges, bizarre wandering ascetics, and locations for the funeral cremation of bodies. A corpse's funeral becomes the symbol of a culture different from that of Christian tradition, and its unfamiliarity, otherness, and inapproachability are manifested precisely in the places where bodies are cremated. The focus on dealing with → death, with the dead, and with the extended families of the dead in Benares is portrayed, in a form that shows the religiosity of the city almost in its entirety, in Robert Gardner's film, "Forest of Bliss" (1986), which is entirely without dialogue or subtitles; or Josef Winkler's meticulously exact, diary-like description of Benares's fiery funerals (Winkler 1996).

1. Gutschow/Michaels 1993, 102-144.

Literature

Eck, Diana L., Banares: City of Light, New York 1982; Gutschow, Niels/Michaels, Axel, Benares. Tempel und religiöses Leben in der heiligen Stadt der Hindus, Cologne 1993; Kapur, Anuradha, Actors, Pilgrims, Kings and Gods: The Ramlila at Ramnaga, Calcutta 1990; Parry, Jonathan P., Death in Benares, Cambridge 1994; Singh, Rana P. B. (ed.), Banāras (Vārāṇasī): Cosmic Order, Sacred City, Hindu Traditions, Varanasi 1993 (with extensive bibliography).

Belletristic Work: Winkler, Josef, Domra. Am Ufer des Ganges, Frankfurt/M. 1996.

→ Buddhism, Death and Dying, Funeral, Hinduism, Pilgrimage, Polytheism, Reincarnation

Jörg Gengnagel

Bible

Name

1. The name 'Bible' comes from the name of the city Byblos, the most important transshipment port for Egyptian papyrus on the eastern coast of the Levant. From this name the word biblion is derived—the Greek word for the written page of papyrus, as well as for the scroll or → book which it composes. The plural, bíblia, usually meant all sacred and liturgical books, and was adopted by the Christians restrictively, as the name denoting their canonical writings. Now it could be used in Latin as a singular: biblia, 'the book,' simply, the 'book of books' or 'writing of writings,' sacred scripture. Today, 'Bible' is used to denote the books of the Old and New Testaments in their entirety. The Bible comprises the whole → canon of the Christian churches—Christianity's sacred scripture.

2. Designation and differentiation alike are relevant for the history of religions, in that this 'Holy Writ' incorporates the Bible of the first Christians—the Jewish or Hebrew Bible. This was specified as the 'Old Testament' only after the Church had withdrawn from Judaism. The reception of these books in the canon—despite Marcion—and the arrangement of the freshly appeared New Testament writings following the Jewish Bible in the sacred book, testifies to the fact that it was in this Jewish Bible that the Church saw the foundations of Christianity.[1] The Bible's influence on the civilization and culture not only of Judaism and Christianity, but of the entire world, is unsurpassed in degree and duration by any other written work. It spans all areas of life, and extends its concerns to all spiritual occupations, namely, those of philosophy and the arts.[2]

The Formation of the Canon

3. The content and order of the writings in the Bible vary. Various formations of the canon do not receive certain writings, and others assess and arrange them differently.

As late as the twentieth century, the Bible was the book for Protestants, a family heirloom for use every evening. It was also used to record important events in the family history. Thanks to translations into one's own language, 'God's word' can reach persons directly, but it calls for 'study' in its entirety, and is read from cover to cover in the family circle. Beginning in 1685, the French Reformed, the Huguenots, suffered persecution at the hands of the Catholic majority. Then the possession of a Bible was as dangerous as it was indispensable, since it was proof of their Protestant confession. Miniature editions were therefore printed, which could readily be hidden during a search. (Christoph Auffarth)

a) The Hebrew Bible/Old Testament was composed originally in Hebrew, except for a few chapters of Ezra and Daniel (composed in Aramaic). It contains thirty-nine books, which are divided into three parts: (1) the Law (Torah), (2) the Prophets (Nebi'im), and (3) the Writings (Ketubim). The initial letters of these sections form the Hebrew word TNK (Tanakh), with which Jews designate the Hebrew canon in its totality. The formation of the canon occurred successively, in a process. Part 1 was closed in the fourth century BCE, part 2 in the second century BCE, and part 3 circa 100 CE. The basic tripartite arrangement of these scriptures was first explicitly referred to in the foreword composed by the grandson of Jesus Sirach for the Greek translation of his grandfather's wisdom book in 132 BCE: "The Law, the Prophets, and the other writings." The names of these three parts are cited for the Jewish Bible in exactly the same way by the Evangelists, and by ancient authors such as Philo and Josephus. Evidently neither the name, nor indeed the extent, of the third part had been fully established by this time. The canon was not closed by the time of the events of the New Testament (although there was a surprisingly fixed tradition of some biblical books, as the evidence from → Qumran reveals). It was established only around 100 CE, with the omission of important writings from the wisdom and apocalyptic literature, possibly precisely because of the proximity of their dates to those of newly arisen Christianity. These, however, were to be found in the Greek translation of the Bible that had appeared at Alexandria. The so-called Letter of Aristeas transmits the legend of the convocation of seventy-two Jewish scholars by Egyptian King Ptolemy II Philadelphos (283–247 BCE), who enjoined upon them the task of translating the Jewish Bible for his renowned library. The Jewish community of Alexandria endorsed the project, stipulating the canonical formula, "Nothing adding, nothing altering, nothing omitting." This solemn formulation, endorsing a kind of 'prize essay' on the part of Judaism and Jerusalem, evidently bears on the legitimization of the Septuagint as superior to the other Greek translations available, and as solemnly sanctioned by the community for use in the liturgy. The writings contained only in the Septuagint (and in the Latin Vulgate) were seen by the Eastern and Western churches as 'deuterocanonical.' Martin → Luther excluded them from the Reformation canon, in his humanistic regard for the revered canon of Hebraica veritas, considered the original canon. They were tolerated as 'apocryphal,' however, and might be read for mere edification. (Luther: "These are books not altogether regarded as belonging to Sacred Scripture, and yet they are good, and of utility to read.") Even today they are appended to the Hebrew canon only in exceptional cases. The Catholic tradition, on the other hand, at Trent, decided to retain them, and thus they are regularly found in Catholic versions. Some further writings, not attributed to the canon even in early Christian times, were never received into the Bible. These latter compositions are reckoned as apocryphal (hidden, inauthentic) or 'pseudepigraphic' (pseudonymous). The Hebrew Bible writings testify to God's dealings with humanity from the creation of the world to the return from the Babylonian Captivity or the Maccabean struggle against Hellenism (to 135 BCE).

b) The New Testament contains twenty-seven writings, beginning with four testimonials on the words and deeds, life and death, of Jesus Christ (the Gospels), which are followed by a book on the beginnings of the early communities (Acts of the Apostles), letters to various communities and

Some religions—as here in a Jewish community in New York, with a Hassidic Hungarian background—keep to old forms of books and book productions. The picture shows a professional Torah-scribe in his workshop, diligently mending Torah scrolls made of leather to be used in synagogue.

Christians of the first and second centuries CE, and an → apocalypse. The churches today regard the history of the Bible's origin as somewhat settled. The Bible is not a book written in heaven, or at God's literal dictation ('verbal inspiration'). It exists thanks to human beings whose writings are judged to be 'sacred scripture' and 'God's word.' Thus, the books of the Old Testament were composed for various reasons, and only later collected for regular use (formation of a canon), in an anything but uniform process, while others were excluded (Apocrypha, Pseudepigrapha).

4. The (indirect) role of the Bible in the missionary evangelization of Europe, the Christianization of the West, is all but impossible to exaggerate. The clergy devoted themselves to the task of administrating the Bible, or practicing religion, ritual, and the sacraments with the Bible in hand. Until well into the twentieth century the Catholic Church maintained Latin as the language of the Church and of the Bible, and this made Latin the (scholarly) language of all Europe. A like influence was exercised by Luther's translation of the Bible. With the creation of the language of the German Bible, that became the language of every place where German was spoken. The Bible was an inexhaustible source of quotations and proverbs. By way of the inculcation of literacy in a focus that bore on the Bible—especially in the monasteries, the centers of culture and education—the Bible exerted great influence everywhere, even on painting and sculpture. For a long time, the principal content of popular education was essentially knowledge of the Bible. From the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries, in manuscripts and printed works alike, we find a very particular type of book, the Biblia pauperum ("Bible of the poor"), intended to call the message of the Biblical books to the reader's mind, especially the narrative material of the Old Testament, in a manner easy to grasp. But since it obviously presupposed an ability to read the Latin text, and a minimum of theological knowledge, it was not actually 'for the poor,' but rather for scholars and clergy. The churches of the Reformation saw it as their task to acquaint their communities with the Bible. Luther desired to have a daily, continuous reading and explanation of the Bible at divine service morning and evening. In Zurich, Zwingli created the so-called Prophezei, a specific study of scripture for clerics and students, in the High Choir of the Great Cathedral. With secularization, the Bible has become one book among others. Since the eighteenth century, in European churches and in America, Bible Societies have been founded, which take up the task of spreading the text of the Bible worldwide.

Bible and New Media

5. In our times, the electronic publication of books and bibles is of growing importance. Voluminous Bible software programs serve various functions, providing for a synoptic study of the biblical texts in their original languages, Hebrew/Aramaic and Greek, and, at the same time, supplying translations in a number of foreign languages. Over the Internet, texts and translation aids are offered on-line, being connected with interactive functions that serve study or proclamation. These efforts also show how complicated and problematic it can be to 'translate' the Bible into the age of multimedia.

1. Zenger et al. 1996, 12-21.
2. Kindlers Neues Literatur Lexikon, vol. 23, Munich 1992.
3. Bächtold-Staubli, Hanns et al. (eds.), Handwörterbuch des deutschen Aberglaubens 1 (1987), 1211-1219.

Literature

Conzelmann, Hans/Lindemann, Andreas, Interpreting the New Testament: An Introduction to the Principles and Methods of N.T. Exegesis, Peabody 1988; Gabel, John B. et al., The Bible as Literature: An Introduction, New York [4]2000; Kautzsch, Emil (ed.), Die Apokryphen und Pseudepigraphen des Alten Testaments, Tübingen 1900; Mack, Burton L., Who Wrote the New Testament? The Making of the Christian Myth, New York 1995; Riches, John, The Bible: A Very Short Introduction, Oxford 2000; Sæbø, Magne (ed.), Hebrew Bible, Old Testament: The History of Its Interpretation, vol. I: From the Beginnings to the Middle Ages (until 1300); vol. II: The Middle Ages, Göttingen 1996ff.; Trebolle Barrera, Julio, The Jewish Bible and the Christian Bible: An Introduction to the History of the Bible, Leiden etc. 1998; Zenger, Erich et al. (eds.), Einleitung in das Alte Testament, Stuttgart [2]1996.

→ Antiquity, Book, Canon, Christianity, Film, Judaism, Literature, Reception

Andreas Reichert

Bioethics

Need of a Bioethical Orientation

Bioethics is one of the main fields of interdisciplinary applied ethics. Its aim is to gain a normative understanding of the scope and limits of human interference with nature, including human life. As an academic discipline, but also as an area of public as well as institutionalized reflection, bioethics proper began to establish itself in the 1960s. Undesirable consequences of industrial and technological developments, along with the generation of ever-new methods for intervening with human and nonhuman life in the fields of biology and medicine were the driving forces behind its emergence. The indisputable prospects of being able to lengthen our life span and improve our quality of life must be weighed against potentially undesirable side effects or irreversible long-term harm to human life and nature. Furthermore, irrespective of what consequences biotechnological developments might have, one must ask whether all that is technologically feasible is also desirable and justifiable from an ethical point of view. The framework for human action originally defined by nature is being expanded at an ever increasing rate by the remarkably fast pace of scientific development. Confrontations with newly created options for human action are usually not governed by conventional normative systems of law and ethics, and in our pluralistic, secular societies, we no longer rely on religious conviction and ecclesiastical authority as unquestionable yardsticks for our choices and actions. The advent of bioethics is the response to this situation, characterized by a lack of normative orientation and the accompanying fear of an ethical and legal vacuum which could impact the welfare of the present and future generations.

Origins of Bioethics in Intellectual History

2. As early as 1927, the concept 'bio-ethics' was used to characterize the "assumption that there are moral obligations not only with regard to mankind, but with regard to all living beings." F. Jahr welcomes the process of gradually abolishing the strict distinction between beast and human being, which in his eye prevailed from the time when European culture began to develop until the end of the eighteenth century. For Jahr this transformation results from the emergence of a variety of new scientific theories and views (for example, the Darwinian → theory of evolution).[1] He also identifies important precursors of bioethics in the history of religion and philosophy, among them → Francis of Assisi and Romantic and post-Romantic philosophers who had come under the influence of Indian religion and philosophy (Herder, Schleiermacher, Krause, Schopenhauer, → Nietzsche, E. von Hartmann). The concept of bioethics did not establish itself until later, however. It was introduced in 1970/71 by the cancer researcher van Rensselaer Potter, whose aim was to promote "the formation of a new discipline, the discipline of Bioethics," which he called the "Bridge to the Future" and the "Science of Survival." According to him, bioethics implies a long-term project, the aim of which is to secure the survival and well-being of mankind, which must be adapted to its natural environment. In bridging the sterile gap between the 'two cultures'—the sciences and the humanities—, bioethics has the task of combining biological knowledge with knowledge of human value systems. For Potter, bioethics is compatible with religious pluralism. In 1971 the "Joseph and Rose Kennedy Institute for the Study of Human Reproduction and Bioethics" at the Georgetown University in Washington, D.C.—now called the Kennedy Institute of Ethics—was also founded. This act of institutionalization reduced the scope of the concept, making it equivalent with medical ethics. Unfortunately, this restriction in terminology is still prevalent today.

Object and Scope of Bioethics

3. In the last thirty years, bioethics has been differentiated into a multiplicity of 'area-specific ethics.' Apart from medical ethics, there is ethics of genetics, animal ethics, ethics of nature, ecological ethics and even a neuroethics. The concepts are not always consistently used, however, and in some cases, the goals set by these area-specific ethics and the understanding we have of them conflict. Many of the problems mentioned above can be attributed to an exaggerated anthropocentrism, which regards nature only as an instrument of human interests, thus turning it into an object of ruthless exploitation. Accordingly, one important focus of the bioethical debate is the search for alternatives for action that can be given an ethical foundation. As regards the question as to who or what the object of our moral consideration ('moral patients') should be, four positions are presently under discussion: (1) a moderate anthropocentrism, which regards the conservation and preservation of nature as crucial for maintaining it as a basis of human existence, as a source of the human being's aesthetic experience, a shelter and a school of sensitivity; (2) a pathocentrism, which views all beings susceptible of experiencing pain and pleasure as having a value in themselves, i.e. as having an 'inherent value,' or that considers them worthy of protection for their own sake; (3) a biocentrism, which regards all life as worthy of protection and conservation for its own sake; and (4) holism or physiocentrism, which extends this principle to the totality of nature. In philosophy and theology, there are strong tendencies to question the human being's claim to mastery over nature, which is derived from his endowment with reason. In these disciplines, powerful arguments are made for holding up our obligation to be considerate of living beings beyond the limits of the human species. Efforts are also being stepped up to find alternatives to experiments on animals. The way of thinking which informs such convictions and efforts characterizes Albert Schweitzer's ethics of reverence for life as well as those positions held by Christian theology which have been influenced by him. This way of thinking is also found in approaches indebted to completely different philosophical traditions (T. Regan, P. Singer, P. W. Taylor, U. Wolf, J.-C. Wolf, O. Höffe). In light of today's factory farming, not only torture of animals, but also the killing of animals has become an issue for reflection (→ Vegetarianism). It is important to emphasize that the aim of animal ethics is not to lower the status of human beings, but rather to elevate that of animals. Whether and to what extent this aim can be reached by applying the concept of the 'dignity of the creature' is a matter of heated controversy (Baranzke, Teutsch). According to Hans Jonas, the dignity of animals and living beings in general is an assumption which is underpinned by the Darwinian theory of descent. Darwinism, which "turns out to have been a thoroughly dialectical event,"[2] is now being investigated in terms of the ramifications it has for animal ethics.

Bioethical Approaches in the Religions

4. Among the various religions, there is no animal ethics (→ Animal) or ethics of nature which is universally subscribed to. The human being in its relation to nature is essentially shaped by the respective ideas of the divine and its relationship to the human being and to nature. There are great differences among (1) religions which are founded on theism and belief in a personal God (Judaism, Christianity, Islam), (2) the Eastern religions (Hinduism, Jainism, Buddhism) and (3) 'nature religions.' Within these various types of religions, there are differences as well. In the first three religions named above (those belonging to the first group cited), the privileged position of human beings as solicitous guardians and trustees of creation—a position bestowed upon them by God—has often enough been interpreted as warranting an exploitative relation to the defenseless creature. At the same time, in the course of the reception of ancient Greek philosophy, especially since the period of → scholasticism, the question of nature or the natural state has remained a subject of ethical reflection. In the Eastern religions, concepts like that of an all-embracing vital power, of → reincarnation and of rebirth, or of cyclical appearance and disappearance define the relationship between human beings and nature. From the perspective of these religions, actions such as tormenting and killing animals or showing disrespect for vegetative life generally meet with stronger disapproval than they do in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Some Jains bind cloth before their mouths and noses, lest they unintentionally kill a living being by inhaling or swallowing it (→ Hinduism). Similarly, in both Hinduism and Buddhism there are taboos against killing or mistreating animals. In the 'nature religions,' natural phenomena are usually personified as gods or spirits, and gods, spirits, human beings, and animals are often not clearly distinguished from one another; thus transformations are deemed to be possible. The undeniable necessity of reorienting ourselves in our relationship to animals confronts us with the task of defining our position within nature out of regard for the rest of nature and the weal and woe of living beings. In doing so, we do not have the option of making nature-in-itself the norm and model for our behavior, however.

Fields of Applied Bioethics

5. Human biology and human medicine belong to the most discussed subjects of bioethics. The spectacular success of transplantation and reproductive medicine, genetics, molecular biology, and → genetic engineering not only raises hopes; it also poses difficult problems and generates fear of misuse. The unraveling of the human genetic code and the development of gene testing enable us to make predictive genetic diagnoses for a number of diseases and to identify propensities for diseases. Thus, individuals have the prospect of being able to shape their lives accordingly, with the help of careful family planning. It must be kept in mind that such tests are not always reliable, however. The use of these tests by employers or by insurance companies can lead to discrimination. Moreover there are serious diseases which can be predicted by gene testing, but for which no therapies are—as yet, in any case—available. The advent of in-vitro fertilization as a means of treating infertility has opened up the way for other applications, such as pre-implantation diagnosis, embryonic stem cell research, germline therapy, and cloning (→ Genetic Engineering). A special challenge to biomedical ethics lies in the potential or already implemented networking of discrete technologies. If a risk-pregnancy is expected, pre-implantation diagnosis makes it possible to detect and predict serious diseases of the embryo in vitro, i.e. before the embryo is even implanted in the uterus. In most cases this enables the potential future mother to avoid an induced abortion of the embryo or fetus in vivo after a prenatal diagnosis has been made at a much later point in the embryo's or fetus's development. Since these technologies involving embryos in vitro imply the selection and destruction of embryos, highly controversial, ethical questions arise as concerns the moral status of the cells being examined and of the embryo in vitro, the potential misuse of pre-implantation diagnosis and the threat of discrimination against and stigmatization of persons with handicaps in our societies (→ Eugenics). As opposed to somatic genetic therapy, germ-line therapy—a procedure not yet developed for use in the treatment of human beings—involves a genetic alteration of the embryo, inheritable by future offspring, which is carried out at the earliest possible stage of development. Current estimates predict, however, that the failure rate for germ-line therapy would be very high, at least initially. Therefore this technique raises the question of its principal justifiability and therapeutic status. The act of procreating human beings who 'verify' or 'falsify' the quality of technology by their very existence violates human dignity. Human and personal dignity, genetic and individual identity, as well as the instrumentalization of the human being, are also issues of discussion that are raised in debates on human cloning, be it research cloning, reproductive cloning or so-called 'therapeutic' cloning. This issue gives rise to a variety of ethical problems as well, depending on the nature of particular technologies and what one intends to use them for (Honnefelder et al. 2003). In the context of transplantation medicine, xenotransplantation as a potential technology of the future is highly controversial as well (Schicktanz). Xenotransplantation poses the risk of infection and also causes other problems, which might have a detrimental affect on human beings. In the face of these risks for humans, concerns arising from the perspective of animal ethics (transgenetic manipulation of animals, farming, keeping animals under unfit conditions, and the functionalization of animals as 'substitute-parts banks') weigh even more, because it is doubtful whether animal organs can perform vital functions for patients. Such controversies show that anthropological considerations, considerations based on the philosophy of nature, and the philosophy of the natural sciences as well as issues raised by the individual sciences themselves are essential elements of bioethics. As such, they weigh just as much as does the discussion of fundamental principles, norms, and values. Moreover, these discussions show that bioethics increasingly fulfills a prospective function, anticipating chances and risks of future technologies instead of limping behind already implemented technologies. As the task of bioethics does not exhaust itself in providing 'recipes' for the solution of problematic cases, the term 'application-oriented' ethics is more appropriate than the widely used term 'applied ethics.'

Bioethics and the Public

6. In this context, an important political aspect of bioethics comes into view. Bioethics is not an exclusively academic discipline, nor is it purely philosophical or theological. It is practiced in a public framework. The advent of ethics councils on the national and international level as well as the numerous reports, opinions, declarations, and recommendations on various subjects which have been and continue to be publicized indicate the important functions which bioethics fulfill in our societies as concerns present-day political decision-making processes.

1. Jahr, Fritz, "Bio = Ethik: Eine Umschau über die ethischen Beziehungen des Menschen zu Tier und Pflanze," in: Kosmos 24 (1927), 2.
2. Jonas, Hans, The Phenomenon of Life: Towards a Philosophical Biology, Evanston 2001, 58.

Literature

Baranzke, H., "Würde der Kreatur"? Die Idee der Würde im Horizont der Bioethik, Würzburg 2002; Beauchamp, T. L./Childress, J. F., Principles of Biomedical Ethics, New York/Oxford [5]2001 ([1]1979); Bioethics 1 (1987)ff.; Casabona, C. M. R. (ed.), Los Xenotrasplantes. Aspectos científicos, éticos y jurídicos, Granada 2002; Desai, P. N., "Medical Ethics in India," in: The Journal of Medicine and Philosophy 13/1 (1988), 231-255; Engelhardt, H. T., The Foundations of Bioethics, New York/Oxford 1986; Engels, E.-M., "The Moral Status of Animals in the Discussions on Xenotransplantation," in: Revista de Derecho y Genoma Humano/Law and the Human Genome Review 13, July–Dec. (2000), 165-181 (Part I); 14, January–June (2001), 183-203 (Part II); Environmental Ethics 1 (1979)ff.; Eubios: Journal of Asian and Int. Bioethics 1 (1991)ff.; Feldman, D. M.: Marital Relations, Birth Control and Abortion in Jewish Law, New York 1968; Haker, H./Beyleveld, D. (eds.), The Ethics of Genetics in Human Procreation, Burlington etc. 2000; Hastings Center Report 1 (1971)ff.; Hildt, E./Mieth, D. (eds.), In Vitro Fertilisation in the 1990s: Towards a Medical, Social and Ethical Evaluation, Burlington etc., reprint 1999 (1st ed. 1998); Honnefelder, L./Lanzerath, D. (eds.), Klonen in biomedizinischer Forschung und Reproduktion. Wissenschaftliche Aspekte—Ethische, rechtliche und gesellschaftliche Grenzen / Cloning in Biomedical Research and Reproduction. Scientific Aspects—Ethical, Legal and Social Limits, Bonn 2003; Jonas, H., The Imperative of Responsibility: In Search of an Ethics for the Technological Age, Chicago 1995; Jonsen, A. R., The Birth of Bioethics: New York etc. 1998; Keown, D., Buddhism and Bioethics, New York/London 1995; Keown, D./Prebish, Ch./Husted, W., Buddhism and Human Rights, Richmond 1998; Müller, D./Poltier, H. (eds.), La dignité de l'animal, Geneva 2000; Nationaler Ethikrat (German National Ethics Council) (ed.), Der Umgang mit vorgeburtlichem Leben in anderen Kulturen (The attitudes of other cultures to prenatal life). Tagungsdokumentation, Hamburg 2004; Potter, van Rensselaer, "Bioethics, the Science of Survival," in: Perspectives in Biology and Medicine 14/1 (1970), 127-153; Idem, Bioethics: Bridge to the Future, Englewood Cliffs 1971; Idem, Global Bioethics, East Lansing 1988; Regan, T., The Case for Animal Rights, Berkeley 1985 ([1]1983); Reich, W. T., "The Word 'Bioethics': The Struggle Over Its Earliest Meanings," in: Kennedy Institute of Ethics Journal Vol. 5/1 (1995), 19-34; Rispler-Chaim, V., Islamic Medical Ethics in the Twentieth Century, Leiden etc. 1993; Schicktanz, S., Organlieferant Tier? Medizin- und tierethische Probleme der Xenotransplantation, Frankfurt/M. 2002; Singer, P., Practical Ethics, 2nd ed. 1993; Taylor, P. W., Respect for Nature: A Theory of Environmental Ethics, Princeton 1986; Teutsch, G. M., Lexikon der Umweltethik, Göttingen/Düsseldorf 1985; Idem, Mensch und Tier. Lexikon der Tierschutzethik, Göttingen 1987; Idem, "Würde der Kreatur". Erläuterungen zu einem neuen Verfassungsbegriff am Beispiel des Tieres, Bern etc. 1995; The President's Council on Bioethics: Human Cloning and Human Dignity. An Ethical Inquiry, Washington, DC 2002; Wolf, J.-C., Tierethik. Neue Perspektiven für Tiere und Menschen, Freiburg, Schweiz 1992; Wolf, U., Das Tier in der Moral, Frankfurt/M. 1990.

→ Animal, Environmentalism, Ethics/Morals, Eugenics, Euthanasia/Assisted Suicide, Genetic Engineering, Nature, Science, Vegetarianism

I would like to thank Dr. Susan Nurmi-Schomers for the translation from German into English.

Eve-Marie Engels

Biography / Autobiography

General

1. The concept, 'biography' (Gk., 'description of a life'), is not a univocal one. It is the name for inscriptions on ancient tombstones and for literary or scientific presentations of the entire life of a well-known person. The concept of biographical writing also includes shorter life-descriptions (vitae; pl. of Lat. vita, 'life'), memoirs, and autobiographies. Biographical writing is closely tied to given conceptualizations of individuality. In function of a particular historical or cultural context, a biography can either show homogeneous, exemplary traits, intended as normative, or present a sketch of an individual life. Autobiography is usually understood as a special form of biography: The description of a writer's own life frequently crosses over into the portrayal of another life. An autobiography is the cohesive report of the life of an actually existing person, who has arrived at the twilight of life, and who undertakes to create a written record of that life. Such an essay will attempt to show the writer's life in both its public and private aspects, and its purpose will be to show 'the way things really were.' Thus, it is often composed in the style of an apologia.

2. With the Greeks, biography appears as early as the fourth century BCE, and comes forward as a literary genre of its own. Christian biography arises in the fourth century CE, and consists in the vitae of saints. An example would be Athanasius's "Life of Saint Anthony." In the Middle Ages, as well, along with the vitae of the popes (liber pontificalis), hagiographies or legends of the saints were the prevailing forms of biography. Examples of medieval forms of biography are the vitae composed in the vernacular by Beguins of the twelfth and early thirteenth centuries. These are to be ranged in the genre of affective and mystical writing (→ Mysticism). In Islam, a biographical literature mainly concerned with the life of the Prophet → Muhammad enters the scene quite early. The first comprehensive biography of the Prophet is Ibn Ishaq's Sira (Arab., 'biography'), at hand a mere 150 years after Muhammad's death in an edition by Ibn Hisam, and this version still exists today as a classic of Islamic Arabic literature. In Shiite Islam, religious biographical literature concerns itself with persons of the Prophet's family as well.

Islamic Biography of the Prophet

Biographies in Modern Times

In modern times, biographies are usually devoted to the careers of scholars, artists, and rulers, and direct their main attention away from these persons' public life to their private self-realization: their interest is more keenly psychological. But it holds true for them as well that the life is described—usually in a chronological presentation—teleologically: they are composed with an intent or purpose. The thrust of secularization since the → Renaissance grew stronger in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In England, Isaac Walton (1593–1683) composed the life of theologian Richard Hooker, as well as those of the two religious poets John Donne (1640) and George Herbert (1670), at times modeling his biographical production on religious patterns such as the legends of the saints: George Herbert's life is styled on the model of → Francis of Assisi. Even a citizen can now become an example of a life of right behavior (see Boswell's Life of Johnson, 1791). The nineteenth century stands altogether under the sign of the great individual biography (e.g., W. Dilthey's Schleiermacher, 1870). An example of a biographical novel with a religious subject is Pope Joan (1866), by Greek writer E. Roidis. His reworking of the legend of the female pope Johannes Angelicus underwent repeated literary variation (by, for instance, Boccaccio, R. Borchardt, A. von Arnim).

In the twentieth century, biographica turned against the cult of great personalities, that favorite theme of the nineteenth century. An intensified psychologizing was now in evidence, a mixture of scholarship and art, as in Hermann Hesse's biographical novel Siddhartha. Alongside this phenomenon there developed a type of novel in a style of biographical history, as in Robert Grave's I, Claudius (1934). In many twentieth-century biographies and biographical novels, typical characteristics of biographical writing, such as chronology, continuity, and teleology, for instance, are bid farewell.

Autobiography

3. Considered formally, the autobiography is expressly heterogeneous and open in comparison with other autobiographical styles, such as memoirs, self-portraits, reports (Lat., res gestae, 'deeds accomplished'), and diaries. But autobiographies are frequently more self-reflective and more fictional than, for instance, memoirs, and unlike diaries, can present connections and contexts that span a whole life.

For long, autobiography was regarded as a straightforward report of things as they actually occurred, and an expression of an individual's 'inmost being.' Since the early 1980s, however, researchers' interest has shifted to authorship of an autobiography as a means of self-stylization and self-invention. Even the criterion of forthrightness, long an established component of any definition of autobiography, is closely scrutinized today. The authorship of an autobiographical text rests on a selection of experiences drawn from life, and on → memory, of which Henri Bergson has spoken as a never-ending act of interpretation. Memory is not objective, then; rather, an autobiography continuously reshapes the past through → language. We discern this in the self-presentations of the Puritans (→ Protestantism), which are produced in a discourse of interiority and self-examination. John Bunyan's spiritual autobiography Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners (1666), which reports the journey of his soul to God, is not a mere agreeable presentation of self, but a pitiless piercing of self, and strictly follows the schema of the → conversion report with its four stages: spiritual blindness is followed by the calling, and by its accompanying experience of rebirth; then come fears and doubts, and finally, temptations, since salvation is never sure but in heaven. → Gandhi's autobiography documents the religious autobiography in a non-Western context.

Part Played by Religion in the Appearance of the Autobiography

4. Autobiographies have not existed always and everywhere, their existence being supported by necessary conditions. G. Gusdorf views the autobiography as a belated phenomenon of Western culture, materializing when Christian thought penetrated classical traditions. The first autobiography of the West is considered to be the Confessions of → Augustine (397), which are directed by a religious interest and a character of avowal, and which govern autobiographical writing into the eighteenth century. In the Middle Ages, an autobiographical character is demonstrated in the literature of vitae and of revelation, mystical texts (Henry Suso's Vita, 1327), and the letters of Abelard and Heloise (1135). The Revelations of Julian of Norwich (1342–c. 1416) serve as an example of religious and mystical autobiography in the Middle Ages. The text reports Julian's life-threatening illness (from 1373), her visions, and her healing. The climax of the visions is the unio mystica ('mystical union') of her soul with Christ.

Secular Forms of the Autobiography

In the Renaissance, the emergence of a sense of history, the feeling of the human being's new freedom from metaphysical bonds, and the accompanying thrust to individuality, afford an essential impulse for the appearance of secular autobiographical manners of writing. Along with Benvenuto Cellini's famous Vita, Girolamo Cardano's De vita propria (written 1575/6, published 1643) is usually regarded as the most important autobiography of the Renaissance, as Cardano introduced a psychological self-evaluating into the genre. In the eighteenth century, Jean-Jacques Rousseau bequeathed his celebrated Confessions (1782–1789), equally apologetical and indicting, and they have become the pattern for numerous subsequent autobiographies. Along with Augustine's Confessions and Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Dichtung und Wahrheit ("Poetry and Truth," 1811–1832), they belong to the classics of the genre. In the autobiographical texts of the nineteenth century, the pattern of an individual's educational history, characteristic of the biography, is retained (e.g., Edward Gibbon's Memoirs, 1789). Autobiographies of the twentieth century demonstrate a loss of authentic → identity, continuity, and autonomy, which finds expression in the fragmentary character of autobiographical texts.

Literature

Biography: Backscheider, Paula R., Reflections of Biography, Oxford 1999; Batchelor (ed.), The Art of Literary Biography, Oxford 1995; Nadel, Ira B., Biography: Fiction, Fact and Form, London 1984; Stauffer, Donald, English Biography before 1700, Cambridge 1930; Wendorf, Richard, The Elements of Life: Biography and Portrait-Painting in Stuart and Georgian England, Oxford 1990.

Autobiography: Anderson, Linda, Autobiography, London 2001; Jelinek, Estelle C., The Tradition of Women's Autobiography, Boston 1986; Lejeune, Philippe, On Autobiography, Minneapolis 1989; Mayer, Thomas F./Woolf, D. R. (eds.), The Rhetorics of Life-Writing in Early Modern Europe, Ann Arbor 1995; Misch, Georg, A History of Autobiography in Antiquity, 2 vols., London 1950; Idem, Geschichte der Autobiographie, vol. IV.2 (Von der Renaissance bis zu den autobiographischen Hauptwerken des 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts), Frankfurt/M. 1969; Olney, James, Metaphors of the Self: The Meaning of Autobiography, Princeton 1972; Idem (ed.), Autobiography: Essays Theoretical and Critical, Princeton 1980. Pascal, Roy, Design and Truth in Autobiography, London 1960; Schulze, Winfried (ed.), Ego-Dokumente: Annäherung an den Menschen in der Geschichte, Berlin 1996; Sturrock, John, The Language of Autobiography, Cambridge 1993.

→ Augustine, Conversion, Francis of Assisi, History, Identity, Memory, Muhammad, Mysticism, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Protestantism, Secularization, Teleology, Tradition

Gabriele Rippl

Birth

1. 'Birth,' also known as confinement ('lying-in') or delivery (i.e., liberation) is often understood purely as a biological occurrence: the expulsion of a child from the uterus at the close of pregnancy. Over against this

An Aboriginal woman holds her grandchild in the smoke of the konkerberry tree, which symbolizes the spirit of the Earth Mother. Representing all of the women of her clan, the mother blesses the child at this ritual and sprinkles some of her own milk onto the fire. In many societies, fire or smoke serve to dispel spirits and demons, and to purify the child. Rites of purification often come at the conclusion of the phase after the birth.

reductionist view, birth can be conceptualized as a 'biosocial' event—a biological event imbedded in the social processes of an immediate or extended family, and whose form and process are specific to a particular culture. Birth is everywhere understood as an extraordinary event for the individual and the community, and as potentially dangerous for the mother and the child. An evaluation of this endangerment, however, and how it is dealt with, differs from society to society. By way of birth rituals, the biological occurrence becomes a social event, perhaps even a religious one. Such rituals are a symbolic mixture of, among other things, concrete behavioral prescriptions, a worldview, and magical cautionary measures.

In many religions, birth is an elemental metaphorical model of reception into the worshiping community—as, for example, in → baptism—or, also, a mythical model of the becoming of the world (cosmogony) and the human being (anthropogony). Frequently the birth model is linked with the concept of an antecedent symbolic death, and thus is found not only in particular → funeral rituals (→ Death), but in rites of initiation as well, in which a newborn or reborn being is expressed and presented symbolically (for instance, in the initiation of a shaman or Catholic ordination to the priesthood; → Charismatic Movements).

Assistance at Birth

2. In today's Western industrial societies, birth, like pregnancy and the postpartum phase, is primarily understood as a merely biological occurrence, to be coped with by medical means ('birth management'). Over centuries, with technological research and discoveries, assistance at birth has developed into a highly specialized, physician-dominated field of medical practice. Previously, practical help at birth was reserved to specialized women (midwives; lit., 'with-women,' women with women giving birth). Precisely this female knowledge about birth brought the birth helpers into danger: it was all too easy to ascribe to them any failures in case of complications or the fatal outcome of a birth: witness allegations of witchcraft (→ Witch/Persecution of Witches), or of the interchange of a normal infant with a monster (changeling).

3. Along with (pubertal) initiation, marriage, and death, birth is one of the four crises of the → life cycle, and is engaged by the individual and the community with traditional rituals (→ Initiation). For the woman, especially with her first child, the transition to motherhood is in the foreground, while with the child what is emphasized is the aspect of integration into the social group (immediate and extended family). It is usually the father who legitimates the newborn, through a social rite of acceptance, as for example in lifting the child from the earth (rite of the levatio) in ancient Rome.

Despite their multiplicity, birth rites exhibit common traits in traditional societies: Restrictions on nutrition and certain activities, or the ritual purification of mother and child after the birth event, are very common.

Rites of magical warding-off of fear accompany the child's first weeks: In the Mediterranean basin, for example, → amulets against the → evil eye are hung about the child.

The weeklong childbed, for the mother's physical recovery, is customary in many places. The paternal childbed ('couvade'), in certain Latin American societies, represents ritual compensation for the frequent absence of the father at the actual events surrounding the birth. Only exceptionally is the newborn initiated into religious communities. One such exception is Christian infant → baptism: Since the Middle Ages, in view of high infant mortality, children have been baptized as soon as possible after birth. This exception is the rule today with the large Christian confessions. → Baptists and other groups, of course, require a conscious decision on the part of the baptismal candidate, and advocate adult baptism exclusively. The baptismal rites of the various churches have frequently been explained in terms of the death of the sinful human being, and rebirth in the waters of baptism.

Birth Myths

4. Many myths present the birth of a god or special child as a desexualized—as it were, pure—occurrence. Thus, in ancient mythology, Adonis is born of a myrrh tree, and Athena springs full-panoplied from the head of her father, Zeus. For the founder of a religion, we may cite the Buddha, who sprang from the hip of his mother Maya. The Hebrew Bible too knows this concept: Eve was created from one of Adam's ribs. The denial of acknowledgment to the newborn, and refusal of acceptance into the social unit, is often reported in the tale of the birth of the hero-child, a tale frequently fantasized and embroidered, the child being exposed and then in a wondrous manner rescued (Moses, Oedipus, Romulus and Remus).

Birth Today

5. Since the 1950s, in Western industrial societies, hospital births are the rule. Medicine's success in minimizing maternal and infant mortality rates does reduce the fear associated with the 'risk' of birth, but an approach to birth as if it were a routine, machine-manageable illness creates an image of birth as a departure from 'normal' bodily processes. With their demands for a gentle, natural, or even home birth, women criticize this experience of alienation. As for appeals to birth practices in other societies, an untenable idealization of non-European cultures that one likes to characterize as 'close to nature' is, of course, the object of justifiable criticism.

Literature

Davis-Floyd, Robbie E./Sargent, Carolyn F. (eds.), Childbirth and Authoritative Knowledge: Cross-Cultural Perspectives, Berkeley 1997; Dundes, Lauren (ed.), The Manner Born: Birth Rites in Cross-Cultural Perspective, Walnut Creek 2003; Eliade, Mircea, Rites and Symbols of Initiation: The Mysteries of Birth and Rebirth, New York 1965 ([1]1958); Kay, Margarita Artschwager (ed.), Anthropology of Human Birth, Philadelphia 1982; Paige, Karen Ericksen/Paige, Jeffery M., The Politics of Reproductive Ritual, Berkeley 1981; von Zylinicki, Friedrich, Geburt. Eine Kulturgeschichte in Bildern, Baunschweig 1983.

→ Abortion/Contraception, Baptism, Baptists, Child/Childhood, Initiation, Life Cycle, Magic, Reincarnation, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Sabine Hensel

Blasphemy

Blasphemy (Gk., blasphemía, 'abuse' e.g., verbal; also 'abuse of God') is disparagement of God. The status of blasphemy is indicated in Jewish and Roman law themselves. It was adopted by the medieval imperial and canonical codes from Justinian's Novels 77 (c. 540 CE). The concept is marked by the European legal tradition, and, to a lesser degree, by the monotheistic notion of God. Its generalization is therefore not unproblematic. For the sake of a specification of the concept in religious studies, these origins are first rendered explicit,[1] and then abstract criteria are drawn up for purposes of comparison.[2]

Lèse-Majesté

1. The point of departure for blasphemy as a crime is the third of the Ten Commandments: "You shall not make wrongful use of the name of the Lord your God, for the Lord will not acquit anyone who misuses his name" (Exod 20:7). In order to avoid violating this commandment, Jews refrained from pronouncing the name of → God at all. Cursing, or any dishonoring of the name of God, was an assault upon God. As an offense against majesty (crimen laesae majestatis), Christianity and Islam widened the notion of blasphemy to include deviant interpretations of doctrine and the violation of religious dictates. For → Augustine, for example, scarcely any distinction obtains between blasphemy and heresy. In the Middle Ages, the imputation of offense against majesty was used as a weapon against heretics, although penalties varied broadly in degree from region to region: the spectrum ranged from fine to execution; the verdict was pronounced and sentence executed by secular and spiritual authorities alike. Through the influence of the Enlightenment, crime against religion replaced dishonor of God. Now the foundation has changed: inasmuch as law is understood as an instance of a democratically legitimated body politic, the protection of the laws applies only when an assault is mounted against the public peace or the individual's religious sentiments, and no longer when it is against the honor of God. The status of divine blasphemy

In an interesting reversal of positions, the modern artistic avant-garde develops religious traits out of blasphemous criticism of Christianity itself. The "Orgies Mysteries Theater" of Vienna activist Hermann Nitsch in Prinzendorf makes explicit use of Christian symbolism, often transformed in its opposite: crucifixion, slaughter of a steer, releasing of lambs from their pasture, defilement of Mass vestments with blood and excrement. Behind his overt concern to shock the bourgoisie, Nitsch's determination nonetheless predominates: to lead Christianity back to its pagan Dionysian origins, and to the 'basic excess' of pagan lustfulness. Unsublimated, the latter is now to be revived and experienced once more in ritual. The six-day dramatic presentation staged by Nitsch as the pinnacle of his ritual 'actions' in 1998, came into conflict, however, less with the Church than with the animal protection league: the state's attorney filed a charge of animal torture. The lawsuit was resolved in favor of Nitsch who today lets the animals be slaughtered according to the official Austrian laws. (Hubert Mohr) no longer appears in modern penal law or, where it remains—such as in The Netherlands (godslastering)—is almost never applied. The right to freedom of expression fundamentally protects objectively motivated criticism of a religious institution. In public discourse, the imputation of blasphemy is still a reproach.

Communicative Context

2. a) The disciplines concerned with religion analyze the communicative context in which blasphemy is imbedded. The event of blasphemy includes not only a deed, but also a public accusation. This yields differences in the attribution: who is accusing whom of blasphemy? For example, if an entire religion or sect is incriminated, what is at issue is a heterostereotype, whose denunciation is the aim of the other group. An assessment of what ought to qualify as blasphemy will not be identical in different groupings of persons. According to hagiographical reports, Boniface (c. 675–754 CE) had felled a certain sacred oak that grew in the territory of the Teutons. But as his deed, blasphemous though it had been from the Teuton viewpoint, had been visited with no negative consequences, Boniface was now able to convince a great number of the Teutons of the power of the Christian God.

Communicative Means

b) Furthermore, an analysis must be made of the communicative means that generate the blasphemy. In a foreign context, in an inappropriate linkage of meaning, or through inappropriate use, religious symbols can be alienated. Accordingly, the connections in which the concept of blasphemy is applied are manifold, and they cannot be ranged over a common denominator.

In many cultures, the use of curses is widespread. They express the wish that misfortunes and harm may come upon others. In monotheistic religions, this was usually regarded as blasphemy, since those who utter curses are calling upon, and attempting to misuse, the power of the divine for their own malicious ends. Blasphemous insults or outcries, as well, are labeled cursing. Here words having an important religious meaning—often replaced (for instance, 'Jeez!' for 'Jesus!') or combined with morally or aesthetically negative concepts (for instance, 'Goddam!')—are brought into an alien context. To be sure, it is only in extremely rare cases that the use of these expressions or words constitutes a conscious act of blasphemy.

Blasphemy and Art

In our modern day, blasphemy is occasionally imputed to art. Frequently it is an (artistically expressed) statement critical of religion that provokes anger or resentment here. In many cases what is at hand is an especially daring or unusual distortion of traditional material, conditioned by an aesthetic alienation. In particular, a combination of religious and sexual motifs, in the eyes of those who level the charge of blasphemy, is especially inappropriate when it comes to religious meaning. For example, such people have found this offense in Salman Rushdie's The Satanic Verses (1989), or the film, "The Last Temptation of Christ," by director Martin Scorsese (1989). In 2004, the making of the film "Submission" by Theo van Gogh, criticizing the role of woman in Islam with shocking images, led to the murder of the Dutch director by a Muslim extremist.

In ancient Greece, jokes about the gods were integrated into cultural forms (comedy) and accepted. Just so, in many rituals celebrated by pre-literate cultures, ridicule of transcendent powers is a customary phenomenon. Still, narrow bounds are set to the use of religious symbols for purposes of amusement. In the case of unbelief, many Christian and Muslim theologians pronounce a verdict of blasphemy where, with a denial of revelation, Jesus or Muhammad are designated as 'liars.'

Punishment of Blasphemy

c) The above phenomena, constituted as socially or culturally unacceptable behavior with regard to explicitly religious institutions, norms, and concepts, call in question or offer insult to religious 'order.' Consequently, appropriate measures for the normalization of the situation must be introduced. This is how Malinowski interprets breaches of law across the board.[1] One often meets with the thought that the one offended—God, then, or a spirit or an ancestor—will punish the culprit personally. This argument has various consequences for punishment: first, a punishment already executed might be sanctioned by religious authority; second, in a certain framework—for example, through a divine judgment—the guilty verdict might not actually be pronounced; finally, punishment might be altogether renounced. Thus, in the ancient Roman cult, religious transgressions were not punished unless they had been directed at the Emperor; for "not law, but God himself will be judge" (Cicero, De Legibus, 25).

In many cultures, a frequently invoked basis for the punishment of blasphemy lies in the anticipation of possible harm to the community if the culprit is not subjected to swift punishment. The restoration of order, then, is not the affair of one individual alone, but concerns the entire group.

1. Malinowski, Bronislaw, Crime and Custom in Savage Society, London 1926.

Literature

Cabantous, Alain, Blasphemy: Impious Speech in the West from the Seventeenth to the Nineteenth Century, New York 2002; Lawton, David, Blasphemy, New York 1993; Leonard, W., Blasphemy, New York 1993; Walter, Nicholas, Blasphemy, Ancient and Modern, London 1990; Webster, Richard, A Brief History of Blasphemy: Liberalism, Censorship and "The Satanic Verses", Southwold 1990; Zierker, Hans, "Gotteslästerung oder Freiheit der Kunst? Religiöse Empörung in säkularer Gesellschaft," in: Zeitschrift für Religions- und Geistesgeschichte 43 (1991), 345-359.

→ Art, Communication, Heresy, Joke, Prayer/Curse

Ansgar Jödicke

Blessing

While → prayer expresses wishes in one's own or another's behalf, blessing expresses God's benevolent power (salus, 'salvation') upon others. The Aaronite blessing, with which Christian divine service is concluded, expresses blessing not solely as wish, but at the same time as fulfillment: the minister or priest confers it upon the other in God's name ("The Lord bless you," Num 6:21-27). He bestows his name upon Aaron, brother of lawgiver Moses, since the former is the model for all later priests. The authoritative gesture that comes to expression herein is typical of blessing, Albania was the Eastern European state that most rigorously implemented communism. Only with the collapse of the Eastern bloc could religious life once again become public, as here with Archbishop Anastasios in the Church of the Proclamation [of the Gospel] in Tirana. The prelate still wears his hair traditionally, uncut (in a knot), while the young priests accompanying him prefer their hair short. The three extended fingers of his right hand signify the Trinity. He traces the Sign of the Cross over the basket of bread that the boy will distribute to the participants in the divine service at their departure after the Eucharist. The bread thus blessed (not Eucharistically consecrated) conveys its blessing to all who receive it; its abundance provides for its availability to the bedridden grandmother as well, at the hands of a family member who has been present for this Liturgy of the Eucharist.

as it is of its negative form, the curse: as the High Priest (in the succession of Aaron) blesses his people, so the father blesses the family, elders the juniors, never the other way about. There is always the need for blessing: the newly planted field, the little lamb, infants, all need special protection. Once the blessing or curse is uttered, it is ascribed its own efficacy, for shelter or catastrophe. Signs of blessing, such as a small cross received at → Baptism, a bottle of holy water, the image of a deliverer, ensure against misfortune (→ Security).

Christoph Auffarth

Blood

Blood as the Seat of Life

1. The meaning of blood as the seat of life, and as the repository of the power of the soul, explains the pivotal role of blood in many religions, archaic and lettered alike. Here blood has an ambivalent meaning that can promise good or danger, life or death, and thus it is akin to the concept of 'The → Holy,' which denotes all that is filled with special power. The early Teutonic word haila was the name for powers that can be useful as well as harmful. This ambivalence is revealed in the very etymology of the word 'blood,' which derives from the Indo-European bhle ('pour,' 'burst,' 'flow'). Presumably it was at first an epithet of (1) asere and (2) cruor ('raw'), and replaced these. The positive, salvific power of blood is shown in the 'blood doctrines,' especially in Christianity, as well as in numerous forms of folk belief, which had spread even among the learned. Blood was recommended for the treatment of epilepsy and leprosy, for old men's rejuvenation, or as a love charm. In particular, menstrual blood was regarded as a seductive and dangerous potion (Strack 1900). Virgins' blood, or that of those upon whom a sentence of capital punishment had been executed, was regarded as salvific: the blood of virgins, because it stood for purity; the blood of the executed, because it conveyed the notion of sacrifice.

Through the blood of the latter, → evil and violence were expelled from the community. The danger that lurked in blood was also expressed in conceptualizations of the pact with the → devil, which must be signed in blood. Prefiguring the vampires and Draculas of modernity, the → Antichrist was thought of as a blood-thief, in contrast with the Savior, who offers his blood for others. The idea of blood as something dangerous is also shown in the myths concerning the sexually transmitted (and incurable till the twentieth century) syphilis, which was a disease of 'bad blood.' One of the recommended antidotes for syphilis was the touch of the 'good' and salvific blood of the martyrs (blood relics); another was intercourse with a virgin. The latter image was taken over by Bram Stoker in his Dracula (1897). Despite exact knowledge of blood in modern times (Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood in 1624; 'blood types' have been identifiable since 1901), myths about blood can still appear today. If 'bad blood' first settled abroad, with secularization it has increasingly shifted 'inside.' It represents the 'enemy within,' especially in a collective context. The myth of 'bad blood' emerges most clearly today in images of AIDS.

Blood in the Biblical Religions

2. The Hebrew word dam means blood. In the Jewish religion, the consumption of blood is strictly proscribed, as blood, being the symbol of life, is reserved for the creator. The flesh of warm-blooded animals may be consumed only once the last drop of blood has been removed from them. The blood of sacrificial animals is dashed on the altar. If blood is accidentally spilled, it is to be covered with earth—buried, that it may be given over once more to its rightful owner, God. The consumption of blood was never prohibited this comprehensively and earnestly in any other ancient religion or culture of the East. Here, then, we deal not with an archaic taboo, but with the law of a scriptural culture. With the Jewish religion, there appeared for the first time a religious community grounded in a scripture, and it prefigures the 'virtual' communities of our modern society with its media networks.

In Christianity as well, blood became one of the constitutive elements of community. At the → Lord's Supper, the climax of the divine service, believers take the blood and body of the Lord and receive them within themselves. If the prohibition of a consumption of blood confronts Jewish believers, in their difference from God, in Christianity the Eucharist accomplishes union with God. If in the Jewish religion a sublimation of the invisible God stands over against a worldly community that defines itself through ritual laws, in the Christian religion this sublimation is confronted with God's becoming the world. In Christianity this had as a consequence the requirement to place the Incarnation in evidence through images: the 'blood miracles' (bleeding statues, paintings, hosts, crucifixes; → Stigmata/Stigmatics) belong here, just as does the doctrine of the 'Transubstantiation' (1215). Not coincidentally, the 'blood miracles' always occur in the presence of an unbeliever or doubter. The doctrine of the Transubstantiation defines that the host and wine are not a symbol of the Lord's body and blood, but are the living presence of God, who—in his Son—has sacrificed himself for humanity. Both—the conception of a God who has sacrificed himself, and the need for the continual re-presentation of this sacrifice—are contrary to the Jewish religion, and lie at the source of many anti-Jewish and anti-Semitic stereotypes on the part of the Christian community that are linked with images of blood (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes). Legends of a 'sacrilege against the host' or of a Jewish 'ritual murder' (→ Anti-Semitism) sprang up. A host desecrated by Jews had begun to shed blood. Or it was alleged that Jews had drunk the blood of Christian children for ritual purposes. Such allegations reached from ancient times to the early twentieth century, and led to violent pogroms against Jewish communities.

Blood and Sexuality

3. Behind the various images of blood in the Jewish and Christian religions, various sexual images reside as well. These are to be associated with blood's symbolism as the 'seat of life,' a symbolism closely bound up with → sexuality. The menstrual-blood taboo, found in many ancient societies, is one of the symptoms here. It discloses a fear of the terrifying powers of woman, in whose body the power of God seems to have taken form. This is why in many cultures menstrual blood was revered as 'dangerous' and 'divine,' a symbol of fertility—a notion that likewise comes to expression in the biblical word 'flower' for menstruation (Lev 15:24), a word retained in the English language. In Greek antiquity, menstrual blood was called 'supernatural red wine,' which Mother Hera—as Hebe—was accustomed to serve the gods. In Christianity, the menstruation taboo (positive and negative) recedes. Jesus does not shrink from the touch of the woman 'suffering from hemorrhages' (Mark 5:24-34). But this is to be explained by a change of symbolism, whereby the blood and wounds of the Savior become a source of fertility, the 'nourishing bosom' (Bynum 1991). 'Impure' menstrual blood yields to the pure blood of sacrifice, reflecting the Christian division of 'good' and 'bad' blood, or 'good' and 'sinful' femaleness (Mary/Eve). From the various pictures of sexuality in Christianity and Judaism, too, there sprang a whole series of anti-Jewish and anti-Semitic clichés: the imputation of ritual murder was partially grounded on the supposition that Jewish men menstruated, and so had need of blood. In the secular context, sexual images can be seen in the notion of Rassenschande (Ger., 'racial shame'), in which Jews seduced Christian girls in order to infect the 'pure' body of the Aryan people. (Here the images of syphilis played an important role.) Even in this case, the accusations represent a projection of Christian wishful thinking. In racist anti-Semitism, the concept of 'incest' denotes not the sin of intercourse with one's own blood, but the sin of intercourse with 'foreign' or 'strange' blood.

Film Blood

4. All in all, Christian conceptualizations of blood betray a paradoxical process in history. On the one side, the Christian community increasingly took on abstract, spiritualized 'virtual' traits. Over against this stood the ever recurrent, often virulent, urge to 'de-sublimate,' to materialize, which was to find its expression especially in Christians' images of blood, from bleeding religious paintings and statues, to the doctrine of the Transubstantiation and the Feast of the Precious Blood (1849), to the racist conception of the Volkskörper (Ger., 'people's body'). This duality may explain why, in films, on television, and on the digital web, images of blood play such a pivotal role (in the form of violence or sex). Blood has become a symbol of 'reality' and lends the virtual or abstract images of the media the appearance of immediacy, materiality, and reality.

Literature

Buckley, Thomas/Gottlieb, Alma (ed.), Blood Magic: The Anthropology of Menstruation, Berkeley 1988; Bynum, Caroline Walker, Fragmentation and Redemption: Essays on Gender and the Human Body in Medieval Religion, New York 1991; Camporesi, Piero, "The Consecrated Host. A Wondrous Excess," in: Feher, Michael et al. (eds.), Fragments for a History of the Human Body, Part 1, New York 1989; Troyer, Kristin de, Wholly Woman, Holy Blood: A Feminist Critique of Purity and Impurity, Harrisburg 2003; Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Fischer-Homberger, Esther, Krankheit Frau, Darmstadt 1984; Gilman, Sander L., "Aids and Syphilis: The Iconography of a Disease," in: Crimp, Douglas (ed.), Aids: Cultural Analysis, Cultural Activism, Cambridge 1988; Knight, Chris, Blood Relations: Menstruation and the Origins of Culture, New Haven 1991; Schlehe, Judith, Das Blut der fremden Frauen. Menstruation in der anderen und der eigenen Kultur, Frankfurt/M. 1987; Strack, Hermann L., Das Blut in Glauben und Aberglauben der Menschheit, Munich 1900; von Braun, Christina, "Die Blutschande. Wandlungen eines Begriffs: vom Inzesttabu zu den Rassengesetzen," in: Eadem, Die schamlose Schönheit des Vergangenen, Frankfurt/M. 1989, 81-111; von Braun, Christina/Heid, Ludger (eds.), Der Ewige Judenhaß, Bonn 1990.

→ Anti-Semitism, Body, Gender Stereotypes, Guilt, Initiation, Judaism, Purity, Sexuality

Christina von Braun

Body

The Body as Salvific Message

1. Inasmuch as human mortality is evinced in the transience of the body, the body becomes a central topos of all discourses of salvation. The myth of origins itself, through which a community defines itself as an indivisible 'body,' contains the wish for a defeat of death: the individual person is thought of as part of an immortal cosmos or collective body. In rough outline, four distinct 'strategies' of a religious defeat of death can be distinguished: (1) The participation of the individual in an immortal cosmos; (2) the promise of a bodily revivification, either in the present world in another body, or in another world; (3) the participation of the individual in an immortal collective body; (4) the defeat of mortality through spiritualization, asceticism, and victory over bodily needs. In the various religions, these four 'strategies' often overlap—in Christianity the three last-named exist side by side. Usually, however, one aspect predominates. Even within one religion, shifts can occur from era to era or from region to region. In early Christianity (from the first to the fourth century), the aspect of → asceticism played an important role (Brown 1988). In later Christianity the integration of the individual into the body of the community predominated.

The Body as a Symbol

2. Contrary to what could be assumed, in cultures without writing the human body is not conceived (as animals and plants are) as a 'given of nature.' It counts as part of the culture, which, to be sure, does present a mirror image of nature as the latter is observed. The human body acquires an important meaning in the interaction between the human being and nature, as well as in social relationships. In many cultures, for example, the names of deceased persons may no longer be mentioned, since the name is conceptualized as a part of the body. This can even extend to a demand that the corpses of deceased persons be burned, their ashes scattered, and their belongings destroyed. As individual bodies, they must be extinguished from memory: only thus can they be absorbed into the community to which they have belonged. This double movement—disappearance as individuals, and participation in an immortal cosmos or community body—is ritualized in diverse ways. But in neither case is the body something 'negative.'

Instead, in other cultures (especially in those that bear the impress of the abstract thinking of alphabetic writing, with stress laid on the dichotomy of spirit and body), the body has a paradoxical symbolism, bespeaking life on the one hand, and mortality on the other. In Homer, the word soma means 'corpse,' and only later is used for 'body.' For Plato, by contrast, the → soul represents the proper 'self,' in contrast to the transient body.[1] In → death he sees the liberation of the soul from the prison (in Greek, sema, 'tomb') of the body.[2] Only in the thirteenth century does the German word Körper refer to the body. This occurs under the influence of the doctrine of the Transubstantiation (→ Blood), according to which the host (corpus Christi, Lat., 'body of Christ') is to be thought of no longer as a sign (symbol), but as the real presence of the Lord. Today the concept of body has come into general use, and refers, rather in its 'mechanical' aspects, to fields such as medicine, sport, and others, that is, to an image of the body that connotes human predictability and technology.

Perception of Pain

The fact that the body has a symbolical function in all cultures (writing as well as non-writing) comparable to that of speech, a code, or a medium, explains why there are various ways of perceiving pain. It also explains why some cultures regard ecstasy and → possession as salutary, while others see them as manifestations of illness. In either case, the habitus of the body (Mauss 1935) stands in a connection with the conceptualizations of immortality and the religious notions of each given culture. Since → pain is the clearest sign of the frailty of the human body, in some religions it is of especially great significance. This is true for the Christian religion, in particular: the Passion and → Cross, the experience of pain, demonstrates that God has actually become a human being, and takes on the frailty of the human body.

Symbolism of the Body in Modernity

In secular modernity, two forms of the cult of immortality are especially active. One consists in the aestheticization of the body, especially as it has developed with the evolution of the visual media, photography, and film. These (unlike painting) depict the body in a seemingly 'objective' manner, while at the same time sparking the fantasy that one might transform the body into an 'incorruptible' work of art. Another strategy of immortality dear to modernity is based on the idea that, altogether in Descartes's sense, the body functions as a 'machine,' according to laws that might be planned and reproduced. Here, too, the body comes forward as a symbol. Nothing supports the concept of an irreducible body, immune from social construction, as clearly as → genetic engineering.

Modernity's fantasy of immortality lies in 'calculability': a calculable body is a reproducible body. This fantasy actually constitutes a part of the thrust of modern medical research. In any case, the body becomes the symbol of a religious proclamation.

The Community Body

3. In the Timaeus, Plato likened the cosmos to the human body; and vice versa, he understood the human body as a mirror image of the cosmos. For the Stoics, too, the microcosm of the body reflected the macrocosm of the world. In many other cultures the cosmos is replaced with the community, seen as the 'body' whose 'members' are the distinct individuals comprising it. Unlike the individual body, however, the body that is the community is pictured as immortal. This constitutes the power of attraction settled not only in this sort of religion, but also in secular communities, and lies at the base of the nineteenth-century ideology of the Volkskörper (Ger., 'body of the people'; → Collective Representations).

The body symbolism of the community takes on very different forms, depending on the specific religion in question. While in the Judaic religion the community is formed around the commandments and ritual laws of an invisible God (→ circumcision, dietary laws, and so on), the Christian community arises through union with the God become a human being. In Communion, the believing Christian has a share in the (immortal) body and blood of the Lord; at the same time, a union with the other 'members' of the community is reinforced. "Because there is one bread, we who are many are one body," Paul says (1 Cor 10:17). In Christ, the individual 'members' form one indivisible body (Rom 12:5; cf. 1 Cor 12:12 and 27). The concept of oneness with God, again, leads to that of the Church (or the faith community) as corpus Christi. For Paul, the notion of 'body' comprises three distinct levels, which will be decisive for later Christianity: (1) the body of the faithful, one with the Lord and the other members of the community; (2) the sacramental body, which each one receives at the sacred Supper; 3) the social or ecclesial body, into which the individual is assumed through the Eucharist. In other words, in Christianity the body is conceived as physical and material community on the one hand, but on the other as spiritual community—and this division into a physical and a spiritual body is repeated on various levels, for example in the doctrine of the Trinity, or in the sundered image of woman as the 'pure' Mother of God and 'sinful' Eve.

Body and Sexuality

4. → Sexuality is a sign of the body's capacity for regeneration. This view of the body is closely bound up with particular sex roles (→ Gender Stereotypes). The 'seduction of the flesh' by woman is a common pattern with Buddhist as well as Christian monks. The split into a 'good' and 'bad' body corresponds to the split between a 'good' and a 'bad' sexuality. In many medieval representations the wounds of the Savior are presented as a bountiful bosom.[3]

As Jesus was born of a woman, medieval nuns reverenced human participation in God as participation in God's femininity. In reality, however, with the doctrine of the Transubstantiation there had been a turnabout, which provided the sacrificed 'body' of the 'Savior' with all of the meanings that once had been ascribed to the female body as receptacle of the symbols of earthly fruitfulness. The female body as representation of sexuality and the continued existence of the community had been replaced by the 'Word become flesh,' which now became the guarantor of regeneration. In ancient Christianity, the opposition of soul and body, inherited from Greek antiquity, had been in the foreground (Gal 5:17), issuing in a high appraisal of → asceticism and the ideal of a sexless, 'paradisiacal body.' This ideal is realized in the spiritual community—for example in the religious life—as especially characteristic of early Christianity and monastic Buddhism. Here, community with God and the other members of the community arises not through bodily union (in the Eucharist or in matrimony), but by the 'overcoming' of corporeality achieved in fasting and sexual abstinence. In Christian symbolism the Crucified one represents the spiritual aspect of faith (the head), while the community of mortals appears as his body, and thus assumes feminine form as Ecclesia.

Opposition of Soul and Body

Image of the Body and Ordering of the Genders

This symbolism expressed itself in the very ordering of the genders. Thus, Paul demanded that, just as Christ is the Head of the community, so also let man in marriage be the head of woman, and she represent his body (Eph 5:23,28). Men are to love their wives "as they do their own bodies." In Christianity, union with God now finds its reflection in marriage. In marriage, man and woman become 'one flesh,' as the human being becomes one body and one spirit with God in the Holy Eucharist.

As early as the fourth century, however, a new image of sexuality becomes accepted—first, with → Augustine, who assumed a sexuality in Paradise that must have been subject to the will.[4] In the Middle Ages—with Bernard of Clairvaux, with → Meister Eckhart, and others—the experience of faith is compared with the lust of sexuality. The same phenomenon is observable in art, which, from the thirteenth century on, shifts the sex of the Savior into the center of the presentation (Steinberg 1983). Thus, there is not only a good, pure, and immortal body, but also a good, pure sexuality that guarantees eternal life. This development is especially characteristic of Christianity.

In Judaism, asceticism does not play a central role. Sexuality itself is affirmed as God's gift and set forth as one of the joys of the Sabbath. While Saint Jerome enjoins young women "to be pale and thin from fasting,"[5] among rabbis a fasting girl was occasion for anxiety. In terms of a different appraisal of sexuality, too, in Judaism monogamy has a different 'sense' from its meaning in Christianity. In the Jewish religion, what is at issue is corporeal fatherhood; in Christianity, 'spiritual paternity' takes center stage (the male as 'producer' of books and other immortal works of art). The indissolubility of matrimony, which Christianity alone proclaims, is founded on the inseparability of a 'head,' imagined as male, from its 'body,' pictured as female.

Body and Ritual

5. In religious → rituals, in →dance, often accompanied by the wearing of → masks or by body painting, the 'I' loses its individual form and eventuates in symbolism hidden behind the ritual or mask. In a state of → trance, which materializes through dancing, rhythmic movement, fasting, sleep deprivation, hyperventilation, or at times by the ingestion of hallucinogens (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens), it takes the form of a being indwelling in the person behind the mask: these may be spirits, demons, ancestors, sacred animals, or beings of fable. With the possession of the body by an alien spirit, the 'I' appropriates 'strange' powers. But ritual can also serve to expel the foreign spirits from the body.

All things considered, it may be said that the perception of the body differs greatly from religion to religion. While 'nature religions' see no difference between body and soul—the body is conceived as the seat of the soul—the ascetical-mystical religions look on the body as a hindrance to salvation, and therefore strive for its deadening ('mortification') or taming by the soul. This perspective is shown in the rituals proper to the various religions. Whereas in the nature-oriented religions dance, gesture, and even the state of trance shift the body to the midpoint of event—as home of the soul, it is drawn into the religious experience—the ascetical religions seek either to exclude or to sublimate the neediness of the body. The paradox is the position of Christianity. Here spirituality and the defeat of bodiliness play an important role; and yet corporality is appraised as a central value, which comes to expression in the thematization of pain, → blood, and the → Cross. These two levels—spirituality on the one hand, and corporeality on the other—are extended by the Christian traditions in the secular context. Accordingly, in modern Western societies, visual and electronic technologies vie with one another to produce a visual or 'simulated' (but purely spiritual) body, with the techniques of modern → sports, medicine, and →genetic engineering, which strive to develop the potentialities of the real, biological body.

1. Plato, Gorgias, 493a.
2. Idem, Cratylus, 400bc.
3. Bynum 1991.
4. Augustine, City of God, book 14, chap. 24.
5. Jerome, Letter 22, no.16, in: Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, series 2, vol. 16, no. 77.

Literature

Akashe-Böhme, Farideh (ed.), Von der Auffälligkeit des Leibes, Frankfurt/M. 1995; Bordo, Susan, Unbearable Weight: Feminism, Western Culture, and the Body, Berkeley 1993; Brown, Peter, The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York 1988; Bynum, Caroline Walker, Fragmentation and Redemption: Essays on Gender and the Human Body in Medieval Religion, New York 1991; Coakley, Sarah (ed.), Religion and the Body, Cambridge 1997; Davis, Kathy, Reshaping the Female Body: The Dilemma of Cosmetic Surgery, New York 1995; Eadem, Dubious Equalities & Embodied Differences: Cultural Studies on Cosmetic Surgery, Lanham 2003; Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Feher, Michael et al. (eds.), Fragments for a History of the Human Body, 3 vols., New York 1989ff.; Grogan, Sarah, Body Image: Understanding Body Dissatisfaction in Men, Women and Children, London 1999; Kantorowicz, Ernst, The King's Two Bodies: a Study in Mediaeval Political Theology, Princeton 1957; Mauss, Marcel, "Techniques of the Body" (1935), in: Idem, Sociology and Psychology: Essays, London 1979; Steinberg, Leo, The Sexuality of Christ in Renaissance Art and Modern Oblivion, New York 1983; von Braun, Christina, Nicht Ich. Logik, Lüge, Libido, Frankfurt/M. 1985;

→ Asceticism, Blood, Breathing, Drinking/Drink, Eating/Nourishment, Fasting, Gender Stereotypes, Genetic Engineering, Mask, Materiality, Mummification, Nudity, Pain, Regeneration/Fertility, Relics (Veneration of), Sexuality, Tattoo

Christina von Braun

Book

The Book as a Medium

1. The book (from Middle English bok, derived in turn from bohiz, Proto-Germanic for 'beech,' or beechwood tablets with rune carvings), for the recording and transmittal of written content, had its forerunners in the high

The symbolic value of the 'book icon' is so great in Islam that—as in this hand painting on the wall of a house in Suez, in Egypt—even an (unorthodox) reference to a visit to the tomb of the Prophet in Medina can be produced in this form. Such a visit does not count as the hajj (the prescribed pilgrimage to Mecca), and understood as an actual cultic act at a tomb, is, strictly speaking, prohibited. The right side of the book presents Medina's Mosque of the Tomb; on the left are the words of the Prophet, as handed down: "Who visits my tomb shall enjoy my protection." The female pilgrim (hajjija) stands proudly before the memorial image, for which a painter has been engaged at considerable expense.

cultures of the ancient East, in various forms and materials: clay tablets in Babylon and Assyria, papyrus, leather, or parchment scrolls (Egyptians, Greeks, Romans), but also stone tablets and metal plates (with or without a wax coating). The field of ancient Eastern, Egyptian, and other ancient books is, of course best researched and attested by archaeology.

In ancient Israel, 'book' (Heb., sepher) denoted a scroll (see Jer 36:4; Ezek 3:1); but it could also stand for legal documents, royal decrees, or simply letters addressed to someone. In the Septuagint, bíblos or bíblion was used; the plural designates a collection of books or a library. The oldest extant manuscripts of the biblical books were discovered in the caves of → Qumran, and date back to the third century BCE. They are in the form of scrolls, now in fragments except for the scroll of the book of Isaiah (1QJes[a] , today in the Shrine of the Book in Jerusalem), which is complete. On 17 strips of sheepskin (width 26 cm, length somewhat over 7 m) sewn together with linen thread, it contains 54 columns of text. Scrolls from Qumran are ordinarily of leather, more rarely of papyrus. Besides these, numerous fragments of papyrus scrolls have been preserved in the dry climate of Egypt, especially in the desert sands. How books looked in the eighth century BCE can be reconstructed from the so-called Bileam Inscription of Tell Deir Alla, written, about 750 BCE, in Hebrew cursive in black ink (with some red) on white wash. Jer 36 contains further important information on the production and

On the occasion of a Bar Mitzvah, the ritual introduction of a boy into the adult community, a Jewish community of today bends over a Torah scroll (the five Books of Moses), while the young man recites a passage from the Hebrew text of the Bible. Still today, the form of the book prescribed for divine service is the leather scroll.

transmittal of a biblical book. Jeremiah dictates his words to a professional scribe named Baruch, and the latter writes them on a scroll. There could obviously be different editions, then, and there are references to extensions and revisions (see Dan 9:2). Words of the prophets are preserved for later generations as testimonials (Isa 8:1-2; 16-19; the expressions for tablet and style, used in the text, are disputed). Wooden or ivory tablets with a plaster or wax coating on the inside, bound with hinges to diptychs or polytychs, serve as notebooks. There are frequent biblical references to books, to some extent even to writings or collections, quoted or serving as sources: the "Book of the Wars of YHWH" (Num 21:14), the "Book of the Acts of Solomon" (1 Kings 11:41), the "Book of the Annals of the Kings of Israel" or the "Kings of Judah" (1 Kings 14:19 and 29). These are not extant, however, nor is it possible to reconstruct them in their entirety. It is imagined that even God writes, and needs books (the "book of the living," Ps 69:28; or the 'book' of the names of persons destined for deliverance, e.g., Dan 12:1). Of like heavenly origin are the Tablets of the Destinies of Israel in Sumer and Babylon. In the New Testament, we hear that Jesus used the Hebrew Bible on scrolls (Luke 4:17-20; Jesus has before him the scroll of Isaiah, to present a reading in the synagogal liturgy). Paul studies the Torah (Gal 3:10); he takes 'books,' and even precious 'parchments,' with him on a journey, or has them brought to him later (2 Tim 4:13). A book trade and private collections are attested of the Greece of the fifth to the fourth centuries BCE, and the privately owned book appears. But the most important invention came later—that of the codex (first century BCE), which for various reasons (see below) became the preferred form in early Christianity, then reigning as definitive from the fourth and fifth centuries CE until the invention of the electronic book. In early Christianity, the greater capacity of the codex was important for the canonization of bodies of text, because books in this form could be hidden more easily in case of persecution, and because in theological controversy, referral to particular loci was not as awkward as with a scroll. As for the transmission of the Bible, the great parchment codices of the Greek Bible (Old and New Testaments), Sinaiticus, Vaticanus, Alexandrinus (fourth to fifth centuries CE), are especially to be mentioned. Ornate bibles and other illustrated books with rich decoration began to appear. In the extreme form, the Manicheans (→ Manichaeism) regarded the book as a cooperative work of art. Here the unique, precious character of the content of a book was brought out in the beauty of its script (calligraphy), in its illustrations, and by the worth of its bindings. The missionary success of the Manicheans was in many cases attributable to their books of unique beauty and of the highest value.

Paper and Printing Press

The manuscripts of the Middle Ages used the codex of parchment—or of paper, a Chinese invention of the second century CE, known in Europe in the early eleventh century. This new, inexpensive writing material favored the late medieval and humanistic efforts in education. The invention of printing with movable type (by Johann Gutenberg in Mainz in 1456, with the "Gutenberg Bible") was the second great revolution, after the change from scroll to codex, in the spread of the book. Pre-Reformation bible printing was important in its own right; but it was only through the Reform that the 'book' was discovered as the pivotal medium in a spread of religion among the broad population. The dynamics of the great spiritual exhilaration aroused by Luther in Germany would have been impossible without the new medium. Characteristic of the seventeenth-century religious book is the literature of edification that grew in extent and importance with the spread of pietism. The latter then itself promoted the printing of the Bible, contributing to the worldwide dissemination of the Bible with the founding of bible publishers (Cansteinische Bibelanstalt, 1710; British and Foreign Bible Society, 1804). In addition to the towering role of the Bible in the history of the book as a medium in the area of religion, other examples from the field of culture and world religions might be cited. In the 'media culture' of the end of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first, the book seems to be losing its singular position, in favor of electronic media. For the storage and communication of knowledge, computer technology has developed inexpensive and productive alternatives (→ Memory). However, disadvantageous effects of this third revolution are also being more and more discussed. There is a remarkable trend toward pictures, films, and interactive media. Development is out and out explosive. Its effect on the medium of the book cannot as yet be appraised.

2. 'Book' (in Arabic, kitab; pl., kutub) is one of the most frequently occurring nouns in the → Qur'an. With an article (Arab., al-kitab) it is synonymous with Islamic written revelation. As 'peoples of the Book' (Arab., ahl al-kitab), followers of other written revelations—particularly Jews and Christians, as distinguished from the followers of non-scriptural religions—are granted a special status (Arab., dimmi) in terms of legal rights in religion. Muhammad maintained the proposition that the messages and teachings that God had communicated to him—as to the earlier messengers—through angels, or visions and dreams, came from a source in the beyond, an original text in heaven, containing all sacred books and revelations (Arab., umm al-kitab). The Arabic art of writing, only sparingly attested in pre-Islamic times, received enormous impetus from the privilege of a written communication of sacred and profane knowledge, in whose wake Islamic culture became essentially a 'book culture.' The manufacture, importation, and sale of paper, the preparation of artistic leather bindings, the standardization of copying procedures and trends in calligraphic styles, and finally, a commerce in books, occasioned the development of new crafts and trades into determining elements of Eastern city culture. Its most visible expression, and a richly symbolic one, was the establishment of libraries (Arab., maktaba). Beginning in the ninth century, gigantic collections were amassed, frequently of several dozen thousands of volumes, some under public, some under private auspices, around which arose secular and religious centers of formation and research. An exciting development has been the encounter of Islam, with its exclusive attachment to the Qur'an, and modern secularism and science, setting in confrontation models as different from each other as Morocco and Indonesia.

We first meet the concept 'book religion' in 1873, with F. Max Müller. Müller, however, does not restrict his ascription of the concept to the classic religions—which Islam calls 'possessors of the scripture of revelation'—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. He lists others, as well, such as Orphism, Hinduism, Buddhism, Sikhism, Zoroastrianism, Jainism, Daoism, and the Mormon religion of the Latter Day Saints.

Book and Ritual in Religions

3. It is not easy to maintain with consistency the widely accepted division of religious forms into those of a ritual character, with their oral, communitarian tradition on the one hand; and on the other, religions of the book, with their fixed sacred traditions, canon, administrative structures, and doctrinal authority. Certain religions consciously reject such a categorization, as, for example, Central Asian → shamanism—although the Mongols/Yugurs have possessed scriptures for 1,300 years. The multiple potential meanings and interpretability of religious traditions is of massive importance: defined symbols, including canonical scriptures, are ultimately subjected to new interpretations of content and new theological expositions, in terms of their successive historical environments. Symbols or contents that evade this contextualization are condemned to decline and fall. In such cases, scriptural content is altogether repressed, reduced to the 'recitable' sounds represented by the print or script as such: 'church languages' thus arise. Many of the lamas in Mongolia recite the sacred sutras in Sanskrit, without understanding their content. The Catholic Church has long employed Latin for the reading of Scripture, and Mongolian Darhad recite Nestorian texts in Old Syrian (the language of heaven) in the ancestor worship of Genghis Khan. The administration and interpretation of religious media call for a corresponding 'caste,' which thereby acquires authority over a religion and its believing members. Saints, texts canonized in books, myths, and rituals form a reciprocally interpreting frame of reference in religions. Here ritual can dramatize myth, a myth can be received, and a myth can (etiologically) establish or expound a certain cultic behavior.

Literature

Barker, Nicolas, Form and Meaning in the History of the Book: Selected Essays, London 2003; Blanck, H., Das Buch in der Antike, Munich 1992; Casson, Lionel, Libraries in the Ancient World, New Haven 2001; Dane, Joseph A., The Myth of Print Culture: Essays on Evidence, Textuality, and Bibliographical Method, Toronto 2003; Finkelstein, David/McCleery, Alistair (eds.), The Book History Reader, London 2002; Hodgson, Robert/Soukup, Paul, From One Medium to Another: Basic Issues for Communicating the Scriptures in New Media, New York 1997; Marshall, D. N., History of Libraries: Ancient and Mediaeval, Oxford 1983; McKitterick, David, Print, Manuscript and the Search for Order, 1450–1830, Cambridge 2003; Noelle-Neumann, Elisabeth/Schmidtchen, Gerhard, Religiöses Buch und christlicher Buchhandel, Hamburg 1969.

→ Bible, Canon, Literature, Materiality, Media, Memory, Oral Tradition, Qur'an, Text/Textual Criticism, Writing

Andreas Reichert

Bosnia-Herzegovina

Until the beginning of 1992, Bosnia-Herzegovina was a province of Yugoslavia. From April 1992 until November 1995 (Dayton Peace Agreement), war reigned in Bosnia-Herzegovina. Through the war in Bosnia, many persons experienced for the first time the new possibility of war in Europe (→ Conflict/Violence). The population of Bosnia-Herzegovina belongs essentially to three religious groups or communities: the Serbian Orthodox Church, the Catholic Church, and Islam. The distribution of the groups is not even: in Herzegovina, for example, there is a Catholic Croatian majority. Essentially, allocation to the respective groups in Bosnia-Herzegovina was originally determined by formal religious membership. An Orthodox was reckoned a Serbian, a Catholic a Croatian, and one with Islamic membership a Muslim. 'Muslim,' here, denoted not the minorities of Albanian or Turkish descent, but only the Southern Slavs, who formally belonged to Islam. The construct of the ethnic groups later called 'peoples' was finally (1963) established in Yugoslavia administratively, in function of one's 'original' religious membership (that of one's forebears). The decisive factor usually was and is the religious membership of the father. Since 1963, then, there are also 'ethnic' Serbs, Croatians, and Muslims without religious affiliation at all. The proportion of secularized members of the original religious groups has sharply increased since 1945. Close religious ties in the Yugoslavia of Josip Tito were rather rare. A particularity of Muslims in Bosnia is their religious extraction. Essentially, they are descendants of the Bogomils, a Christian community appearing in the tenth century, and later, when Bosnia belonged to the Ottoman Empire, converting to Islam. Often, the various groups in Bosnia-Herzegovina are referred to as 'ethnic' groups, or even as 'peoples.' This is very misleading. Technically, Serbs, Croats, and Muslims are all Southern Slavs. All speak Serbo-Croatian. Before the war, this language was differentiated only in script (Latin or Cyrillic) and, marginally, in regional dialects. Since the beginning of the war, differences in the language are consciously emphasized, especially in Croatia. The recent war is an unequivocal example of how

The picture shows a minaret destroyed by an explosion in Ahmici, a village of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Until the beginning of the war (1992), there were many communities in Bosnia-Herzegovina with religious buildings of (often) two or (rarely) three of the three primary religious communities of Bosnia-Herzegovina: the Catholic Church, the Serbian Orthodox Church, and Bosnian Islam. Besides these, Jewish communities had synagogues in the large cities. In smaller communities, often enough, a religious house was built in the center, while another, more often, was constructed outside. All of this reflects the relationships maintained by the majoritarian communities in the village populations. Since one of the goals of the military leaders of the various parties was the expulsion, even the annihilation, of the other groups, 'ethnic cleansing' comported the destruction of the symbols and testimonials of the other religious cultures. The ruins of former places of worship are either left standing as triumphalistic monuments of war ('destruction aesthetics'), or—more frequently—razed to the ground to erase any memory of the faith community that has been expelled and preclude its return (method of the damnatio memoriae, 'extinction from memory'). Finally, again and again, houses of faith are destroyed even when members of the religious community are still living in the vicinity. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, all three approaches to religious structures have been employed. But it has also happened that 'alien' religious installations have been maintained and protected, despite the expulsion of the population groups that once used them. (T. Pflüger)

CROATIA
Vukovar
Prijedor
Bihac
Sanski Most Banja Luka
Brcko
Doboj
Bijeljina
Mrkonjic Grad
BOSNIA - HERZEGOVINA
Tuzla
Jajce
Zvornik
Zenica
Glamoc
Vitez
Bugojno
Busovaca
Knin
CROATIA
Gornji Vakuf
Vogosca
Sarajevo
Pale Livno
Praca
YUGOSLAVIA
Konjic
Tusici
Jablanica
Gorazde
Split
Foca
Mostar
Nevesinje
DISTRIBUTION OF RELIGIONS IN BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA
Confessional Membership
Orthodox Muslim Catholic
Undeclared
National Boundary
Jewish Minority
Proportion of the Confessions
11 - 50 %
51 - 90 %
91 - 100 %
0 25
50 km
F.D.2005

ethnic identities can be constructed and religious membership exploited for political purposes.

→ Conflict/Violence, Europe II

Tobias Pflüger

Boundary

Human beings draw boundaries to 'bound themselves off' as members of one group against 'the others': in order to erect identities of their own and to specify their own territories vis-à-vis the outer world. 'We-they' thinking leaves its traces in almost all areas of human behavior. Fences, boundary stones, and turnpikes cannot be overcome by everyone at all moments: They show persons whether they may enter, as they belong there, or whether they must remain without. The temple (in Greek, témenos, 'bounded space') is the religious space par excellence. The living spaces of religious minorities such as Jews, even as late as modern times, were bounded by gates and shut off (→ Ghetto/Ghettoization). Religion can bring powerful forces to bear, in order efficaciously to bound off sacred space from profane. No less violent are the explosions that take place when one crosses boundaries otherwise regarded as natural or even necessary. The potential of tension manifests itself in the temptation, in the desire, to breach the taboo.

→ Landscape, Nature, Orientation, Place (Sacred), Prejudices/Stereotypes, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Georg Hartmann

Breathing

General

1. Breathing influences psychic well-being, and in religious texts is often connected with life: as long as one has breath, one is alive. In religions and cultures in which body and spirit are thought of as separate, and which believe in a less corporeal soul, breathing is used in connection with s*piritus* (Lat., 'spirit') or anima (Lat., 'soul'). The power of the spirit, and a person's way of thinking, are also frequently connected with breathing. To some extent, the various religions have developed special breathing exercises and techniques, in order, on the one hand, to build up one's personal life force, but primarily to win access to a divine spiritual principle. Thus, depending on the context, breathing can be defined as 'respiration,' 'rhythm,' 'life,' or 'spirit.' In many ancient languages there is only one word for the concepts of 'breath' and 'spirit'—for example, pneuma in Greek, ruah in Hebrew, iki in Japanese, spiritus in Latin. In Sanskrit, spirit is atman. Atman is regarded as the inner principle of all of a person's intellectual and spiritual activities; it is the part of the being upon which the other life forces depend. Likewise in Old High German, atum wiho, spirit and breath, coincide in designating the Holy Spirit, as well as the respiration of life, or Odem.

Built in the form of a Qur'an lectern, this newly erected gate stands at the frontier of Mecca's haram district. Al-haram means "the sanctuary," and designates a 'sacred, inviolable place' strictly off-limits to non-Muslims at all times. This haram extends, at its narrowest width, from five kilometers from the Ka'aba in all directions, and stretches thirty kilometers to the southeast, enclosing Mount Arafat and all other locations at which the pilgrimage ceremonies take place. During the period of pilgrimage, everyone coming from outside Saudi Arabia must have a pilgrimage visa in his passport in order to set foot in the haram at all. (A. M. Harwazinski)

Breath with the Greeks and Romans

2. a) The Greeks conceived of one of the souls in which they believed as the 'breath soul'—the psyche (Gk., psychein, 'to breathe'), which escapes at death as breath through the mouth. If the breath soul is good, it ascends to heaven; if it is bad, it is devoured by the spirit of the dead and conveyed to the underworld. Furthermore, Greek gods 'in-spired' the emotions and thoughts of heroes, and breath was used to transmit magical, divine powers to mortals. The Romans regarded it as their religious duty to see to it that a dying person's last breath be inhaled by his or her nearest relative, in order that the spirit of the former might continue in existence. Similar usages are found with certain Indian tribes, as with tribes in South Africa and in the Congo.

b) Ruah in Hebrew is the spirit in a person that is created out of God's spirit, and gives the person life. The word Odem, which found wide acceptance upon Luther's using it in his German Bible, contains the root od-, which means 'life power.' In the Genesis account, God creates the human being of a clump of earth, breathing the living breath into his nostrils. Spiritus Sanctus was long translated in the ecclesiastical use of language with the Old High German atum, before the concept of 'spirit' gained currency. The Holy Spirit or Ghost is a 'being of breath': It is presented as divided into corpus (Lat., 'body') and spiramen (Lat., 'breathing'), and living in its power as spiritus sanctus by breathing.

Breath in Islam

c) The Islamic view has parallels to the Hebrew one. Ruh, 'breath,' or 'wind,' is a divine radiation emanating from the left side of the heart, and creating all of the other parts by a breathing: it is the life power that binds the bodily and spiritual principles of human existence. → Sufism knows special breathing exercises, which contain instructions on the exact number and duration of breaths to be drawn, in order to intensify God's call in meditation.

Indian Breathing Techniques

d) In India, 'breath' is the word for personhood, for the self, the life power, and the soul (atman). As early as the Vedic-Brahmanic period, there were sitting and breathing exercises, performed with the help of the syllable om (arisen from a-u-m, a primary sound emitted with intensive exhalation). In the Upanishads there are directions for controlled application of the breathing. This technique is called → yoga, which, along with an ethical, ascetical behavior, requires certain physical postures and comportment: a squatting posture (asana) and breath control (pranayama—control of the breathing cycle in rhythms). The prescribed ascetical behavior includes special rules for taking nourishment, for cultivating physical well being, and so on, as well as when, how often, how, and in what circumstances one 'practices.' All of this—the ethical, ascetical behavior, the postures and the physical comportment—are the prerequisites for a turning within. Learning the technique requires a teacher, since otherwise a body-and-energy overload can easily occur. The breath is drawn and expelled only through the nose, never through the mouth. The rhythm of breathing is divided into units called matraprana. A matra is the unit for one drawn breath. The purpose of this rhythm is to join together the three basic elements of the act of breathing—inhaling (puraka), holding the breath (kumbhaka), and exhaling (recaka)—in one harmonious happening. A favorite rhythm is 1:4:2; beginners often start with 1:2:2. The goal is to open the centers of physical energy, the chakras, in order to find, by way of concentration, the path from the individual 'I' to the universal divine self (atman).

Breath in Buddhism

e) In → Buddhism, along with the bodily position, the basis of meditation is the subjugating of the breath during the breathing cycle (the long and short breaths). The breathing is not controlled; rather the exercise consists in permitting the breath to come and go, in order to train awareness and attention (→ Zen Buddhism). In China, Daoist monks, from earliest times, have cultivated breathing exercises that adopt the movements and positions of animals, in order to find oneness with nature. Another form is embryonic breathing, in seeking to hold the breath lengthily, as in pranayama yoga. Here the purpose is a vital breathing that, bound together with sexual energy, bestows the elixir of life on the heart (fire), spleen or stomach (earth), lungs (metal), liver (wood), and kidneys (water). Breath (qi) is ordered to the masculine principle of the Yang. Yang is the sky, which gives the spirit; Yin is the earth, which gives the body. The spirit, the soul, returns to the sky after death.

In the Eastern Christian Church, Hesychasm is a method of breathing still practiced by certain monks of Mount Athos. The breath is held, the chin is pressed against the breast, and the gaze is directed downward toward the middle of the body, while the Prayer of Jesus is repeated indefinitely.

Breathing is not only necessary to life in a simple physiological sense. Knowledge of the meaning of breath and a consciousness of the possibilities of influencing the breath in an appropriate context broaden the worlds of individual experience, and thereby have an effect on one's identity.

Literature

Banks Findly, Ellison, "Breath and Breathing," in: Encyclopedia of Religion, New York 1987, vol. 1, 302-308; Simon, Rae, Breath Becomes the Wind: Old and New in Karo Religion, Dunedin 1994; Zysk, Kenneth G., "Vital Breath (Prana) in Ancient Indian Medicine and Religion," in: 15th International Symposium on the Comparative History of Medicine—East and West, Tokyo 1995, 33-65.

→ Buddhism, Christianity, Experience, Islam, Meditation, Mysticism, Order/Brotherhood, Soul, Trance, Yoga, Zen Buddhism

Elke Sofie Frohn

Buddha

The Historical Buddha

1. According to tradition, Gautama Buddha, the founder of → Buddhism, was sprung of a noble family of the Śākya people. Presumably he was born in the fifth century BCE (today's research places his life span c. 450–370), the offspring of Śuddkodana and Māyā(devī), in the border region between today's Nepal and India, and given the name Siddhārtha. Shortly after the birth of his son, Rahula, deeply stirred by a meditative experience, he left his family and began to embrace various salvation doctrines, from which he hoped to gain knowledge concerning deliverance from the cycle of rebirths.

Early Buddhism did not represent the Buddha in the form of a human being. Instead, symbols graphically represent his presence—an impressed pillow, the wheel of the teaching, the tree of enlightenment, or the imprint of two feet. Only gradually does an anthropomorphic imagery of the Buddha make its appearance. Meanwhile the old symbols continued to be applied. And thus, today, ornamental footprints still recall the Buddha's wandering life, along whose course he announced to suffering human beings his message of salvation, and thereby indicated to them the road to deliverance from the cycle of rebirths. The picture shows a devout Nepalese Buddhist woman bowing before the footprints at the Svayambhu Temple in Katmandu.

At last, after a search lasting twelve years, one characterized first by an extreme → asceticism, and then by the practice of immersion in yogic concentration (→ Yoga), he attained to the liberating insight that he sought, in Uruvelā, today's Bodh Gaya (south of Patna, Bihar). Siddhārtha came to be called the Buddha, the 'awakened one.' He showed the 'middle way' leading to release from the torment of existence to his five companions—companions who had once abandoned him when he gave up the severe asceticism which had led to the brink of death. According to Buddhist tradition, the Order was established as the Buddha made them his disciples. Subsequently, the number of the Buddha's followers speedily grew, wealthy laity bestowed numerous groves on the Order, monasteries were established, and the order of nuns was founded. After more than forty years of itinerant teaching, the Buddha died at the age of eighty, at Kuśinagara.

Mythologization

2. There can be no doubt as to the Buddha's historicity. He was one of numerous ascetics who traversed northern India in the fifth century BCE, seeking the knowledge that would lead to release from the endless cycle of rebirths and attracting likeminded disciples. And the ancient texts portraying his life and works depict him throughout as an ordinary human being. However, this life history has to a great extent been reworked on hagiographical patterns, and a basic freedom of hagiographical molding has permitted an altogether serene extension of existing texts with further, legendary, elements. Moreover, from a very early date, the Buddha was regarded as a Cakravartin, a world-conquering hero (through his teaching), so that reports concerning his person have acquired traits of a heroic vita. As one approaches the texts purporting to represent the Buddha's person from a perspective informed by religious and literary studies, familiar patterns emerge. (a) His birth is no more commonplace than his conception. His mother, while not a virgin, becomes pregnant without the intervention of the father. He is born not by way of the birth canal, but from her right side. (b) Far from homeland and family, he engages in a bitter contest with Mara, the power of evil—the Buddha's great exploit, the hero's 'struggle with the dragon.' More 'battles' ensue (and the Buddha converts a thousand Brahmans through the display of his supernatural power). (c) As his birth, so his death is attended with miracles.

Conception of the Buddha's Form

3. Buddhism itself has been concerned with the figuration of the Buddha from earliest times. In the apprehension of ancient Buddhism, through his physical death the Buddha has forsaken worldly existence for good and all, so that henceforward and forever he consists only in the form of his teaching—'a god dead since his nirvana.' Conceptions appeared early, then, guaranteeing the presence of the Buddha in the world. The school of the Mahāsānghika-Lokottaravādins, who maintain a docetist position, saw in the Buddha a super-worldly being, of immeasurable life span, who, purely for the good of the beings of earth, had appeared in the form of a (mortal) human being, namely, (the historical) Gautama Buddha. But the most successful concept was based on the notion of a multiplicity of Buddhas. Ancient Buddhism itself had treated the Buddha as one of the Seven Buddhas, who had made their appearance, at measurelessly great intervals of time, in order to announce their message of salvation to those struggling for release; and it acknowledged in Maitreya still another Buddha, destined to appear in a distant future. Over the course of time, the number of Buddhas further increased, although the concept was maintained that but one Buddha could come forward at any one time in the same world-system. Mahāyāna Buddhism broke with this. It taught that there are many world systems, and Buddhas as many as the grains of sand along the bottom of the Ganges. Thereby the Buddha lost his quality as the Buddha once-for-all, and 'buddhahood' could become a new salvific goal. Now an important development was that the effectiveness of the (future) Buddhas, the bodhisattvas, shifted to the time before their attainment of salvific knowledge: they could work in the world; indeed, out of compassion for living beings, many renounced their own release altogether, and now there was no time limit to their effectiveness for salvation.

Representations and Cultic Practice

4. Corresponding to the differences in the conception of the form and nature of the Buddha, in Mahāyāna Buddhism the Buddha is worshiped as a god, of whom believers hope for active assistance in their struggle for liberation, while in Theravāda Buddhism he is venerated as the one who, of all human beings, at last discovered the way to release, and along this way attained to his goal, nirvana: he is the exemplar to be emulated, and honor paid to him serves the believer first and foremost as a way of visualizing his characteristic virtues. The most common manifestation of this cultic reverence is in the presentation of the Buddha in figured form. This image becomes the object of various ceremonial actions, such as bathing, adorning, crowning with flowers, and incensing; the believer bows humbly before it, and prayers are addressed to it. Elements of the Hindu pūjā were assimilated in these practices. To Buddhism's great geographical expanse corresponds the multiplicity of the Buddha's representations, from the gaunt ascetic of Indian art, to the sublime, godlike image of Tibet, to the corpulent Bronze of Chinese tradition. Great statues of the Buddha, ordinarily fashioned of twigs and leaves, dominate the midpoint of the Vesak Festival, celebrated annually in May by Buddhists of all countries, to recall the Buddha's birth, enlightenment, and death, all of which, according to tradition, occurred on the same day of the calendar. In the West, a wide public was acquainted with the figure of the Buddha not least through Hermann Hesse's novel Siddhartha. The wisdom and unworldliness of the Buddha has made recent appeal to a growing number of those yearning for inner peace, and striving for values beyond consumption and material profit.

Literature

Bareau, André, Recherches sur la biographie du Buddha dans les Sūtrapiṭaka et les Vinayapiṭaka anciens, I-III, Paris 1963-1995; Nanamoli, Bhikkhu, The Life of the Buddha, Kandy 1972 ; Oldenberg, Hermann, Buddha. Sein Leben, seine Lehre, seine Gemeinde, Stuttgart [13]1959; Reynolds, F./Hallisey, Ch., "The Buddha," in: Kitagawa, J. M./Cummings, M. D. (eds.), Buddhism and Asian History, New York 1989, 29-49; Roscoe, Gerald, The Buddha's Life: Man, Myth and Fable, Bangkok 1992; Schober, Juliane (ed.), Sacred Biography in the Buddhist Traditions of South and Southeast Asia, Honolulu 1997; Thomas, E. J., The Life of the Buddha as Legend and History, London 1927; Idem, The Quest of Enlightenment: A Selection of the Buddhist Scriptures Translated from the Sanskrit, London 1950.

→ Buddhism, Guru, Master/Pupil, Monasticism, Order/Brotherhood, Zen Buddhism

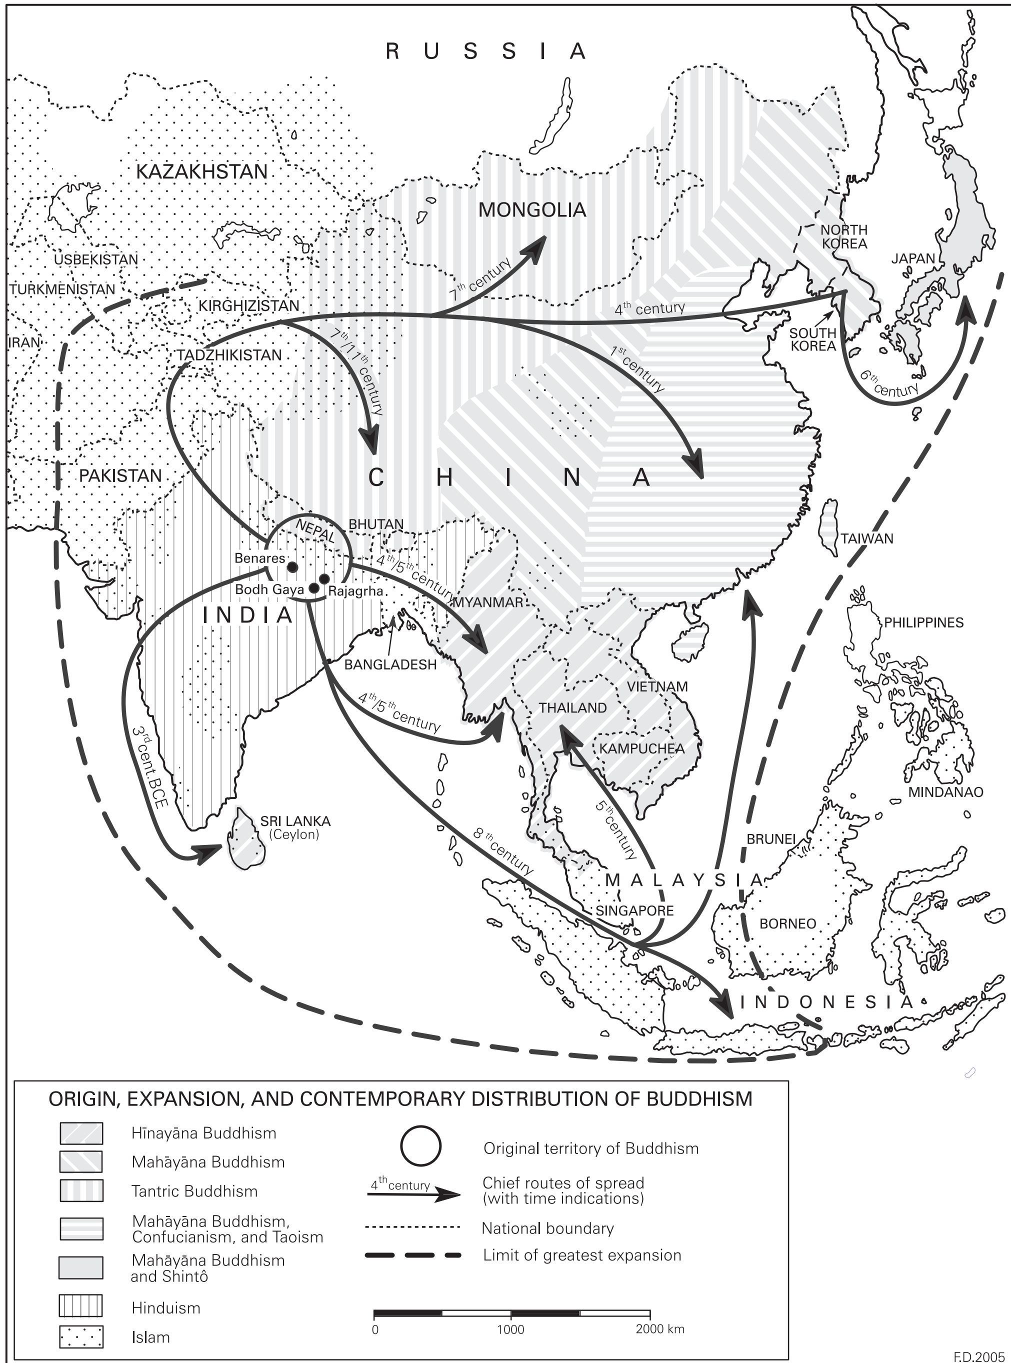
Thomas Oberlies

Buddhism

Concept

1. 'Buddhism' is the term used to denote the religion descending from the ascetic movement founded by Gautama → Buddha. To be sure, the teachings of early Buddhism have been developed in very different ways over the course of time. A large number of schools, at times with considerably divergent philosophical systems and corresponding monastic rules, were and are scattered across an immense geographical space (today nearly all of Asia, with the exception of India, Buddhism's land of origin). The three great directions are Tantric (→ Tantra), Mahāyāna (Northern), and Hīnayāna (Southern) Buddhism. To the last named belongs today's most important form, Theravada, which prevails in Sri Lanka and Southeast Asia.



Geographical Expansion

2. The Buddha's resolve to share his knowledge with others was the exemplary act imitated by the monks. Sent by the Buddha, they went forth and proclaimed the great teaching to others who strove for release from the cycle of rebirths. This missionary activity, altogether foreign to → Hinduism (even, basically, today), led to the rapid spread of the still young religion. Of decisive consequence here was the royal protection that Buddhism enjoyed. Under Maurya king Aśoka (268–232 BCE), it became the state religion and penetrated not only most parts of the Indian subcontinent, but also India's neighboring lands.

While Buddhism flourished in these lands, its time in India gradually ended, as the Hindu religion waxed in strength in the first centuries CE. The monastic universities of Bihar and Bengali were completely destroyed by the troops of Muhammad Ghuri—Nālandā in 1197, Vikramaśīla in 1203—and Buddhism's fate on Indian soil was sealed. Almost simultaneously, Buddhism was promoted to the status of state religion in two of India's neighboring countries: Burma at the end of the eleventh century and Siam near the end of the thirteenth. And in these countries, as also in Ceylon (Sri Lanka), it maintains this role down to the present day.

Cultic veneration of the Buddha at first played a subordinate role in Buddhism. It was recognized only as a means of producing a salvific state of consciousness. In the course of time, however, the wish spread, especially from the side of the laity, for a piety that could be practiced on a daily basis. On models borrowed from the various Hindu religions, an elaborate cult developed, at whose midpoint stands the representational image of the Buddha and various bodhisattvas. Here, in a little Buddhist temple in Hong Kong, a monk makes his daily meditation. (T. Oberlies)

Of special importance for the further history of Buddhism was the patronage of the Kuṣāṇas. Their realm stretched over the territory of today's Pakistan and Afghanistan, far into Central Asia. The political stability of this enormous empire favored the spread of Buddhism from Northwest India to Sogdia in the far West, and along the → silk route to China. From China it penetrated Vietnam and Korea in the fourth century CE, and in the seventh century Japan. From India's east coast Buddhism reached Burma, Kampuchea, and Indonesia; from the north, in the seventh century, it traversed the Himalayan Pass to Tibet, whence it came once more to the Mongols and the Manchus.

Teaching

3. As for nearly all of the religious and philosophical systems of India, the cycle of rebirths and the effect of karma are a basic given in Buddhism (→ Reincarnation). The present existence is not the first, nor in all likelihood will it be the last, and the mode and manner of each is determined by karma, the sum of a being's good and evil deeds. Regardless of its actual quality, the 'being' of this life, in Buddhism's appraisal, is basically one of suffering. Thus, the goal of Buddhism is a complete and definitive liberation from the painful transience of life. This can be attained through the recognition, and definitive elimination, of the factors leading to a birth eternally replicated, and with it to suffering endlessly repeated—namely that of the demand for sensory satisfaction and, especially, for new existence. This occurs through the *contemplation of the Four Noble Truth*s, which means: (1) that all of the elements composing being, and therefore composing earthly personhood, are elements of suffering; (2) that the cause of this suffering is desire and craving, which leads to rebirth ever and again; (3) that this suffering can come to an end when desire and craving are completely eliminated; and (4) that one can reach this goal by means of the practice of right view, right intent, right speech, right conduct, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration. The final member is the decisive moment of the Noble Eightfold Path: by means of meditative absorption, a person can gain the redemptive insight: recognition and knowledge of the Four Noble Truths. The Buddhist practice of meditative absorption consists in a series of spiritual exercises—for example, the practice of the Unbounded, in which the subject radiates, to all points of the skies, the feelings, in succession, of benevolence, compassion, joy, and equanimity—or the trancelike kasina meditations; or the satipatthana visualizations (observation of one's breathing and other bodily functions); or the meditative or objective consideration of the various stages of the decomposition of a corpse.

Rules of the Order

4. In the components, right speech and right conduct, of the Noble Path the seeker after liberation is prescribed to refrain from untrue, slanderous, gross, or rash speech; from the wounding or killing of living beings, from the unlawful appropriation of possessions; and from all sexual activity. Right manner of life consists in abstinence from more than one meal a day, from observing dance presentations and from like pleasures, from the use of garlands or balms, from sleeping on luxurious bedding, and so on. Suchlike prescriptions and prohibitions, whose observance is an indispensable prerequisite if release from the cycle of rebirths is to be effected, are collected in the Vinayapitaka, the code of Buddhist monastic regulations. The core of Buddhist penal law is the Prātimoksasūtra. It lists the transgressions, divided into eight parts, which monks and (with variations) nuns must not commit. At the beginning come the transgressions on whose grounds a monk is excluded from the Order forever: (1) the prohibition of all manner of sexual contact, (2) the prohibition of serious theft, (3) the prohibition of the killing of a human being, and (4) the prohibition of false presumption of spiritual perfections and supernatural characteristics. In its procedural as well as in its monastic law, Buddhism is indebted to the earlier Vedic religion (→ Hinduism). Hence the Order has adopted ceremonies modeled after age-old rituals. The Pabbajā, or reception of a novice, with shearing of the head and beard, precedes the Upasampadā, or ordination as monk (with an analogous procedure for nuns). The first step may be taken as early as the eighth year, and the second at twenty, a time frame corresponding to that of the Brahmanic ritual of initiation. Of equal importance, for the existence of the community, to that of the consecration of the novice and the monk, is the semi-monthly confessional celebration, the Uposatha, in the course of which the Prātimokṣasūtra, the confessional formula, is recited. The Uposatha is celebrated throughout the nights before full and half-moon, in an assembly of a minimum of four full-fledged monks. In the tradition of Theravāda Buddhism, freedom from transgression is a prerequisite for participation for the celebration of the Uposatha. Admission of a transgression normally comes before the recitation of the Prātimokṣa. Of the various Buddhist rituals, we may mention the Kaṭhina celebration, among the great religious feasts of the Southeast Asian lands still today. Here the Order receives (mostly from laity) monks' attire, or the material of which it is made.

5. True, the monk does not make a vow to renounce possessions, but he is expected to live in the most extreme poverty. He has but three articles of clothing, a cincture, a begging bowl, a small knife, a needle, and a water strainer, that he can call his own. He lives on contributions of food that he receives on his daily alms rounds. He does have leave to accept personal invitations to meals, but he is forbidden to receive gifts otherwise. Lay devotees must care for monks, as the latter have completely rejected worldly life (which is still true today in Burma, on a monk's daily alms route). Thus, from earliest times, the Order has been attended by a circle of laity, who continue with their secular lives, but who have 'taken refuge with the Buddha, the Teaching, and the Community.' Lay Buddhists are bound not by strict rejection of the world, but—at least on the days of the Uposatha (see section 4)—by the renunciation of the 'killing of living beings, acquiring things that have not been bestowed, false speech, unchastity, and the ingestion of alcoholic or other intoxicating beverages.' On these days, the laity who would pursue the stricter discipline fast, sleep on the bare earth, and abstain from the use of any cosmetics. For this ethically and morally good behavior, which is requited with the legacy of good karma through their acts of generosity, the laity anticipate a recompense in heaven and in a better rebirth. There, as nuns and monks, they can strive for their release. Only in Mahāyāna Buddhism was the opportunity finally offered of liberation in the here and now, through a corresponding manner of life.

Development of the Buddhist Order

5. In a narrow sense, the Saṅgha, the Buddhist Order, is made up only of the monks and nuns who were the Buddha's direct interlocutors. Even in the wider sense, Theravāda Buddhism regards the female monastic tradition as extinct, and only the tradition of the monks continues to be acknowledged. A principle received in ancient times delineates that the Saṅgha consists of four parts—monks, nuns, male and female lay disciples—thus taking into account the importance of the laity in and for Buddhism, even though they are not organized. In days of old, the Order was extensively modeled after the ancient republican states, and knew practically no hierarchical organization. The highest authority was the Buddha, and all monks had identical rights and duties, irrespective of the caste from which they came. The only ranking was that according to seniority of ordination. Early enough, however, and over the course of time, this principle of equality gradually fell into disuse. The Buddhist texts leave no doubt that the Order, with its strict discipline, was created as a framework in which the human being, freed from all worldly ties and obligations, can strive after the realization of nirvāṇa, or deliverance. Thus, the discipline of the Order is the formal aspect of morality, the point of departure and foundation of the path to liberation. Accordingly, the rules of the Order compose an integral element of the monk's spiritual exercise and practice. Even the economic situation of the respective Buddhist communities depends directly on the observance of these rules. Only that community whose monks lead a pure and observant life is worthy of munificence in the eyes of the laity. Only a like community is accepted as a promising 'merit field' in which it is worthwhile to invest. The account of the first serious disagreement in the community, while the Buddha was actually still living, is a clear demonstration: the dispute was settled because the laity refused to feed the monks until they had settled their quarrel.

Relationship of Monks, Nuns, and Laity

7. A most intimate relationship prevails between monks and laity, especially in countries where every male Buddhist enters the Order at least once in his lifetime—and usually on more than one occasion, almost always before taking a wife—as in Burma, Kampuchea, Laos, and Thailand today. Indeed, this temporary monasticism offers large prospects of social promotion. Monks and laity live in a symbiotic rapport—after all, each of the two groups provides the other with an opportunity to gain merit, and thereby to make a contribution to their karma 'account.' And since, for the ordinary Buddhist—monk or lay person—nirvana is far too remote and intangible a goal to be striven for immediately, religious praxis focuses on the gaining of merit. Monks recite and explain the sacred texts to the laity, conduct for them the ceremony of the Paritta, a kind of protective spell or charm, and function as their 'priests' on other religious occasions, as at blessing of the home, at weddings, or at funerals. The laity afford the monks material support. Little has changed here in the course of centuries. A very ancient text of the Theravada Canon reads: "Great utility, O monks, the masters of the house provide to you, for they impart to you raiment, victuals, roof, and remedy when you ail. And great comfort, as well, O monks, are ye to the masters of the house, for ye announce to them the teaching, [. . .] and show them the blameless way of life. In this wise, in mutual dependency, monks and the masters of the house lead a pure life, with the goal of crossing the torrent of saṃsāra [the cycle of rebirths] and putting an end to suffering. In mutual dependency, you make this good teaching to prosper [. . .]." This exchange of life sustenance for 'spiritual service rendered,' occurs, for instance, on the days of the Uposatha (see section 4), when laity visit the nearest monastery to provide its residents with food, or, on special occasions, to invite them to share a meal; and reciprocally, when monks bear forth the sacred texts. Such generosity is of great importance to the laity, for, in terms of a widespread viewpoint in Buddhist lands, they are able to transfer the merit thus acquired to the account of departed relatives, or to others, and thereby offer them the prospect of a better rebirth. This transfer of merit corresponds to the cult of → ancestors in other religions. Merit can also be gained by → pilgrimage to holy places, or by the maintenance of the pagodas called stūpas—originally, monuments that housed relics of the Buddha. The laity can also acquire merit by ransoming animals intended for slaughter, or held in cages, and releasing them in their natural environment.

Current Situation

8. Not without reason is Buddhism regarded as an uncommonly tolerant religion. In its long history, few wars have been waged in its name (but see → Conflict/Violence [illustration]), and the cohabitation of monks of altogether divergent Buddhist schools in the same monastery has never presented any difficulties. As it is for its tolerance, this religion is distinguished for its flexibility. Not only is it the affair of each individual what degree of bodily privation he or she mean to embrace, or what vows to assume; neither is the meaning of ritual and worship for practical living called in question, however foreign these may have been to original Buddhism. After all, the existence of powerful goddesses, gods, and spirits, that intervene both positively and negatively in the life of human persons, is undisputed. (It is, therefore, an utterly inadmissible simplification to refer to Buddhism as a religion without God—as an atheistic religion.) Thus, in many Buddhist lands, → amulets, to cite but one instance, are an important component of religious life, and Buddhist monks are quite decisively engaged in the production of protective talismans. This flexibility also distinguishes Buddhism's relationship to society and state. The religion was inculturated in the most varied forms of rule and government, and the most diverse cultures, and it always succeeded in maintaining is characteristic imprint. Since Buddhism's supreme goal is to indicate to human beings a supra-worldly condition of salvation, it has seldom called the concrete social order into question, and this has repeatedly brought upon it the reproach that it is little concerned with daily human needs.

The connection between a philosophy bent on practical aims (in the form of an analysis of an existence identified as one of suffering) and a manner of life that includes techniques of → meditation and → yoga (and, in Zen, of combat), as well as a worship that speaks to the senses—often coupled, it is true, with presentations stemming from Orientalist discourse—has awakened a fascination in the Westerner, and this not only at the critical moments of the past century (→ Esalen Institute; New Age). A life of personally attained inner peace, above the suffering and helplessness of daily life, and a life of a discovery of oneself, has appealed to seekers of all psychological and cultural hues, at different stages in their life and in different social strata. Philosophers like Schopenhauer, musicians like Yehudi Menuhin, scientists and authors, as well as beatniks and New Age spiritists, have all yielded to its magnetism. A Western adaptation of Buddhism, accompanied by the foundation of numerous communities, has not, admittedly, come off without dogmatic encrustations or internal schisms.

Literature

Sources: Conze, E., Buddhist Scriptures, London 1959.

Secondary Literature: Bechert, H./Gombrich, R. (eds.), The World of Buddhism: Buddhist Monks and Nuns in Society and Culture, London 1984; Conze, E. (ed.), Buddhist Texts Through the Ages, New York 1954; Gethin, R., The Foundations of Buddhism, Oxford/New York 1998; Gombrich, R., Theravāda Buddhism: A Social History from Ancient Benares to Modern Colombo, London/New York 1988; Harris, A. (ed.), Buddhism and Politics in Twentieth-Century Asia, London 1999; Harvey, P., An Introduction to Buddhism: Teachings, History and Practices, Cambridge 1990; Hirakawa, A., A History of Indian Buddhism: From Sakyamuni to Early Mahayana, Hawaii 1990; Lamotte, É., History of Indian Buddhism, Louvain 1988; Paul, D., Women in Buddhism, Berkeley etc. 1985; Roscoe, G., A Guide to Buddhism for the Westerner, Bangkok 1990; Idem, The Monastic Life: Pathway of the Buddhist Monk, Bangkok 1992;

Shopen, G., Bones, Stones, and Buddhist Monks, Honolulu 1997; Williams, P./Tribe, A., Buddhist Thought: A Complete Introduction to the Indian Tradition, London/New York 2000.

→ Asceticism, Buddha, China/Japan/Korea; Indian Subcontinent, Meditation, Monasticism, Order/Brotherhood, Tibet, Zen Buddhism

Thomas Oberlies

Buddhism: Time Chart

1. Chronology

Era 1: Early Doctrinal Development and First Expansion

4th/5th cent. BCE	Lifetime of the historical Buddha in the North of India	The biographical dates of Siddhartha Gautama, who, after his awakening (bodhi), is called the Buddha, cannot be determined with certainty.
until 1st cent. BCE	Early Buddhism in India First "Councils:" Oral transmission	Tradition reports 'councils' (probably local assemblies of monks) for agreement on doctrine and the Order's law, immediately after the Buddha's death in Rajagrha, and 100 years later in Vaishali.
268–232	Rule of Maurya King Ashoka	Ashoka leaves numerous edicts on cliffs and pillars, in which he recommends Buddhist doctrine and ethics. Buddhism reaches Southern India.
	Sthaviravada and Mahasanghika	In the time of Ashoka, a third council is said to have been held, in Pataliputra. Differences of opinion over the rules of the Order lead to the formation of two distinct branches (nikaya): Sthaviravada (Doctrine of the Elders) and Mahasanghika (Grand Community). Doctrinal divergences reign as to the status of the 'redeemed person' (arhat).

	First Schools of Buddhism	A multiplicity of 'schools' appear, among them: Lokottaravada (from Mahasanghika), from the doctrine of the transcendent (lokottara), eternal Buddha. Vatsiputria, Puggalavada, from Sthaviravada; the reincarnated 'person' (puggala). Relativization of the not-I (anatta). Sarvastivada (from Sthaviravada); sarvam asti (everything exists, that is, all factors of being, including past and future). Sautrantika: only the sutras, and not the Abhidharma, are acknowledged. Theravada (Pali equivalent of "Sthaviravada"): the only surviving non-Mahayana school, with Pali as its sacred language; the Buddha as human teacher of an attainable path of salvation: systematic doctrine in the Abhidhamma, in Pali.

around 3rd cent. BCE–6th cent. CE	Expansion into the region of Gandhara, around the city of Taxila Milindapanha ("The questions of Milinda/ Menander")	In Northwest India, and in North of today's Afghanistan and Pakistan, Buddhism is proclaimed under changing rule (Indo-Greek, Maurya Empire, Scythians, Kusana Empire, and others). The Milindapanha is a literary testimonial of Buddhist presence under King Menander (first century BCE). The Greco-Roman Ghandhara scores the Buddha's presentation in human form.
from 3rd cent. BCE	Sri Lanka: Linking of Buddhism and Singhalese Rule	King Devanampiya Tissa (247–207) promotes Theravada Buddhism, which becomes established on the island. In connection with the ever-recurring conflicts between Singhalese and Tamil, the former identify Buddhism with the Singhalese state. King and monastic orders stand in a close mutual relationship. The monks win the status of landlords.
1st cent. BCE	Written transmission of the Pali Canon	Written down for the first time in Sri Lanka, on palm leaves. These are preserved in three baskets (Pali: Tipitaka).
Era 2: Emergence of Mahayana Buddhism (Great Vehicle) in India
1st cent. BCE–6th cent. CE	Further development of Indian Buddhism	In the sutras of the Mahayana, the Emergence of Mahayana	concept of "emptiness" (shunyata) appears. The new ideal is the bodhisattva, who, with wisdom (prajna) and compassion, strives for the well-being and salvation of all living things. Cult and popular piety have status with the bodhisattvas, with the Buddha Amitabha as defender of the 'blessed land' Sukhavati, and with the 'future Buddha' Maitreya.

	Indian monasteries as cultural and economic centers	Endowments result in extensive monastery landholdings. At first, monks hold and live diverging doctrinal views, but, in many places, hold the same discipline of the Order under one roof. The most important monastery university is Nalanda.
around 2nd cent.	Nagarjuna founds the Madhyamika School (School of the "Middle Way")	He systematizes the doctrine of making one's appearance, of the coming to reality, in dependency and emptiness, as well as the distinction between conventional and higher truth.
around 4th cent.	Yogacara (Vijnanavada) School	Asanga and Vasubandhu compose important works of the school, which assigns great value to the practice of yoga and the reality of consciousness (vijnana).

Era 3: Buddhism reaches Central Asia

from 1st cent. CE	Buddhism reaches Central Asia	In the oasis cities of the Tarim Basin, along the Silk Route, Buddhism comes in contact with Manichaeism, Nestorian Christianity, and Zoroastrianism. Now Buddhist art and multilingual literature attain their zenith. From the seventh and eighth centuries, Islamization slowly weakens Buddhism. It endures longest on the border with China.
from 1st cent. CE	First Buddhists in China	Merchants, monks, and legations, under way along the trade route, carry Buddhism to China. First texts are translated.
2nd cent. CE	Introduction of Buddhism in Vietnam	Beginning in 111 BCE, North Vietnam is a Chinese province. Confucianism and Buddhism (Mahayana) play a role among the ruling class.
221–589	Political instability in China State patronage in the North	Governors not of Chinese extraction in the North give the advantage to representatives of Buddhism, as a counterpoise to native Confucianism, and as vehicles of magical capabilities. The number of monasteries rises to the thousands.

344/50–413	Translator Kumarajiva	Outstanding among Central Asian translators of Buddhist Sanskrit texts into Chinese.
399–413	Faxian travels to India	After his return, the Southern Chinese monk translates texts that he has brought with him, and publishes a travel report.
from 5th cent.	Jingtu School (School of the Pure Land)	Systematization of the popular veneration of the Amithaba Buddha (in Chin., Omitofu).
4th–6th cent.	First Buddhists in Korea Five Teachings (ogyo)	Buddhism is introduced from China, 530–531: Vinaya School (Kyeryul, Yul). Gradually, five schools based on writing.
around 5th cent.–10th cent.	First testimonials of Buddhism in Burma	The beginnings of Buddhism in this region are not known. Mahayana, Tantra, and Theravada reach the realms of Pyu, Mon, and Pagan.
from 6th cent. (528 or 552)	Introduction at the Japanese Imperial Court	The court religion taken over from Korea is expected to have positive effects on rainfall and harvest, as well as on procedures for the healing of the sick. Further cultural elements such as Chinese script are introduced with Buddhism. Regent Shotoku-Taishi promotes the new religion.

581–618	Sui Dynasty in China Tiantai School	Unification of the Empire in 589. Yang Jian (Gaou), who reigned from 581–604, appeals to Buddhist content for political purposes. From 538–97, on Zhuyi, the Tiantai School grows weak.
before 7th cent. (beginning is not known)	Indian influence in Indonesia Srivijaya Empire (6th to 13th centuries, center on Sumatra) Shailendra Dynasty on Java	Hinduism and Buddhism arrive in the island world of Indonesia, in the baggage of Indian merchants and colonizers. Various directions, such as Sarvastivada, at first flank one another. Then, toward the end of the seventh centry, Mahayana and Tantric Buddhism become dominant. From the end of the eighth century, sacred architecture appears in central Java, especially the monumental stupa complex of Borobudur.
Era 4: Tantra and Chan. Gradual disappearance from India
7th cent.	Tantric Buddhism gains in importance in India	Reported as early as the fourth century, the Tantric direction comes into full bloom. The → Tantra texts are of an esoteric character, that is, understandable only in a connection with personal instruction. A gradual transcendence of contraries proceeds by means of a symbolical representation of spiritual events.

7th–13th cent.	Centers of monastic culture in Kashmir, Bengali, and Southern India	In the reports of Chinese pilgrim Xuanzang, from 629–45, it is the reputation of several thousand monasteries throughout India that considerable land holdings are at their disposal.
around 800	Founding of the monastic university of Vikramashila	It becomes a Tantric center of education and formation. From here, monks are sent to Tibet.
	Progressive replacement of Buddhism by Hinduism and Islam	The patronage of the monasteries by rulers, local elites, and other laity diminishes. With the Islamic conquest, the remaining monasteries are destroyed (among them, Nalanda in 1199, Vikramashila in 1203). Indian Buddhism vanishes, Hinduism abides, Islam is added as a new religion.
618–907	Tang Dynasty in China Buddhism flourishes Monasteries as an economic force	Monasteries participate in charitable services, and in public building projects and landscaping, and enjoy exemption from taxation. Along with newly appearing directions, such as Chan, Huayan, and Tantra, the Amitabha devotion is as popular as ever.
	Chan School	Named after 'meditation,' in Sanskrit dhyana, it appeals to the historically intangible founding personality, Boddhidarma, who is supposed to have come to China in the sixth century.

	Huayan, Xianshou, or Faxiang School (in Jap.: Kegon)	It is founded on the Avatamsaka Sutra ("Garland of Blossom Sutra"). The authority is Xuan-zang (602–664), who undertakes a pilgrimage to India, and brings texts to China.
705–774	Amoghavajra (in Chin., Bukong)	After journeys through India and Sri Lanka, this Tantric lives in China, and is patronized by the Imperial Court as magician and translator of Tantric texts.
845	Persecution of Buddhism in China, and extensive seizure of monasteries	At the instigation of the Confucian elite, the monasteries are dispossessed of land holdings and slaves. Many of them are destroyed, and thousands of monks and nuns are reduced to the lay state.
668–918	Silla period in Korea Son School	Sinhaeng (704–779) founds the meditation school S*on*, the Korean variant of the Chinese Chan. It subsequently develops the schools of the "Nine Mountains."
710–784	Nara period in Japan The six schools of Nara	Six schools exist: Sanron (Madhyamika), Jojitsu, Hosso (yogacara), Kusha, Kegon

		(in Chin., Huayan), and Risshu (Vinaya). The monasteries are tax-exempt, and their landholdings increase through bequests.
794–1185	Heian age in Japan Tendai School and Shingon School	804: Saicho (Dengyo Daishi, 767–822) and Kukai (Kobo Daishi, 774–835) travel to China with a legation. The former subsequently founds the Tendai School (after the Chinese Tiantai) on Mount Hiei. On Mount Koya-san, Kukai founds the Great Temple of Shingon (in Chin., Zhenyan, "School of the True Word"), an esoteric direction influenced by the Tantra.
10th–11th cent.	Japanese monasteries as a military force	Conflicts among the monasteries and with the state. Gradual militarization of the large monasteries and appointment of monk-lords.
918–1392	Koryo Age in Korea	Buddhism is sanctioned by the state. Membership in the Order grows, as do monastic holdings. The order acquires political influence.
960–1279	Song Dynasty in China	Several Chinese schools exist side by side. The most dynamic is the Chan School.

968–1400	Vietnamese Northern Empire Thien (in Chin., Chan) Pure Land	Imperial endorsements of Buddhism, introduction of texts, erection of temples and monasteries. Buddhism and folk religion make a connection; also Daoist and Confucianist influences are notable. The emperors of the Ly and Tran Dynasties are usually also members of the Order. The most important school directions are meditation school Thien, and the School of the Pure Land.
1260–1367	Mongolian Yuan Dynasty in China	Preference for tantric Buddhism.
13th–15th cent.	Islam arrives in Indonesia	Hinduism and Buddhism, meanwhile present in extensively syncretistic form, retreat before Islamization, but do not altogether disappear.
Era 5: Independent Japanese schools are founded
1185–1333	Japan: Kamakura Age and first Shogun government (from 1192)	Buddhism adopts specific Japanese forms, that help it to popularity.
1133–1212	Genku (Honen Schonin), founder of the Jodo-shu (School of the Pure Land)	Popular veneration of the Buddha Amisa (Amitabha) has its institutionalization in 1198. The new school teaches a rebirth in the 'Pure Land' of Sukhavati by a patronage of the Amida Buddha and its invocation as religious practice.

1173–1262	Shinran Shonin, founder of the Jodo-shinshu (True School of the Pure Land)	He interprets the formula of invocation as a pure expression of gratitude for the act of grace experienced. The widespread notion that we live in a degenerative age contributes to the further notion that, instead of liberation by one's own power (jiriki), as Zen teaches it, Shinran Shonin places his confidence in the succoring support of another (tariki). His school renounces celibacy, and attains exceptional popularity.
1141–1215	Eisai, founder of Rinzai Zen (in Chin., Linji)	The centers of gravity in religious praxis lie in koan meditation and zazen (seated meditation). Interest in Rinzai practice on the part of the warrior nobility occasions the development of martial arts.
1200–1253	Dogen, founder of Soto Zen (in Chin., Caotong)	The school develops rather a monastically orientated direction, around the principal temple of Eiheiji, and a popular direction soon represented by many village temples.
1253	Nichiren School	Nichiren (1222–1282) founds a direction of his own on the basis of the Lotus Sutra, and nationalistic conceptualizations, and enters into conflict with other schools as well as with the government. As a popular religious practice, he recommends the recitation of the formula "Veneration to the sutra of the lotus of the good law."

16th cent.	Strengthening of the Shogun's central political power	The powerful monasteries, especially that of the Tendai School on Mount Hiei, are subjected to the military.
Era 6: Flourishing of Theravada Buddhism in Sri Lanka and Southeast Asia
9th–12th cent.	The Sangha in Sri Lanka	The Sangha ('Monastic Order') assumes a key role in society. The monasteries are the largest landholders of the island, and have political influence. The Sangha experiences setbacks under Southeast Indian/Tamil rule.
889–1431	Kampuchea: Khmer Empire of Angkor	India is the origin of both Hinduism and (Mahayana) Buddhism, which exist in syncretistic forms. Monumental sacred architecture is erected in the capital city. In the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, Theravada gains the upper hand.
1044–1287	Pagan Dynasty in Burma State patronage of Theravada	Theravada, Mahayana, and Tantra, have long existed in the Great Burmese Empire. In piety and religiosity, Theravada's veneration of future

		Buddha Maitreya and endowment of religious edifices play a prominent role.
1065	Renewal of the monastic tradition in Sri Lanka	Once more come to power, the Singhalese introduce monastic ordination from Burma.
1153–1186	Parakkamabahu I unifies the Sangha in Sri Lanka	The King subordinates the Abhayagiri monks to the competing Mahavira. Village and forest monks adopt respectively distinct roles.
13th cent.	The Thai population immigrates to the area of Thailand Introduction of Theravada	The rulers of Sukothai support Theravada, adopted from Sri Lanka around 1250. Several Sangha reforms are sanctioned from the side of the state.
1287–1752	Small states in Burma and Second Burmese Empire	Mongols overcome the Empire of Pagan, later to be replaced by the Shan (Thai). Again, the Shan rulers take over Buddhist-controlled rural culture. In the capital of Pegu, the Order is subjected to state control. Borrowed from Sri Lanka, and through the efforts of King Dhammaceti (1472–1492), the ordination or monks prevails.
14th cent.–1569 and 1592–1767	Thailand: Ayuthia is capital of a Siamese empire	The city becomes a center of Theravada, with many sacred buildings. With the Burmese conquest, the city is destroyed and the Empire dissolved.

14th–16th cent.	Collapse of political unity and downfall of Buddhism in Sri Lanka	Monks who are large landholders neglect and ignore the rules of the Order, the obligation of celibacy, and the monastic garb. The monastic lifestyle is maintained only among the forest monks.
1434–1863	Peak time of Theravada in Kampuchea	The capital Phnom-Penh is partly under Thai or Vietnamese rule. A Vietnamese annexation in 1841 is accompanied by the destruction of many places of worship. In 1849 the reformed Dhammayuttika-Nikaya is introduced from Thailand.
16th–18th cent.	Wars in Southeast Asia legitimated by religious promises	With a number of wars between Birman, Mon, and the Thai empires, Buddhism, Kingship, and the consciousness of a national task are amalgamated.
Era 7: East Asian Buddhism on the defensive vis-à-vis Confucianism
1368–1644	Ming Dynasty in China	Limitations on Buddhist monasteries and ordination beginning of 15th cent.	Korea: Partial expropriation of monastic land	A government favoring Confucianism abolishes the tax exemption of the monasteries. Next, a great portion of their landholdings are expropriated. Some monasteries are closed. In 1424 the state combines the existing schools into a Sonjong (meditation) and a Kyojong (writing) direction.

1428–1785	Lê Dynasty in Vietnam	Confucianism is privileged from the side of the state, and Buddhism loses its influence. New temples are subsequently erected, only within the district of influence of the feudal generations of Trinh and Nguyên.
Era 8: Confrontation with colonialism
1505–1815	Incipient colonialization of Sri Lanka New Nikayas	In 1505, arrival of the Portuguese, followed by Dutch (1656) and British (1796). In the Kingdom of Kandy, the succession of ordination is renewed, taken in 1596 and 1697 from Burma, and in 1753 from Thailand. The new Siyam Nikaya receives only high-caste monks. The Amarapura Nikaya, a reform branch of Burmese provenance (beginning in 1803), at first rejects this association with caste, just as does the Ramanna Nikaya (from 1863/65).

1603–1867	Tokugawa shogunate in Japan: Membership in Buddhism is obligatory	Every family must have itself registered with a temple—as a preventive measure against passage to Christianity, in the context of Japan's barricading itself against foreign influences.
1644–1911	Quing Dynasty in China	The Manchurian Emperors withdraw the monasteries' privileges, and render ordination difficult. Popular Buddhism abides, as part of a pragmatic piety.
1707	Several small Laotian states	The importance of Buddhism dwindles.
1752–1885	Military expansion of the Konbaung dynasty in Burma Beginning of British colonialization	The new rulers take aggressive measures against the Mon and against Thailand. In wars against the East India Company, between 1826 and 1885, the Kingdom loses its rural territory to colonial control. Reform movements stand in opposition to state surveillance of the Order.
1868–1871	"Council" of Mandalay	King Mindon Min, concerned for the strengthening of his position, convokes a 'council,' in whose course the sacred scriptures are engraved on marble tablets.
from 1782	Chakri Dynasty in Thailand	The country preserves its independence. The rulers promote Buddhism, and interfere repeatedly in the structuring of the Order.

1802–1945	Nguyên Dynasty in Vietnam: Buddhist renewal movement, resistance to French colonization and Christian mission	Having come to power with French help, Vietnam's rulers must relinquish the South to France in 1862. As Christian mission is seen as a tool of colonialism, the government has missionaries in the North murdered. By 1885 the French have taken control of the whole country. Since 1920, the revitalization of a seriously impaired Buddhism is underway. Lay associations and student centers strive for reforming and anticolonialist goals.
Era 9: Era of imperialism. Buddhist modernism and anti-colonial resistance
1815–1948	Sri Lanka (Ceylon) is a British colony Buddhist modernism	Under British rule, Christianity is determinedly promoted, and the entire educational system is stamped with mission. The repression of the practice of their religion plunges the Buddhists into a crisis, from which Buddhist modernism is formed. The leading representative is Anagarika Dharmapala. Theosophist Henry Steele Olcott performs a supporting role. Buddhist institutions are created.

1851–1868	Rama IV Mongkut reigns in Thailand	As a monk, the king had occupied himself intensively with reform Buddhism, and now founded the Dhammayuttika Nikaya. This branch of the Order stresses a strict observance of the Vinaya, sermons whose content was understandable (instead of simple recitation), and study of the texts. The majority direction, Maha Nikaya, goes on as before.
1863–1953	Kampuchea under French, Japanese, and Thai rule	Many monks are active in the movement for independence supported by Prince Sihanouk (King Norodom II Sihanouk).
1868–1914	Meiji age in Japan	After the compelled opening of the country, the restored Imperial Government makes → Shintô the state religion, and, with a view to a strengthening of national identity, persecutes Buddhism as un-Japanese. Beginning in 1875, however, it protects universal freedom of religion.
1881	Founding of the British Pali Text Society by T. R. W. Rhys Davids	The society avails itself of editions and translations of Buddhist source texts, especially of the Pali Canon.
1886–1948	Burma is a British colony	Buddhist modernism emphasizes meditation and the rules of the Order. Resistance movements against the British are frequently motivated by religion; many connect Buddhism with Marxism. In the Second World War, the Japanese army occupies the country.

1891	Founding of the Mahabodhi Society	The society called to life by Singhalese Anagarika Dharmapala promotes the cooperation of all Buddhist directions, and the rebuilding of Indian pilgrimage destinations.
1893–1945	Laos is French protectorate
Turn of the Century	First European Theravada monks in Southeast Asia and Sri Lanka	The first Bhikkhus from Europe include Briton Ananda Metteyya (Allan Bennett, ordained in Burma in 1901) and German Nyanatiloka (Anton Gueth, ordained in Burma in 1904 who lived subsequently in Sri Lanka).
1914–1945	Modernization and military expansion of Japan New schools of Nichiren Buddhism	Modernization in Japan inspires the scientific investigation of Buddhism on the one side, and its critical review and demythologization on the other. Between 1924 and 1929, compilation of the Chinese Canon (Taisho Shinshu Daizokyo).

		Other schools or lay movements of Nichiren Buddhism arise, that feel obligated to the nationalistic spirit of the time.
beginning of 20th cent.	Renewal movement in China	As a counter-measure to Christian mission, monks and laity seek to revive Buddhism through publications and teaching activity. The movement does not, however, achieve extensive success.
1924	San Soe-tae founds Korean Won Buddhism	The Union for the Study of the Law of the Buddha, since 1946 called Won ("Circle"), rejects celibacy, and distinguishes itself by great activity on the part of laity, both men and women. It operates charitable and educational organizations.
Era 10: Decolonialization, independence, and political upheavals from 1938	Frequent regime changes and military dictatorships in Thailand Buddhism is state religion	Monks partly represent approaches of social reform, partly subscribe to American-inspired anti-Communism.
1945–1975	Indo-Chinese wars, partition and reunification of Vietnam	France's attempt at recolonialization ends in 1954 with a defeat. In the North, Buddhist unification with the Communist Viêt-Minh is arranged. By way of measures hostile to Buddhism, the South Vietnamese regime, supported by the United States, and of Catholic coloration, provokes a politicization of the Order, culminating in demonstrations against the military overlords and in self-immolations. The Vietnam War ends with the defeat of the American intervention troops and the overcoming of South Vietnam by the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese army.

1948	Independence of Sri Lanka	In the conflict between the majoritarian Buddhist Singhalese and the minoritarian Hindu Tamil, the theological connection on both sides between religious and politico-military power contributes to the sanguinary escalation (especially since 1983).
1948–1958 and 1960–1962	Civil government in Burma	U Nu, twice head of state, attempts to strike a synthesis between socialism and Buddhism. In Rangoon from 1954 to 1956 the "Sixth Buddhist Council" assembles with the task of a review of the Scriptures. The attempt to reform the Order through state legislation provokes resistance among the monks.

1949	Founding of the People's Republic of China	Under Mao Zedong, there occurs a wave of state appropriation of monasteries, and of the compulsory laicization of monks and nuns. The economic basis of the monasteries is lost.
1950	Founding of the World Fellowship of Buddhists	Umbrella organization in Colombo, Sri Lanka. Its first President is G. P. Malalasekera.
1954	Independence of Kampuchea	As head of the regime, Sihanouk involves monks in reform plans, but limits their political activity.
1956	Neo-Buddhism in India	Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar goes over to Buddhism publicly, followed by former casteless (Dalit).
from 1962	Military dictatorship in Burma (Myanmar)	The Order is extensively under state control, but partly active in the opposition.
1966	World Buddhist Sangha Council, Colombo, Sri Lanka	Inter-school merger of monks and nuns.
1966–1976	Cultural Revolution in China	Like all other religions, Buddhism becomes the victim of destruction in the area of the Chinese state, including occupied Tibet. Subsequently, a more tolerant attitude is manifested toward worship.

from 1975	Government of socialist Phatet Lao in Laos	State control, and massive restriction of the Sangha; from 1979 onward, revival of religious activities.
1975–1979	Khmer Rouge reign of terror in Kampuchea	Every exercise of religion is prohibited, the Sangha is dissolved, and monasteries are destroyed. Most monks fall victim to the terror, which takes a million lives altogether.
from 1976	Socialist Republic of Vietnam	In Vietnam, united after the war, religious practice is limited, and politically engaged Buddhism is excluded. The Sangha (Mahayana majority and Southern Theravada minority) stands under the state-controlled Buddhist Center. Refugees by the hundreds of thousands, including many monks and nuns, forsake the economically and politically devastated country.
after 1979	Revitalization in Kampuchea	Reconstruction of the Sangha, new monasteries and Pali schools.
Era 11: Buddhism as a global religion
since middle of 20th cent.	Presence outside of Asia, especially in North America, Europe, Australia Migration and reception	The diaspora from Buddhist countries is constituted by refugees and other migrants. With the quest for alternative religious forms, all great school directions enjoy reception. Conversions occasion the adoption of new earmarks of form and content, and adopt institutional forms in Buddhist groups, with centers for formation, religious practice, and meditation.

	Meaning and importance of meditation	A legacy of Buddhist modernism is the rediscovery, further development, and popularization of Buddhist meditation techniques, even, and especially, among the laity.
	Committed Buddhism	The present day finds Buddhist participation in social movements in Asian countries and in the diaspora. Fields of endeavor include social reforms, human rights movements, alleviation of poverty, efforts for peace, ecological movements, animal protection, and medical and charitable services.
	The Quadruple Assemblage	Even in the lifetime of the Buddha, his community consisted of monks, nuns, and lay followers of both genders. While the importance of monasticism is often outstanding in the history of Buddhism, now one witnesses a growing participation of Buddhist female and male followers in the shaping of their religion.

Kirsten Holzapfel

Festivals of Theravada Buddhism

Calendar: The festival year is orientated to the solar year and to lunar calendars, with regionally distinct names for the months. Feast days are determined by the phases of the moon, and fall on different dates from year to year, although they are celebrated in the same seasons.

a) Regular festival days:

- Bi-weekly, at the full moon and new moon, the recitation of the Patimokkha. At a celebration for the confession of sins, the ordained recite the Rule of the Order (not universally practiced).
- Full moon, new moon, and days of the first and fourth quarter moons: Uposatha Days.

For the laity, these offer occasion for reinforced religious engagement (voluntary): service through contributions; recall of the five ethical self-obligations; voluntary temporary asceticism through additional self-obligations, that otherwise are only for the ordained; temple visits and hearing of doctrine.

b) Festivals in the course of the year

Festivals of national importance are indicated. Further, there are many regional feasts. Festivals are occasions for visits to the temple, recitation and hearing of teaching, contributions to the Order, and presentation of sacrificial gifts such as flowers, candles, and incense sticks.

Gregorian Calendar	Lunar Calendar	Name	Land	Explanation
January	Full moon in the month of Duruthu	Duruthu Poya	Sri Lanka	Commemoration of a mythical visit by the Buddha to Sri Lanka. Processions from the Kelaniya Temple near Colombo
January/ February	Full moon in the month of Navam	Navam Poya	Sri Lanka	Procession of the Gangaramaya Temple in Colombo, with dancers, drummers, and elephants
February/ March	Full moon in the month of Magha	Magha Puja. Sangha Day Makha Bucha in Thailand Bun Makha Busa in Laos Meak Bochea in Kampuchea		Commemoration of the exposition of the Patimokkha before 1250 monks. Triple circumambulation of the Stupa, the ordination hall, or a figure of the Buddha.

Gregorian Calendar	Lunar Calendar	Name	Land	Explanation
March	Full moon in the month of Tabaung		Myanmar	Watering of the Bodhi Tree, building of sand pagodas. Pagoda festivals, especially that of the Shwedagon Pagoda in Rangoon.
Mid-April	Several days	New Year Moon New Year of the Hindus and Buddhists in Sri Lanka Thingyan in Myanmar Songkran in Thailand Bun Pimai in Laos Choul Chnam in Kampuchea		The celebration has also integrated Buddhist elements. Ritually sprinkled with water are figures of the Buddha, as well as monks and other persons of dignity (at times only their hands). At the street festival, participants playfully soak one another with great splashes of water. Erection of sand stupas in the precinct of the temple.
May	Full moon in the month of Vesakha	Vesakha, Buddha Day Vesak in Sri Lanka Kahsoung in Myanmar Visakha Puja in Laos Visakha Bucha in Thailand Visakha Bochea in Kampuchea Buddha Pumima in Malaysia and Singapore		The Buddha's birth, complete Awakening (bodhi), and demise (parinirvana) are celebrated on one and the same day.
May/June	Around Vesakha: the date varies from place to place	Bun Bang Fai	Laos and the Northeast of Thailand	A feast to receive rain. Bamboo flares are borne in procession, dedicated, and shot into the sky, in the hope that they will be answered with rain. Those whose rockets fly especially high are feted. The builders of failed rockets are cast into the mire. Music, and wild, erotic dance.
June	Full moon in the month of Poson	Poson Poya	Sri Lanka	Memorial day of Arahat Mahinda Thera, who, according to Singhalese tradition, brought Buddhism to Sri Lanka. Pilgrimage to the Mountain of Mihintale.

Gregorian Calendar	Lunar Calendar	Name	Land	Explanation
June/July	To the full moon in the month of Esala (Asalha)	Kandy Esala Perahera	Sri Lanka	Folk festival in Kandy, of several days. Dancers, drummers, and artists, along with festooned elephants, join the procession. One elephant carries a small gold shrine containing relics of the Buddha.
July	Full moon in the Month of Asalha	Asalah Puja, Dhamma Day. Day of the Teaching Esala Poya in Sri Lanka Khao Phansa in Thailand		Commemoration of the first Instruction pronounced by the Buddha, at Benares. On the next day, Vassa begins.
C. July (August) to October (November)	3 months, usually in conjunction with Asalha Puja	Vassa, Rainy season During the Indian Monsoon, in the ancient period, the members of the Order remained in their monasteries.		The monks return to their monastery, to devote themselves to meditation and the teaching. Preferred time for entry into the order, to stay long or only temporarily.
During the Vassa period	Dates vary regionally	From Thailand to Malaysia Feasts for the Deceased, frequently several days		The famished spirits are offered gifts of food. Recitations by the monks, and gifts to the monastery for the benefit of the deceased.
August/ September	Full moon	Bun Khao Padap Dinh	Laos	Secondary burial: cremation of the exhumed bones
September		Bun Khao Salak	Laos	Celebration for the dead
September/ October	Full moon	Phchum Ben	Kampuchea	Celebration for the dead
October	Full moon	Pavarana Day, Day of the Admonition Vap Poya in Sri Lanka Ok Pansa / Tak Bat Devorohana in Thailand		Festival for the end of Vassa, the rainy season. The monks hold a celebration of confession. Reflection on the return of the Buddha from the sky of Tushita, where he has presented a divinity who in the previous life was his mother, with the Instruction.

Gregorian Calendar	Lunar Calendar	Name	Land	Explanation
		Thadingyut, Abhi-dhamma Day	Myanmar	Festival of Lamps
		Bun Ok Phansaa	Laos	Festival of Lamps. On the eve of the feast, boats with lamps, incense, flowers, and other sacrificial gifts are consigned to a river.
October/ November	Within the month following Vassa	Katina Celebrations		In a solemn ceremony, the laity bestow new robes on the monastic community. This celebration is mentioned as early as the Pali Canon
November/ December	Full moon	Bun That Luang	Laos	Festival of the That Luang Temple in Vientiane and other temples. Procession of lamps around the temple by night, markets, music, and pyrotechnics.
November	Full moon in the month of Tazaungmon	Tazaungdaing. Kathein (Kathina)	Myanmar	Festival of Lamps. Gift of new robes to the monks and to the Buddha statues. Competition among the young women for the best weaving.
December	Full moon in the month of Unduwap	Sangamitta Day. Unduvap Poya	Sri Lanka	Commemoration of Arahat Theri Sanghamitta. According to Singhalese tradition, she brought a shoot of the sacred Bodhi Tree to Anuradhapura.
Between November and March	Widely varying dates from place to place	Bun Pha Vet	Laos	Reading of the generous Prince Vessantara's story, "Jataka" (former life of the Buddha). A preferred time to enter the monastic order.

Kirsten Holzapfel

Calendar

Lunar/Solar Year

1. A calendar presents a system for ordering time by dividing a unit, the year, into a framework whose smallest components are days. This system coordinates a society's social, economic, and religious activities. Objectification and communication are served through 'natural' rhythms, impressive meteorological phenomena (seasons), the world of plants and animals, and, frequently, the phases of the visibility of the moon ('lunation,' 'month'). A year built by lunar months (12 × 29.54 = 354 days) is coordinated with a solar year (some 365.25 days) by the addition of a thirteenth month, or of a number of days to one or other month (a shift, or 'leap'), either in rhythm with the seasonal vegetation cycle or according to calculated leap-rhythms (lunisolar calendar). Skillful manipulation brings the discrepancy down to less than one-half month, which is adequate for the daily needs of even more complex societies. The result is a rhythm of months, or half-months, often ritually marked by feast days (→ Feasts and Celebrations). But farming cultures often require shorter periods of from four to ten days (weeks).

History

2. a) Calendars oriented to the solar year alone, without reference to the actual phases of the moon, are the exceptions rather than the rule. In the European-Mediterranean realm, such a calendar was first developed in Egypt during the second half of the second millennium BCE at the latest, first in the form of a simple 365-day year that gradually shifted ('leapt') with respect to the seasons, and that took 1461 (1460 Julian) years (Sothic periods) to conform once more to the original astronomical position of the sun; in many areas of life, then, it failed to supplant the lunar calendar.

Rome: Republican Calendar

b) The process that led to the Gregorian calendar began in a rather backward region as far as as technology of the calendar is concerned—in fifth-century BCE Rome. In the conflicts of the social groups, which included disputes over control of the calendar (empirical lunar calendars constantly require decisions on adjustment), the calendar became a matter of codification. An arbitrary fixing of the lengths of the months, and the moments of the calendrical leaps, led factually to a solar calendar detached from lunar phases. However, typical traits of the lunar calendar remained in place, such as the unequal lengths of the months (March, May, July, October with 31 days, the others with 29) and a resulting 22-23-day leap month. Characteristics of today's Western calendar (names of the months, unequal lengths) stem from this prototype. At the same time, the fixing of the lengths of the months made it possible to let each new series of weeks (in Rome, a period of eight days) run through a lunar cycle. Previously, a new month, as in many calendars, had meant the abrupt beginning of a new series of weeks—an 'invention' that was almost simultaneous with the same change made in the Jewish calendar during the Babylonian Exile.

Julian Calendar

c) Doubtless in consultation with Egyptian specialists, the Roman calendar was optimized in 45 BCE, by minimizing the extension of the shifts (to one leap day), and fixing the rhythm of the shift (to once every four years). But it was not the enlistment of professional knowledge that lay at the basis of this calendar's success: it was the intervention in its favor—in the face of all contrary criticism—of the mighty dictator Gaius Julius Caesar, and its protection (with certain adjustments) by his successor Augustus. This system was the one to which the lengths of the months correspond in our calendar today. It won enormous popularity, prevailing in Italy as well as, presumably, in the West and the North of the Roman Empire. In the East, it offered a stable reference point for numerous local calendars, which kept their own names for the months and the time of the observance of their respective new years. Thus, the Palestinian Jewish calendar, which bears an especially marked imprint owing to the developments of the Babylonian Exile (see 2b, above), was one of the calendars that remained lunisolar, thereby contributing to the molding of the people's identity. That the particularist → Qumran community used a solar calendar of 364 days only confirms this function of the calendar.

d) The Christian ecclesiastical year followed the Julian calendar, but integrated the Jewish seven-day week and the lunisolar calculation of the feast of Easter. Only in the fourth century, after an extremely conflictive process, the Easter date was defined as the first Sunday after the first full moon of spring. With the integration of Christian 'feast' days, the Roman calendar gradually became the Christian calendar. The inertia of this sort of framework of perception and regulation, which defined the year day by day, becomes clear only in a case of conflict, when its 'ideological' function is called into question. In a calendar reform of 1582, Pope Gregory XIII corrected the progressive inaccuracy of the Julian calendar, leaping over the dates of ten days and fine-tuning the rules for the leap year: leap years at the turn of a century occur only in those centuries not evenly divisible by four (1700, 1900, 2100). In a Europe no longer united in a single religious confession, the reform was looked upon as 'Catholic.' It was accepted by most Protestant states only with great hesitation (in 1700)—in some cantons of Switzerland only in the mid-nineteenth century. In the Orthodox Churches, the Julian calendar continues to be employed (with improved rules for the calculation of leap years). On the other hand, the calendar (1792) of the French Revolution, at first a technically inferior 'rationalization' of the Gregorian calendar, prevailed only briefly, even though it provided an anti-Christian alternative, and promptly installed new 'feasts.'

Gregorian Calendar

e) The Christian calendar, with its scientific astronomy and simplicity of application, with the growth of literacy, and, not least of all, with European expansion, has enjoyed broad propagation—a typical instance would be the career of the Jesuit missionary Schall in sixteenth-century China. Nevertheless, numerous local calendars have survived along with it, and sometimes in its stead, and are cherished as part of a religion and culture of days gone by. The Islamic calendar as well has found widespread observance, despite the difficulty of applying a purely lunar calendar, which shifts back steadily through the solar year. Now that calendrical information can be calculated centuries in advance, and readily be disseminated in the media, practical difficulties are practically without a role.

Outlook

3. Calendars that regulate a whole society, or indeed the whole world, have as a rule been difficult to ideologize since ancient times (names of the months, date of the new year, enumeration of the years 'since the revolution'). Nevertheless, some religious groups still use their own calendars—as part of the general differentiation of complex societies, in which individual rhythms as well as temporal schemes of different social areas or organizations differ (work on Sunday, top season, uninterrupted periods of activities).

Literature

Bieritz, Karl-Heinrich, Das Kirchenjahr, Munich [3]1991; Borst, Arno, Computus. Zeit und Zahl in der Geschichte Europas, Berlin 1990; Coyne, George V. et al., Gregorian Reform of the Calendar, Città del Vaticano 1983; Meinzer, Michael, Der französische Revolutionskalender 1792–1805, Munich 1992; Nilsson, Martin P., Primitive Time-Reckoning, Lund 1920; Parker, R. A., The Calendars of Ancient Egypt, Chicago 1950; Rüpke, Jörg, Kalender und Öffentlichkeit. Die Geschichte der Repräsentation und religiösen Qualifikation von Zeit in Rom, Berlin 1995; Stern, Sacha, Calendar and Community: A History of the Jewish Calendar Second Century BCE—Tenth Century CE, Oxford 2001; Strobel, August, Ursprung und Geschichte des frühchristlichen Osterkalenders, Münster 1977; Talmon, S., King, Cult, and Calendar in Ancient Israel, Jerusalem 1986; Wendorff, Rudolf, Zeit und Kultur. Geschichte des Zeitbewußtseins in Europa, Opladen 1980; Zerubavel, Eviatar, Hidden Rhyms: Schedules and Calendars in Social Life, Chicago 1981.

→ Astrology, Feasts and Celebrations, Sunday/Sabbath, Time

Jörg Rüpke

California

The "Golden State"

California's dream of boundless frontiers continues to lure religious seekers. This state, whose shores overlook the expansive Pacific Ocean, offers a place for the spirit to roam free in search of new vistas. The frontier is, as Cotton Mather once wrote, "a temporary condition through which we are passing to the Promised Land" (Dyrness 1989, 29). And this Promised Land of California has seemed to guarantee economic, spatial, and religious fulfillment. It is not surprisingly that the state received its name from a fictional island of bountiful wealth in García de Ordoñez de Montalvo's sixteenth century novel. Hernan Cortes was probably the first to apply it to what is now known as Baja California (a part of Mexico; → Central America). The "Golden State" possesses untapped resources that bring prosperity and new beginnings. And so—although certainly the name for the 31st state of the United States of America—the word 'California' carries with it visions of hope and untapped wealth for the soul.

In reaching toward new frontiers, California has always resisted being too aware of history. What really interests Californians is moving ahead. Yet some of the state's history is essential for grasping its contemporary religious life.

History

The Spanish, the largest group of Europeans first to arrive in California in the sixteenth century, found a land with scattered, independent groups of hunter-gatherers, or 'Indians' (→ North America [Traditional Religions]). The Spanish sought to convert these Indians to Catholicism. They first set up forts along the coast and then missions. The dean of these missions was the Franciscan Father, Junipero Serra, who arrived in California in 1769 and continued until his death in 1784. In 1821, Mexico gained independence from Spain, but could not control this new area. In May 1846, the United States went to war with Mexico over Texas. The war spread, and through a series of battles the U.S. eventually gained control of a huge southwestern area, including California, with the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo signed on 2 February 1848. California officially became a state on 9 September 1850.

From the Gold Rush to Silicon Valley

Perhaps even more significant—and just over a week before the treaty—gold was discovered on 24 January 1848. The 'Gold Rush' began. Though certainly Protestantism had arrived earlier, with this influx of people, a new, freewheeling frontier faith emerged, sometimes creating tensions with established ecclesiastical bodies. Gold—and like it the search for a quick, new prosperity or spiritual experience—has marked the history of California. Gold production peaked just four years later, and so in 1860s the state's economy needed new stimulation, which it found through agriculture as well as railroad expansion. The railroads employed immigrant workers, especially Chinese—some converted to Christianity, but others maintained more traditional Asian religious practices. Though hit hard by the Great Depression of the 1930s, California continued to grow a population who found work in a variety of burgeoning fields, such as entertainment and oil. Again, these economic expansions brought immigrants to work, which further diversified Californian religion. Most recently, the development of the microprocessor in the area near San Jose has made 'Silicon Valley' synonymous with entrepreneurial wealth. California has seemed to offer yet another version of new frontiers and opportunities.

Religious Plurality

Variety summarizes the religious and cultural climate of the state. Besides a full array of world religions (such as Judaism, Islam, Buddhism, and Hinduism), California is home to a wide range of Christianity (Catholicism, Eastern Orthodoxy, Protestant denominations, non-denominations, and mega-churches), as well as to a panoply of New Religious Movements (NRMs; → New Religions), neopagan groups (→ Paganism/Neopaganism), and more secular approaches to transcendence. If religion is to survive in this state of religious hothouse, it must do something different.

New Religious Movements and the New Age

NRMs have filled the landscape so much that some have coined the term 'Cultifornia.' The community of Heaven's Gate, with its 39 suicides in the Southern California town of Rancho Santa Fe in 1997, brought memories of an earlier, similar mass suicide. Jim Jones began his preaching in San Francisco before moving to Jonestown in Guyana, eventually leading 900 persons to mass suicide in 1978. Other, slightly less dramatic movements have also sprouted in California. Anton Szander LaVey began his Church of Satan in San Francisco in 1966, eschewing traditional spiritual views of Satan for a more freewheeling hedonism in the name of the Devil. In addition, other movements with a broader, more secular sense of transcendence have sprung up on the shores of California. For example, → Esalen Institute, self-described as an "educational center devoted to the exploration of human potential," was begun at Big Sur by Stanford graduates in 1962. The → New Age movement dots the landscape, so that one can find more books on → channeling than on the Bible in Monterey, as many crystals as crosses in Marin County.

Christian Movements

Innovations to traditional patterns of religion provide a new aspect to the traditional Christian beliefs. In 1906, the Azusa Street revival in Los Angeles, initiated by W. J. Seymour, brought a new direction to the Christian 'holiness' movement and began modern Pentecostalism. Currently, the Pentecostal churches vie with Catholicism for the large Spanish-speaking population. One of the largest Presbyterian churches in the U.S., of over 5000 members, can be found in Menlo Park (north of the Silicon Valley). California is the hothouse for mega-church growth. A prototype of all mega-churches and the 'seeker sensitive' movement is the Robert Schuller's Crystal Cathedral, a stunning glass structure designed in 1974 by the architect Robert Johnson. Schuller, a Reformed pastor, attempts to blend self-esteem with the message of the Bible to draw those who otherwise reject Christianity. Another movement, redefining the California religious landscape, is Calvary Chapel—originally a part of the 'Jesus people' of the late 1960s—brings together fundamentalist and charismatic movements and became the seedbed for Christian rock through its mass evangelistic services.

California's Future

The technology of electronic media and the internet will hold some answers to the religious future of California. In addition, the state has a growing 'minority' population so that soon there will be no majority racial ethnic group. This may mirror California's religious make-up. Finally, given its past, California's religious frontiers are always at least partially open and therefore impossible to predict with certainty.

Literature

Dyrness, William A., How Does America Hear the Gospel?, Grand Rapids 1989; Peters, Ted, The Cosmic Self: A Penetration Look at Today's New Age Movements, New York 1991; Rawls, James J./Bean, Walton, California: An Interpretive History, New York [6]1993.

→ Esalen Institute, New Age, New Religions, North America, Paganism/Neopaganism

Gregory S. Cootsona

Cannibalism

Concept

1. After landing in the isles of the West Indies in 1492, Columbus reported 'man-eating' inhabitants of the islands, the 'Caribs' (caribes, caniba, 'strong,' 'shrewd'). The word 'cannibalism' was derived from their name. With the discovery of the New World, it replaced the concept of 'anthropophagy' (Gk., ánthropos, 'human being'; phageín, 'to eat'), the term that had been used since antiquity and the Middle Ages. Anthropophagy in the strict sense is the actual consumption of human flesh; the broader sense includes the drinking of blood, or the consuming of the ashes of bones, as with the Cashibo Indians.

Real and Symbolic Cannibalism

2. Formally and systematically, the numerous reports of cannibalism can be divided into reports of (a) real cannibalism, (b) symbolic cannibalism,

Symbolic cannibalism of a whipped cream torte? This torte, a full-size replica, deceptively similar to the Lenin laid out in Red Square Mausoleum, was created by Russian artist Yuri Shabelnikov, and was consumed in the Moscow Gallery Dar in 1998. Even anti-Communists, eyewitnesses report, felt a chill running up their spines—this was no simple, raw perversity, the symbolic desecration of a corpse. 'Dining on a corpse,' taken literally, refers to a sign piled high with religious meaning: the totemistic or sacramental meal of 'God-eating.' Shabelnikov expressly cites poet Lev Oshanin: "Lenin is in you, Lenin is in me," while also appealing to a basic figure of the Christian mystical union (cf. John 14:20). A psychological drive leads what has been loved and reverenced to seek incarnation in the lover. (Hubert Mohr) and (c) fantasies of cannibalism. Real cannibalism will include a cannibalism occurring in extreme situations of hunger ('cannibalism of necessity'), as reported, for example, of starvation crises during the Thirty Years' War. Ritual real cannibalism is primarily symbolic cannibalism. This is based on the notion that a person's strength and vitality are localized in organs and in the blood. One is thought to be able to assimilate these by way of the consumption of a person's body or bodily parts. Consumption of relatives or of members of one's own social group is termed endocannibalism, while that of outsiders or enemies is exocannibalism. As part of the ritual of warfare, the latter can serve to deprive the enemy of a capacity to terrorize. Ritual cannibalism is also cited in reports of → human sacrifice. The Gimi and Fore in New Guinea are regularly cited as examples of the cannibal. The fact that the Fore can be victims of the very rare kuru disease, which is similar to mad cow disease, convinces many that this group consumes human brain. The reality of ritual cannibalism is actually a matter of current scientific debate, as reports of cannibalism defy precise eyewitness observation. These reports then are less a matter of the (ethnographically grounded) description of a ritual praxis, than of the unquestioning transmittal of the hearsay, censuring, and fixed opinions of third parties and/or of writers' fantasies.

We also encounter the cannibalistic fantasy in myths, sagas, and fairytales, as with Polyphemus the Cyclops in Homer's Odyssey, or in Saturn who devours his children, or in "Hansel and Gretel" as a stereotype of the child-eating witch.

3. Cannibalism is always ascribed to 'others.' Here, then, is rhetoric of differentiation, and metaphor for being other. That cannibals always dwell 'beyond the pale' is exemplified by non-European societies' view of their neighbors, as well as of Europeans. As for the Europeans' own view, the reproach of cannibalism has historically been directed outward, serving to distinguish the civilized Christians from the cannibalistic → heathen. It functioned as an ideological justification on the part of the colonizers: It had accepted the vacillating description of foreign cultures that is now revulsive, now fascinating (→ Orientalism/Exotism). Directed inward, it fostered discrimination against religious groups or marginal social entities. Thus, the allegation of cannibalism struck a bond with the legend of ritual murder ("Jews kill and eat Christian children"; → Anti-Semitism), or with the imputation of witchery in the stereotype of the cannibalistic → witch. Finally, it was referred to the Catholic understanding of the Eucharist (doctrine of transubstantiation; → Lord's Supper/Eucharist), and was formulated as a comprehensive accusation in terms of a criticism of Catholicism.

Generally, in the discourse upon cannibalism, indignation at the monstrosity of the consuming of human flesh entwines with the (subliminal) fear of this (oral) form of aggression. At the same time, reports of cannibalism produce a grotesque fascination.

Literature

Arens, William, The Man-Eating Myth: Anthropology and Anthropophagy, New York 1979; Barker, Francis et al. (eds.), Cannibalism and the Colonial World, Cambridge 1998; Brown, Paula/Tuzin, Donald (eds.), The Ethnography of Cannibalism, Washington 1983; Goldman, Laurence R. (ed.), The Anthropology of Cannibalism, Westport 1999; Röckelein, Hedwig, (ed.), Kannibalismus und europäische Kultur, Tübingen 1996; Spiel, Christian, Menschen essen Menschen. Die Welt der Kannibalen, Frankfurt/M. 1972; Strathern, Andrew, "Witchcraft, Greed, Cannibalism and Death: Some Related Themes from the New Guinea Highlands," in: Bloch, Maurice/Parry, Jonathan (eds.), Death and the Regeneration of Life, Cambridge [3]1987.

→ Human Sacrifice, Lord's Supper/Eucharist, Orientalism/Exotism, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Sabine Hensel

Canon / Canonization

Canonization as a Process

1. The concept of canonization (from Heb., qana, 'staff,' '[measuring] reed,' adopted as a loan word in Greek) describes the process in which a set of symbols, texts, actions, or artifacts is fixed as authoritative and normative. The collection, ordering, and commitment to canonical writing of self-evident daily relationships, cultic practices, styles of piety, and moral conceptions serves to reinforce tradition. It is a process of crystallization that can go on for centuries, as the various expressive religious forms solidify in the stockpile of the canon. Canonized material loses its place in real life. In a canon, oral traditions are reworked in writing, and in various phases of transmittal; spontaneous expressions and practices become self-evident in agenda, protocols, and liturgies; the extraordinary experiences of individuals are recounted and collected as exemplary stories. The special sign of a religious canon, as contradistinguished from a collection of classical materials, or from a corpus of laws, is the sacralization of the material gathered. At the term of a canonization process stands a sacred → book, such as the Jewish Tanach, the Christian → Bible, or the Muslim → Qur'an—the basis of the concept of a book religion—or a collection of sacred writings such as the Buddhist Tipitaka or the Sikh Adi Granth. A canon ensures the identity of a community, together with its religious forms of doctrine and praxis over several generations. The reason is that the material of a canon is available for repetition as place and time demand. It becomes the medium of both memory and the cultivation of meaning. In the religious canon, tradition is promoted to the rank of divine revelation, authentic ancestral word, or sacred testimony. Thus the canon itself becomes productive of religion.

Reaction to Crises

2. Canonizations are often reactions to crises. The threat of a loss of tradition must be overcome with a forced protection of tradition. This crisis situation may come from without, or it may be provoked from within. Thus, the Judaic textual corpus arises after the destruction of Jerusalem, the central place of worship, and the exile of Jewish society. After the loss of a self-evident daily praxis, often a substitute is fashioned, in the form of the sacred text. Scholars and scribes move into the place of priests and prophets. The central position of cultic practice is assumed by scripture readings and their exposition. An inner crisis in Christianity in late antiquity forces the determination of a New Testament canon. The internal pluralism of religious traditions begets religious uncertainty. A solid reference text is necessary. The New Testament is principally the official Christian reaction to the recommendations for a Christian canon on the part of Marcion, a founder of Christian communities, who at the end of the second century sought to establish a 'purified' textual corpus that would not incorporate Jewish traditions. The church councils reacted. Marcion was excluded, the 'Old' Testament remained canonical, the four Gospels were not reduced to one. The canon was finally closed only in the third to the fourth centuries.

Power and Institution

3. Canonization is bound up with power. Seldom does a canon appear simply because traditions have succeeded in perpetuating themselves. A canon is usually the result of subtle or open interference on the part of an institution, such as a school of textual criticism, a synod, or a council. The approach to sacred texts is regulated by taboos and barriers, such as rules for interpretation, lesson rituals, and monopolies on interpretation. The body responsible for a given religious community assumes the authority of experts in exposition and interpretation. Accordingly, expository traditions of the canonical texts grow to be a particular canonical form themselves, which thereupon forms a kind of second-level canon, such as the Mishna and → Talmud, the Hadiths (→ Islam), or the Bible commentaries of the ancient Church. But the canonical product can also be a canon actionis that prescribes the manner of reading these texts, and the ritual implementations in which the sacred text plays a role. Any ritual can be described as a canonization of the execution of specific acts. The canon is expounded at festivals, divine services, and devotional sites, as well as in schools, colleges, and academies. Thus, the canon is equivalent to a medium of cult and formation.

Security and Loss of Traditions

4. Canonization processes are ambivalent. On the one side, they serve to ensure identity and concentration of meaning; on the other, they occasion the loss of some material of tradition, since any authoritative selection shuts out other traditions. In a relatively benign variant, the excluded material will only be listed as apocryphal, therefore as merely 'inauthentic' material. The apocryphal text may be good and useful to read, it will be said; but it lacks authority. At times, processes of canonization are intensified to the level of censorship. Once a corpus is regarded as unconditionally and exclusively valid, it is ascribed a monopoly on truth: strands of tradition that have not been adopted are considered →heresy—false, threatening teachings. They are lost in oblivion, blacklisted, or transmitted only secretly, so that, as a concurrent extracanonical shadow, they harbor the opportunity for a renewal of a religious community. The canon, then, is not first of all a reaction to heresy. First it indirectly produces the heresy, by erecting a criterion of deviation (itself). Only then does it become the norm of repudiation.

Old Texts and Modernity

5. The canon contains the paradox of hostility toward renewal and potential for innovation. The 'archival' character inherent in this medium immunizes it from innovations, for to point to 'that which is written' is to mount an obstacle to any contemporary objection or revisionist complement. The shelf is full. And thus arises the danger of a fundamentalist constriction. On the other hand, because of its aesthetic quality, which makes it appear as especially relevant also for a nonreligious cultivation of meaning, a holy text is open to ever-new interpretations. The canonical text has demonstrated its durability by hundreds of years of application. Thus, it enjoys an a priori reliance at least equal to that of the 'classics.' Precisely the cultural and temporal distance, and 'strange' manner, of the old texts renders the canon attractive. And so, again and again, it becomes productive of meaning, and thereby relevant to the real world. The canon exerts its binding effect, but it also dispenses persons from making an ongoing, immediate, personal interpretation. The canon serves as a religious grammar, offering a fund of concepts, counsels, and tales to which religious communities may refer in their religious implementation and theoretical self-explanation (doctrine, theology, philosophy of religion). The creeping, imperceptible alteration of interpretation keeps the canon alive, since any interpretation is tied to what its subjects can achieve with respect to reception. Thus, the canon contains in itself both completeness and openness.

Literature

Assmann, Jan, Das kulturelle Gedächtnis. Schrift, Erinnerung und politische Identität in frühen Hochkulturen, Munich 1992; Assmann, Aleida/Assmann, Jan (eds.), Kanon und Zensur. Archäologie der literarischen Kommunikation II, Munich 1987; Smith, Jonathan Z., "Sacred Persistence: Toward a Redescription of Canon," in: Idem: Imagining Religion: From Babylon to Jonestown, Chicago 1982, 36-52; Woestman, William H. (ed.), Canonization: Theology, History, Process, Ottawa 2002.

→ Bible, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Memory, Oral Tradition, Reception, Tradition, Writing

Petra Bahr

Capitalism

1. The concept of capitalism, fallen from fashion today—the preferred term is market economy—denotes an economic mode whose constitutive condition is the exchange of goods, on a theoretically transparent market, by its formally free economic subjects, with labor being counted as one of these goods. A long-term equilibrium between supply and demand is supposed. Whether the value of these goods is 'objectively' determinable—for example, when it is measured by the average amount of work time spent in their production—or 'subjectively' determinable—for example, in terms of maximal expected profit—was a major theme of economics for a century. In Western science, the doctrine of 'subjective' value has been dominant for some generations. Consequently, a capitalistic economic mode is only possible when certain presuppositions are verified, at least at the outset: free disposition of land and real property, freely disposable work time, private ownership of means of production, free contract conditions, freedom of trade, and minimal control of competition—to name only the most important requisites. Even of themselves, these presuppositions show that the capitalist economy is a historical phenomenon, and that it can by no means be identified with 'economics.' In Europe, free disposition of land and real property was possible only after the properties of the Church had been dealt with through secularization, and after the elimination of the feudal system in which farmers were bound to the soil. The emancipation of the farmers was, again, the prerequisite for the appearance of an employment regime in which they were instead dependent only on the sale of their labor (proletariat); free trade and competition must prevail over guild-based systems.

Social Boundaries

In its pure form, which prescribes unrestrained competition without state interference as an essential element, there has never been such a thing as capitalism. Since the nineteenth century, the tendency to exclude competition through monopolies or agreements, and state limitation of free trade (prohibition of child labor, curtailment of the working day, and so on) has always accompanied the institution of the capitalist economic mode. With the reinforcement of the organized labor movement, through the influence of → Marxism, a socially domesticated capitalism came into existence (over the course of decades), at least in the developed industrial societies of Europe.

Religious Roots of Capitalism?

2. Still disputed today is the question whether capitalism required certain intellectual, perhaps even religious, prerequisites for its appearance and its success. Certain observations seem to incline to the affirmative, as for example the fact that, in the nineteenth century, some (far from all!) societies of a Protestant stamp were further advanced in industrial and capitalist development than were those of a Catholic coloration. Even on this count there were exceptions, as for example in Belgium, or in the industrial regions of northern France. It has always been difficult to isolate the religious factor in a historical analysis to the point that one may speak of it as an independently operating variable. Only with Max → Weber's Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus ("The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism") at the beginning of the twentieth century was the theme, for one thing, detached from the field of economic history, and for another, altered in such a way that the question under consideration could no longer be answered. Inasmuch as Weber disconnected capitalism's 'spirit' from its concrete configuration (so that the vehicle of this spirit need not be capitalists) did it become possible to establish a mental kinship of selection between the Calvinist teaching on grace, as it was carried further by the English Puritans, and the savings and investment compulsion, as based on a renunciation of consumption by an earlier class of entrepreneurs. This connection between a piety serving only the glorification of God and an ascetical attitude with regard to all worldly satisfactions is plausible. But it cannot be established with certitude as an objective historical relationship.

Churches against Capitalism

3. Certainly, however, the large churches of the Christian religion had considerable initial difficulties with the acceptance of capitalistic economic modes, as with the casts of mind that corresponded to them. Part of this is to be traced to the fact that the churches had adopted conceptualizations of value that appeared to be irreconcilable with capitalism. This applies especially to the inherent drive of capitalism to increase its capital (its productive assets), which to a traditional outlook must have looked like the miser's amassment of treasures. Throughout antiquity greed was hateful as vice, and in the Middle Ages indeed as mortal sin. Then came the fact that a developing capitalism must necessarily destroy traditional lifestyles, such as the relationship between landlords and soil-bound farmers, and thereby also the feudally based system of levies maintained by the Church. Only newly forming communities of religion, which were frequently splinters from the established churches, and so were without social and political stability in traditional structures, could in practice relate at least neutrally to the rise of capitalism. Thus, there seems actually to have been a connection between an earlier class of entrepreneurs and the so-called sectarians, as the Quakers, the Russian Old Believers, and the surviving French Protestants. These examples alone show that religious ideology could have been playing a subordinate role at most.

4. With the collapse of the societies of Soviet-dominated 'real socialism,' capitalism seems to have succeeded in becoming the only economic system. Even the remaining socialist states (China, Vietnam, Cuba) are compelled to introduce capitalistic elements like free enterprise and a minimum of regulations vis-à-vis labor relations. Whether the capitalist economic system will long be without a viable alternative is not foreseeable today. It is foreseeable, however, that, if religions today are to survive, they must come to an arrangement with the groups that support capitalism. Most religions have already made this peace.

Literature

Claessen, Dieter, Kapitalismus und demokratische Kultur, Frankfurt/M. 1992; Sayer, Derek, Capitalism and Modernity: An Excursus on Marx and Weber, London 1991; Weber, Max, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism ([1]1904/05), ed./trans. Stephen Kalberg, Los Angeles 2002.

→ Asceticism, Economy, Marxism, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Monasticism, Protestantism, Weber

Günter Kehrer

Capital Punishment / Execution

1. Whether it is permissible in law to kill a person, either in the name of the state, or indeed of religion, ranks as one of the most fundamental and most disputed of ethical problems. As the heaviest and ultimate form of punishment, its implementation awaits the correct solution to the problem of what societal or political instance has the right of life and death.

Historically, capital punishment developed out of crimes regulated by private, family, tribal, and sacral rights and their atonement, and was committed to a community of law as its apposite instance. Its introduction as a general right constitutes a regulation vis-à-vis unauthorized or arbitrary private justice. Especially the lex talionis (Lat., 'law of retribution': "an eye for an eye," Exod 21:23-25) opens up the possibility of regimentation, by maintaining the proportionality between crime and punishment.

Religious Positions on Capital Punishment: Judaism

2. a) In the Hebrew Bible, capital punishment is prescribed for, among other crimes, murder and kidnapping (Exod 21:12-16), certain sexual practices (Lev 20:10-16; Exod 22:19), adultery (Lev 20:10), incest (Lev 20:17), → blasphemy (Lev 24:15-16), idolatry (Exod 22:19), profanation of the Sabbath (Exod 31:14-15), prostitution on the part of the daughter of a priest (Lev 21:9), and striking or cursing father or mother (Exod 21:15,17). The legitimization of the death penalty is the right of vengeance, especially in the case of sacrilege, in order to keep the people of YHWH 'pure' through retaliation. Likewise, the deterrent principle is of importance in the consideration of capital punishment. Except for blood vengeance, whose punishment was death by the sword, stoning and burning alive were the most frequent forms of capital punishment; impaling and hanging were seen as a particular dishonor. Beheading and crucifixion were not used until Roman times.

The belief that the human being has been created in the image and likeness of God, and that the resurrection is to be that of the whole person—as well as faith in God's command of love of neighbor—greatly curtailed the use of capital punishment in rabbinical Judaism. Where capital punishment seemed unavoidable, the value of external integrity of the body was stressed. Despite a relative autonomy in legal matters of religion, the Jewish religious councils were not in charge of death sentences, even before the fall of Jewish civil autonomy in 70 CE (hence, the Christian assumption that "the Jews killed Jesus" is utterly wrong; → Anti-Semitism). Nevertheless, the death penalty played a significant role in Jewish legal tradition. Despite the multiplicity of Jewish groups of various colorations, the texts (composed between 70 and 600 BCE) of the bodies of rabbinical scholars in Babylon and Palestine have been regarded as 'normative' by extensive parts of Judaism to our day. In Israel, capital punishment is still legally permissible, but has been executed only one time, in 1962, with the hanging of Adolf Eichmann.

Christianity

2. b) The New Testament, as well, attests to the use of capital punishment (John 8:2-11), and Jesus's crucifixion belongs to the forms of punishment used in the Roman provincial regime (→ Cross/Crucifixion). In a special way, however, in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt 5-7), Jesus radically questions

In Europe, not least of all on account of arbitrary sentencing by the dictatorships of the 1930s and 1940s, capital punishment was completely abolished. But in the United States, the discussion is in full swing. In Europe, the main arguments are that death precludes a judicial appeal, or that the value of the human being is disregarded. In the United States, where the decision to use capital punishment is in the hands of the several states, and criminal sentences are usually pronounced by ordinary citizens, religious arguments are front and center. The demonstrators here, in front of a court in Pittsburgh, hold multiplied copies of a poster that proclaims to the jurors God's command in the Bible, "Thou shalt not kill" (Exod 20:13). More than seventy percent of the proponents of capital punishment are loyal Christians, who counter the opposing arguments with verses from the Bible, but who appeal to the same commandment, "You shall not murder," in their stand against abortion. In the photograph, the text of the Fifth Commandment is supplemented by a homemade poster that contests the positive effect of capital punishment for instruction and education, while the admonition represented by the American flag recalls the role of the United States as a model for the rest of the world. (Christoph Auffarth) whether a person might judge other human beings, while Paul, in his Letter to the Romans (Rom 13), refers to the authority of the state and subordination to state power. This field of tension also marks the discussion carried on by the Fathers of the Church.

→ Augustine formulates his new doctrine for the state in Roman jurisprudence in his De libero Arbitrio ("On Free Choice"), 1. From then on, capital punishment was necessary, in cooperation between heavenly and earthly justice, for the maintenance of the order of the state at the hands of the Emperor as representative of God. Despite the importance of conversion and penance, the Church under Innocent I (402–417), at the beginning of the fifth century, relinquished its disapproval of capital punishment.

In the thirteenth century, capital punishment received enormous impetus with the institution of the → Inquisition. True, clergy might not themselves act as judges; nonetheless, in the case of heretics (→ Heresy; Witch/Persecution of Witches), a mercy to be extended by the spiritual power of retribution—gladius spiritualis (Lat., 'spiritual sword')—was cancelled in favor of an appeal for execution at the hands of the state power of retribution—gladius materialis ('material sword'). Indicating that, after all, a sinner may always do penance before execution and thereby win deliverance, Thomas Aquinas (1225/26–1274) too pronounced in favor of capital punishment for the safeguarding of the community, and proponents of capital punishment appeal to Thomas's argumentation even today. Especially with the Spanish Inquisition, the execution of heretics was presented as a spectacular community event and demonstration of faith, with religious procession and fiery stake (Auto de fé, Span.; Autodafé, Port.: 'Act of Faith'). Likewise, the majority of the Reformers concurred with the imposition of capital punishment; exceptions are to be found only with fringe groups like the Anabaptists (→ Baptists).

In the Catholic and Protestant Churches, controversies rage over the legitimacy of capital punishment even today. Opponents appeal to philosophers Immanuel Kant (1724–1804) and Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831), who, instead, require the perpetrator to repent and thereby restore the moral order. With the argument of a failed resocialization, Friedrich Schleiermacher (1768–1834) comes forward in opposition to capital punishment. With him and Karl Barth (1886–1968), interest in punishment shifts to a subject-oriented understanding: From the eighteenth century onward, focus is no longer on the revenge of an offended sovereign, but, as Michel Foucault explains, on the disciplining of citizens within a new system of justice, whose interest is in the solicitous supervision of the circumstances accompanying the course of a person's life.

c) As in Judaism, judges in Islam see only to earthly sentences, leaving final judgment to God. According to the Islamic books of jurisprudence, the four series of capital transgressions are: → apostasy, prohibited sexual activities, robbery, and murder. The first three belong to the so-called hadd- ('border') punishments, whose sentences are precisely specified. The last is subject to the lex talionis, the principle of retaliation, and has its origin in the right of vengeance. The legal concept according to which, in the case of collective murder or manslaughter, not only is the direct perpetrator guilty, but ultimately his or her fellow murderers as well, explains why in certain circumstances more than one agent may be punished for the same deed. Depending on a number of factors, such as the perpetrator's religious status or an understanding arrived at with the injured family, a capital sentence may be commuted to a fine in money or property ('blood money'). However, as with the entire complex of penal law, this solution is approached differently in the various schools of Islamic law.

The Battle against Capital Punishment

3. It was especially with Montesquieu (Lettres Persanes, "Persian Letters," 1721) that the 'unbounded bloodshed' of capital punishment began to come under criticism. The actual battle against capital punishment began with the writings of Cesare Beccaria (1738–1794). The Milanese jurist was the first (1764) to question the deterrent value of capital punishment, as well as its necessity for the sovereign: after all, once executed, criminals can no longer be examined for signs of repentance. For Beccaria, capital punishment eventuated as idolatry of government. As an enlightened absolutist, he was concerned to make a clear division between religion and reason. Voltaire (1694–1778), as well, expressed himself against capital punishment, in commentaries on Beccaria's writings. Nevertheless, even within the Enlightenment and the humanist tradition, the discussion was carried on whether capital punishment was legitimate for the protection of society or whether the individual's right to life should prevail instead. Only with the beginning of the twentieth century did a stance of repudiation of capital punishment win out in the states of (Northern) Europe (Addendum 6 of the Human Rights Convention of the member states of the European Council, April 28, 1983). After the arbitrary practice of capital punishment at the hands of a state terrorism during the National Socialist regime, the Federal Republic of Germany abolished capital punishment by the Grundgesetz ("Fundamental Law"), Art. 102, in 1949 (by comparison: German Democratic Republic, 1987; Austria, 1968; in Switzerland, still in force in military penal law). The Evangelical Church of Germany has condemned capital punishment; this is not in principle questionable for the Catholic Church.

Today's Position

4. In the frequently irrelevant discussions of capital punishment, proponents emphasize a deterrent effect of capital punishment. Further arguments are the 'people's sense of justice' (the concept of revenge and retribution), as well as the permanent protection of the populace from the perpetrator. On the other hand, there is no way to establish a connection between the number and seriousness of a culprit's transgressions and the imposition of capital punishment. Even its abolition in the face of the people's will to the contrary entails no consequences in this respect. Permanent protection of the population can be guaranteed just as well through the exclusion of the culprit from general societal contact. None of the arguments in favor of capital punishment can continue to be brought forward without flagrant fallacies or weak points. On the contrary, in practice, a multiplicity of 'racist' cases and irrecoverable miscarriages of justice can be verified.

In 1986, with his scapegoat theory René Girard offered a new angle from which to view capital punishment. For him, social aggressions are diverted and released through the persecution and execution of outsiders. In view of the ratio of prisoners sentenced to death to those actually executed (one hundred fifteen to one in the United States in 1993), one understands that a group is being created here from which individuals can be selected for the collective drainage of aggression. Although there is a worldwide trend toward the abolition of capital punishment, and it is prohibited, or no longer actually imposed, in more than one-half of all national states, in 1998 at least 3,899 death sentences were pronounced, in seventy-eight countries. In thirty-seven of the ninety national states that continue to practice capital punishment, 1,625 executions were performed, eighty percent of them in China, Congo, the United States, and Iran. On April 29, 1999, the United Nations Organization passed a resolution urging the worldwide abolition of capital punishment.

Literature

Baird, Robert M. (ed.), Punishment and the Death Penalty: The Current Debate, Amherst 1995; Cancik, Hubert, "Christentum und Todesstrafe: Zur Religionsgeschichte der legalen Gewalt," in: von Stietencron, Heinrich (ed.), Angst und Gewalt. Ihre Präsenz und ihre Bewältigung in den Religionen, Düsseldorf 1979; Foucault, Michel, Discipline and Punish: The Birth of the Prison, London 1991; Gräf, Erwin, "Probleme der Todesstrafe im Islam," in: Zeitschrift für vergleichende Rechtswissenschaft einschließlich der ethnologischen Rechtsforschung 59 (1957); McBride, James, "Capital Punishment as the Unconstitutional Establishment of Religion: A Girardian Reading of the Death Penalty," in: Journal of Church and State 37 (1995), 263-287; Owens, Erik C. et al. (ed.), Religion and the Death Penalty: A Call for Reckoning, Grand Rapids 2004.

→ Conflict/Violence, Cross/Crucifixion, Fatwa, Inquisition, Law, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Markus Wachowski

Carnival

Fasting Eve—
Fasching—Carnival

1. The word 'carnival' is derived from the Italian carne ('meat') and levale ('removal'), recalling the practice of abstinence from meat during the penitential season of Lent. It was originally used for the name of Shrove Tuesday, the eve of the first day of Lent (Ash Wednesday). Derived from the Old English lengten ('springtime,' implying the lengthening of the days), 'lent' is the annual forty-weekday Christian season of fasting, abstinence from meat, and sobriety of manner, in the spirit of a memorial of the suffering of Christ on the cross. Shrove Tuesday, then, has traditionally been considered the last appropriate or permissible moment before Easter to 'indulge'—not only by eating meat, but, likely, in rollicking recreation and frivolity. The celebration of this moment was called Carnival. Today we refer to celebrations such as this, which may be entirely secular in composition and spirit, and held at any time of the year, as 'carnivals.'

In the history of religions, Carnival (or Fasting Eve) integrates three phenomena: the seasonal feast of the winter solstice, the principal ascetical time of fasting, and the central structural element of conversion (Lat., 'turning around') with a symbolic reversal of social relations.

Shrove Tuesday: Usages and Their Precedents

2. A reversal of the social hierarchy was originally an element of the Roman Saturnalia, when masters and mistresses served their slaves. In the Middle Ages, the clerical festivals of a 'backwards world' saw, in various locales, the selection of a child or → 'fool' as Bishop. Since around 1500, the figure of the fool has been integrated: his symbolic depth-dimension of foolishness—ass's ears—lack of charity (bells, ref. to 1 Cor 13:1), and lust point to a godless condition that remains outside the Christian salvific order. The fool receives the symbolic right to practice honesty with impunity, the purpose being to hold before a normality customarily seen as 'pleasing to God' the mirror of its actual foolishness. The extent of a countermovement behind the fool toward modern rationalization and the upward revaluation of the anthropology of reason is discussed in scholarly research, and the bond to pre-modern phenomena is disputed. In Protestant regions, the usages of 'Fasting Eve,' regarded as superstitious relics of the past, have largely vanished. The nineteenth century actually 'invented' Carnival as currently celebrated on Shrove Tuesday. The "Ascent to the Throne of Hero Carnival"—motto of the first Carnival procession, in Cologne in 1823—marks not only the revitalization of supposedly old usages in the spirit of Romanticism, but entry into the club-like Carnival, organized by propertied, educated groups. Only now does a proper feast day appear, with Rose Monday, especially in Rhineland. And with the extension of the 'session' to the whole time from November to Ash Wednesday, a 'fifth season' is created.

The notion of a continuity with the ancient customs of Shrove Tuesday—'Fasting Eve'—is regarded critically today, just as, in Germany, is the citing of 'Teutonic' sources by National Socialism especially. The etymological derivation of 'Carnival' from the carrus navalis (Lat.) of the ancient festival of Dionysus is a construction of the nineteenth century, just as is the derivation of Fastnacht (Ger., 'Fasting Eve') from phallus or faseln (Ger., 'to act crazy') has been refuted. The Christian coding, however, does not exclude the possibility that ancient traditions, for instance in the medieval clerical festivals (perhaps as a product of the reading of ancient texts), might occasionally have been taken up or incorporated into traditional elements of the folk-celebration of Fasting Eve (possibly pre-Christian fertility rites). Two characteristics of continuity abide: all carnival-like festivals are held at the winter solstice; and they constitute a social rite of passage to a new year, so that they render social normality symbolically out of commission, thus inviting a polemics pointing, however briefly, to an alternative world.

Holi

3. In the initiatory rites of oral religions as well, the social order can be emptied of its validity and thereby reversed. In India at the Holi feast, a spring festival having its roots in fertility cults, there are allusions to a reversal of social relationships. Women, principally of the lower classes, sprinkle members of the upper with water or coloring, and select the 'King of Holi.' While the celebration of the winter solstice and ascetical practices are interculturally widespread, the criticism of societal patterns of order that would have its underpinnings in religion and its organization in ritual is not to be found so clearly enunciated in extra-European cultures.

Masking

4. As a compensation for the strict controls of Lent, carnival festivals were accepted and encouraged by Church and society alike. Disguises, especially → masks, were a component of the festivals from the beginning. Furthermore, they belong to the constitutive elements of a symbolic reversal of values vis-à-vis 'normal' relationships. At the same time they offer the masked person opportunities for the individual widening of her or his environment: to be what one plays. In this sense, masquerading was (and is) a latent threat to Church and society, and was therefore regimented the moment the festival threatened really to call the social order into question.

Literature

Aching, Gerard, Masking and Power: Carnival and Popular Culture in the Caribbean, Minneapolis 2002; Coronato, Rocco, Jonson versus Bakhtin: Carnival and the Grotesque, Amsterdam 2003; Danow, David K., The Spirit of Carnival: Magical Realism and the Grotesque, Lexington 1995; Gilmore, David D., Carnival and Culture: Sex, Symbol, and Status in Spain, New Haven 1998; Le carnival, la fête et la communication. Actes des premières rencontres internationales, Nice, 8 au 10 mars 1984, Nice 1985; Liverpool, Hollis, Rituals of Power and Rebellion: The Carnival Tradition in Trinidad and Tobago, 1763–1962, Chicago 2001; Matheus, Michael (ed.), Fastnacht/Karneval im europäischen Vergleich, Stuttgart 1999; Mezger, Werner, Narrenidee und Fastnachtsbrauch. Studien zum Fortleben des Mittelalters in der europäischen Festkultur, Konstanz 1991; Turner, Victor, The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure, Ithaca 1977; Zeitschrift für Volkskunde 77 (1981)-80 (1984).

→ Calendar, Drama (sacred), Feasts and Celebrations, Mask, Ritual, Theater

Hans-Georg Lützenkirchen and Helmut Zander

Caste

1. The concept of caste is usually associated with some of the seemingly most deplorable phenomena of the Indian social order. These include a fatalism opposed to progress, discrimination against large parts of the Indian population, and a religious determination of social class. Let it be pointed out, however, that this is a conceptualization maintained in Europe, which, in principle, can no longer think justice apart from an egalitarian society. It can even be argued that 'caste' as a conceptual hierarchization of Indian society was 'invented' by European scholars and politicians in the nineteenth century (→ Orientalism/Exotism).

2. First mention of a permanent classification is found as early as the Veda, which speaks of four varna (groups). But it is only after the development of new occupations, consequent upon the adoption of a sedentary culture among the Indo-Europeans, that the Dharmashastra specified these groups more precisely (from 200 BCE).

Hierarchical Order

At the pinnacle of the system of the varna are the Brahmin (priests, 'Brahmans'); after them come the kshatriya (warriors and nobility) and the vaishya (merchants and farmers). Only these three varna belong to the 'twice born' (dvija), and may receive the initiation, from which the shudra (workers and laborers) are excluded. The importance of integrating the indigenous population was presumably determined with the appearance of the shudra castes, since these had never existed before the beginning of the immigration.

Without a Caste

Outside the varna stand the primitive population (adivasi), and certain occupational groups like the leatherworkers and street cleaners ('untouchables'). The scriptures call them candala ('the least'); → Gandhi gave them the euphemistic name harijan ('children of God'); today they are usually designated as dalit ('the crushed'). Our common word 'pariah' is from the Tamil, and in that language means 'drummers,' but lacks the negative connotation attaching to it in the West. Officially, the untouchables are grouped among the 'scheduled castes,' while the adivasi are listed among the 'scheduled tribes.' The expression 'backward castes' stands for an average number of disadvantaged groups for whom the state reserves places in education and work.

This schema is first of all an ideal or typical description, in large part determined by the ideological interests of the Brahmans. Further, the expression 'caste' is a European invention, derived from the Portuguese casta, meaning 'something unmixed,' and introducing a racist component. Finally, while theoretically all of the many thousands of individual castes (jati, 'birth') can be ranged under the four varna groups, this says nothing as yet as to the defining elements of the social structure. Thus, for example, the status of a given jati is not to be defined in sole terms of the varna hierarchy, but can vary by region and local tradition. The manifold relationships among the castes are fixed according to the following elements.

Relationships among the Castes

(1) Separation: Each caste is marked by unequivocal distinction from the other castes. This is expressed primarily by specification of its residential location within a village. Marriages are contracted only within a caste (endogamy); the taking of meals is governed by the injunction of ritual purity (commensality).

(2) Specialization: Members of a caste may practice only those callings assigned to their jati (ritualized division of labor).

(3) Hierarchy: An individual's social prestige is determined by caste membership. However, the social rank of a jati within a varna group can differ widely.

In the intent of the caste system, vocational specializations serve the maintenance of religious norms. Economic relations rest extensively on personal relations. In practice, this means that the dominant caste in a region receives its goods and services from the other castes, and in return provides them with material support. For example, if an agricultural caste is dominant, its members receive goods (e.g., earthenware) and services (e.g., haircut and shave) from the other castes. In exchange, the lower-ranking castes receive foodstuffs, leasing or rental, or money. In this so-called jajmani system ('patron system'), the castes that are strongest economically generally stand at the head of the hierarchy; depending on circumstances; however, that place may fall to the caste having special political influence or ritual rank.

Again, of great importance is commensality, which lies at the basis of the 'clean/unclean' scale of evaluation. Any commerce with unclean things—subject to a multitude of local modifications—prohibits, on a general or temporary basis, certain social contacts. In particular, patrilinear descent, important in terms of 'purity of ancestry,' accords marriage regulations their great importance (→ Family/Kinship/Genealogy). Group membership (varna) and subcaste (jati) are the fixed normative points in marriages between families. While the concept of caste is ordered to a religious, salvific end, it does not determine a rigid set of regulations that would rule out the necessary pragmatism of the everyday. The respective hierarchies are not, in social reality, unconditionally oriented to the absolute varna hierarchy; rather, they depend on the local stamp of the comprehensive system. This comprehensive system is broadly typical of India and Hinduism even today. A like view is justified to the extent that—as one may say despite certain misleading conceptualizations concerning caste—without castes there would be no → Hinduism. Not only social relations, but religious rights and duties are stipulated by caste membership. Observance of the duties of caste is an inseparable component of dharma, and without the fulfillment of these duties, deliverance from the cycle of births—the goal of all Hindu religions—is regarded as impossible.

Ordering of Castes and Hinduism

Change of Status

3. The ascription of all persons to determinate castes by all caste members is principally conducive to the regulation of personal relationships, from which the Brahmans by no means always draw the greatest profit. Nevertheless, the caste system is not just a mental construct. Otherwise there would not be such vehement opposition to the broadening of government measures in favor of the backward castes. Not only members of the dvija castes, but also those of other castes, who can improve their ranking through the learning and use of Sanskrit, see their privileges threatened through such measures. Changes of status are sought within the caste system, and not through calling it into question. Conversion to another religion deprives members of a backward caste of their claim to reserved places in training and employment. On the other hand, a crossover to Christianity, Islam, or Buddhism frequently presents the only opportunity to escape the status of untouchable, and at least find recognition, perhaps even employment, in the new community. Although the total number of conversions is small, they are a thorn in the side of Hindu religious extremists. Thus, in January 1999, an Australian missionary together with his two sons were burned alive—only the bloody apex of a series of encroachments on churches and mission stations.

Dismantling the Caste System

4. In the twentieth century, the leading champions of the untouchables were Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar and Mahatma → Gandhi. Their efforts, however, were crowned with no lasting success. Today, owing to new lifestyles, many of the earlier differentiations and limitations are being dismantled, especially in the large cities. On the other hand, an intensification of caste awareness must be acknowledged as well, for instance in the Hindu chauvinist movement. What tendencies will prevail in the long term is a question whose answer must be awaited. But a wholesale dismantling of the caste system not only would be all but impossible, owing to its essential structure, but would mean that the principle of subsidiarity resting on it would have to be replaced by public assistance, of which India would scarcely be capable in the foreseeable future.

Literature

Dumont, Louis M., Homo Hierarchicus: An Essay on the Caste System, Chicago 1970 ([1]1966); Fuchs, Martin, Theorie und Verfremdung. Max Weber, Louis Dumont und die Analyse der indischen Gesellschaft, Frankfurt/M. 1988; Kolenda, Pauline M., Caste in Contemporary India: Beyond Organic Solidarity, Prospect Heights 1985 ([1]1977); Srinivas, Mysore N., The Dominant Caste and Other Essays, New Delhi 1987.

→ Boundary, Gandhi, Group, Hinduism, Indian Subcontinent, Purity

Thomas Schweer

Catharsis

Concept

1. Generally, the ancient Greek concept catharsis denotes 'cleansing' or 'purification.' By way of a determinate, prescribed action—usually cultic and ritual—a condition regarded as unclean is forsaken, and, either as novelty or anew, replaced with a state of → purity. The opposition of clean and unclean is universal and enters a system of classification as an ordering of experiences (M. Douglas). In a more restricted sense, 'catharsis' is a medical expression, and denotes a procedure intended to restore a bodily imbalance through removal and discharge. The physician, whose measures are intended to deliver the patient from a 'surfeit' (D. Goltz), must occasionally reinforce self-purifying systems of the body. This conception, according to Aristotle, is verified in tragedy, and his definition of it is the basis of its modern usage in aesthetics and psychoanalysis.

Aristotle

2. In his Politeia, Plato indicted the art of poetry for molding powerful affects in such a way that the state comes to be "guided by the like and dislike to be in the state, instead of being governed by law" (607a). In his Poetics, on the other hand, Aristotle stresses the 'cathartic' function of art, defining this function more closely in terms of its example in tragedy. The effect of tragedy is to "evoke misery and shudders, and thereby work a cleansing from these states of arousal" (1449b). In the original as in translation, it remains unclear how one ought to conceptualize the purification, by art, of these two passions, éleos and phóbos—whose exact meaning, for that matter, is disputed. ('Misery' and 'shudders,' we have called them; 'compassion' and 'fear' are the older translations.)

Moral Interpretation

(a) The first interpretation of Aristotle takes its point of departure in the idea that the passions themselves are purified, so that, along with the subject experiencing them, they are improved. From the late Italian Renaissance to Corneille and Goethe, this is the interpretation defended by nearly all experts in theater, although they weigh certain elements differently. In Germany, Lessing's considerations in the Hamburgische Dramaturgie ("Hamburg Dramaturgy") have been the most influential. Lessing explains that "purification is due to nothing else but the transformation of the passions into virtuous skills" (78th Stück). To this, again, B. Brecht is indebted in his theory of epic theater. He nevertheless replaces the catharsis, for whose success he requires the "empathy of the audience with the persons in the action,"[1] with appreciation and partisanship.

Medical Interpretation

b) The second interpretation of our Aristotelian locus is that misery/fear and shuddering/compassion are first to be evoked, and only then efficaciously eliminated. This is the position of classical philologist Jacob Bernays (1824–1881), who is followed by the majority of Aristotelian scholars. Bernays arrives at his insight by way of a comparison with Aristotle's Politics, where the Philosopher sees the cleansing function of music as a 'relief,' or 'easing' (1342a). By 'catharsis,' he understands a "designation transferred from the bodily to the sensuous sphere, for the purpose of such action, on the part of an anxious individual, that seeks not to alter or repress the antipathetic element, but to arouse it, thrust it forth—and thereby attempt to work the relief of the one who is suffering the anxiety."[2]

Psychoanalysis

3. Bernays' interpretation is of decisive importance for the rise of a new science, that of → psychoanalysis, although, it is true, the latter will not limit itself to it. In the Vienna of the 1880s and 1890s, it presents a most appropriate horizon for the understanding of new phenomena. At the encouragement of his patient Anna O. (Bertha Pappenheim), general practitioner Josef Breuer developed a method of eliminating hysterical symptoms by means of memories evoked under hypnosis. With his younger colleague, Sigmund → Freud—Bernays' nephew by marriage—he produced his revolutionary Studien über Hysterie ("Studies on Hysteria," 1895), in which the new method is credited with a 'cathartic effect,' inasmuch as notions or conceptualizations that have become pathogenic emerge from oblivion, and, 're-remembered,' are recounted and 'rejected.' Catharsis has since become the decisive concept for methods of dealing with the psyche (Soul), which make use of dramatic forms of expression and work with stimulating models of conceptualization.

Cultic Praxis: Cathartic Rites

4. It is probable that the applications of the concept of catharsis, with which we have so far been dealing, have developed from their occurrences in cultic connections. In any case, this concept is indeed encountered in cults—not surprisingly—as → purification, and is usually presented as a preparatory, introductory action to which one must submit in order to take active part in a religious celebration. To this purpose, the candidate's normal condition must be surrendered, and another adopted, often that of dedication or consecration. Catharsis can therefore stand in close connection with practices of → initiation. It occurs as a washing (→ Baptism) or a censing, or may take the forms of abstinence and → asceticism. At times it calls for physically aggressive actions, such as hurling or striking. Cathartic rituals can also be introduced as a remedy for a → crisis. Ancient societies have used them to free someone or something from an evil, or to purify a person or thing of sacrilege (míasma). Occasionally a group or its representative would select a scapegoat (katharmós, pharmakós; cf. Lev 16), to be driven off or slain as representing the group. In Western religions, most of all in Christianity, a penitent confession of sin has an eminently purifying function. It may occur publicly, as in the early Church or in the American Pentecostal movements of the twentieth century, or, as in the Catholic Church since the High Middle Ages, in the form of 'auricular → confession,' the content of which, on the part of the priest, is secret by law. When, at divine service or in individual séance, ecstasy and → trance are introduced, cathartic characteristics may attach to cultic seizure by a spirit.

1. Brecht 1967, 16:240.
2. Bernays 1858, 12.

Literature

Primary sources: Aristotle, Poetics, introd., comm. and app. by D. W. Lucas, London 1978; Idem, Politics, trans. by Benjamin Jowett, New York 1943; Bernays, Jacob, Grundzüge der verlorenen Abhandlung des Aristoteles über die Wirkung der Tragödie, Breslau 1858; Brecht, Bertolt, "Über eine nichtaristotelische Dramatik," in: Gesammelte Werke 16, Frankfurt/M. 1967, 227-336; Breuer, Josef/Freud, Sigmund, Studies on Hysteria, New York 2000 ([1]1895); Lessing, G. E., Hamburgische Dramaturgie, Stuttgart 1981; Plato, The Republic, trans. J. L. Davies and D. J. Vaughan, London 1935.

Secondary literature: Bremmer, Jan, "Scapegoat Rituals in Ancient Greece," in: Harvard Studies in Classical Philology 87 (1983), 299-320; Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Scheff, T. J., Catharsis in Healing, Ritual and Drama, Berkeley etc. 1979.

→ Crisis, Illness/Health, Initiation, Purity, Ritual, Soul, Trance, Theater

Martin Treml

Catholicism

The spectrum of the concept 'Catholicism' is broad, stretching from a vague understanding to concretely identifiable phenomena. In the widest sense, Catholicism describes the Catholic Church together with all of the manifestations of Catholic Christianity, without spatial or temporal limitation. In the narrowest sense, it is provided with an attribute (for instance, in the expression, 'political Catholicism'), and denotes functional or ideological segments of a given 'milieu Catholicism.' Along this broad scale, one may identify four focal variants, current in everyday use and in research, of the meaning of the term 'Catholicism.'

'Catholic' and 'Catholicism'

1. The broadest denotation of the concept of Catholicism applies to every manifestation of the Catholic Church over the course of two millennia: the Roman Catholic Church and the attitudes and actions it has inspired. This usage spans a continuity, and appeals to the earliest use of the word 'catholic' (Gk., kathólon), in the sense of 'general,' 'universal,' by Ignatius of Antioch, (d. c. 110), in order to cite a feature of the Church. Actually, the meaning of the tradition of a single part of Christianity appears only with the confessionalization of the concept as Catholic, in the sixteenth century, when the concept 'Catholicism' is first used. The formula 'Roman Catholic Church' (see 2) was first established with the separation of Old Catholicism from 'Catholicism' in a countermovement to the dogma of the infallibility (1870). In contradistinction to → Protestantism, the Catholic Church stresses → tradition along with the Bible, as well as the role of a clergy sundered from the laity as administrators and allocators of the goods of salvation. Divergences in teachings on justification and on grace, in the understanding of the → Lord's Supper and the Sacraments, in the understanding of office, as well as in a particular centralism (→ Papacy), make ecumenical progress difficult even today.

The Roman Catholic Church

2. 'Catholicism' often functions as a synonym for Roman Catholic Church. Theologians especially relate with skepticism to this identification. The division between Church and Catholicism in the sense of the "historical expressions of life, and their consequences," emerging from that Church is the occasion of the "misinterpretation" of historical vicissitudes "as favoring, or detracting from, the proper essence of the Church."[1] Insofar, however, as the interest in a pure 'essence' of the Church—the existence of which, even so, is adopted in faith, and whose profile, once more, is always defined by the Church itself—stands behind it, this distinction is purely theological, and otherwise unusable. In another respect, the division between Church and Catholicism is altogether important analytically: Catholicism as a social, political, and cultural phenomenon points far beyond the narrower purview of the official Church, although it does stand it in close connection with it.

Catholicism as Weltanschauung

3. More frequently, under 'Catholicism' a Weltanschauung or worldview is understood, for one thing as an ensemble of dogmas and religious values, for another as an ideology with secular claims and effects. Thus, 'Catholicism' can refer to the overall system of the Church, or to the respective variants of that system (Latin American, Irish Catholicism). Even as early as the nineteenth century, Catholics labeled their system of interpretation a Weltanschauung, whose closed character and supposed indefectibility it proudly displayed to its adversaries. Catholicism has had its current specific ideological and political stamp since the first third of the nineteenth century. In ultra-montanism (from the Latin, ultra montes, 'beyond the mountains' [Alps] from the perspective of Middle and North Europeans, i.e., from the viewpoint of persons living north of the Alps), the system became interiorly disciplined and sealed off against the outside—against the infections of modernity later included in 'modernism.' Since the defeat of Fascism and state socialism, Catholicism has been regarded as the last survivor of the great, centrally organized ideologies. In contradistinction to the level of a reflective high ideology, with specific dogmas and statutes (frequently a challenging compromise among scholars, popes, and civil powers), new scholarship moves closer to the level of the concrete population and the everyday. The history of this mentality comprises collectively distributed patterns of interpretation, emotions and ritual practices (pilgrimage, belief in miracles, 'superstition,' procession, pious devotion, → veneration of the saints, and so on), as well as their instrumentalization and their effects on life patterns, politics (attitude in elections), and society (formation of milieus). One sees that the normativization and expansion of a belief to be prescribed by the confessions and churches (Catholic and Protestant) triumphed not as early as the confessional age of the → Reformation, but only in the nineteenth century, a second confessional era.

Catholicism as Milieu

4. Since the 1960s, 'Catholicism' has been commonly understood as referring to concrete milieus. This sociological approach has emphatically taken its distance from the postulation of any (supra-temporal, metaphysical) 'essence' of Catholicism or of the Church, and concentrates instead on the part of Catholicism, among all 'categorical' Catholics (Church members), that finds itself in a movement or organized network. In societies where Catholics constitute only a numerical → minority, this concrete formation in communication and solidarity is called a sub-society, because it forms a society within a hegemonic (Protestant) greater society. In the United States (Catholics, 1910, 18%; 2002, 24%) one speaks simply of US Catholics; for Germany (Catholics, 1900, 36%; 1995, 33.4%) the milieu concept has established itself; in Switzerland one speaks of sub-societies (Catholics, 1900, c. 39%; 1992, 46.1%); in the Netherlands (1900, 35%; 1992, 36%) they are called 'pillars.' In countries where Catholics are in the majority, divided between laicism and loyal Catholicism (Austria, France), the term is 'camps' (Belgium, 'pillars'). The highest level of the degree of formation of these various Catholicisms is the pillar: Between the end of the nineteenth century and the 1960s, Dutch Catholics had their own schools, labor unions, and associations, including even sporting associations, elected a Catholic party, and listened to their own radio stations. A like confessional separatism is also to be observed in Germany, even before the Kulturkampf ('battle for/over [a] culture'). When the milieus eroded is disputed: the earliest dating for the demise of the Catholic milieu in Germany is around 1900, another is during the time of National Socialism, the latest as late as Vatican II (1962–1965). Core structures of this milieu are still alive today, and scholarship investigates its current homogeneity.

Segments of Milieu Catholicism

5. Purposefully restricted concepts of Catholicism are applicable to certain segments of milieu Catholicism that have responsibility for a specific task, or that evidence a special direction.

Political Catholicism refers to political representation of Catholics, which manifested itself in the early nineteenth century as a 'Catholic movement,' against secularization and state omnipotence, and later, in many countries, in Catholic parties (1870, Zentrum, Ger., "Center"; 1918, Katholieke Staats Partij, Dutch, "Catholic State Party"; 1919, Partito Populare Italiano, "Italian Popular Party"; etc.). Vereinskatholizismus ("Association Catholicism"), supported Catholicism's political commitments in its largely religious, but also political, social, and cultural organizations. The largest mass organization was the Volksverein für das katholische Deutschland ("Popular Association for a Catholic Germany," 1914, 805,000 members). What is termed 'Social' Catholicism challenged → industrial society (the 'social question'), attempting, at first, to dominate it through its charities. Later, Catholic social doctrine tried a middle way between capitalism and communism or socialism. Cultural Catholicism refers to two phenomena: associations for the fostering of Catholic interests in science, literature, and art—and then, recently (as counterpart of cultural Protestantism) the wing that opened itself to modernity, including Old Catholicism, Reform Catholicism since the 1890s, and liberal Catholicism. Here lie traditions of leftist or critical Catholicism, which criticizes celibacy and authority and comes forward in favor of more freedom on the part of the faithful vis-à-vis the hierarchy. On the other side, rightist Catholicism (national Catholicism) developed into a tributary of National Socialism in Germany. Present problems of a normative tonic for the failing importance of the churches (despite a remission after 1945), of their moral imperatives, and the accelerating privatization of the faith since the 1960s, come to expression in concepts like 'occasional' or 'opportunity Catholicism.'

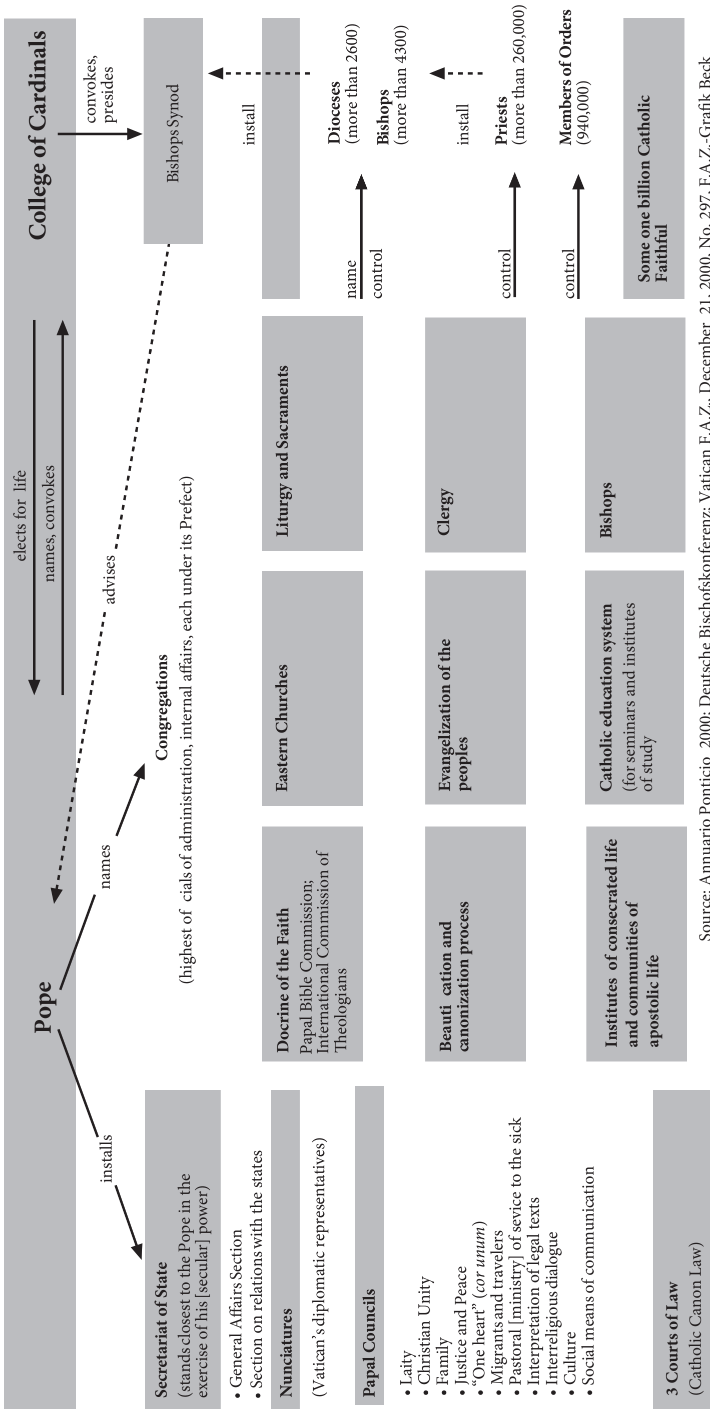
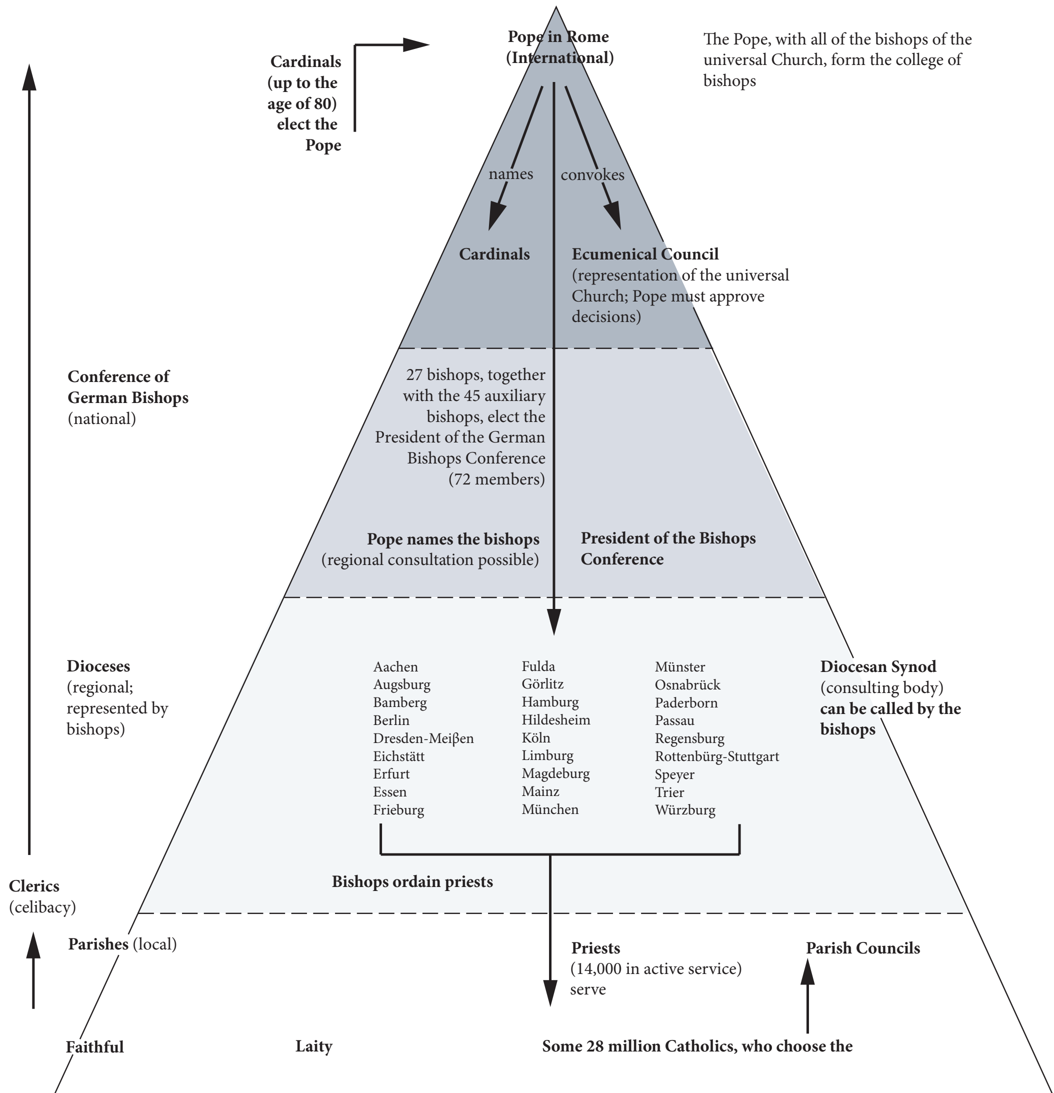
1. Rahner 1961, 89.



Literature



Blaschke, Olaf/Kuhlemann, Frank-Michael (eds.), Religion im Kaiserreich. Milieus, Mentalitäten, Krisen, Gütersloh 1996; Buchanan, Tom/Conway, Martin (eds.), Political Catholicism in Europe 1918–1965, Oxford 1996; Collinge, William J., Historical Dictionary of Catholicism, Lanham 1997; Glazier, Michael/Hellwig, Monika K. (eds.), The Modern Catholic Encyclopedia, Dublin 1994; McGreevy, John T., Catholicism and American Freedom: A History, New York 2003; Rahner, Karl, "Katholizismus," in: Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche 6 (^{2}1961), 88f.

→ Christianity, Confession, Veneration of Saints, Mary, Miracles, Papacy, Protestantism, Relics (Veneration of), Rome

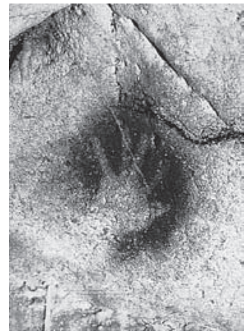
Olaf Blaschke

Catholicism: Tables

The Hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church: Example of Germany

Cave



The Cave as Place of Worship

1. Caves, as places of cultic, ritual or religious actions in the broadest sense, are a worldwide phenomenon. They can neither be circumscribed by a historical period, nor simply connected with particular societal forms. Caves, in all times and on all continents, serve as particular fixed points in the landscape of nature. By way of their natural structure as 'gates to another world,' they play an important role in human beings' cultural and mythological interpretation of the environment.

Old Stone Age

2. In the section of human history accessible only by archaeological methods, caves seem to have been of special importance not only for modern persons, but also for European and Near Eastern Neanderthals. The first unambiguous, representative artistic expressions of the modern person likewise come from caves. Here, on the one hand, we find the small ivory objects in Southern Germany, and on the other, the paintings recently discovered in the grotto of Chauvet (Ardèche, in France), which are more than 30,000 years old. These paintings, besides, represent the oldest example of the European phenomenon of producing representations and signs in deep caves, away from the light of day.

Although the precise content of these paintings remains forever closed to us, still, after a painstaking analysis, they at least permit a glance into the world of thought and imagination in which persons lived during the Old Stone Age (the Paleolithic) in Europe. Simultaneously, these caves demonstrate an intensive and specific involvement with the natural environment, which extends far beyond ecological and economic needs (→ Nature). The hunting and gathering peoples of the Paleolithic moved in meaningful, mythological → landscapes as well, as we know from ethnography.

The depiction of human hands on the walls of caves is a worldwide phenomenon. Representations of this kind demonstrate a close connection between the artists and the caves with their natural structure. The picture shows the negative of a hand, from the Old Stone Age grotto of Ardèche, in France, which is some 30,000 years old. The coloring was probably sprayed on by mouth. The occurrence of hallucinogenic substances in these dyes supports a 'shamanic' and ritual interpretation of Stone Age cave art.

3. In all parts of the world, caves are important points of demarcation. They have never served simply for the housing and shelter of 'cave men,' but have always been part of a bustling world. In this sense, they themselves represent lively little 'universes.' For example, with the discovery of paintings or etchings, we behold a blend of realities mythological and real, alive and inanimate. Caves seem to be places of a ritual and religious age, in which the natural order of the everyday world loses its meaning, or is even twisted into its contrary.

This observation stands in correspondence with general structures of → ritual, which call for an exclusion from 'normal time' and are frequently accompanied by extreme bodily and psychic states, hallucinations, and 'sensory deprivation' (the exclusion of external sensory influences; → Perception). These latter elements are doubtless responsible for the fact that in all cultures and in different social circumstances caves claim a special meaning and importance. They are points of intersection with the 'suprasensory' and entryways to another world. Their walls often become, as it were, thin membranes, through which an exchange with supernatural powers and beings takes place. The 'sun dance' of the Cheyenne, for example, is the compelling representation of a mythological story with which, each year, nature is reanimated. The central 'cabin of new life' here symbolizes the sacred mountain Nowah'wus, on which—in a cave—the great medicine spirit (Maheo) slept with the female companion of a mythical shaman. Still

In Myalapur (Karnataka) in India, a young assistant priest reverences the god Mallanna—a divinity identified with Shiva—in the god's cultic cave, swinging a camphor lamp before him. The mask imbedded in fabric shows the location at which the god has appeared to human beings. Like a prince or a king, he wears elegant clothes and a large turban. As a mount, a horse is furnished to him, and also a trident—Shiva's attribute. Worshipping in caves is a widespread practice in India. In keeping with Hindu cosmology, the maternal bosom of Nature, from which the today, the Cheyenne seek out this mountain and its caves for meditation and fasting, in connection with rites of initiation and vision quests.

4. This is the basis on which we conclude that caves have probably never lost their meaning for religious life. In traditional tales and sagas, the cave stands for a connection with nature and the earth, and is seen as akin to an 'Earth Mother.' She may join life-bestowing attributes and lethal ones all in one person. Caution, however, is often enough in order here when a millennial ritual tradition is postulated for familiar or famous caves. Such a tradition can represent actual continuities, the repeated use of natural conditions, or things only recently produced. The discovery of an unambiguous distinction is often beset with difficulties at the hands of historical and archaeological methods.

Many caves on Crete, for instance, are set in connection with Greek mythology: Rhea is supposed to have brought Zeus into the world in the cave of Dicte, while he himself, concealed from his father Kronos, grew up in the grotto of Camare. In these instances, continuities between Minoan and Greek portrayals are clearly observable, although they are scarcely plausible for later times. In the early New Stone Age (Neolithic), the Eileithyian Cave seems to have been a dwelling and burial place, and was often mentioned even by ancient authors (such as Homer). It was only in the middle of the last century, however, that it was rediscovered, after centuries of oblivion.

Nevertheless, points of application of actual traditions are offered by, for example, the 'Black Madonnas,' with whom it is apparently a matter of applying a Christian meaning to older cave cults. In this case, the archaic fruitfulness-motif of 'birth in the cave of the earth' gained access to Christian iconography, just as early Greek Orthodox presentations attest the birth of Christ in a stone grotto. Last, but not least, we should recall that the place of pilgrimage of Lourdes is likewise in a cave.

Besides all of this, caves, as places of religious life, are often bound up with the romantic world of imagination of certain movements that may be inspired by esoteric spirituality, or feminism. Such movements bestow upon caves the rank of 'archetypal places of → initiation' and render them the object of projections of a long-lost, apparently original connection with the earth, if not indeed the object of a mystical experience of nature.

entire world of phenomena unfolds, is also represented as a cave lying beneath a mountain. This concept is present in temples (as 'images of the cosmos'), where the sanctuary—a dark room with smooth walls—is always unmistakably reminiscent of a cave. Many caves even acquire meaning as the dwelling place of respected ascetics. (Benita von Behr)

Literature

Clottes, Jean/Lewis-Williams, David, The Shamans of Prehistory: Trance and Magic in the Painted Caves, New York 1998; Duerr, Hans Peter, Sedna oder die Liebe zum Leben, Frankfurt/M. 1984; Francfort, Henri-Paul/Hamayon, Roberte N. (eds.), The Concept of Shamanism: Uses and Abuses, Budapest 2001; Lewis-Williams, David, The Mind in the Cave: Consciousness and the Origins of Art, London 2002; Whitley, David S. (ed.), Handbook of Rock Art Research, Walnut Creek 2001.

→ Landscape, Nature, Place (Sacred), Pre- and Early History

Martin Porr

Celibacy

1. In Western society, → sexuality is considered an important component of being human. In most cultures, one's own procreation in one's children is fully as basic a need as a perspective on one's life. When the Catholic Church demands of its priests the unmarried state as a charisma specific to their office, it stands in stark contrast to the values of modernity. The Catholic Church theologically grounds a compelled renunciation of sexuality and → family in the unmarried state of Jesus himself. What for him was demanded by the inconstancy of the underground movement, and rendered bearable by the expectation of a total, imminent upheaval, becomes a valid injunction forever and everywhere.

True, historical findings make it clear that lifelong celibacy (Lat., caelebs/coelebs, 'unmarried' [masc.]) for those in Christian office has been the usage since the fourth century, in their situation of competition with the 'holy' or 'holier' monks. But only in the Western Church, and only since the Second Council of the Lateran (1139), has the unmarried state for all priests been imposed unconditionally. As the Reformers—provocatively—dismantled celibacy and replaced it with the vicarage, the Catholic Church, in a counter-move, promoted celibacy to the status of an unconditional

For Catholics in the United States, the current shortage of priests is often painfully evident. Louise Haggett found no priest to visit her mother in a nursing home—until she turned to married priests. And so, in 1992, C.I.T.I.'s ("Celibacy Is The Issue") idea of "Rent a Priest" was born. Married Roman Catholic priests offer their services at www.rentapriest.com. Through a database, those interested can find priests in their area who are at their disposal for consultation, the celebration of Holy Mass, and the sacraments. Besides the important rites of passage, such as marriage and funerals, assistance in need (Communion and the Sacrament of the Sick at the sickbed) is provided. Offers are made for the private celebration of Mass with the faithful at home, or for the celebration of marriages of divorced Catholics—the latter against the teaching of the Catholic Church, which not only prohibits such ceremonies, but declares the marriages themselves null and void under immutable divine law. Indeed, priests not living in celibacy are no longer permitted to act as priests at all, except in a case of imminent danger of death. Nonetheless, even in the official teaching just referred to, they are recognized as validly ordained; and of course they offer the education and experience of their office. Provocatively, they here demonstrate their pro-family stance with an unusual presentation of the Last Supper: Jesus surrounded by his disciples, their wives, and their children! Together, these priests excluded from the clergy stress the 'holiness of the married life' as well as their irreversible ordination: "Once a priest, always a priest" (principle of the character indelebilis, 'indelible character'—the permanent mark imprinted on the soul by the reception of a non-reiterable sacrament). The private

We married Roman Catholic Priest/couples invite you to join us in celebration.

COME AS YOU ARE !

Jesus, the Apostles, their wives and children at the Last Supper

Welcome to the web site of

Celibacy Is The Issue

(C.I.T.I)

An International Married Roman Catholic Priest Faith Community and

The "Rent A Priest"© Referral Program

Visit our Cyber Catholic Community Web Site

characteristic of → Catholicism, in the Council of Trent in 1563. Compensation for the renunciation, on the other hand, is invisible: the "marriage with heaven" (coelum), as the popular etymology ran, was visible only indirectly, in the cohesion of brotherhoods and in the social prestige that was the occasion of admiration and influence; today, the celibate priest is alienated from community and society.

2. Along with all of this appears the question of the compatibility of sexuality and holiness. Is a 'celibacy' so narrowly bounded by a Christian institution also to be found in other religions? Sexuality is often regarded as incompatible with ritual activity—but also with hunting and war, for example; nevertheless, it is seldom required lifelong. This obervation demonstrates that sexuality is at times regarded as befouling and impure, but that it has no affinity with the Christian concept of → sin (→ Purity). The distinction is clear from the Indian ritual handbooks, the Brahmanas, which appeared some seven hundred years BCE. If a yajamana (a married man allowed to have a sacrifice offered) is appointed to a particular ritual, and is himself thereby ordained, he must be chaste before and during the ceremony, and this in some cases for a year. The sacrifice leads the yajamana into another existence, and the transition is seen as birth. In the course of the sacrifice at hand, he is like a fetus, and hence not sufficiently mature for sexuality. There may be no other culture that has been so concerned with → asceticism and celibacy, on the one hand, and on the other, with sexuality, as the Indian (→ Indian Subcontinent; Hinduism). Another basis for celibacy in Indian culture is the notion that the loss of semen means the loss of spiritual power. There are numberless tales which recount of an ascetic that, through sexual abstinence, he has amassed so much strength that he has become a threat to the gods. Only by sending some utterly beautiful nymphs to his side, to be his temptation, were the gods successful in seducing the ascetic and thus in despoiling him of his strength. Celibacy continues to play an important role in Hinduism: In the last phase of their life, Indians of the three highest conditions are supposed to wander about as Sanyasin (roaming ascetics), and although this is rarely done, it surely shows the meaning of celibacy on an ideological level. Celibacy is also of importance in certain neo-Hindu movements that have appeared in the West, such as the → Hare Krishna.

and individual nature of their personal histories of sufferings should be countered with a constructive, need-oriented appeal to a personal calling. The target group of the Rent a Priest program are especially persons who, on whatsoever grounds, feel alienated from the institutional Church. For their own legitimation, the initiators appeal to the circumstances of early Christianity. Married priests who do not wish to be dispensed from their office, but who continue to understand themselves as (Catholic) priests even without celibacy, are offered, over the Internet, the opportunity to make their concerns public, to reach their clientele in an uncomplicated and trans-regional manner, and to develop their own fields of activity. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

Celibacy in the European History of Religion

Classical Antiquity

3. a) If we turn our gaze to the West, we see another situation. In classical antiquity, celibacy was not a general goal of life. It is striking that priests regularly did not live in celibacy, but priestesses often did. Virginity obviously had a different meaning with women than with men, and indeed women's virginity was ascribed a superior power. Correspondingly, it is to be observed in Greco-Roman mythology that there were indeed virgin goddesses in the society of the divinities, such as Athena and Artemis, but no virgin gods. Priestesses often assumed the role of oracular medium between gods and human beings, and had to be chaste, since the god gave his oracle through sexual union, and the priestess in question must therefore never have been touched by a man. True, there were also prescriptions of chastity for laity; however, they were linked to a particular place or festival, as during the three days of the Thesmophorian Festival in Athens. Here again it is striking that celibacy was mostly expected of women. With the Romans, the Vestals are doubtless the best-known example: For a period of thirty years, they had to live in virginity. In Hellenism, the demand for celibacy intensified after the passing of the classical period. Stoics, Neo-Platonists, and some Gnostics (→ Gnosticism) valued sexual abstinence as worth the effort. This outlook emerged from a dualistic conceptualization, in which the body is subordinated to the soul: the soul, in the view of believers, must be released from the body if it is to reach salvation.

Early Christianity and Late Antiquity

b) It is in terms of Hellenism and Judaism that we must appraise celibacy in Christianity. In the New Testament, it is never prescribed. Paul, however, preferred a celibate lifestyle as an appropriate preparation for the imminent end of the world (1 Cor 7:25-40). The earliest and most senior leaders of the early Christian community, obviously, were selected from among married men. Besides these beginnings of an institutionalized clergy, there were also wandering charismatics, who were personally conscious of being filled with the Holy Spirit, and who lived their celibacy in the following and discipleship of Jesus. These charismatics disappeared fairly early, as they were looked upon as a threat to the newly established ecclesiastical hierarchy. In third century Egypt, 'desert ascetics' (anchorites) appeared and influenced the formation of → monasticism. The origins of monasticism are not entirely clear, but in any case a role was played by the worsening economic situation, and the resulting disintegration of solidarity groups. The early development of monasticism in the East, where it also fulfilled ministerial needs, contributed to the fact that pressure on the lower clergy to live in complete celibacy was never great in those areas, as monasticism provided as an alternative for devotees of celibacy. True, it was—and is—forbidden to priests of the Orthodox Church to engage in sexual relations before the divine service. Bishops, however, failed to escape this pressure to remain unmarried. In the first place, the people attributed a higher sanctity to them, and in the second place the authorities did not look kindly on the distribution of church possessions among children of bishops, since this could have given rise to powerful church dynasties. In the Eastern Church, monks are still usually selected to be bishops.

Eastern Monasticism and Orthodox Churches

4. To return to the problem with which we began: if celibacy seems necessary—not, indeed, for Christianity, but for a charismatic understanding of the priest and for the identity of the Catholic Church—then the Church confronts a serious problem. In view of the dearth of priests, priests will now have to be brought in for Mass 'on the fly.' If celibacy is a matter of historical contingency, however, so that it will still be possible to be observed, even praised and recommended, but without its being unconditional, then parishes will have 'their' priests again. Certain Catholic parishes in the Netherlands, with the sufferance of the Bishop, already have 'their' married priests.

Literature

Abbott, Elizabeth, A History of Celibacy, New York 2000; Brown, Peter, The Body and Society: Men, Women and Sexual Renunciation in Early Christianity, New York 1988; Brundage, James A., Law, Sex and Christian Society in Medieval Europe, Chicago 1987; Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Kaelber, Walter O., Tapta Mārga: Asceticism and Initiation in Vedic India, Albany 1989; Lot-Falk, Eveline, Les Rites de chasse chez les peuples Sibériens, Paris 1953; Olivelle, Patrick, Rules and Regulations of Brahmanical Asceticism, New York 1995.

→ Asceticism, Catholicism, Charisma, Family, Monasticism, Priest/Priestess, Purity, Sexuality, Specialists (religious)

Leo Tepper

Celts

Concept

1. Today's denotation of the concept Celtic (from 'Celts'; Gk., Keltoi, Galatai; Lat., Celtae, Galli), from the soccer team to harp music, can be seen as the product of a lengthy, repeatedly interrupted history of its → reception. Generally, the concept designates at least three distinct stocks of content: (a) certain ethnic groupings, (b) an Indo-European language group (Irish, Gaelic, Welsh, and Breton are still actively spoken today), and (c) an archaeological complex in western Middle Europe, distinguished by its synonymous style of art.

Antiquity

2. The name Keltoi first appears around 500 BCE in Greek texts and served to designate the 'barbarous' societies, the so-called keltiké, living along the northern and middle coasts of the ancient Mediterranean world. Traditionally, these 'early Celts' were ranged as part of the Hallstatt culture (800–500 BCE) so interesting to archaeologists (→ Pre- and Early History). Beginning in the fifth century BCE, along a geographical belt that stretched from eastern France to Bohemia, there arose a new, differentiable culture, now named for the earliest Swiss archaeological site, La Tène, that is regarded as Celtic.

In the third century BCE, the 'Celtic world' consisted of a shifting mosaic of autonomous tribes stretching from Ireland to Hungary; it also comprised some enclaves in the area that goes from Portugal to Turkey. For Caesar, the Celtae were merely a tribe among others in greater Gaul, and must have taken that name themselves. It may be that the generalization came from cultural contact between Greece and Gaul.

Contrary to today's praxis, no ancient author designated the Britons or Irish as Celts. However, an ideological function of the identification of the 'Celtic' appears already in the ancient authors.

Religion

3. Besides some of the testimony of ancient authors, we have inscriptions; both name a plethora of Celtic gods and goddesses, but ordinarily in terms of the Interpretatio Romana, and therefore in dependency upon the system of Roman gods. From the elaborate burial gifts found in graves of the early Celtic cultures on the Continent, it can be concluded that they held a belief in a life after death, at least for their nobility (graves of princes). Steles and images there portray divinities, often in combination with animals, which has been interpreted as totemistic. Additionally, there are indications of a mythological kind derived from medieval Welsh and Irish folklore—to festivals throughout the course of the year, and to notions of 'another world.' However, scholars dispute the authenticity of these texts, and, even more vigorously, question any connection they might have with Continental systems of belief that disappeared centuries before their appearance on the British Isles. Investigation of sites of Celtic → sacrifice indicates a comprehensive sacrificial praxis, presumably prevailing throughout → Druid culture; but we have neither descriptions of the Celts' rituals, nor reports on the conceptualization of their beliefs. From finds in Gaul it can be concluded that there was a warrior cult in which skulls were revered, and where, perhaps, even → human sacrifice played a part. In view of the wide temporal and cultural variance of the cultures that have been pointed to as Celtic, the very existence of a Celtic religion is disputed; scholarship assumes instead the existence of different systems of worship and belief prevailing at different times. As the content of Celtic beliefs can no longer be discovered, and owing to the multiplicity of heterogeneous sources, the Celtic religions, since early modern times, have been the subject of fanciful reconstructions and compilations, which constitute an important aspect of the reception of Celtic culture.

Reception of the Celts

4. Beginning in the sixteenth century, one encounters the notion that the Gauls were Celtic ancestors of the French, and any political, philosophical, or religious wish representations were projected onto a pre-Roman past, which was not sufficiently known. Even today the erroneous seventeenth-century ascription of bronze-age places of burial and worship to the Celtic Druids remains influential (Stonehenge). Normative for the popular image of the Celtic literature and mentality in the second half of the eighteenth century were the Works of Ossian, written by James Macpherson (1736–1796), which unleashed a veritable wave of Romantic 'Celtization.' In the nineteenth century, nationalistic, nativist endeavors and progress in archaeology, and newly founded 'Celtology,' mutually conditioned each other. The contraposition of Celtic Bretons, Welsh, Scots, and Irish to French, Franks, Teutons, Anglo-Saxons, or English betrays an intrinsically contradictory pattern, the presentation of which can range from that of a morally superior periphery to a technically superior central culture; but in any case the Celtic is the 'other.' In the literary movement of the Irish Renaissance at the beginning of the twentieth century, esteem for the Celtic culminates in the concept of the Irish, as the never-Romanized 'most Celtic Celts.'

Celts and New Age

5. The most recent development is the reception of supposedly Celtic religiosity in the → 'New Age,' including, for example, the idea of a Celtic matriarchate (Jean Markale), and the mobilization 'of the Celts' for the idea of a European unity. Although its swollen connotation has rendered it nebulous, the concept of Celts today serves not only as a specification for strangers and foreigners, but also, and especially, as a self-designation by not a few persons. This phenomenon has received copious contributions from its application in art films (such as "Excalibur," 1951), just as with bestselling novel The Mists of Avalon (Marion Zimmer Bradley, 1982). The French comic strip "Asterix" (Albert Uderzo and René Goscinny, since 1959) became especially popular, and has been translated into numerous languages across the world. It has sold 200 million copies worldwide. Since the 1980s, there are also attempts to revive an imaginary 'Celtic shamanism,' partly with the help of Native American rituals.

Literature

Birkhan, Helmut, Celts: Images of Their Culture, London 2000; Brown, Terence (ed.), Celticism, Amsterdam 1996; Chopman, Malcolm, The Celts: The Construction of a Myth, New York 1992; Hubert, Henry, The History of the Celtic People, London 1934; James, Simon, Exploring the World of the Celts, London 1993; Maier, Bernhard, Dictionary of Celtic Religion and Culture, Woodbridge 1997; Idem, The Celts: A History from Earliest Times to the Present, Edinburgh 2003.

→ Antiquity, Druids, European History of Religion, Reception

Silvia Kurre

Celts and Teutons: Time Chart

Era 1: Pre-Christian Northern Europe

8th–6th cent. BCE	Hallstatt culture	The Hallstatt Culture, named for a cemetery near Hallstatt in the Salzkammergut, extends from its nucleus to the middle Danube, then across Central Europe. It replaces the Bronze Age Urn-Field Culture. Numerous large grave hills and high forts appear.
4th cent. BCE	La Tène culture	Influenced by the Scythians, the Greek trading colonies, and the Etruscan culture, the Celtic La Tène Culture stretches to Spain, Northern Italy, and Britain, accompanied by a major social organization, with certain city centers. The Viereckschanzen (Ger., 'square trenches'), very extensive mainly north of the Alps, are most often interpreted in religious terms, although unambiguous archaeological testimonials are lacking.
387 BCE	"Gallic Catastrophe"	In 387, a Celtic army strikes the legions of the Roman Republic in the Battle of Allia, destroying them, plunders Rome, and besieges the Capitolium. A ransom finally purchases the retreat of the Celts into the settled region of the Plain of the Po.

278 BCE	Plundering of Delphi	A Celtic host invades Greece, and besieges Delphi.
58–51 BCE	Julius Caesar conquers Gaul	In 58, Julius Caesar besieges the Helvetians, invades Gaul (today's France and the Benelux countries), and subjugates the Gallic tribes in a series of campaigns. His report, De Bello Gallico, discusses the Druid religion in Gaul and Britain, and brings the names of the Gallic gods into conformity with the Roman Pantheon. Gaul becomes part of the Roman Empire. A mixed Gallo-Roman culture appears.
9 CE	Battle of Varus	After three legions, under Varus, are annihilated by Teutonic tribes in the Battle in the Teutoburg Forest, the Roman attempt to subjugate the Teutons all the way to the Elbe is abandoned once more. In the nineteenth century, the heroic figure of "Hermann the Cheruscan" becomes a national symbol in Germany ("Herman's Monument").
from 43 CE, 78–84	Romanizing of Britain	Roman marshal Agricola forges ahead with the conquest of Britain, which had been begun in 43, and in 84 besieges the Caledonians in the Battle of Mount Graupius. The conquest of Scotland, however, remains to be accomplished, just as does an invasion that has been planned. Instead, the Wall of Antony is built into a border defense.

98 CE	Publius Cornelius Tacitus: Germania (De Origine et Situ Germanorum Liber) (Lat., "Germania—Book of the Origin and Place of the Teutons")	Roman writer Tacitus writes a polemical, cultural, critique of Rome's 'collapse of mores.' Roman culture and history seem to him to be inferior to those of the Teutonic tribes. His opus is one of the rare sources that deal with Teutonic religion, but must be read critically. Since the Renaissance, and especially in the first half of the twentieth century, the positive image of the Teutonic religion serves for national and popular edification and ideology in Germany.
from 400	De-Romanization of Britain	The Roman Province of Britain is abandoned. In around 420, the legions withdraw. From 450 onward, the Teutonic tribes of the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes conquer the Southeast of the island, forcing the Britons back to Wales and Scotland. Along with them, Christianity withdraws to these 'British' regions.

Era 2: Christianization of the Pagan World
5th cent.	Saint Patrick	Patrick, half British, half Roman son of a decurion, plies a mission in Ireland. The Church of Armagh lays claim to his succession, and, beginning in the eighth century, fosters his ascent to the status of Ireland's 'National Saint.'
563	Founding of the Iona Monastery (Hebrides)	Irish peer Colum Cille founds the monastery of Iona on an island of the Hebrides. From there, and from its daughter monastery Lindisfarne, founded in 635, Irish monks' (Re-) Christianization of Britain and Germania (land of the Teutons) proceeds apace.
596	Founding of Canterbury	King Aethelberht of Cantia is baptized, and bestows Canterbury on Roman Legate Augustine as seat of the episcopate of Britain.
7th–11th cent.	Flourishing of the Irish Church	In the Irish monastic centers, an extensive Christian and mythological literature appears. Irish monks serve missions to Britain and Germany ("Iro-Scottish Mission" / "Scottish Monasteries").

772–804	Saxon Wars of Charlemagne	Charlemagne conducts campaigns against the Saxons, and in 772 destroys the Isle of Irm, a key sanctuary of the Teutonic tribes, compelling mass baptisms. The baptism of Widukind, Duke of the Saxons, is in 785. In the folk paganism of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, the victory of 'Charles, Slaughterer of the Saxons' is seen as a historic 'original sin,' that had been punished by the victory of the 'foreign' Christian religion.
10th cent.	Christianization of Scandinavia	C. 960: Danish King Harald Blauzahn (Ger., 'Harald of the Blue Tooth') is baptized, and builds dioceses in Denmark. Beginning in 995, Norwegian King Olav Tryggvason, and his successor Olav the Holy, introduce Christianity into Norway, in some cases by force. In 1000, Olav Skötkonung ('King of the Scots') is baptized. In 1083, King Inge has the central pagan temple of Uppsala closed. In 1164, Uppsala becomes an episcopal see.
from 988	Christianization of Russia	Vladimir I, Prince of Kiev and Novgorod, marries Anna, sister of Emperor Basileus I of Constantinople, and introduces Christianity into the Russian Empire.

1000	Iceland	The Icelandic King introduces Christianity by Parliamentary Decree. The images of the Nordic gods are hurled into the Goða, but their private veneration is still permitted. The saga literature of the twelfth century preserves traits of pre-Christian society.
1168	Destruction of the last Pomeranians' temple	Waldemar I of Denmark captures the fort of Arkona on Rügen, destroys the pagan Pomeranians' last temple, and takes the statue of Slavic god Swantewit to Denmark as booty.
Era 3: Origins of the modern image of the Celto-Teutonic Culture
c. 1137	Geoffrey of Monmouth: Historia Regum Britanniae (Lat., "History of the Kings of Britain")—Beginning of the Myth of Arthur	Geoffrey of Monmouth composes a fictitious history of the prehistoric kings of Britain, according to which a King Arthur builds a Britonic Empire and successfully combats Romans and Anglo-Saxons. His book becomes the starting point of an extensive folk literature of King Arthur.
from 1150	Tales of "Tristan and Isolde"	After 1150, there appear various adaptations of the saga of Tristan and Isolde (e.g., by Béroul, Eilhart of Oberge, and Gottfried of Strassburg). The material presumably spread from Wales to the rest of Europe in the eleventh century, and developed motifs of Welsh mythology.

13th cent.	Nibelungenlied ("Song of the Nibelung")	At the episcopal see in Passau, the Nibelungenlied (Ger., "Song of the Nibelung") appears, a compilation of various traditions of Teutonic tribes in a framework of courtly/feudal poetry. The epic defines the modern image of the Teutons at the time of the migration of the peoples.
Era 4: Modern paganism: National revitalization and romantic fantasies
c. 1634	Geoffrey Keating: Foras Feasa ar Éirinn (Celt., "Foundations of the Knowledge of Ireland")	Around 1634, Irish clergyman Keating writes the Foras Frasa at Éirinn ("Foundations of knowledge of Ireland"), on the history of Ireland since 1169. It develops numerous medieval texts and oral traditions. His book is the point of departure of the modern Irish language, as well as of the Irish resistance to cultural Anglicization.

1717	John Toland founds the Ancient Druid Order in London	Toland's foundation occurs in parallel fashion with the founding of the first Freemasonic lodge, in London. In the spirit of the Enlightenment, it aims at religious tolerance, philanthropy, and a philosophical understanding, without any particularly accentuated interest in the Celtic.
1750	Jean-Jacques Rousseau: Discours sur les sciences et les arts (Fr., "Discourse on the Sciences and the Arts")	In 1750, Rousseau publishes his celebrated Essay on a question proposed for competition in the Academy of Dijon, treating whether or not scholarship and art have contributed to an elucidation of mores. It develops the idea of cultural alienation of the person, which subsequently provides the framework for the image of pagan cultures.
1760–1765	Ossianism	Scotch pastor James Macpherson (1736–1796) publishes the 'works' of a poet named Ossian, purportedly translated from the Gaelic and dating from the third century BCE. They are translated into a number of European languages, and unleash an enthusiasm for 'Celtic mythology' and 'national' Scottish poetry, influencing many authors of Romanticism. After many wars of words, they are revealed to be Macpherson's own composition.

1792	Belfast Harp Festival	In 1792, Belfast Cathedral Organist Edward Bunting (1773–1843), collects the last extant professional harp compositions of the traditional schools of the bards, and transcribes them for performance (gorsedd). Notes and texts of some of these form the sole extant testimonials of the schools of the Irish bards.
19th cent.	Arthur Romanticism	Influenced by Romanticism and historicism, the medieval Arthurian literature is taken up anew. It spreads abroad, especially in England, in a number of new folkloric arrangements, and finds wide propagation, beginning with the novels of Sir Walter Scott.
1849	Kalevala	In 1849, Elias Lönnroth (1802–1884) publishes the Kalevala, a combination of Finnish and Samish traditions, which he works into an epic. It becomes the Finnish national poem.

1893	Gaelic League	In 1893, in Dublin, Douglas Hyde (1860–1946) and Eoin Mac Neill (1867–1945) found the Gaelic League, for the revival of Irish culture and the Irish language. It becomes a mass movement in Ireland and America.
1902	Lady Gregory: Cuchulain of Muirthemne	In 1892, Lady Augusta Gregory, an Anglo-Irish peer, joins the Irish independence movement. In 1902, she publishes a collection of Irish sagas in English, her free translations still serving as the basis of most books on 'Celtic mythology.'
Era 5: Political paganism: the nationalist, popular, and racist reception
1876 1881	Richard Wagner opens the B*ayreuther Festspielhaus* with the operatic cycle, Der Ring des Nibelungen (Ger., "The Ring of the Nibelung") Premiere of Wagner's Parsifal, a "Festival Drama for the Dedication of a Stage" (Bühnenweihfestspiel)	Wagner's dramatic musical work is one of the most influential neo-mythic sketches of the nineteenth century. His chefs-d'oeuvre adapt materials from 'Celtic' (his Arthurian epic "Parsifal") and Nordic mythology and heroic sagas. His later work aims at a 'regeneration' of Christendom, under anti-Semitic auspices, by way of a cultic theater. The "Bayreuth Circle" (H. St. Chamberlain, Hans von Wollzogen, Leopold von Schröder) puts Wagner's ideologically

		racist orientation to work in racism and popularism (sketch of an 'Aryan' religion). Under Winifred Wagner, Bayreuth becomes the preparation, and ideologically atheistic impulse, for National Socialism.
from 1866	German National Movement—Georg von Schönerer	In 1866, in Vienna, the German National Movement (Deutschnationale Bewegung) is founded, with its powerfully nationalistic and anti-Semitic features. In 1866, its chair, Georg von Schönerer (1842–1921), pleads for the establishment of the year 113 BCE (victory of the Cimbrians and Teutons over the Romans) as 'year 1' of a new völkisch era. In 1901, Schönerer founds the Alldeutsche Vereinigung ("Association of all Germans"), with its orientation in the direction of a völkisch imperialism.
around 1895	Arthur Bonus: Teutonization of Christianity	Like Friedrich Naumann and, later, J. W. Hauer, Bonus represents liberal Protestantism's affinity for, or transition to, the völkisch camp.
around 1900	"Teutonic Occultism" (e.g., Arian myth, theosophy, Nietzscheanism)	Viennese Guido List develops 'Ariosophy,' on the model of Helena Blavatsky's 'Theosophy,' an esoteric Votan-religion. He bases it as well on the myth of a Teutonic priestly elite, the 'Armani.' In 1907, Adolf Lanz alias Jörg Lanz von Liebenfels founds the Ordo Novi Templi (Lat., 'Order of the New Temple'), the first in a series of 'mystery associations' in the spirit of völkisch religion. Others will be the Wodan Bund (1909), the Urda Bund (1911), and the Germanen-Orden (1912). The exemplar is usually that of the Masonic lodges. In his periodical Ostara (1905 ff.), Lanz proclaims a catholicizing racial religion.

1908	Ludwig Fahrenkrog founds the Deutsche religiöse Gemeinschaft (Ger., "German Religious Community")	Fahrenkrog's group, soon renamed the Germanische Glaubens-Gemeinschaft (Ger., "Order of the Teutonic Faith"), is one of the first attempts at the founding of a pagan völkisch religion. The total number of the members of these groups, however, gradually decreases, until, by 1914, they number less than 200 members in the German Empire.
1923	Völkisch "Artamanen" settlement project	The initiator is author Willibald Hentschel. He is the author of the novel Varuna, based on the racist myth. The settlement's purpose is the rearing of a Teutonic 'Aryan' elite.

July 1933	Arbeitsgemeinschaft deutsche Glaubensbewegung (ADG) (Ger., "German Faith Movement Community")	Conceived as a collective entity composed of all religious völkisch groups, in 1923 it was renamed the Deutsche Glaubensbewegung ("German Faith-Movement.") One of the initiators is Tübingen Indologist and religious scholar Jakob Wilhelm Hauer. In 1936 the Movement is dissolved by the National Socialist state.
1933–1945	Reception of and speculation on the Teutons reach their climax under → National Socialism	Despite the exclusion of rival völkisch-groups, as well as Hitler's personal hostility and political primacy, there develops, especially in Heinrich Himmler's SS, a certain pagan occultism in the spirit of völkisch religion. (Foundation Ahnenerbe, "Legacy of the Ancestors"). It was intended to have its cultic center in the Wewel Fortress, in Westphalia. Since 1936 it has used 'God-believing' (gottgläubig) as the label for a new national piety.
Era 6: Pagan and neo-pagan movements since 1945
1950s	The Wicca Religion appears, as the ritual religion of the "New Witches"	Founded in England by Gerald Gardner and Doreen Valiente, it claims to tender the ancient wisdom of the 'wise women' of (e.g., Celtic) prehistory. Especially since the 1970s, Wicca is increasingly winning members in the United States.

1954/55	John R. R. Tolkien: The Lord of the Rings	The three-volume cycle of novels sketches a fantasy world of its own. Along with Tolkien's 1977 The Silmarillion, it becomes a cultic text and foundation stone of the literature of → fantasy.
from 1973	Ásatrú	Founded by Sveinbjörn Beinteinsson, ásatrú ("Belief of Ases") is recognized in Iceland as a religious community. Jörmundur Ingi Hansen has been its leader since 1994. Numerous loosely affiliated, sympathizing groups appear in Europe and America during the 1990s.
from the 1970s	Alternative religious reception of the Celts and Teutons	The alternative and ecological movement sketches out an image of 'Celtic,' and in lesser measure 'Teutonic,' piety as 'nature religion,' and (erroneously) sees its testimonials in the remnants of Stone Age megalithic cultures (Stonehenge). The fragmentary or missing tradition is replaced particularly with notions of Native American → shamanism.

1981	John Boorman: Excalibur	Influenced by Tolkien, the film epic about the sword “Excalibur” mixes settings from the High Middle Ages with (illusorily) pre-Christian motifs of the Arthur material. Thereby it creates a style for further film adaptations with a Celtic Anglo-Saxon setting (“Highlander,” “Conan,” etc.).
1982	Marion Zimmer Bradley: The Mists of Avalon	The fantasy author gains worldwide success with a free adaptation of motifs from the Arthur material, reworked from the viewpoint of a matriarchal mythology. Thereby she establishes a genre within the literature of → fantasy.

Georg Hehn

Cemetery

Surrounded by a wall, and near a church (or even partly within), and enjoying the latter’s ‘immunity’ from assault lies the cemetery (Middle English cimiterie, from Lat., coemeterium, Greek koimētērion, and ultimately from koiman, ‘to put to sleep’; compare Ger., Frieden, denoting ‘peace’; cf. Friedhof, ‘cemetery’). Even fugitives seeking → asylum could find safety here. The social prestige of the departed is reflected in the choice and form of the burial place. In the course of the nineteenth century, locations of burial were established on the edge of a city, or outside it—separation of the living and dead being regarded as hygienically necessary—and made into spacious parks. In a republican spirit, the display of prestige or wealth is minimized. Distinction of religions is absent among Christian confessions; Jews are separated; the graves of suicides and the unbaptized were long relegated to locations outside the walls. In the Southern United States, until very recently separation along racial lines has been the rule.

A devoted young woman from Hong Kong gives the departed a drink. It is the Ching-Ming Festival, and relatives bring their departed a sumptuous meal, serving them the food in front of their headstones. Here the dead are represented as photographs. (Christoph Auffarth)

The double world in which the Australian → Aborigines live since their 'discovery' by the Europeans is reflected in this multicultural cemetery scene on the island of Melville in the north of Australia, around 1990. In conformity with indigenous burial rules, hollow eucalyptus trunks are erected, which contain the bones of the departed. These are the burial pillars for a second burial: the dead are originally placed elsewhere, for example on a tree, until the process of decomposition has left only whitened bones. These are then gathered and hidden in the trunk receptacles, which are decorated with symbols from Aboriginal mythology. Western and Christian burial usage is demonstrated by the grave in the middle: relatives have also adopted a simple wooden cross, and the molded shape and religious symbolism, of a European grave. (Hubert Mohr)

Russian Orthodox Christians, as here in Volgograd, visit the cemetery at Easter for a common meal with the departed as part of their celebration of the Feast of the Resurrection. The grave is fenced off; the dead are present as images of the living. Their share of the meal consists of red-colored Easter eggs, which are blessed at the Easter Liturgy, and then laid before them at the gravestone. Freshly planted flowers, and the well-tended grave, testify to the visitors' lasting solicitude for the dead. (Christoph Auffarth)

Romuald Spira prays before the grave of an ancestor, cabbalist Nathan Spira (c. 1585–1633), whose work Discoverer of the Depths (posthum., 1637) became fundamental as a text for the modern Ashkenazi → Kabbalah. The Remu Cemetery (founded 1551), where the grave marker in the middle of the photograph is found, shared the fate of the Israelite religious community in Poland who buried their dead here: at the beginning of the Second World War, the SS built a shooting target range on the forty-seven mazzewe (monuments) still standing, destroying all of them but one. Excavations at the end of the 1950s unearthed more than 700 gravestones intact, which, owing to the destruction of Jewish culture in Poland, had received neither scientific attention nor any maintenance. Spira, one of few survivors, has documented the inscriptions, which he has taught himself to do. Today, in Poland as in Germany, the Jewish communities that kept them up and needed them have mostly disappeared, since their members were driven out or killed. (Hubert Mohr)

→ Ars Moriendi, Death and Dying, Funeral/Burial, Materiality, Memory, Monument/Memorial Places

Christoph Auffarth

Central America

Pre-Spanish Time

1. In the pre-Spanish era, the cultural space of Central America, reaching from the region of the Maya to northern Mexico, was a land of rival, hierarchical central states, all nevertheless penetrated by a practically homogeneous religion. Their cities were also cultural centers with temple pyramids in which an influential priesthood celebrated the polytheistic state religion, with its complex rites and rituals, to maintain the fragile cosmic equilibrium. Their rituals were all observed on the basis of a complex calendrical system of a solar ritual year, having with fifty-two-year world cycles, in which each individual day was ascribed special characteristics. Religiously motivated arts and sciences flourished particularly among the Maya. Our romanticized picture of their societies as peaceful pantheistic → theocracies, living in the rain forest, was demystified over the course of our progress in the deciphering of their written records.

Indian Religiosity Today

2. After the destruction of the Indians' places and writings, the murder of their priesthood, and their compulsory conversion to Catholicism, one may speak today of still independent Indian religions only in Central America's outlying regions. This is the case among the Huitchol in the West of Mexico, among the Cuna of Panama, and, with qualifications, among many other groups, such as the Talamanca, who along with Christianity, continue to practice another religion.

With the Maya, too, in and alongside the Catholic religion that was forced upon them, many old elements of belief are active. Market locations like Chichicastenango, in the highlands of Guatemala, serve the Maya as centers of worship as well. To the threshold of the church there—as of old to the steps of the temple pyramids—they present their divinities and ancestral spirits with copal incense, candles, flowers, maize, liquor, Coca-Cola, cigarettes, and bloody sacrifices, while the interior of the temple, then as now, is reserved to the priestly class. In San Juan Chamula, in 1869, the Tzotzil Maya crucified a boy, lest they ever again need to worship a white. In the 1880s, they expelled the Catholic priests for good and all, and henceforth venerated the richly ornamented figures of their own deities and nature powers on the walls of the church. Sweet smelling pine needles cover the church floors, on which Mayan priests observe the old Central American → calendar with ceremonies of healing, divination, or the preservation of fertility and the equilibrium of the universe. The intimacy and ardor of their invocations, their vows, their rituals of → sacrifice, their noisy quarrels with the powers—all of which reach the stage of trance—are in no way disturbed by the tourists permitted to visit, for an admission fee, this thoroughly reinterpreted and now fully Indian church.

F.D.2005
0 250 500 km
Phoenix
Dallas
UNITED STATES
Houston Chihuahua
MEXICO
Wirikuta
Monterrey
Mythical land of origin and place of peyote pilgrimage of the Huichol
Plateros
Pilgrimage to the Child Jesus (Santo Niño de Atocha)
Catorce de Real Pilgrimage to Saint Francis
San Juan de los Lagos
Place of Pilgrimage
El Tajín
Totonaki
Zapopan
Guadalajara
Basilica of the Virgin of Zapopan
Papantla
Ceremony of the Flyers
Tula (Tollan) 3
Tzintzuntzán 4
MEXICO
Teotihuacán
Janitzio
1,2 Puebla
Festivals at All Souls
Malinalco
Cholula
Aztecs
Xochicalco
Huatla de Jiménez
5 Catemaco
Village of the Mixe, Pilgrimage Place of Drug and Shamanism Tourists Monte Albán
Zapoateki, Mixteki
San Juan Chamula
Mayan Worship Center
Palenque
Maya
La Venta
Almeki
Uxmal
Maya Chichen Itzá
Maya
Belize
Belmopan
Caracol
Maya
GUATEMALA
Maya Copán
Guatemala
EL SALVADOR
El Salvador
HONDURAS
Suyapa
Marian Pilgrimage
Tegucigalpa
NICARAQUA
León
Managua
Largest Cathedral in Latin America
Costa Rica
San José
Cartago
Basilica of Our Lady of the Angels, Patron of Costa Rica PANAMA
Panama
Portobelo
Pilgrimage to the Black Christ
Havana
CUBA
BAHAMAS
JAMAICA
Kingston
1 Tepeya Basilica of the Virgin of Guadalupe; Indian/Catholic Pilgrimage Place
2 Aztecs (Former Tenochtitlán)
3 Tolteki Mythical Home of Quetzalcóatl)
4 Taraski (Purépecha)
5 Catemaco Brujo (Sorcerer), Curandero (Healer), and Shamanism-Tourist Center
6 Tikal Maya
7 Yaxchilán Maya
8 Bonampak Maya
9 Esquipulas Pilgrimage to the Black Christ
10 Chichicastenango Maya-Quiché Worship Center
CENTRAL AMERICA SETTLEMENT AREAS OF RELIGIOUS GROUPS
Indian Cultures (Selection)
Cuna
Huichol
Mayan Cultures
Talamanca
Afro-American Cultures
Garifuna (Afro-Carib)
Miskito (Afro-Indian)
Religious Minorities
Mennonites (German Protestants)
Quaker (United States Americans)
Sacred Topography
Catholic
Other Places of Religious Devotion
Pre-Spanish Ceremonial Centers

The Flight Ceremony of the Totonaki—first described by chroniclers in 1535—has retained its basic form since pre-Spanish times. Dancing atop a pole some thirty meters high, a flutist/drummer plays both of his instruments, while four others 'fly down,' upside down, in thirteen revolutions, as 'sun birds,' each attached by a single foot to a long rope. Thus they bear the fertility of the sky down upon the earth. The number symbolism refers to the Central American calendar, with its thirteen ritual months, and world cycle of fifty-two (4x13) years, as well as to the Indian cosmology, with its five points of orientation: the four directions of heaven, and the world axis at its center. Nowadays the flyers also have to 'balance' the ritual quality of their tradition with a tourist attraction. In several locales the action is effected at the festival of the respective local patron saints; in Papantla, in Mexican Federal State of Veracruz, it is presented at the Feast of Corpus Christi. Totonaki who work at the festival have organized into a trade union—Unión de Danzantes y Voladores de Papantla ("Union of Dancers and Flyers of Papantla")—and present their dances and flights on various occasions as part of the national heritage. The photograph shows a production of the flying ceremony in the archaeological district of Teotenango, in the Federal State of Mexico, in an action reminiscent of the pre-Spanish presentation in the ceremonial centers. (M. Gabriel and D. Neitzke)

Exotic Movements and Movements of Revitalization

At the same time, pilgrimage → tourism is massive. It has flourished since the 1960s, fueled by Carlos Castaneda's novels, together with reports on the use of hallucinogenic plants in the → shamanism of the Mixe and Huichol. Against her will, Mixe shaman Maria Sabina, of Huautla, became an icon of the pop-culture elite. Their foolish exoticism provoked acts of violence and destroyed culture, but occasioned a revitalization of elements of folklore. Here may lie one of the roots of those neopagan, folkloristic movements, often dominated by middle-class urban whites that label as specifically 'Central American' a store of esoteric ideas that is actually available throughout the world. We refer to movements that publicly present their glorious, sparkling speculations on pre-Columbian spirituality without any reference to actually living Indians.

Folk Catholicism

3. But neither has a Catholicism of force and compulsion simply delivered from their old beliefs groups that are Indian, or that merely behave as Indian. Often, as the Spaniards repeatedly erected churches upon temple pyramids that they had reduced to ruin, their the new symbols and forms veiled old content. A syncretism was formed, very vital and alive, molded and shaped in great diversity according to region, class, and ethnic membership. This phenomenon stamps a country like Mexico most profoundly. There, a powerfully laicized condition and attitude has long negated and battled the existence of the Church. Theological knowledge is not very widespread, and in the private sphere is supplemented with a plenitude of local myths, practices of a variety of hues, and conceptualizations like that of a multiplicity of → souls in the same person (as well as of illnesses caused by the loss of these souls, and nagualism, the belief in alter egos, which are frequently animal), witchcraft, or apparitions of speaking tortillas.

It does not correspond to Indian tradition to perceive layered religions as incompatible systems. Gods and goddesses are but fleeting manifestations of an abiding, absolute transcendence; they can be defeated or complemented by others, and they change with the concrete life of believers. The white creator god is most typically feared as a threat, and associated with the sun. In some places, the figure of Jesus is regarded as a cultural hero; the extremely brutal presentation of his battle with death in art and in Passion plays articulates their own suffering. But, generally speaking, the elements of the Trinity, awash in a host of saints that have taken on so many traits of the old gods, play a minor role.

Veneration of the Saints

Everywhere, in homes, buses, and the market place, colorfully sparkling altars with figures of the saints are to be found, to whom one turns with one's everyday cares. These figures are absolutely understood as independent local divinities. The favorites are the various figures of → Mary, most importantly the dark-skinned Virgin of Guadalupe, acknowledged as patroness of America after long rejection on the part of the Church. According to legend, she appeared to a baptized Indian in 1531, on the ruins of the important worship and pilgrimage center of the Middle American Earth and Mother Goddess Tonantzin, in Tepeyac, before the gates of Mexico City. Here the suffering and oppressed venerate her, in pilgrimages and ecstatic dances, as their Patroness and Defender, and beg of her deliverance from the inevitable social and natural catastrophes of Central America. But her miraculous likeness also adorns the packaging of many consumer products. In the pantheon of Central American folk Catholicism, Tonantzin Guadalupe represents the central divinity; from the premise of her iconographical preeminence, however, no conclusions whatever are to be drawn suggesting any matriarchal societal structures.

Festivals

The name day of a patron saint is the most important festivity of the year. Besides that, one should mention the night of the dead, during which the souls of the dead return from the world beyond, to join their living relatives in feasting, dancing, and drinking to excess, atop graves magnificently decorated and studded with candles and orange marigolds. In some places, the deceased are honored by a temporary home altar as well, on which they are offered their favorite dishes, and some of the other things they have loved, together with their skeletons and grinning skulls of frosting or papier-mâché, while visitors are served cocoa and sweet 'bread of the dead.' The atmosphere of this festival of the dead is permeated with macabre jokes and wild, derisive singing.

Other Faith Communities

4. Non-Indian religious minorities include, along with some Jews and Baha'i: the Afro-American Garífuna, who live on the Caribbean coast and practice both Christianity and a religion revolving around ancestors and spirit-possession; the Afro-Indian Misquito, who adopted the Protestantism of the (mainly English) pirates of their coastal region; and the Mennonites, who live on quite extensive tracts of land given them by the United States, speak a Low German dialect, and retain their Puritan Protestantism.

Protestant Mission

Since the 1980s, various Protestant, often fundamentalist, confessions have exercised a strong attraction. Their aggressive mission has frequently stood in direct connection with counter-insurgency programs, administered from and financed by offices in the United States, and has been very successful, precisely among Indian groups that are being exploited, oppressed, and destroyed. Flamboyant preachers deliver a stereotyped message of sinfulness, imminent apocalypse (present in Indian mythology and historical experience), and individual awakening. But they also offer unequivocal orientations in need, which are experienced as modern, and a more active community life than that offered by the Catholic churches with their frequently inadequate pastoral attention. Reliable statistical material is not yet available, but it would be reasonable to estimate that fifteen percent of the Mexican population, and doubtless the greater part of the (mostly Mayan) population of Guatemala, currently belong to evangelical sects. The latter's aim is the complete extermination of the local systems of belief, with their opulent festivals, siblingship, and a hierarchical arrangement of offices in religious politics, which often forms a basis for protection of autonomy and community. These are replaced by the rigid, individualistic ethic of an ideology that, fragmented though it may be, claims to be universal. Offering certitude only in the world to come, it demands, in the present one a life of prayer, song, work, order, abstinence, and political resignation.

Theology of Liberation

Over against this, all Central American guerilla movements worthy of mention in recent decades, including today's Zapatista Army in Chiapas, are based on the Catholic theology of liberation (→ Liberation Theology), both ideologically and in their inner lives. This theology encourages laity and catechists to form basic Christian communities, and, in common, to create an interpretation of the situation of their lives based on a local proclamation of the Bible. Many see an armed religious battle for a paradise on earth as the only alternative to death by exploitation, deprivation, and violence.

Literature

Berryman, Phillip, Stubborn Hope: Religion, Politics, and Revolution in Central America, Maryknoll 1994; Cabarrus, Carlos Rafael, Genesis de una revolución, San Salvador 1988; Gossen, Garry H., Chamulas in the World of the Sun, Cambridge 1974; Ingham, John M., Mary, Michael, and Lucifer: Folk Catholicism in Central Mexico, Austin 1986; Lafaye, Jacques, Quetzalcóatl et Guadalupe. La formation de la conscience nationale au Mexique, Paris 1974; Miller, Mary/Taube, Karl, The Gods and Symbols of Ancient Mexico and the Maya: An Illustrated Dictionary of Mesoamerican Religion, London 1993; Nebel, Richard, Santa María Tonantzin Virgen de Guadalupe. Religiöse Kontinuität und Transformation in Mexiko, Immensee 1992; Nepstad, Sharon Erickson, Convictions of the Soul: Religion, Culture, and Agency in the Central America Solidarity Movement, New York 2004; Stephen, Lynn/Dow, James W. (eds.), Class, Politics, and Popular Religion in Mexico and Central America, Washington 1990.

→ Afro-American Religions, Catholicism, North America, South America, Syncretism, Tourism, Veneration of Saints

Dietmar Neitzke

Central and South America: Time Chart

Era 1: Precolumbian era (c. 15,000 BCE–1492 CE)

around 15,000 BCE	Settling of America: hunter-gatherer cultures. Phases: Paleo-Indio, formative, era of the regional developments.	Shamanism, hunting rituals (cave paintings). Economic base: hunting (deep rain forest). After the end of the last glacier period (c. 5000 BCE), shallower forest. In the case of the coast dwellers, mussel heaps (Puerto Hormiga, in Colombia). Manioc raising.

around 1500 BCE–1600 CE	Sacred Kazikism of Colombia (Kalima, Quimbaya, Sinú, Tairona, Muisca)	Raising the storable vegetable maize makes possible the development of complex societies, with social differentiation, specialization (goldsmiths), and religious specialization (priests, shamans). Development of magnificent irrigation and drainage systems (Sinú culture), terracing (cf. the Ciudad Perdida—Span., 'Lost City'—of the Tairona, Sierra Nevada de Santa Marta, Colombia); meaning and importance of the cult of the dead (tumuli, subterranean mausoleums, with gifts for the dead, especially of gold).
c. 2000 BCE–today	The culture of the Maya (Mexico, Guatemala, Belize, Honduras)	Phase 1: Pre-classical 2000 BCE–250 CE Phase 2: Classical (250–900 CE) Phase 3: Postclassical (900–1540 CE) Even today, the economy of the Maya rests on maize farming (the Maya call themselves 'persons out of maize'), grain farming plays a key role in the mythical element of cultic life. Among the outstanding 'high culture' achievements of the historical Maya culture are: irrigation systems, terracing, development of hieroglyphic script and the 'Maya Calendar,' a detailed knowledge of astronomy (cf. the "Venus tables" of the Dresden Codex) and meteorology, important for an agrarian society. The multiplicity of small sacred and political temples and power centers (e.g., Palenque, Tikal, Copán), in which an Indian upper class (nobles, priests, scientists, administrators) ruled over the farmers—unlike the centrally organized 'theocracies' of the Incas and Aztecs—made the Spanish Conquista difficult. The independent Mayan Empire of Itzá (Petén) successfully resisted the Conquista until 1697. After the collapse of the old governmental structures, the Maya have retained their old popular faith until today, a 'Christian paganism.'

c. 400 BCE–1470 CE	In the area of the Andes and adjacent coastal region, the Chavín, Huari, Tiahuanaco, Moche, Nazca, Lambayeque, Chimú arise: prerequisite for the subsequent empire of the Incas.	Temple installations (Sun Gate of the Tiahuanaco at Lake Titricaca, the Sun Pyramid of the Moche at Trujillo, the Nazca lines: astronomic agrarian calendars, connection with the rituals of a farming culture, in order to carry the vital resource of water; irrigation canals, ceramic and gold artifacts. The appearance of multi-layered societal structures, which, in a religious perspective, might have been based on veneration of the sun.

around 1000–1533 CE	Rise and fall of the Incas: at its zenith (1438–1532), the Inca empire embraces the great geographical area of Cuzco, from Peru and Ecuador to Southern Colombia, to the south to Bolivia, Northern Chile, and Northwest Argentina.	A religio-political temple complex, with religious specialization and sacred rule, characteristically with the veneration of numerous deities (huacas). Wide-ranging networks of streets, agrarian irrigation and terracing systems. The Inca Emperor, whose seat was the Sun Temple in Cuzco ("Coricancha") legitimized his position of power by his descent from the sun-deity Inti. After the death of Inca ruler Huayna Capac (1493–1527), the Tahuantinsuyu ("Totality of the Four Regions of the World") found itself in serious crisis: the brothers Huascar (1527–1532) and Atahualpa (1527–1533) struggled for the royal succession in the Civil War. This facilitated the Spaniards' conquest.
c. 1350–1521	The Aztec Empire: the political military	The theocracy (sacred ruler Moctezuma is empire, stretching from Mexico to Guatemala, rested on the alliance of the three city states, Tenochtitlán, Tezcoco, Tlacopan.	accounted the representative of the Fire God, and is successor of Quetzalcoatl and Huitzilopochtli), was a society of social classes (nobles, priests, merchants, artisans, farmers), a vassalage of subjected Indian peoples that must offer tribute. Sacred architecture (cult metropolis Tenochtitlán, founded in 1325). Hernán Cortes's conquest (1519–1521) of the Indian Empire, which succeeded the alliance with other oppressed Indian peoples (Totonaces, Tlaxcalteces). The Aztec ritual practice of the human sacrifice, whose quantity is disputed, is supposed to have served a myth. The myth in question would have been that these sacrifices were necessary to maintain the cosmos, and to promise the continuation of human existence. They provided the Europeans with their strategy of legitimization of their subjugation and annihilation of these 'barbarian heathen.'

Era 2: The Invasion of America (1492–1550): Genocide, enslavement, and a coercive mission—military and spiritual europeanization, economic exploitation from 1492	European, imperialistic war policy of 'Bible and Sword'	After the Spanish Reconquista (defeat of the Spanish Muslims, pogroms against the Jews), Columbus arrives on the island of Guanahani: Encounter with the peaceful Taino culture (850–1500 CE); within an extremely short time, however, exploitation, enslavement, and extirpation of these natives. Legitimated by four papal bulls, Pope Alexander VI (1493, e.g., Inter Cetera; conferral of rights of possession of the 'discovered' lands, missionary assignment), begins the greatest genocide in the history of humanity, on the alleged basis of punishing and eliminating 'cannibalism,' human sacrifice, devil-worship, and lasciviousness.

1531–1533	Conquest of the Inca Empire by Francisco Pizarro, Murder of the Ruler of the Incas, Atahualpa	Special natural phenomena (moon, earthquake) presage to the Incas the pachacuti (end of the present world age). The Conquista is seen as a cosmic catastrophe—and for the Aztecs, the return of Quetzalcoatl. Just so, in keeping with the myths of their religion, the Incas awaited preternatural events on Viracocha. Inca king Atahualpa, murdered by the Spaniards, lives on in the collective memory of the Quechua population. His post-mortal name is Inkarrí. This messianic myth provides munition for numerous revolts motivated by the politics of religion.

1534	Pedro Heredia: irruption into the area of the Zenú (Columbian coast of the Carribean): in an extremely short time, the Spaniards despoil cemeteries of 836 kg of gold.	The myth of El Dorado drives the various expeditions of the Spaniards into the interior of the country. In their measureless lust for gold, they scour the continent, plundering and ravaging. Behind the myth of the “Man Changed into Gold” lurked the initiation rite of the Kazik of Guatavita (near Bogota). The newly installed ruler of the Muisca was rowed, on a raft, out to the midst of the Lake of Guatavita, was covered with gold dust there; then people cast into the lake votive gifts of gold that they had brought. For the Spaniards, gold possessed only material value. The Indians reverenced the noble metal as a concrete representation of the divine Sun and its creative force.
1536–1539	Three expeditions in the area of Muisca (highlands of Bogotá, Colombia): Quesada, Federmann, Belalcázar
1542	Amazon expedition of Francisco de Orellana (report of Dominican friar Carvajal)
from 1503–1720	System of the Requerimiento and Encomienda (Span., ‘Task,’ ‘Assignment’): coercive mission and economic exploitation	Forced labor (working in the fields, mining) by the Indians in regions granted to the conquerors by the Spanish Crown. In return, the white masters accepted the obligation of bringing the natives to the Gospel and civilization. The Indians were read the Requerimiento, a document in the Spanish language, which sanctioned land appropriation and Christianization by papal authority. Resistance meant enslavement, war, and physical annihilation.

16th/17th cent.	Era of the Inquisitions (e.g., in Cartagena de Indias in Colombia; Lima and Peru)	Combat of the traditional Indian religions: corporal punishments, monetary penalties imposed upon the 'pagan heretics'; destruction of sacred objects; internment of Indian priests in reeducation camps. Beginning in 1558: Inquisition of Franciscan bishop Diego de Landa: persecution if Maya priests, book burning (Maya codices).
1609–1768	The Jesuit "State of God" among the Guarani Indians of Paraguay	The Franciscans (1575) sought to protect the natives from the economic exploitation of the Encomendieros in designated Indian defense areas, and the Brazilian slave hunters ('Paulists'). The Jesuits founded their 'State of God,' economic autonomy, withdrawal from the whites, instruction in the Gospel.

Era 3: Creole independence, formation of Latin American national states: ‘Interior colonialism’ (political, economic, religious) from 1819	Era of the Latin American national states	Simón Bolívar routs the Spanish host in Colombia (1819); Brazil’s independence from Portugal (1822; Emperor Pedro I). For the natives, these new economic policies alter nothing of their destiny: exploitation, subjugation, and missionizing continue by the respective Creole, hegemonic oligarchy to our present day.

Response of the original inhabitants: Religious rebellions in the area of the political (open incitement, ‘Great Rejection’) around 1560	Taqui Oncoy (“Song and Dance of the Pleiades”)	Expectation of salvation among the Peruvian Quechua population, whose members were possessed by the local nature deities (huacas) manifested in their shrines. The goal was rescue from the impending world destruction, which the Andean creative forces would effect by fever and flood, in order to restore the mythical Inca era. Reaction of the Spaniards: more and more destruction of the huacas.

1639	Rebellion of the Encomienda Indians in the Mexican province of Quintana Roo (Maya lowlands)	Destruction of the churches, profanation of sacred Christian objects, then withdrawal into the wild, and life as small farmers.

around 1742	Juan Santos Atahualpa	Quechua Juan Santos, Son of God, and Apu Inca (reincarnation of Inca rulers Atahualpa and Huayna Capac), ignites an Indian guerrilla war, in order to reestablish the mythical Inca era. Especially the Indian peoples of the Montaña (Campa, Amuesha, Conibo, Shipibo, etc.) join the bloody revolt: for a hundred years, the Peruvian Montaña remains liberated from the Spaniards and mestizos.
1780–1781	Tupac Amaru II (José Gabriel Condorcanqui Tupac Amaru)	Condorcanqui designates himself legitimate Inca ruler, and organizes an uprising for the restoral of the Inca Empire in the region of Cuzco. Crushing, and public execution, of Tupac Amaru II by the Spaniards (1781).
1847	'Mestizos' War' (= caste war)	Greatest Maya uprising since the European invasion: return to 'Catholic paganism.'
1857–1860	Venáncio Kamiku Christu	Charismatic shaman preacher Venáncio Kamiku Christu, chosen by God after his recovery from a serious disease, calls for a revolt in the Amazonian border region of Brazil, Venezuela, and Colombia. It is to be that of the 'Great Rejection,' among the Wakuénai (Baniwa). Participants anticipate the imminent destruction of the world, and the return of the mythical Ancestors, at which only Indians who have prepared themselves (through ritual dance, asceticism, and refusal to labor for their white masters) are to be redeemed. 'Manioc from heaven' feeds the Baniwa after the ethnic cleansing.

1867–1870	Rebellion of the Tzotzil (Chiapas highlands)	Crucifixion of an Indian youth, lest a white continued to have to be adored: propagation of a distinct Maya Christianity.
19th cent. to middle 20th cent.	Battle of the X-Cacal (Maya of Yucatán) against the Mexican national state	The cofradías (religious brotherhoods), administrators of the local cults of the saints, organize the resistance against the national-state system of political religion.
1984	Comando Quintín Lame	In 1984, in reaction to the murder of Indian priest Alvaro Ulcué, and the bloody invasion of Hacienda López Adentro, c. 100,000 Páez Indians of the Colombian Cauca region had organized the Guerrilla organization Quintín Lame. This group had appealed to the guiding figure of Manuel Quintín Lame (1880–1967), an Indian of the Colombian Cauca region, who had begun to organize the struggle for Indian land-rights among the peoples of Southern Colombia (Cauca, Tolima) as early as 1914. Quintín Lame, who composes an Indian manifesto (The Reflections of the Indian Who Instructed Himself in the Colombian Forests), and declares himself to have been sent by God, stands in battle, in the historical tradition of mythical Kazikes Angelina Guyumús, Juan Tama, and Calumbás (eighteenth century), who had been 'born' of cataclysmic landslides. His starting point is a conviction of the Indian with respect to the white man on grounds of his 'proximity to nature,' and of the divine gifts connected therewith. The aim of the movement is the recovery of the Indian lands, the defense of the Indians' particular culture (and with it, their religion). Between 1989 and 1991, in the wake of peace negotiations on the part of the Colombian government with various guerrilla fractions of the country, these Guerrilleros lay down their weapons.

Revolutionary currents in the Catholic Church of the twentieth century: The spiritual invasion of Latin America by American evangelical pentecostal churches and awakening movements

1965	Camilo Torres	This Catholic priest joins the Columbian Guerrilla ELN ("National Liberation Front"), to fight for the rights of the simple people. Shortly thereafter, he falls in the armed conflict. Camilo Torres is no exception: priest 'Cura Pérez' was leader of the ELN until shortly before his natural death.
1968	Latin American Bishops Conference of Medellín: Birth of → Liberation Theology	The bishops' option for the poor and oppressed, revolutionary purposes, etc., social justice, etc.; change in missionary self-understanding: the missionary task is no longer the primary aim, but an option of solidarity for the Indians (cf. CIMI—Conselho Indigenista Missionário—Port., "Catholic Mission Council of Brazil"). In the ecumenical movement today, one speaks of 'guided guides,' and equal rights in the 'inter-religious dialogue' (the missioner seeks to learn from the Indian). After the collapse of 'real socialism,' Pope John Paul II, before his visit to Latin America, proclaimed as well the end of liberation theology.

1970	Founding of the CRIC (Consejo Regional Indígena del Cauca—Span., "Indigenous Regional Council of the Cauca") Alliance of the Indians of the Colombian Cauca	New self-image on the part of the Indian, starting signal for the pan-Indian movement, intensification of the historical battle for 'land and culture,' which had never been given up, appreciation of native medicine and shamanism, Indian piety and spirituality.
1971	Declaration of Barbados	Leading anthropologists take a critical position toward the role of the Indian mission.
January 1, 1994	Rebellion of the Maya of Chiapas (Mexico), founding of the Zapatian National Liberation Army (EZLN)	Indian resistance has lasted for five hundred years, and continues without interruption today. The Maya join the Zapatista guerrilla organization (under 'Subcomandante Marcos') whose avowed end is the struggle for their rightful land, along with recognition of their culture, their Indian identity, and their religious traditions, and, thus, their sovereignty. Even practicing their religious traditions under the cloak of 'syncretism' ultimately represents passive resistance, and an attempt at a cultural survival as Indians—once they had been defeated, in direct military confrontations with the European colonial powers and their heirs, the respective Creole national-state hegemonies.

around 2000	Rivalry in Latin America of four religious forms and traditions: (1) Shamanism and Indo-American religions; (2) Catholicism (3) Afro-American religions (Brazil, Colombia); (4) Increasingly, Protestant Free Churches: charismatic Pentecostalists and Evangelical fundamentalists (from the United States)	After the 'failure' of Catholic liberation theology, America's Evangelical Pentecostal churches and awakening movements increasingly are recruiting broad strata of the Latin American population—already over 50 million members! The future of the American subcontinent looks 'Evangelical.' 'Believers' (in Span., creyentes, in Portug., crentes) are oriented toward fundamentalism, unlike liberation theology, and rather, often range from apostolic to conservative. The existing laws of the national state, and the socio-economic and political, feudalistic, status quo are 'divinely willed.' Religious conflicts on the social level are inescapable, as documented by cases from Colombia and Brazil (battering of sacred images and statues of Mary by 'evangelicals'). Today the Indian peoples reject the concept of 'Latin America' as a European construct, the expression of hegemonic goals. Aymara leader Takir Manami recommends, instead, the concept of Abya-Yala, a Cuna Indian (Panama, Colombia) word, designating the American continent in its entirety and means 'land in complete state of maturation/ripening' (tierra en plena madurez).

Josef Drexler

Channeling

The New Age Movement and Channeling

Popular in the context of the → New Age movement, the term 'channeling' refers to the conviction of contemporary psychic mediums that they are able, under certain circumstances, to act as a channel for receiving and transmitting information from sources other than their normal selves. In less technical terms, channeling means the reception and transmission of messages from invisible intelligent beings, often referred to as 'entities.'[1] The practice of channeling presupposes a worldview in which embodied existence on our planet is merely one mode of being among many others: the universe is believed to consist of innumerable levels of reality, all of which are inhabited by intelligent beings (→ Angel; Ancestors).[2] All such entities, we ourselves included, go through a long process of spiritual evolution, in which we learn from our experiences by living many lives in many realities, and evolve to ever higher levels of spiritual attainment (→ Reincarnation). Thus it is considered quite natural that entities who have once lived on earth—including important religious personalities such as Jesus, Paul, or Buddha—have now progressed to a superior level of reality, from where they may communicate with human beings by means of channeling. The grand scheme of continuous spiritual evolution on all levels of reality explains, from a New Age perspective, why the contents of their messages may often be very different from what they taught during their lives on earth: in the course of their development they have simply changed their minds and attained more spiritual perspectives. Thus, for example, one may encounter channeled messages attributed to the apostle Paul, in which he expresses regret about his earlier statements on women, and proclaims a New Age worldview very different from anything we find in his letters.

Ways of Channeling

There are several ways in which channeled information is produced. New York psychologist Helen Schucman claimed to hear an internal voice in her head that dictated a text of over 1100 pages, published in 1975 under the title A Course in Miracles and now treated with great respect as a 'New Age bible.' Other channels transmit their messages by means of inspired or automatic writing. But perhaps most widespread is the practice known as spiritual dissociation or 'trance channeling,' in which the medium enters an 'altered state of consciousness' during which the entity is believed to speak with his or—usually, for the majority of channels are women—her voice (→ Trance; Spiritism). In the most common variety, that of light trance states, the voice of the medium mostly remains the same; but in the more spectacular cases of deep trance channeling it may happen that the medium's voice and general body language are dramatically altered (for example, a woman may produce a deep male baritone). In such cases we are technically dealing with the phenomenon known by anthropologists as spirit → possession: the entity is believed to temporarily 'take over' or 'inhabit' the body of the medium, who is usually unconscious of what happens during the channeling session.

A General Category?

While devotees tend to claim that channeling is a universal phenomenon (arguing for example that the prophets of the Hebrew Bible were channeling an entity called JHWH or that Muhammad channeled the Qur'an), it is more correct to see it as a New Age term for the general category of religious revelations that result in verbal messages—a phenomenon that has been surprisingly neglected by historians of religions, in spite of its obvious importance.[3] Interior voices, automatic writing, or inspired speech during trance or possession states have been reported from many cultures and periods of history; but it is more useful to reserve the specific term 'channeling' only for the cases where such phenomena are interpreted from the characteristic multi-dimensional worldview described above. That worldview is a product of post-eighteenth-century developments,[4] and in fact it is in the context of nineteenth-century spiritualism, occultism and theosophy that one first sees clearly emerge the kind of revelatory practices that we would nowadays recognize as channeling.

From Jane Roberts to Neale Donald Walsch

What might be called the archetypical model of a New Age channel appeared after World War II, in the person of the New York poet and writer Jane Roberts (1929–1984). Her enormously popular books, based upon the messages received by means of full-trance channeling from an entity called "Seth," have become perhaps the most basic revelatory source for what became known as New Age spirituality during the 1980s and 1990s.[5] Among the influential channels representing a slightly more traditional English theosophical current one could mention David Spangler, connected to the pivotal New Age community Findhorn in Scotland, or the anonymous channels of the English Ramala community. In contrast, typically American New Thought ideas—with a strong emphasis on the power of positive thinking—are prominent in the books by many channels from the United States, with Sanaya Roman as a very clear example. During the 1980s, under the notable influence of Shirley MacLaine's popular autobiographies and her TV-miniseries Out on a Limb, channels such as Kevin Ryerson and J. Z. Knight (channel of an entity called "Ramtha") became well known media personalities. Although the channeling 'hype' of that period has passed, the practice remains widespread in the alternative 'spiritual' scene, and continues to produce a flood of popular books. One of the most prominent examples in more recent years is Neale Donald Walsch's extremely popular Conversations with God series (1995ff.), based upon 'inner dictation' by a 'soft voice' inside his head, attributed to God himself.

The New Age and Christianity

Channeling literature demonstrates very clearly that 'New Age' spirituality, in spite of its professed interest for 'the wisdom of the East,' is a quintessentially Western phenomenon, catering to an audience that is critical of traditional churches and mostly rejects traditional Christian theology, but for which broadly Christian values nevertheless remain the primary symbolic reference. While the early generations of Theosophists claimed to be in contact with spiritual 'Masters from the East' (→ Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society), it is remarkable how rarely one encounters books channeled from entities such as Buddha or Krishna; in contrast, some of the most successful bestsellers in the genre are attributed to sources such as Jesus (A Course in Miracles) or a clearly Christian God (Neale Donald Walsch). The popularity of such books also demonstrates another point. For some time the spectacular aspects of deep trance channeling seem to have attracted attention because they could be interpreted as 'proof' of the existence of spiritual beings: the audience could literally observe how an alien intelligence seemed to take possession of a medium's body and voice. In contrast, the popularity of channeling as a literary genre (rather than a practice) seems to rely entirely on the contents of the books: Schucman's or Walsch's 'inner voices' cannot be heard by anyone else, but are believed to come from a divine source simply because readers are so impressed by the language and the contents of the messages. When all is said and done, then, it is the message and not the medium that explains the importance of channeling as a contemporary religious phenomenon.

1. For various definitions, see Klimo 1987, 2; Hastings 1991, 4; Hanegraaff 1996, 24-27.
2. See Hanegraaff, s.v. "Intermediary Beings IV: 18th Century–Present," in: Hanegraaff et al. 2005.
3. On the anachronistic use of channeling as a universal etic category, and the surprising lack of systematic research about the modalities of "articulated revelations", see discussion in Hanegraaff 1996, 24-27.
4. Hanegraaff et al. 2005.
5. Hanegraaff, s.v. "Roberts, Dorothy Jane," in: Hanegraaff et al. 2005.

Literature

Brown, Michael, The Channeling Zone: American Spirituality in an Anxious Age, Cambridge/London 1997; Hammer, Olav, Claiming Knowledge: Strategies of Epistemology from Theosophy to the New Age, Leiden 2001; Hanegraaff, Wouter J., New Age Religion and Western Culture: Esotericism in the Mirror of Secular Thought, Leiden 1996; Hanegraaff, Wouter J. (ed.) in collaboration with Antoine Faivre, Roelof van den Broek and Jean-Pierre Brach, Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, Leiden 2005; Hastings, Arthur, With the Tongues of Men and Angels: A Study of Channeling, Fort Worth etc. 1991; Klimo, Jon, Channeling: Investigations on Receiving Information from Paranormal Sources, Wellingborough 1987.

→ Communication, Esotericism, New Age, Parapsychology, Perception, Revelation, Soul

Wouter J. Hanegraaff

Chaos

Structureless, Life-Threatening Space

1. In all societies explicitly rooted in tradition, a division of reality into a habitual, familiar component and an unaccustomed, strange, threatening one—or the contrariety of cosmos and chaos—has doubtless provided the most elementary orientation. Beyond the familiar, reliable world begins the wilderness—another world, of ghosts, demons, the spirits of the dead, and all manner of unknown, ominous beings.

The concept of chaos (Gk., 'precipice,' 'abyss,' 'chasm'), then, has possessed telling elements of religious meaning from time immemorial. In ancient conceptualizing, it means (as yet) unformed, 'unstructured' space, to be interpreted as standing in contraposition to a harmoniously ordered cosmos—or if, of itself, it presses toward that structure, then as a preliminary step to cosmos. Cosmos, then, means structured reality. The denomination 'chaos,' on the other hand, denotes the 'structureless' dimension of reality, which menaces identity, if not life itself.

Poles of Opposition

In models of understanding that think in simple contrarieties, then, the proposition of chaos can be associated, depending on the context, with the 'other,' the 'strange,' the 'alien' (as opposed to one's 'own'), with darkness and the dark (as opposed to → light), with matter (as opposed to spirit), with multiplicity (as opposed to unity), with → evil (as opposed to the good), with the irrational (as opposed to the rational), with the contingent (as opposed to the necessary), and with the new (as opposed to the tried-and-true 'old'). Strikingly, in myth, chaos is readily personified in the form of the monster (especially the serpent or the dragon), as Leviathan or Behemoth (Hebrew Bible). The Egyptian Sun God Re, for example, keeps watch that the world not fall back into chaos, as each morning he repulses the serpent Apophis—whom, however, he is unable to slay. In the Babylonian myth of creation, Enuma elish, it is the chaotic primordial ocean, named Tiamat, regarded as woman and as a bisexual being, who in battle with the supreme god Marduk, creates monsters, snakes, and raging demons. In sharp contrast with chaos as disorder, stand numinous conceptualizations of order, such as Maat (Egypt), Me (Sumer), Dao (China), Asha (Persia), Rita and → Dharma (India), and Logos (Greece, especially with Heraclitus). Here one sees a close connection between the various representations of chaos and order, and a religious awareness.

Mythical Animal Forms

Scientific Conquest of Chaos

2. The modern scientific notion that, on the basis of their own cognitive faculties, human beings might manage to overcome chaos and dominate a nature generally ordered by the 'laws' of mathematics, was as yet foreign to antiquity. Antiquity conceived chaos as an abiding reality and as one that everlastingly and repeatedly endangered order. The modern notion is surely bound up with the Judeo-Christian thought of a transcendent, almighty, legislating, creating God, who has made the world out of nothing and has committed this good creation in trusteeship to his image and likeness, the human person.

In this modern conception of the world, ideally oriented to a total, mathematical regularity, chaos is reified as a quasi-independent quantity. Here, chaos represents an expressly negative value. In the framework of a mathematically, hierarchical thinking, the appropriate procedure is to exclude chaos in any form. Now one may seek to play off rational order against an irrational chaos, and—precisely in the political arena, as well—one may speak of a downright 'fear in the face of chaos' (J. Schumacher). In an order of eternally prevailing laws, there can be nothing unforeseeably new, and indeed no creativity in the narrow sense. But in the modern context of philosophy of life, chaos can be evaluated positively as a yet unformed, inexhaustible plenum open to various formative possibilities. Here it can be conceived as the source of 'creative' life forces that dynamically press to the fore, and be set over against a 'paralyzed,' unproductive, 'orderly' thinking. Modern univocity and uniformity strive in the opposite direction and seek to exclude ambivalences. According to Zygmunt Baumann, modernity has even promised humankind the complete eradication of chaos. As has become painfully evident as the third millennium gets under way, modernity has been incapable of keeping that promise. Reality itself (and not only our conceptualization of the same) seems at present to be growing ever less unequivocal, less lucid—and more chaotic.

Positive Appraisal of Chaos in Philosophy of Life

Chaos Theory and Self-Organization

3. In this connection, of course, one must cite the scientifically grounded theory of chaos, which leads to a rehabilitation of the primitive concept in such a manner that this rehabilitation seeks to subject chaos to disciplining at the hands of mathematical methods. Here, doubtless, is the decisive difference from the ancient concept of chaos as rather 'fated.' One distinguishes the modern notion in the attempt to render supposedly 'incalculable' or 'unaccountable' chaos sufficiently available to a calculating thinking—one that must be able to 'take account' of reality—that is interested in predictability and planning, that at least a 'weak causality' can go on being a premise. Alongside nonreligious, naturalistic versions of chaos theory, we also find religious interpretations. These tend to holism (Ganoczy 1995), and postulate a God, of a self-organizing dynamics, completely included in the 'open' process of becoming. Here the traditional personal, almighty, eternal God who intervenes in the world from without is bidden farewell. A certain rehabilitation of the elements of chance found in ancient conceptions of chaos is observable, on the macrophysical level, in 'chaotic' forms of the dynamics of meteorological events, and indeed in all so-called 'turbulences.' Here it is radically evident that the human being must acknowledge impassable frontiers of even short-term predictability.

"Apologia for the Accidental"

4. The 'apologia for the accidental' or the 'coincidental' (O. Marquard), once more moving to the fore powerfully in philosophy today, has, then, religious content. This is shown by the fact that after the obvious failure of all comprehensive, unicausal scientific attempts to explain the world, the task of managing contingency is entrusted to religion. In this perspective, religion can indeed be interpreted as a (more or less persuasive) quest for victory over chaos. Here is a quest that has surely adopted a great variety of cultural and time-conditioned forms over the course of intellectual history, but which, as 'anthropological constant,' is a quest that embraces tradition and modernity, and one at hand in virtually all cultures.

Literature

Eliade, Mircea, The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, New York 1959; Ganoczy, Alexandre, Chaos—Zufall—Schöpfungsglaube. Die Chaostheorie als Herausforderung der Theologie, Mainz 1995; Marquardt, Odo, Apologie des Zufälligen. Philosophische Studien, Stuttgart 1986; Prigogine, Ilya, Order Out of Chaos: Man's New Dialogue with Nature, New York 1984; Schumacher, Joachim, Die Angst vor dem Chaos: Über die falsche Apokalypse des Bürgertums, Frankfurt/M. 1978; Smedes, Taede A., Chaos, Complexity, and God: Divine Action and Scientism, Leuven 2004.

→ Meaning/Signification, Place (sacred), Rationalism

Wolfgang Gantke

Charisma

1. The concept charisma (Gk., 'kindness,' 'complaisance,' 'gift'; from cháris, 'amiability,' 'charm,' 'benevolence,' 'physical attractiveness'), has undergone a change of meaning in its history. Originally it is to be traced back to the Apostle Paul, who used it in strong dependence on the Christian gifts of 'grace' (such as prophetical speech, instruction and admonition, mercy), and on offices or responsibilities. This notion does not address particular qualities of the individual, but the concept that each person has particular charismas within the community, that come to expression in his activity for the community (charisma of 'office'). For today's meaning of the concept of 'charisma,' on the other hand, it is essential that the concept describe phenomena in religious society that are not infrequently charged with the negative connotation of 'seduction,' mental 'suggestion,' and the like, when referring to individual, charismatic personalities or to characteristics of → charismatic movements.

History of the Concept

2. In church history, 'charisma' had more of a subordinate meaning. Already Paul appraised in a rather skeptical manner special gifts like speaking in tongues, spiritual healing, that play a central role in today's charismatic movements. Only at the end of the nineteenth century did it acquire the new meaning of a 'spiritual principle of the invisible Church' (Rudolph Sohm, 1841–1920) that stressed a quality of 'outside of the ordinary,' and began to be employed by Max → Weber as a concept of the sociology of governance and rule. For Weber, charisma is bound up with what characterizes the 'leader'—a personality believed to be "equipped with supernatural or superhuman, or at least specifically extraordinary powers or characteristics not accessible to all."[1] Here the essential mark is that the charismatic personality comes to be ascribed this status only through the faith of his or her followers, so that this personality finally wins authority and control. In religious studies, charisma was also conceived as a characteristic of the → sects (G. van der Leeuw, J. Milton Yinger), and then transferred to the charismatic movements. In research into totalitarianism, and in historical studies, the 'charismatic' is also included in the description of politicians' mass effect: Mussolini, Hitler, and Mao generated intense emotions, the experience of coalescence, and ritual acclamation by means of highly wrought, declamatory presentations.

Charismatic Personalities

3. In today's understanding of the concept, charismatic personalities conjoin two characteristics: a magnetic attraction and qualities of leadership. With Max Weber's description of the 'leader,' other types of 'charismatic personalities' can be included in a religious context, such as the messiah (Heb., mashiah, the 'anointed' one), and the → guru (Sans., 'teacher'). Both are attributed authority of instruction or command by the body of their followers. Messianism can even turn against established power structures, to become a movement. What is important is a personal, emotional bond between the 'faithful' and the 'chosen one,' and group formations are not infrequently dashed in the sequel of the charismatic governance in question. Last but not least, this reciprocal effect between followers and 'their' charismatic rests on the expectation of a salvation or rescue posited more or less in the very person of the charismatic: in psychological terms, in a 'projective identification.'

The concept of 'charisma' has long been included in our colloquial language: as a trait of especially successful politicians, film or television stars, one's next door neighbor—persons who arouse enthusiasm for themselves in others. On the one side, the concept denotes the 'extraordinary' amidst the ordinary, often in a very unspecific way, and on the other, the charismatically gifted figure become a cult figure, the object of a contemporary hero-worship.

1. Weber, Max, Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft, 5th ed., Tübingen 1976, 140.

Literature

Carlton-Ford, Steven L., The Effects of Ritual and Charisma: The Creation of Collective Effervescence and the Support of Psychic Strength, New York 1993; Eisenstadt, Shmuel N. (ed.), Max Weber on Charisma and Institution Building, Chicago 1968; Kehrer, Günter, "Charisma," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe, vol. 2, Stuttgart 1990, 195-198; Lindholm, Charles, Charisma, Oxford 1990; Mol, Hans, Identity and the Sacred: A Sketch for a New Social-Scientific Theory of Religion, Oxford 1976; Oakes, Len, Prophetic Charisma: The Psychology of Revolutionary Religious Personalities, Syracuse 1997; Riesebrodt, Martin, "Charisma," in: Kippenberg, Hans G./Riesebrodt, Martin (eds.), Max Webers 'Religionssystematik,' Tübingen 2001, 151-166.

→ Authority, Charismatic Movement, Hero/Heroism, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Jutta Bernard and Günter Kehrer

Charismatic Movement

1. Charismatic movement is a collective concept for Christian missionary movements that legitimate and document their task of persons' awakening through what are called 'gifts of the Spirit' (Gk., charismata; → Charisma), such as healing and 'speaking in tongues' (glossolalia). These movements have some 200 million members worldwide and stand in the tradition of the Pentecostal and awakening movements.

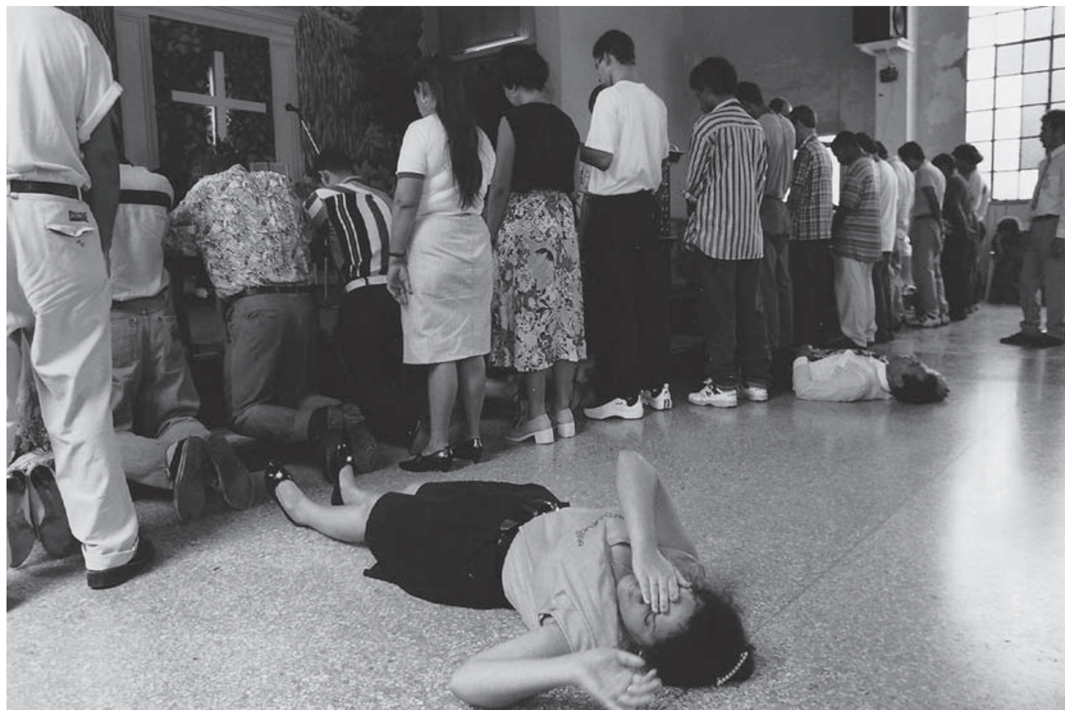
Historical Development

2. What is understood today as the charismatic movement in the more proper sense sprang up in the 1960s in the United States. The foundation

Preacher Reinhard Bonnke at the opening service of the major charismatic event, "Euro-Fire-Conference." Two healings were on the program, in token of the working of the Holy Spirit. According to her own testimony, the young woman in the picture was cured of blindness in one eye. The man standing beside her felt delivered from an affliction of the feet, and, all enthusiastic, cast his sandals into the assembly. The preacher's gesture looks like the expression of a cry of jubilation, possibly a 'Hallelujah!' Mass movements like this make a decisive contribution to the success of the charismatic movements.

of its success had already been laid in the forties and fifties, especially through television broadcasts (→ Televangelism). Thus, public efforts and the media were an important element in the charismatic movement from the outset. In the 1960s, the charismatic movement succeeded in winning a great many members even from the traditional Protestant spectrum. The charismatic movement was effective both within existing churches, as a renewal movement, and as a trigger for independent community foundations (Jesus People Revival). In 1967, the charismatic movement gained a foothold in the Catholic Church, and there enjoyed the support of the institution itself. Besides the United States (Word of God Community in Ann Arbor, Michigan), the Catholic charismatic movement has found great numbers of devotees especially in France (Renouveau Charismatique). In other countries of Europe as well, but especially in Asia, Africa, and South and Central America, where it has been able to make connections with the indigenous traditions of ethnic religions, the charismatic movement has continued to find members.

Content of Belief



3. Despite charismatics' tendency to openness, and to great variety from country to country and community to community, it is possible to describe certain core elements of the content of charismatic belief.

(1) The Bible is the indefectible, inerrant word of God.

(2) The power of the Holy Spirit is revealed in the community through gifts of the spirit, such as prophecy, healing, or speaking in tongues (1 Cor 12:4-11).

(3) Ideally, reception into the community is consequent not upon birth, but on a free and conscious decision on the part of the mature person. This 'surrender of one's life to Jesus' takes place before the assembled community, but need not be accompanied by the formal act of (re-)baptism (→ Baptists).

(4) On grounds of an imminent expectation of the return of Christ (emphasized in varying degrees), bound up with demonological concepts, it is felt most urgent to convert as many persons as possible to Jesus, and to 'do battle with Satan,' since:

Charismatic divine service in Cuba. Many of those who take part in charismatic services experience the working of the Holy Spirit so intensely that they are literally 'bowled over.' Unlike persons in the picture, those caught up in this 'overturning' experience are not left alone, at least not in matured charismatic communities, but as a rule are attended to by pastoral workers.

(5) Only those who have surrendered their life to Jesus can be sure of their salvation in the Last Judgment.

(6) Conversion must be demonstrated in one's manner of life, especially in love of neighbor and the keeping of the Ten Commandments. Here concrete expression is subject to several conceptualizations, more readily to be referred to the conservative spectrum (so that abortion and extramarital relations are shunned, and the place of the husband in the family is emphasized).

3. The culture of the charismatic movement is decidedly of an oral character, with emphasis on songs, sermons, and dances. Divine services have the character of an 'event,' and elements of pop culture are incorporated. Rhythmic music and 'catchy' songs create a mood of expectancy and contribute to the mobilization and participation of all present. Sermons are frequently supported by music and move, through dramatic moments of tension, to the 'experience': the climax, regularly a manifestation of the Holy Spirit, through speaking in tongues, healings, or prophetic visions. Healing and prophetic visions are generally reserved to religious functionaries, such as preachers or community assistants, while speaking in tongues often becomes a mass phenomenon. Thus, on occasion, strikingly turbulent situations arise, in which individuals or entire groups may fall under trance-like conditions. These intense experiences are clearly part of the secret of the charismatic movement's success, especially in lands of the 'Third World,' where elements of indigenous religions and cultures—for example, traditions of African healing, or of Korean → shamanism—are swept up and integrated into the divine services of the charismatic movement.

4. Worldwide, nearly every charismatic community is distinguished by close networks of pastoral availability, pastoral schooling, and concrete offers of help in situations of need, as well as by a high degree of commitment and engagement on the part of believers. Here, clearly, the charismatic movement offers many persons the support for which they long, in a world they experience as confused and anonymous. Still, the charismatic movement does not attack existing governmental and societal structures; on the contrary, it is rather stabilizing in their regard. The spirituality of the charismatic Pentecostal groupings has always been egalitarian: that is, it seeks to overcome boundaries of class and race—mostly, to be sure, only within their own communities, without pretensions to change the whole of society. The image of woman tends to be conservative; still, many communities even accept them in positions of leadership. Statements on the religious and social origin of the members must remain speculative, as representative investigations are lacking. What is clear is that the nucleus of many newly founded communities consists of persons of an intense Christian socialization, often coming from reform movements that have since become institutionalized.

There is no central transregional authority. Community foundations are often closely connected with individual charismatic persons or with small groups. Nevertheless, the members of the most varied groupings feel themselves to be part of the movement. This feeling of 'belonging' is manifested in worldwide networks, usually with a low degree of institutionalization. Institutions are generally looked upon somewhat askance, and accepted only as means to the end.

Over the years and the decades, charismatic enthusiasm has obviously not always succeeded in maintaining itself. Disintegration, or institutionalization and canonization, seem to be the two principal threats to the awakening movements over the long term. Thus, ever new 'waves' of mobilization are necessary, and these are looked upon by their half or wholly established antecedents partly as welcome and partly with mistrust.

Literature

Burgess, Stanley/McGee, Gary B. (eds.), Dictionary of Pentecostal and Charismatic Movements, Grand Rapids 1993; Hunt, Stephen (ed.), Charismatic Christianity—Sociological Perspectives, London 1997.

→ Central America, Charisma, Fundamentalism, Group, North America, South America, Spiritism, Trance

Claudia Haydt

Charitable Organizations

Task of All Religions

1. Concern for those who have fallen into need, to support them, in deed, by counsel, and with economic assistance, is regarded as an important duty by all religions. Commitment to the cause of the weak is one of the fundamental commandments with which the religions foster the cohesiveness of society. Granted, there are differences in the determination of the goal: whether caritas (Lat., '[unselfish] love,' 'charity') is exhausted merely in the bestowal of superfluities or alms, so that one acquires religious merit thereby, or whether instead, solidarity and social justice are the goal.

Here, it is necessary to deal especially with the question of institutionalization. The greatest reason for this concern is that the areas of responsibility among the works of charity have broadened in the present, both quantitatively and qualitatively (underdevelopment, environmental catastrophes, AIDS).

Alms or Solidarity: Christianity

2. In Christianity, the requirement of caritas (in Gk., agape) is rooted in the commandment of love of neighbor, and originates in the love of God for human beings revealed in Jesus Christ (Matt 5:43). Caritas here denotes, for one, the individual's compassionate address to those in need of help, and for another, the organized activity of charity, both in the Catholic Church, and in the Protestant churches where it is called diakonia. In the recent history of Christianity, the social consequences of the industrial revolution have hastened the institutionalization of works of charity. For example, in 1848, the Central-Ausschuß für die Innere Mission (Ger., 'Central Commission for Home Mission') was founded, and in 1897 the Caritasverband für das katholische Deutschland (Ger., 'Caritas Association for Catholic Germany'). The tendency to form associations continued, through the following years, and up to the present. Thus, in 1924, for the merger of the national Caritasverbände ('Caritas Associations') with Caritas Internationalis (Lat.), with headquarters in Rome since 1951, and, in 1957, the Kirchliche Internationale Hilfswerk ('Church International Assistance') and Innere Mission, began to approach their 1976 fusion into the Diakonische Werk der EKD ('Diaconal Project of the Evangelical Church of Germany'). In England and North America, the great awakening movements of the nineteenth century, in their struggle against slavery and mass impoverishment, produced organizational forms of works of mercy that crossed traditional church boundaries. In the large churches, too, as, for example, in the Anglican Church, new forms of charitable activities emerged, outside traditional offices and structures. In many of the 'Free Churches,' organizations of assistance have genuine independence in their action, as with the Mennonite Central Committee, or with the organ of the Quakers known as the American Friends Service Committee. In the Orthodox Churches, social concerns per se are seen not as the responsibility of the churches, but as personal charitable activities. Nevertheless, for example in North America, Orthodox works of charity have been institutionalized as well, in the association known as International Orthodox Christian Charities. Finally, in recent decades, from the → ecumenical movement on the one hand, and on the other, in the wake of globalization, new dimensions are burgeoning in Christian activities of charity. These new dimensions are taking shape in inter-ecclesial assistance and collaboration in development, as well as in commitments to peace and healthy environmental conditions, especially in the 'conciliar process for justice, peace, and the preservation of creation.'

Principle of Subsidiarity

Judaism

3. Works of charity in Judaism are based on tzedaqah ('justice,' as a universal norm) and gemilot hassadim ('pious works of love,' in the sense of individual activities of charity). Tzedaqah comports a strongly obligating character, on the basis of an actual right to assistance enjoyed by those in need. Furthermore—as in many other religions as well—almsgiving falls in the spectrum of charitable action. According to Maimonides, the obligation of tzedaqah surpasses all of the other commandments, and the supreme form of beneficence consists in helping those in need of assistance 'with help for self-help,' and thus delivering them from their need for help—a decisive element in the charitable work of Jewish aid organizations in recent times.

Islam

4. Terminologically, the Arabic word sadaqat closely binds Islam to this same understanding. Sadaqat, however, denotes voluntary almsgiving, and it is in the tzaqat, the social tax incumbent upon every Muslim, that the note of obligation comes to expression. Tzaqat, again, although etymologically related to the Arabic tzaqa ('grow,' 'be pure'), still retains the associative overtones of the Syrian Christian tzeqota, 'service,' 'diakonia.' As shown in sura 2:117 for example, a committed service to the poor belongs to Muslim piety in the same way as does the faith itself, and this not only for neighbors, but also for orphans, the poor, travelers, and beggars. On this basis, Islam has repeatedly placed works of charity at the focus of ethical action. It is not Islam's alleged fatalism, but its pious foundations and endowments (awqaf; sing. waqf), that determine its historical importance; as early as the time of the Crusades, Muslim hospitals were an example to Christianity. Islamic reform movements set new accents: besides the socialism imported from the West, there is also a proper Islamic socialism (→ Socialism II), which strives to enable the poor to participate in the wealth of society. In similar wise, with ta'awun (cooperation), and tahaful (reciprocal responsibility), Muslim Brothers formulate demands for creating works of charity that transcend the concept of mere works of mercy. Today, Islamic groups of the most varied direction are typically active precisely where state social services fail: on the level of altogether concrete work in the city quarters, by way of neighborhood assistance and village development projects. On the basis of their roots in the population, the Brothers usually dispose of a better infrastructure than do the corresponding institutions managed by government offices. The offer of charitable assistance likewise belongs to the profile of Islamic international organizations. In its very charter, the Islamic World League assumes the obligation of fostering prosperity (masalih) among persons, and to stand at the disposition of the Organization of the Islamic Conference. Thus, the League sponsors the Islamic Solidarity Fund and the Islamic Development Bank, two funds available for intervention in situations of need and catastrophic cases.

Muslim Brothers

Various independent Islamic groups as well have a high esteem for works of charity. For the Ibadites, for example, the activity of charity is based on the principle of solidarity (walaya). The Ahmadiyya, especially in Africa, have at their disposal a wide network of clinics, orphanages, and other social institutions. The Ismailites organize social programs and development projects through the Aga Khan endowment institution.

5. In the religious traditions of India, accents on the founding of works of charity have been placed somewhat differently, and this since as early as the time of the Vedas. In the traditions of India (→ Indian Subcontinent), ethical behavior is anchored in the concepts of world order (dharma) and the consequences of acts (karma). Charitable activity is grounded in the dharma, and issues from the demand to fulfill one's obligation to care for one's fellow human beings in the framework of the ideal phases of life (ashramas), and within the system of classes (varna). This gathers up good karma, and thereby raises one's prospects for a better rebirth. Buddhism has fanned out religious concepts especially wide, when it comes to the basis of charitable action. The supreme goal, the removal of suffering (dukkha), finds its counterpart in active care and effort for the conquest of suffering in all of its individual and social forms. Compassion, in the form of an actively loving benevolence (metta), along with co-suffering felt interiorly (karuna), and inner gladness (mudita) in the sense of loving concern for one's neighbors, conform to the four *brahma vihara*s, the highest Buddhist ideals. So does upekkha, the ideal of equanimity, which is to guide believers throughout every commitment. Dana, the almsgiving whose goal is primarily the support of monks and nuns, has a more general meaning as well: it describes any act of charitable activity performed in regard to fellow human beings or any other creature.

Buddhism

Jainism

Apart from Buddhism, in Jainism the commandment of 'harmlessness' and 'mindfulness' vis-à-vis all living beings has been specially emblazoned on the breast. In Mahayana Buddhism—to a certain extent as an ethical counterpart to the practice of the principle of knowledge (prajna)—karuna is the conceptual center of the concrete activity of love or charity. Indeed, in many traditions, a refusal to give alms receives the evaluation of transgression and wickedness. Recently, the meaning of works of charity has been informed with a new dynamism: in East Asia, new Buddhist movements such as the Sokagakki ascribe an altogether special worth to helping the poor and the sick; the Sarvodaya movement in Sri Lanka orients its programs of assistance to Buddhist principles without appealing to → Gandhi's thought; and in Thailand many social projects are to be found that are based on the initiative of local temples. From Thailand, as well, an initiative has emerged to promote and foster the networking of Buddhist individuals and groups for whom not only the social dimension of Buddhism, but also its practical translation into the form of the works of charity, is a special desire. This work is done in consort with the International Network of Engaged Buddhists (INEB, founded in 1989). Furthermore, both the Sarvodaya movement and the INEB, in their work, call special attention to the inter-religious dimension of works of charity.

Hinduism

6. Along with the adoption of pre-Buddhist motifs, some of the religious foundations for Hindu works of charity are borrowed from Buddhism. As examples, let us cite karuna, in the sense of ethically connected acts of the diminishment of suffering; dana, as religiously motivated almsgiving; or ahimsa, the ideal of nonviolence. In addition, there is the tradition of bhakti—trustful, loving surrender to the divine gift of grace—the foundation of Hindu activity of love. Finally, such figures as Ramakrishna and Vivekananda, or Radhakrishnan and Gandhi, have posited demands for a reinforced engagement in the area of charity, at the focus of the 'reform Hinduism' that they represent. This Hinduism takes the ideals of social justice, and the tasks of the promotion of welfare, and integrates them into Hindu identity. Simultaneously, this same Hinduism turned against the colonial rulers, whose governing practices they saw as so obviously contradicting the Christian ideals of the colonialists themselves.

New Foundations

7. Many new religious foundations also place works of charity in the foreground. For Baha'i, as a religion sprung from the Islamic context, merciful beneficence plays an emphatic, key role. The Baha'i vision is one of a new world order in the oneness of the human race. In entering the area of Shintô, it would be important, for instance, to cite Tenriko. In its works of charity, Tenriko brings to expression, in a testifying mode, the event of healing that it expects to emerge from the awaited realm of salvation. In the Christian context, in Africa and Latin America, again, → charismatic movements offer a multiplicity of small, but effective services of assistance. In rural areas, as well as in the slums of the large cities, they connect to traditional concepts. These are already signed by the context of the ethnic religions, and their charitable commitment is directed to areas oftentimes neglected in the interaction of traditional piety and missionary Christianity. In particular, these neglected areas include programs for widows and orphans, as well as simply the poor. In the ethnic religions, the center of gravity for works of charity may, more than in many other religious traditions, lie in charitable activity with regard to members of one's own group. Material wealth is a sign of religious power, and signifies salvation—only, however, when the community participates in it! But solidarity with the poor is engaged by the few, then, and, precisely in the case of greater catastrophes, transcends ethnic boundaries. Thus, many West African ethnic groups offered refuge to the nomads fleeing from the drought of the Sahel zone; the Tanzanians gave asylum to neighbors fleeing the genocide in Rwanda.

Autonomy of Basic Secular Moral Values?

8. With the offer of works of charity comes the problem of the relationship between merciful charity and social justice. Here, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, for example, show a closer proximity to egalitarian ideals than do religions such as Buddhism or Hinduism. Of course, this distinction can be evaluated as a mere difference in stage, and not as a fundamental difference, as is shown in the engagement of certain basic social groups of Buddhist or Hindu provenance. Further, in connection with the discussion of a 'world ethos' (→ Ethics/Morals), the question has arisen of the extent to which diaconic action and charitable organizations have need of a religious foundation. After all, in all religions, there are currents emerging from the authenticity and uniqueness of their specific religious ethics, or, at best, such currents observe criteria of action founded in religion for legitimacy. Conversely, one must ask whether the religions do not, after all, have to acknowledge the autonomy of foundational moral values. In that case, they would also have to recognize a secular ethos as the fundament of charitable action, such as comes to expression in the social → human rights.

Literature

Bremner, Robert H., Giving: Charity and Philanthropy in History, New Brunswick 1996; Çizakça, Murat, A History of Philanthropic Foundations: The Islamic World from the Seventh Century to the Present, Istanbul 2000; Constantelos, Demetrios J., "Charity," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 3 (1987), 222-225; Esposito, John L. (ed.), Islam and Development: Islam and Sociopolitical Change, New York 1982; Friedman, Lawrence J./McGarvie, Mark D. (eds.), Charity, Philanthropy, and Civility in American History, Cambridge 2003; George, Carole Shelbourn (ed.), International Charitable Giving: Laws and Taxation, London 1994; Hennigan, Peter C., The Birth of a Legal Institution: The Formation of the waqf in Third-Century A. H. Hanafi Legal Discourse, Leiden 2004;

Ilchman, Warren F. et al. (eds.), Philanthropy in the World's Traditions, Bloomington 1998; Jones, Colin, The Charitable Imperative: Hospitals and Nursing in the Ancien Régime and Revolutionary France, London 1989; McCarthy, Kathleen D., American Creed: Philanthropy and the Rise of Civil Society, 1700–1865, Chicago 2003; Romanofsky, Peter (ed. in chief), Social Service Organizations, Westport 1978; Sayyid Qutb, Social Justice in Islam, Washington 1953; Singer, Amy, Constructing Ottoman Beneficence: An Imperial Soup Kitchen in Jerusalem, Albany 2002; Siriwardena, Reggie (ed.), Equality and the Religious Traditions of Asia, London 1987; Solomon, Lewis D., In God We Trust? Faith-Based Organizations and the Quest to Solve America's Social Ills, Lanham 2003; The World Conference on Religion and Peace, Symposium on the Ethical and Religious Dimension of Social Development, New York 1995.

→ Contribution, Endowment/Foundation, Ethics/Morals, Humanism, Illness/Health, Poverty, Society

Klaus Hock

Child / Childhood I: Stage of Life

Concept

1. Childhood is that earliest time in a person's life during which she or he is looked upon as a 'child' in the social framework, that is, as not having equal rights with 'grownups.' On account of their restricted, as yet undeveloped capacities, they are excluded from many rights and duties of the adults in a society; full responsibility as members of a society, as well as for their behaviors, is not required of them. The boundaries of childhood have always been variously determined, in dependency on each society's culture and on the spirit of their times. For example, since the time of European industrialization childhood has been culturally specified as extending from the time a child begins to walk until the passing of her or his twentieth year. This is determined by the highly developed educational culture of today, which has shifted entry into the occupational life, and thereby dependence on elders, to an ever later moment in the young person's life. This in turn specifies the span of childhood as that period in which young persons are to learn what they can and must know as 'grown ups'—as up to standard, so to speak, and as fully responsible members of a society or social group. In many cultures, the term of childhood has always been measured according to when the child is capable of observing the roles and functions recognized as being those of adults. In nearly all of the cultures and religions of the world, the formal transition from childhood to adulthood is marked with special rituals (→ Child/Childhood II), in the framework of the onset of sexual maturity (→ Initiation; Puberty). The social group can be a nation, a tribal union, a religious community, or a family federation.

Childhood as Time of Rearing

2. As the time preceding full adult responsibility, childhood is typified by an initial total dependency and helplessness, and by a learning process, through imitation and exploration, that begins with birth. For any social group, this situation produces the need for a rearing (→ Socialization/Upbringing), through which the values, rules of conduct, and traditions of a group are to be transmitted to the child and practiced by him or her. The child thereby becomes warranty of the future of a social group: here it is

The story of the naughty, lovable god-baby Krishna is one of the commonplaces of Vishnu mythology. In today's India, however, the presentation of child divinities is not limited to Rama or Krishna: Shiva and Hanuman, too, appear as children in color pictures. The god in monkey form is one of the most popular gods in the Indian pantheon and ranks as the ideal, devoted, venerator (bhakta) of Rama, as well as the incarnation of Shiva. In the Indian national epic, the Rāmāyana (c. 300 BCE–300 CE), several episodes of Hanuman's childhood are recounted, and today have been taken from the powerfully emotional bhakti tradition and re-worked in 'soft focus.' (I. Keul)

The crianças, child spirits of the Afro-American Umbanda religion in Brazil, are helpful, but irresponsible and playful. Their venerable posture, emphasized by splendid capes and crowns, contrasts with the bundles of pacifiers they wear around their necks. Before the pair of statues burn two candles, as offerings. When the crianças are summoned, toward the end of this séance of the Umbanda ceremonial, the mediums possessed by them adopt the behavior of small children, creep about on the floor and tussle with one another delightedly. (Kirsten Holzapfel) not a matter of merely securing the physical survival of a group, but of guaranteeing the maintenance of its knowledge and social identity, as well. Childhood therefore has a functional meaning for a society into which the child is inserted.

Religious Education

The time of highest impressionability in childhood is also the time of highest receptivity vis-à-vis religious material; and thus religious education has always been an important means of proclamation. Not by chance, the beginning of schooling has been historically powerful in the communication of religious (Christian) content, and this continues in mission schools today. With religious educational theory as a part of theology, there arose a scientific branch that—analogous to psychology of religion—researched religious development during childhood and made recommendations for the transmission of the content of the faith. By way of complement, religious education and (in nations of Anglo-Saxon stamp) Sunday schools are regarded as an indispensable means of religious education. Owing to children's impressionability, the 'school' and confessional nature of religious education has come under increased criticism.

Conceptions of Childhood

3. a) Childhood as a burden: Over against the still widespread idealized view of childhood as the nursery of secure, sheltered development, in a framework 'suited for children,' stands the recognition that children have by no means always been loved and welcomed without hesitancy and for their own sake. Well into modern times, children were frequently reckoned a boon for a community only when they could perform at least small tasks. Accordingly, childhood was looked upon not as a precious time of development, but as a burdensome period of waiting for the child's full 'incorporability' into the framework of the social group—it was the road of helplessness and dependency, and it was to be traversed as speedily as possible. In societies with a strong hierarchy of classes, children were a double burden, if not all parts of the population might marry and rear their children to adulthood (for instance, in the case of slaves, serving girls and farm boys, monks and nuns), or if for economic reasons no, or not all, children could be supported. Early labor under the most difficult conditions, insufficient hygienic and medical situations, as well as physical and mental cruelty and neglect, went out of their way—and still do today, even in the modern industrial states—to make childhood a torment.

b) Childhood as a time of security and shelter: As a protected time and place of personal worth, dedicated to the child, for the purpose of 'carefree' child development, as is usually self-evident in Western countries today, childhood is a comparatively late development, one subsequent to the European enlightenment, and to the rise of an educated middle class in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Childhood since then, especially after the publication of Jean-Jacques Rousseau's novel Émile, or, On Education (1762), has for the first time been generally recognized as a developmental phase, a value in itself, and the object of various scientific disciplines, especially educational theory and psychology. Sigmund → Freud's idea of a proper infantile → sexuality, and → psychoanalysis, destroyed, around 1900, the hitherto prevailing supposition of the child as 'innocent,' which had far-reaching consequences for social behavior with children (ascription to children of their own personality from birth, attention to their own willing, with consequences vis-à-vis their sexual self-determination, and so on). 'Childhood' itself was subdivided into—somewhat contested—phases of development (e.g., nursling, 0–2 yrs.; small child, 2–6 yrs.; school child, 6–14 yrs.; and complemented with puberty, 14–18 yrs.; adolescence, 19–c. 25 yrs.). The concept of the 'oedipal phase,' as Freud developed it (→ Oedipus), became common currency. Further, in function of the notion of a development by phases, children (and, later, young persons) were ascribed a gradually mounting responsibility for their activity and position in the community, which also determined their ascription of rights and duties, and these grew with age.

c) Childhood in harmony with nature: Typically enough, it is precisely cultures once called 'primitive,' with a strong experience of their reference to nature (e.g., certain Indians of North America and South Sea peoples), who give children a greater scope. Here, children are often free of obligations until puberty, and to a certain extent grow up in their own spaces and with their own rules. Childhood, here, is a clearly delimited space of time, which permits liberties that later are no longer conceded.

Child/Childhood in a Religious Framework

4. Childhood begins with → birth (symbol of the origin of all life). At first, birth was not seen in any connection with the sexual act, being regarded instead as a mythical happening. The grounds for childlessness and abundance of children alike (fruitfulness or fertility) were closely tied up with religious conceptualizations. As the product of two opposite elements of emergence (male—female), the child eventually became a symbol of totality. In the framework of animistic conceptualizations (→ Animism), children were reckoned as a rebirth of the departed or as an incarnation of gods. By virtue of their proximity to the origin of life and their 'innocence' seen as springing therefrom, they counted at once as ideal sacrifices for the warding off of especially dreadful events and as vehicles of salvation.

The latter type is active in many religions today. Birth and childhood myths, which set actual everyday events in a mythically sublimated light through tales of wonder, are seen as testifying to and legitimating the exalted position of the herald (e.g., Horus, Apollo, Dionysus, Hercules, Mithra, Krishna, Rama, the → Buddha, → Jesus); the child becomes the 'hero,' the 'divine child.' In this new evaluation, the child is the bearer of divine or godlike powers and wisdom, and thus the object of deep veneration as alive (and not as a sacrifice). This is not necessarily transferred to the profane child of the everyday: In Christianity, newborns are far from being thought of as innocent—instead, they are seen as afflicted with original sin.

Literature

Ariès, Philippe, Centuries of Childhood: A Social History of Family Life, New York 1962; Fass, Paula S. (ed.), Encyclopedia of Children and Childhood in History and Society, New York 2004; Lascarides, V. Celia/Hinitz, Blythe F., History of Early Childhood Education, New York 2000; Mintz, Steven, Huck's Raft: A History of American Childhood, Cambridge 2004; Postman, Neil, The Disappearance of Childhood, New York 1994; Rosen, Michael (ed.), The Penguin Book of Childhood, London 1994; Shahar, Shulamith, Childhood in the Middle Ages, London 1990.

→ Child/Childhood II, Life Cycle, Socialization/Upbringing

Matthias Pilger-Strohl

Child / Childhood II: Ritual

Rituals of Acceptance

1. In every culture, the child is the vessel of the future community; thus, the social order of a society is reflected in the manner in which the child is dealt with and reared. This begins with the very concept of child, whose content is different in different cultures. The biological beginning of the

At this possession ritual in Banjang, Cameroon, the participation of a (female) child is indispensable: The mask of Obasi Njom (god of medicine) so thoroughly exhausts itself that the possessed person sinks to the ground. Men with rifles provide symbolic protection for the mask. New power must now be transmitted to the god by his ritual wife, a duty which only a virgin can discharge. This 1975 scene shows the girl during the transferal of power to the god. In later years, now a young woman, she was deprived of her suitability for this task by pregnancy, so that Obasi Njom no longer appeared, until another girl was designated for the task by an oracle. (Benita von Behr) person/child is → birth, which, previously—owing to the manifold dangers for mother and/or child—was surrounded with many religious usages. But a child is not only a biological being, she or he is also a social being. In this respect as well, certain rituals have often marked children's ultimate inclusion as members of society. Thus, with the Teutons, the Greeks, and other peoples, a child was recognized as a member of the clan only after the father had taken it in his arms from the midwife. Unless he did so, the child was exposed to die. This was the usual fate of girls, or handicapped children, in economically poor societies. In Christianity, the ritual that made a child a member of the community has been → baptism, except in the case of groups not recognizing infant baptism. Although baptism is properly the symbol for reception into a faith community, it has also been the symbol of reception into society in general at the same time, since church and society were formerly inseparable. In Judaism and Islam, → circumcision marks the ritual reception of a boy into the community. In Judaism, this occurs on about the tenth day after birth, in Islam between approximately the eighth and tenth year of life. For girls, in these cultures, there is no equivalent ritual of reception. The circumcision of girls, in Egypt or Somalia for example, must be judged differently: here it is a matter of the subjection or destruction of female sexuality by agents of a male-dominated religion and society. Although societies originally Christian, as well, were long under male control (and in some respects continue to be so today), they have not formed gender-specific childhood rituals of this type.

Exclusion from the Sacred

2. Children are as a rule excluded from sacred, → ritual actions until their initiation, and uninitiated girls often beyond. They receive access to the sacred through authorized rituals, which are usually preceded by a preparation of varying lengths, often concluding with an examination. These rituals symbolize the transition from the phase of ignorance (childhood) into that of knowledge (age of adulthood); thus they recall initiations into mystery cults.

Even where children serve as religious assistants (e.g., altar servers, temple dancers), they remain unconsecrated, and cannot celebrate the full rite themselves. Here the aspect of → purity and innocence stands in the foreground. In the original sense, such assistance could therefore be offered only by as yet uninitiated children, those not yet sexually mature, since in nearly all religions → sexuality has been considered unclean, and has had to be kept at a distance from sacred activity and areas.

End of Childhood

3. In many cultures, the end of childhood is also ritually observed. Thus, in Hinduism, a number of initiation rituals are celebrated, dependent, naturally, on one's membership in a particular → caste. In the three highest castes, childhood for boys ends with the upanayana ritual. Here a cord is run from the left shoulder to beneath the right arm. The age at which the ritual is celebrated is determined by caste: for Brahmans, in the eighth year, for Kshatriyas (warriors) in the twelfth, and for Vaishyas in the twelfth. In this case, just as in that of birth, the end of childhood is not determined only biologically (for example, with the onset of → puberty); rather this, again, is a matter of culture. Similarly, since girls and persons without caste have no 'caste responsibility,' the end of their childhood is not ritually observed: from a certain viewpoint, they remain children. In today's Western societies, there are no longer any general religious boundaries to childhood. Instead, childhood boundaries are set at the transitions from one stage of schooling to the next.

Literature

See Child/Childhood I; in addition: Middleton, John (ed.), From Child to Adult: Studies in the Anthropology of Education, New York 1970; Marcus, Ivan G., Rituals of Childhood: Jewish Acculturation in Medieval Europe, New Haven 1996; Müller, Claudia, Kindheit und Jugend in der griechischen Frühzeit. Eine Untersuchung zur pädagogischen Bedeutung von Riten und Kulten, Gießen 1988; Sommerville, C. John, The Rise and Fall of Childhood, Beverly Hills 1982.

→ Birth, Family, Child/Childhood I, Initiation, Puberty, Ritual, Socialization/Upbringing

Leo Tepper (sections 1, 3) / Matthias Pilger-Strohl (section 2)

China / Japan / Korea

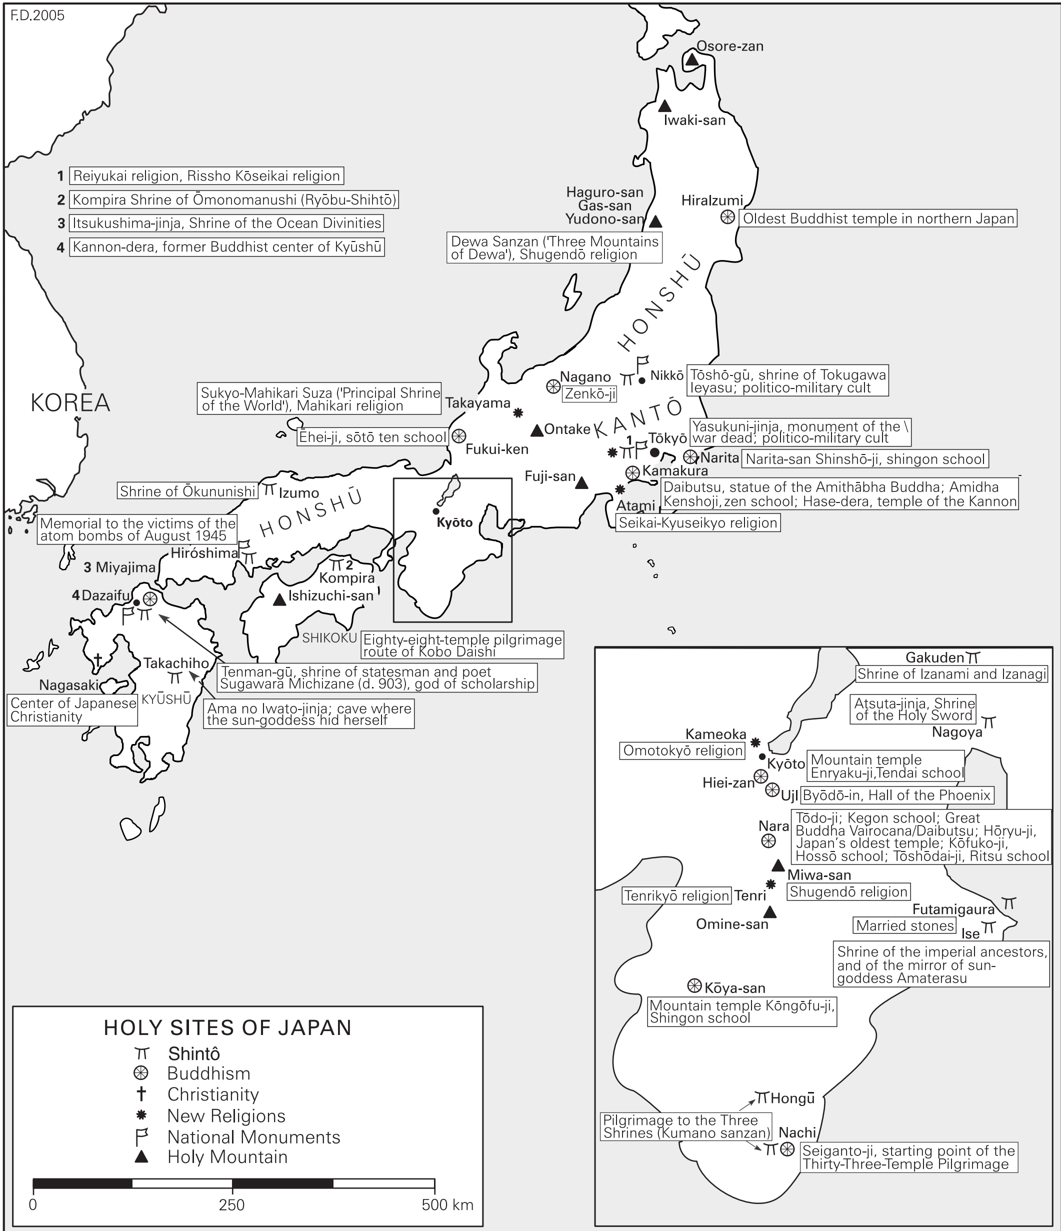
1. On the nature of the entry: The religions of East Asia exercise a power of attraction resting primarily on the conception that East Asian religiosity is marked by profound religious knowledge, spirituality, and tolerance. This picture of a specifically East Asian religiosity is cultivated especially by persons from outside East Asia who seek, and then find, or think that they have found, in East Asian religions what they miss in their own religious environment. Those who cultivate this image are usually ignorant of the fact that it embodies a religiosity that is only that of educated East Asia, and even this only to the extent that it takes its point of departure in individual piety. What is generally imagined of East Asian piety outside

Temporary shrine in Hong Kong in honor of the 'Great Deity, King of the Seas,' and other divinities. In the south coastal regions of China, such shrines are the regular scene of rituals for the welfare and prosperity of fishing and sailing. (S. P. Bumbacher)

Employees of Nankai Railroad Co. gather for an ancestor commemoration in the Confucian tradition. Like many firms in Japan, Nankai maintains its own shrine, in this case on Mount Koya, near Kyôto, at which the 'ancestors' of the enterprise are recalled. (Benita von Behr)

East Asia ordinarily stands in opposition to usual East Asian religiosity. The latter is 'usual' because, first, its modalities define the sum-total of the religious life of all classes, and therefore, in competition with individual piety, define the religious life of the upper classes as well. It is also 'usual' in the sense that it focuses on worldly good fortune and worldly order, and thus, also and precisely, on material prosperity and political stability. In ordinary East Asian religiosity, in other words, the point is not to encounter a god and thereby to gain salvation. The divine therefore does not operate as an instance to which one would irrevocably deliver oneself.

Receiving Felicity



Rather, one can influence gods and spirits: one can understand and interpret them, and then entice and cajole them; indeed one must do so in order not to lose their favor. Religiosity in East Asia is therefore principally the human contribution to a cooperation with the gods, and not worship of, or submission to, a divine omnipotence. Thus, an understanding of East Asian religiosity depends decisively on worldly human striving shifting into the foreground.

Pragmatic Nature of Spirituality

A proper view of the religiosity of East Asia therefore falls first on pragmatics. Thus, it is largely excluded that the religions of East Asia be addressed at all as 'religions' and thereby as distinct social systems, in the sense of Niklas Luhmann, as the religions of the Judeo-Christian space can be principally regarded. The East Asian religions have never understood themselves as 'religions' in the sense just indicated, and this over the greater part of East Asian history of culture. This manner of peculiar or particular interpretation has arisen only in modern times, and thus far only in certain of the religions. If nevertheless one speaks here of 'East Asian religions,' as one does in the sense of the conventional division of

MONGOLIA
NEIMENGGU ZIZHIQU
LIAONING
Dunhuang
Cave-temple locations, with wall painting
Yungang
Hengshan
Peak of the North Beijing
Mausoleum of Mao Zedong
Wutaishan
Sanctuary of bodhisattva Manjushri / Wen Shu
HEBEI
Huanghe
Lamaist monastery
Kumbum
NINGXIA
SHANXI
SHANDONG
Taishan
Qufu
Birthplace of Confucius, reestablished cult of Confucius
Peak of the East
QINGHAI
GANSU
Tomb of the first emperor, Qin Shi Huangdi, with army of clay figures Longmen
Songgao
Peak of the Middle Labrang
Lamaist monastery
Xi'an
Shaolin Monastery
Martial arts center (kung fu)
Maijishan
Huashan
Peak of the West
JIANGSU
SHAANXI
ANHUI
SICHUAN
HENAN
Maoshan
HUBEI
Shanghai
Sanctuary of Master of Heaven Zhang Daoling
Center of meditative shangquing ('Heaven of Supreme Purity') tradition, from c. 360 CE
Qingcheng shan
Changjian
Putuoshan
Sanctuary of bodhisattva Kshitigarha / Di Zang
Sanctuary of Guan Yin, Goddess of Mercy, adaptation of Indian male bodhisattva Avalokiteshvara Yangze
Jiuhuashan
Emeishan
Sanctuary of Bodhisattva Samantabhadra / Pu Xian. Cave sanctuary of 'Yellow Emperor' Huangdi, mythical ancestor-lord of the Chinese Wudangshan
Longhushan
ZHEJIANG
Two-thousand-year-old cult of the god 'True Warrior,' or 'Emperor of the North,' the protecting lord of the art of war
Center of still normative Heavenly Masters tradition, appearing c. second century CE, and going back to the first master Zhang Daoling, whose family still claims the office today
HUNAN
Hengshan
Peak of the South
GUIZHOU
JIANGXI
Temple of the 'Jade Emperor'
FUJIAN
Meizhou
Luzhou
YUNNAN
Cult of Mazu ('Grandmother') or Tianshang Shengmu ('Holy Mother in Heaven'), goddess of seafarers and fishers
GUANGXI
TAIWAN
Xijiang
GUANDONG
Hong-Kong
Center of the Western Christian mission; Bible translations and missionary formation VIETNAM
LAOS
HOLY PLACES OF CHINA
Daoism (to some extent a former state religion)
Confucianism
Buddhism
Christianity
National memorials
Sacred mountain
Archaeological site
Popular religion
Cave temple
Provincial boundary
0 250
500km
THAILAND
F.D.2005

F.D.2005
Osore-zan
Iwaki-san
1 Reiyukai religion, Rissho Kōseikai religion
2 Kompira Shrine of Ōmonomanushi (Ryōbu-Shihtō)
3 Itsukushima-jinja, Shrine of the Ocean Divinities
4 Kannon-dera, former Buddhist center of Kyūshū Haguro-san Gas-san Yudono-san Hiralzumi
Oldest Buddhist temple in northern Japan
Dewa Sanzan ('Three Mountains of Dewa'), Shugendō religion
HONSHŪ
Nagano
Zenkō-ji
Nikkō
Tōshō-gū, shrine of Tokugawa Ieyasu; politico-military cult KOREA
Sukyo-Mahikari Suza ('Principal Shrine of the World'), Mahikari religion Takayama
Ontake
KANTŌ
Eihei-ji, sōtō ten school
Fukui-ken
Tōkyō
Yasukuni-jinja, monument of the war dead; politico-military cult Narita
Narita-san Shinshō-ji, shingon school
Kamakura
Fuji-san Shrine of Ōkununishi
Izumo
Atami
Daibutsu, statue of the Amithābha Buddha; Amidha Kenshoji, zen school; Hase-dera, temple of the Kannon
Seikai-Kyuseikyo religion
Memorial to the victims of the atom bombs of August 1945
HONSHŪ
Kyōto
Hiróshima
3 Miyajima
Kompira
4 Dazaifu
Ishizuchi-san SHIKOKU
Eighty-eight-temple pilgrimage route of Kobo Daishi
Takachiho
Tenman-gū, shrine of statesman and poet Sugawara Michizane (d. 903), god of scholarship
Nagasaki
KYŪSHŪ
Center of Japanese Christianity
Ama no Iwato-jinja; cave where the sun-goddess hid herself
Gakuden
Shrine of Izanami and Izanagi
Atsuta-jinja, Shrine of the Holy Sword
Nagoya
Kameoka
Omotokyō religion
Kyōto
Mountain temple Enryaku-ji,Tendai school
Hiei-zan
Ujl
Byōdō-in, Hall of the Phoenix
Nara
Tōdo-ji; Kegon school; Great Buddha Vairocana/Daibutsu; Hōryu-ji, Japan's oldest temple; Kōfuko-ji, Hossō school; Tōshōdai-ji, Ritsu school Miwa-san Tenrikyō religion
Tenri
Shugendō religion
Futamigaura
Omine-san Married stones
Ise
Shrine of the imperial ancestors, and of the mirror of sun-goddess Amaterasu Kōya-san Mountain temple Kōngōfu-ji, Shingon school
Hongū
Pilgrimage to the Three Shrines (Kumano sanzan)
Nachi
Seiganto-ji, starting point of the Thirty-Three-Temple Pilgrimage
HOLY SITES OF JAPAN
Shintô
Buddhism
Christianity
New Religions
National Monuments
Holy Mountain
0 250
500 km

HOLY SITES OF KOREA
Popular religion
National monuments
Buddhism
Mountain
New Religions
0 100
200 km
CHINA
Paektusan
Korea's highest mountain, symbol of (North) Korean identity
Myohyang sa
Buddhist temple
Son'angdang
Shamanist shrine
NORTH - KOREA
Pyongyang
Kim Ilsŏng Mausoleum
1638 Kŭmgangsan
Places of worship
Shamanist shrine
Tongmulsan
Ŏdaesan
Shamanist shrine
Kangnŭng
Great annual festival of local gods of protection
Seoul
Places of worship of all religions extending throughout Korea
Insel Kanghwa
Taejonggyo places of worship, altar of Tan'gun
T'aebaeksan
1573
Places of worship, in the tradition of Chŏng Kam nok
SOUTH - KOREA
Pusŏksa
Temple: parts from the Koryŏ time (918-1392)
Shamanist festival of a female local divinity
Ŭnsan
Kyeryongsan
Places of worship/ veneration; settlements
Center of Wŏn Buddhism
Iksan
Birthplace of the founder of Ch'ŏndogyo
Kyŏngju
Korea's oldest Buddhist temples, including Pulguksa and Sŏkkuram
Maitreya temple and Chungsan'gyo
Kŭmsansa
Kajŏngni
Folk-religion places of worship/veneration 1915 Chirisan
Haeinsa
Printing plates of the Buddhist canon in Chinese Ch'ŏnbuldong
'Village of the Thousand Buddhas'; statues of Maitreya JAPAN
Cheju
Living folk religion
F.D.2005

the various '-isms,' then this must occur in all cognizance of the restricted validity of such manner of discourse.

Conditions such as come to expression in what follows are not peculiarities that would be attributable exclusively to the religiosity of East Asia. Only rarely until now, however, has the pragmatic nature of East Asian religions been paid adequate attention. Instead, this pragmatism is thrust aside as 'improper'—as a flattening out, and want of depth, of religious experience. On the contrary, it must be made clear that the pragmatic character of the religions of East Asia is not only a determining mode from quantitative viewpoints, but also, so to speak, an autonomous phenomenon.

Historical Sketch

2. Historical sketch: Testimonials of religious phenomena and religious events of East Asia that make it possible to grasp of major connections are available from China from the end of the second millennium BCE, from Japan and Korea only from the end of the third century CE and in a continuous manner from the sixth century CE. In the religious history of East Asia, China has been a kind of turntable. Two religions, Confucianism and Daoism, have their origins in northern or central China, and from there have spread across the ethnic and linguistic frontiers of their original areas to southern China, on the one hand, and to Korea and Japan on the other. Two other religions, namely Buddhism and Christianity, have arrived in China from without.

The first reliable reports on Buddhism in China relate to the middle of the first century CE, and report no more than that members of the higher classes had come in contact with it. In the second half of the fourth century, Buddhist elements from China became known in Korea, whence it arrived in Japan in the sixth century. Christianity was known in China and Japan for the first time in the sixteenth century, and in Korea around the middle of the seventeenth, but gained a certain geographic extension in all three lands only from the nineteenth century onward. The spread of Buddhism, Daoism, and Confucianism in the region of today's China was, among other things, a paraphenomenon of the fact that the political central control at first limited to northern China could at last be solidly established out beyond the boundaries of its nuclear area. These religions reached Korea and Japan as a more or less direct consequence of the fact that political organization in Korea, as in Japan, was coordinated more and more along the lines of the Chinese model. In all three countries, there were always—as there are today—religious conceptualizations and practices whose origins can be unambiguously identified neither temporally nor locally, inasmuch as these conceptualizations and practices have been handed down almost entirely without writing. Here they are all categorized as indigenous religions. Other religions than the ones that we have named have always remained relatively insignificant in East Asia.

As universal religions, Buddhism and Christianity have been propagated throughout East Asia, as is well known. This is not true of Confucianism and Daoism. With the exception of their transmission in circles of Chinese living abroad—in the case of Confucianism also among the foreign Koreans—they have always remained confined to East Asia. In a certain sense, indeed, Daoism must be accounted a purely Chinese phenomenon. After all, in Japan and Korea—not as a salvation proclamation and mantic doctrine, it is true, but nevertheless as an institutionalized religion—it has remained all but shapeless, which does not mean that it has not left deep traces on other religions, especially on Buddhism and → shamanism. Only with qualifications is it possible to designate Confucianism as a 'religion' at all. To do so is justifiable only insofar as Confucianism has given impressive and enduring ritual shape to family ancestor commemoration and memorial (whose ratio and historical origin are fully independent of Confucianism). It has also advanced the concept of → 'ancestors,' and the form of the family ancestor memorial, beyond the circle of relatives. This made it possible to transfer the eminent position attaching to ancestors to any person whomsoever who would have been seen as placed above others. Thus the form of ritual ancestor remembrance became a traditional thought image of that particular hierarchical order of state and society without which East Asia would be decidedly different than it has always been.

Ancestors

3. Regional and social integrations: a) Cults and their sacred places in East Asia almost always exercise a power of attraction only within narrow topographical confines. This is obvious in cases of ancestor remembrance in the narrower sense, which is enjoined a priori upon households or local segments of hereditary groups. But spatial proximity also defines communal cults, which frequently are organized in no larger units than in villages or city quarters, sometimes even only in neighborhoods. More detailed investigations have shown that the catchment area of regional cults is identical, in extreme cases, with market communities of an older sort. But these restrictions also hold good in the case of cults and places of cult that are not primarily laid out to serve the needs of smaller communities—for example, the requirements of Buddhist temples. Naturally, there are also places of worship that draw the attention of broader regions—in the extreme case that of an entire country. To these belong temples that have been founded by eminent Buddhist masters, and that over time have repeatedly been the scene of the activity of important personalities, frequently salvation-proclaiming and thaumaturgical ones. At times, the birthplaces or locales of activity of respected statesmen and military men as well are ranked with places of worship. The birthplace of Kim Ilsŏng (Kim Il-Sung, 1912–1994), founder of the North Korean state, as also the places in which he is supposed to have performed particularly important deeds, belonged to this category even during his lifetime, and are more recent examples of transregionally significant places of remembrance and veneration. Finally, there are sacred mountains or other locations with a reputation for special powers.

Proximity of Worship Communities to Places of Worship

Places of Pilgrimage

Still, by far the greater part of religious life remains confined to narrower spaces. For the majority of the population, visits to important, transregional places of worship are pilgrimages, and many persons make them, if at all, once in a lifetime.

b) The relative narrowness of religious life in East Asia is reinforced by the fact that, alongside a tendency to spatial limitation, a leaning to social restriction is likewise at work. The state of knowledge and of scholarship has not yet reached the point that entire social classes could be made out as delimiting quantities of this kind, and described in terms of the effect of each on religion. But it is nonetheless possible to recognize social units as subjects of religion.

Social Limitation

Trade Associations

East Asian religious practices can be profession or business specific. They are often evidently so among fishers, artisans, and merchants. Then their guilds and guild-like alliances ordinarily mark the social framework of the rituals.

Male Cults

Religion in East Asia can also be gender-specific. This attribute is strikingly verified in Korea. Participants in certain village cults are exclusively men, and the deities upon which these rituals focus are likewise always of masculine gender. This fact is no longer astonishing when one takes into account that the rituals are orientated to Confucian ancestor remembrance, and that the division of the sexes is one of the prerequisites on which the Confucian social ideal rests. Nor does it bewilder, then, to see that participants in other village rituals—namely, the ones usually termed shamanistic—are exclusively women. Buddhism furthermore, as one can see from the constitution of the clergy, is a female domain.

Female Cults

Family

The nuclear family is a not to be overlooked locus of religious socialization. The family, and, to a more limited extent, the other groups of relatives, were the central, if not indeed the only, reference points in the accomplishment of life, and thereby also the loci in which the earliest religious experiences, decisive in so many ways, were had. And this they have remained for the greater part of the population of East Asia. Not without cause, many persons participate in cults and rituals only insofar as such participation is bound up with family descent.

Illiteracy

4. Illiteracy: Regional and social connections and ties restrict religious experiences. Spatial mobility has always been at hand in the past—for example, in the form of flight from one's land, that is, as a reaction to material necessity—but it has always led most persons back to their familiar milieu or into other kinds of milieu bonding. Since it was ordinarily impossible to broaden one's religious experiences through familiarity with cults and religious traditions beyond the horizon of one's own heritage, such broadening would depend, with almost complete exclusivity, on the opportunity to acquire pertinent knowledge through the reading of religious texts. But this opportunity was itself almost completely excluded. Knowledge of reading and writing has been extremely rare over the course of the centuries. In East Asia, nearly the only written medium, and the only one for the spread of religion, was pre-modern written Chinese; and this circumstance obtained not only in China, but also in Korea, as well as to a considerable extent in Japan. But East Asia's pre-modern economy and society never granted more than a miniscule number of persons the years of leisure necessary to become proficient enough in written Chinese to have open access to the sources of religion. When persons had any contact at all with their religion in written form, it was at best by way of legend and story, or in simple compendia of rules for living, as for example in the form of calendars, geomantic manuals, or prayer books and ritual handbooks. The medium of writing could be extended to more than an insignificant number of the population only by Christianity, since the missionaries worked with colloquial translations of the Bible and other Christian religious writing from the very inception of their ministry. The success that Christianity has always had precisely in the circles of East Asia to whom education is important may well be attributed therefore, in decisive measure, to the mix of literacy and popular speech.

Illiteracy in religion precludes, or at least radically diminishes, the utility of doubts of faith. Indeed, illiteracy is an all but insuperable obstacle to faith becoming a category of religiosity at all. Since the religious experiences of others can be really judiciously meditated only in the presence of writing, the possibility is missing, under conditions of illiteracy, of working out one's own religious experiences and doubts against those of other persons, so to speak. Finally, since these conditions exclude individual spirituality, persons are inescapably referred to collective usage and tradition; in this framework, they then accord discipleship to religion as religious praxis, with a greater or lesser degree of interior participation.

5. Religious pragmatics: In the religious praxis of East Asia, as in that of any other region, there are also persons who do not unconditionally surrender to the omnipotence of the spirits and the gods. Rather, they find themselves in a concatenation of activities with the spirits and the gods that permits an interpretation of the actions of these beings and a consequent influence upon the same—to the extent that they manage to bring their influence to bear also, and precisely, on human, intra-worldly ends. Attempts to wield influence can take on crassly materialistic and opportunistic traits.

Task for a Deity

In 743 CE, the first attempts to cast a huge statue of the Vairocana Buddha, for the Todai Temple in Nara, met with failure. But oracles were available in which the deity Yahata/Hachiman, whose place of worship was in the North of the island of Kyūshū, and thus a great distance from the capital, had promised to assist with the cast. The region in which the divinity Hachiman was worshiped had been settled by immigrants from Korea, who had a reputation for excellence in smithery and casting, and who had clearly placed themselves under the protection of Hachiman. In 746, the casting finally succeeded, and the statue was dedicated in the same year. In 749, Hachiman expressed the desire to remove to the capital. Compliance followed early the next year, when the divinity, accompanied by a priestess, arrived in Nara to be greeted with an extravagant celebration and ceremony—graced by the presence of the Tennō family—in the Tōdai temple. Hachiman was given a shrine, raised to the most exalted princely order, and supplied with households of slaves. Hachiman's entry, which could very well have occurred at the instigation of the Korean immigrant residents of northern Kyūshū, marks the inception of the deity's long period of influence as one of the most important divinities of old Japan for affairs of state.

Rule and Religion

This example may stand for a pragmatics of government by a court, and at the same time marks one of the forms of state religion in East Asia. Concern for the honor of the ruling house, and ultimately for the preservation of its sovereignty, were the driving forces here—as, in the case of comparable measures, was concern for the health of a member of the ruling family, or concern for a bountiful harvest, a failure of which could itself have shaken political stability. The political elite of society made use of a store of cults—not the exclusive property of courtly and government circles—and bestowed privileges on them. This conferral of privileges found its expression in the fact that the cults so honored, and their places of worship, were assigned land and slaves, and the places of worship or their personnel were exempted from tribute and service. In the course of time, this was the source of advantages to native cults as well as Buddhist, and in China, Daoist establishments.

But privileges were also withdrawn. The occasions for their withdrawal, if not indeed for worse, testify to their mode of active penetration of society in the service of the pragmatics at hand. One motive for the cashiering of cults and their centers was that their magical efficacy in terms of state requirements had debilitated or evanesced, so that now other cults promised to be more effective. The dwindling—although temporary—of Hachiman's effectiveness was apparent in the fact that an oracle pronounced by the deity in 769 had all but led to the overthrow of the throne. Of course, such danger could also come to naught and cease to threaten the established rule, and the latter's patronage of the Hachiman cult would not be vacated over the long term.

Privileges were also withdrawn when the material favoritism accompanying them threatened to impair the income of court and government, so that a privileged religion became a danger for the political and social elite. Conspicuous examples are the restrictions—indeed, in some places, even violent persecutions—that Buddhism had to endure in ninth-century China and early-fifteenth-century Korea. These persecutions would permanently impair Buddhism's effectiveness in both countries.

Ritual Policy

Religious pragmatics reached beyond the courtly and governmental circles of early times, to embrace the ritual policy of subordinate offices, as indeed it continues to do to an extent even at present. Over the last centuries of monarchical rule, and thus in times of Confucian supremacy and power, rituals were continually engaged in China and Korea for the warding off of epidemics through the appeasement of dissatisfied souls of the dead, and performed under both courtly and governmental auspices. Today as yesterday, and with even greater participation than in the first years after 1945, the Yasukuni Shrine in Tokyo is the scene of honor paid to the memory of the fallen of the war in the Pacific. The observance is held not only with the approval, but actually in the presence, of high political and other eminent personages. Such rituals are celebrated in Japan at provincial gogoku jinja (shrines for the defense of the country), in memory of the war dead of the province in question.

Cults of the last-named kind are explicitly eclectic, since they conjoin rituals that, under premises of the traditional divisions—the distinction of the East Asian religions into Buddhist, Daoist, Confucian, and native religions—would have seemed irreconcilable. Thus, the world and life view of Confucian administrators find their legitimization in the teachings of the sages of pre-imperial China, that is, in authoritative sources of a non-transcendent character. Accordingly, right living emerges in a mutual complementation of societal and political order meant to stand apart from a transcendental reference. This arrangement holds, by and large, for East Asian administrators of any order or rank. Contrary to possible expectations, this circle manifests a simultaneous fear of unappeased souls brought down to death by violence or without warning, and a fear of the 'hungry'—that is, ancestors deprived of memorial and therefore of the nourishment associated therewith. These dead are suspected of causing illnesses unless they are appeased. Thus, officials whose activities one would suppose to be ruled by rationality, are entangled in conceptualizations that one would have ascribed only to the shamans.

Authorities

Rituals from Different Religions

Eclecticism also prevails in private religiosity. For example, Korean shamanesses know a memorial recollection of their personal ancestors, a practice that is widely regarded as specifically Confucian. The behavior of ordinary persons is eclectic as well. Many families celebrate their marriages according to Confucian ritual, but conduct their funerals and mourning according to Buddhist usage, instead of ordering them in a logical unity. Multi-religiosity, then, is the rule, unless both members of the parental pair or all of the grandparents come from the same religious background. It also frequently occurs that persons will forsake one religion or cult in favor of another, after the daughter-in-law has not borne the desired son, or an urgent entreaty has not been answered.

Growth of Christian Churches

Religious pragmatics not only transcend the framework of the so-called traditional religions, but also make use of Christianity. In the last two to three decades, the advance of Christianity in Korea has been simply breathtaking. To a considerably lesser extent, the same has occurred in the People's Republic of China and other Chinese states. An element of religious opportunism is visible in this development. In the case of persons who join Christian churches, country folk often maintain the suspicion, indeed not without justification, that they do so only for the sake of the benevolence of their employers, in case the latter are Christians. Further grounds for the attractiveness of Christianity may possibly lie in the fact that Christianity is still a relatively new religion in East Asia. A switch to Christianity, incidentally, does not always or definitively exclude a participation in memorials of family ancestors, or even an occasional visit to a Buddhist temple. This manner of religious praxis is of course widely appraised as 'un-Christian,' at least in Protestant circles of East Asia; it is determined by family origin and bears witness to the traditional ranking of family before religion. This family extraction, as shown in the example, can collide with a given religion or a given conception of religion. Thus, circumstances of the type described also evince the finite importance of religious origin.

6. Dynamics: A situation of competition between religion as inherited praxis and as doctrine (as indeed religion appears in the example just cited) is no peculiarity of the religiosity of East Asia. It is to be emphasized, however, that a given extraction does not ineluctably entail permanence and immutability. The tendency to attachment to descent is repeatedly thwarted by religious pragmatics, which can then themselves establish—transitory—origin.

Tradition

Interpretations of Eastern religiosity, commonplace especially outside East Asia, emphasize permanence and immutability under the heading of → 'tradition.' On the contrary, the interplay between limitations (which are conditioned by religious descent) and religious pragmatics (under whose conditions religious extraction can never be more than a transitory matter) renders it urgently necessary to take one's point of departure in the mutable dynamics of that religiosity, even in terms of the religiosity of East Asia.

It is altogether justifiable to assume that, in future, such dynamics will characterize the religiosity of East Asia even more than in the past. After all, as religious and local attachments lose their significance, these dynamics may acquire more space, and moments of religious heritage could become increasingly short-lived. At the same time, religious dynamics would acquire a new quality, and this by way of the fact that religion as a religion of writing enjoys no richer outlook for its effectiveness than it has had in the past. True, in comparison with older times, the ability to read and write has spread so widely in East Asia that the region as such can no longer be characterized as extensively illiterate; at the same time, much religious writing has since entered the colloquial languages. As a result, the population has readier access to its written religious sources than it has had in times gone by. Nevertheless, along with this newly acquired literacy, the writing culture is losing its importance, on the same basis and to the same extent as it is in other industrial cultures. If, then, as one must suppose, permanency and attachment are to dwindle as well, then a striving for individual and strongly praxis-oriented experience and behavior will become a governing moment in the religious domain.

Multi-Religious Dynamics

Thus regarded, East Asia would not be found to lag at all behind the established religions in the older industrial societies, with their many anxious concerns. Were religious dynamics to unfold in the direction anticipated, the spirituality of East Asia would become a moment in a spirituality that meanwhile has seized a great part of the rest of the world. From this standpoint, East Asia would also provide a lesson in the meaning of pragmatics and illiteracy for religion.

Literature

China: Bolz, Judith, Survey of Taoist Literature: Tenth to Seventeenth Centuries, Berkeley 1987; Feuchtwang, Stephan, Popular Religion in China: The Imperial Metaphor, Richmond 2001; Gladney, Dru, Muslim Chinese: Ethnic Nationalism in the People's Republic, Cambridge/London 1991; Joachim, Christian, Chinese Religions: A Cultural Perspective, Englewood Cliffs 1986; Madson, Richard, China's Catholics: Tragedy and Hope in an Emerging Civil Society, Berkeley 1998; Seaman, Gary (ed.), Chinese Religions: Publications in Western Languages, vol. 4: 1996–2000, Ann Arbor 2002; Schipper, Kristofer, The Daoist Body, Berkeley 1993; Welch, Holmes, The Buddhist Revival in China, Cambridge 1968.

Japan: Kasahara, Kazuo (ed.), A History of Japanese Religion, Tokyo 2001; Murakami, Shigeyoshi, Japanese Religion in the Modern Century, Tokyo 1980; Noriyoshi, Tamaru/Read, David (eds.), Religion in Japanese Culture: Where Living Traditions Meet a Changing World, Tokyo etc. 1996; Smith, Robert J., Ancestor Worship in Contemporary Japan, Stanford 1974; Sonoda, Koyu/Kashiwahara, Yusen (eds.), Shapers of Japanese Buddhism, Tokyo 1994; Stone, Jacqueline I., Original Enlightenment and the Transformation of Medieval Japanese Buddhism, Honolulu 1999.

Korea: Chongsuh, Kim (ed.), Reader in Korean Religion, Korea 1993; Grayson, James Huntley, Korea—a Religious History, London 2002; Phillips, Earl H./Eui-Young Yu (eds.), Religions in Korea: Beliefs and Cultural Values, Los Angeles 1982; Sørensen, Henrik H. (ed.), Religions in Traditional Korea, Copenhagen 1995.

→ Buddhism, Confucianism, Daoism, Kyôto, Mountains (Five Sacred), Shintô

Dieter Eikemeier

China / Japan / Korea: Time Charts

I. China

1. Time Chart

10th/9th cent. BCE	Neolithization	In this space of time, in Northern as well as in Southern China, lifestyles based on hunting and gathering transition to agriculture and the establishment of semi-permanent settlements.
4th/3rd cent. BCE	Middle Neolithic	In both 'cultural complexes,' the Yangshao (Northern) and the Dapenkeng (Southern), village structures are found that a few years later were once more surrendered, since in consequence of poor fertilization (burning-off), the soil was quickly exhausted. Village and cemetery structures suggest a still egalitarian societal organization.
c. 1600–1045 BCE	Shang: First historically attested dynasty	First written testimonials (oracular inscriptions on bones) with information concerning the religion and life of the nobility. Clear-cut hierarchy, with aristocratic clans at the top. Ancestor and nature worship (mountain and river gods) by the rulers. Large 'royal tombs,' with remains of human sacrifices.

1045–221 BCE	Zhou Dynasty	Originally Western vassals of the Shang, the Zhou defeat the latter. Division of the area into a crown and many 'domains in which to live.' The sky (tian) now emerges as a religious instance: the 'mandate of heaven' (the sky) legitimates the Zhou rule.
551–479 BCE	Confucius	The attempt to reform a system suffering from powerful dissolving phenomena by training the sons (mostly of the elites) in rites and right lifestyle ('ethics').
481–211 BCE	"Age of the Battling States": wars for predominance	The power of the Zhou kings is still only nominal and ritual; some rulers, emerging from earlier regions of habitation, claim the title of king. Civil war.
4^{th}–3^{rd} cent. BCE	Bloom of the philosophical schools	As counselors of the rival rulers, we find, e.g., among the Confucians, Menzius (Meng Ke, c. 321–289), Xunzi c. 298–238, legist Han Fei (280?–233), along with Daoist Zangzi (Zhuang Zhou, c. 320. The anonymous Daode jing or Laozi is likewise from the fourth century.
221 BCE	Founding of the first empire: Qin Dynasty	Court preference for Daoist conceptualizations. Burning of the works of the other philosophical schools (exception: Yi jing). Anti-intellectualism. Cult of rulers, with monumental burial installations.

206 BCE–220 CE	Han Dynasty	Confucianism becomes the 'state religion,' with a gradual penetration by Buddhism along the trade streets. First Daoist religious tradition ("Master of the Sky").
221–589	Age of disintegration	After the end of the Han Dynasty, the Empire disintegrates, at first, into three parts, and from 311 onward, a multiplicity of smaller state units, with the North falling to foreign rule. The general uncertainty favors the expansion of Daoism and Buddhism.
265–420	Jin Dynasty	Discrediting of Confucianism by the fall of the Han Dynasty. Ge Hong (283–343) offers a 'theory' of immortality in his work, Baopuzi. Emergence of the two important Daoist directions in Southern China: the Mao-shan (from 360) and the Lingbao traditions (c. 390). Kumârajîva as most important translator of Buddhist sutras.
420–581	Division of China into Northern and Southern states	North: Daoism becomes the state religion under the Wei (386–534). South: Dao Hongjin collects and edits the original writings of the Mao-shan. Buddhism: Tiantai school.

618–907	Tang Dynasty	Great flourishing of both the economic and the cultural elements of China. Rise of Chan (Zen), Huayan, and Pure Land Buddhism. Introduction of the examination system for state officials. Great persecution of Buddhism in 845. Nestorians in China.
960–1279	Song Dynasty	Appearance of Neo-Confucianism, integrating Daoist and Buddhist elements. Flowering and dominance of Chan Buddhism. Taoist school of meditation and monasticism, the Quanzhen. Jews settle in Kaifeng.
1260–1367	Yuan Dynasty (Mongolian foreign rule)	Dominance (as it was favored by the Court) of tantric Buddhism (Lamaist Buddhism). Franciscan Mission.
1368–1644	Ming Dynasty	Jesuit Mission: Matteo Ricci. Printing of the Daoist canon (still extant today, over 1400 texts).
1644–1911	Qing Dynasty (Manchu foreign rule)	1850: outbreak of the partly Christian-inspired Taiping Rebellion, followed by control of a great part of Southern China with its center in Nanking (ended in 1864).

1949	Founding of the People's Republic of China	Mao Zedong founds the socialist government.
1966–1976	Cultural Revolution	Persecution of religious traditions across the board. Extensive destruction of temples and monasteries by the Red Guard. For fear of discovery, scholars burn their collections of old, e.g., Daoist, manuscripts.
after 1977	Policy of Modernization and relative religious tolerance	Religious traditions are tolerated once more, so long as they submit to state supervision.

2. China: Festal Cycle

a) Schema

Generally: Festivals are held on days determined by the lunar calendar. Since these are inconsistent with the Western solar year, they are to be read as 1.1 = first month, first day, etc., of the lunar year, etc. In the Yin-Yang cycle, the 1.1 means: birth of Yang; Yin at the high point; 3.3.: Yin waxing; 5.5.: Yang waxing; 6.6.: Yang at the high point; Birth of Yin; 9.9: Yang waning, Yin waxing (SuS = summer solstice; WiS = winter solstice.)

WiS 1.1. 15.11 3.3. 5.5. SuS 7.7. 15.7. 9.9. 15.10.

|-----------|---------|--------------|--------------|-------------|--------|--------|----------|----------|

|Birth of Yang |Birth of Yin

b) Explanations

Twelfth and First Months

The dismissal of the old year and the welcome of the new denote the chief element of the festal cycle.

12.15 is the last festival of the protective spirit of the earth (Tudi Gong) in the old year. On this day, in factories, etc., is held the company dinner for employees. On the same occasion, any bonuses are distributed (omitted if business looks unprofitable for the coming year).

12.24 is the day of the farewell to the God of the Hearth (Zaoshen), who has registered, in the kitchen, all of the articulations (chatter!) of the family members and now is to file a report with the sky. Hence, his paper likeness has honey smeared on its mouth, so that he can report only 'sweet' things. As the one responsible (Siming) for the lifespan of the family members, he will file a report that can lengthen or shorten the life of the dwellers of this house. Then the likeness is burned, so that his spirit can ascend to heaven. The other protective spirits accompany him. Inasmuch as these can now no longer 'interfere,' then, this is the best moment for weddings. On this day, the houses, and especially the house altars, are thoroughly cleaned.

On the eve of the New Year, the doors of the house are bolted, the newest outfits are donned, and the last meal of the year is celebrated, in the family circle, with special solemnity. The house altars host especially elegant sacrifices. New Year's Day begins with visits to the local temple, to relatives, and to friends. All work is omitted until the fourth day, when the gods and spirits return from their heavenly excursions.

The first full moon of the first month (1.15) marks the end of the New Year's celebrations. With the 'procession' of the kite dance, and the evening lantern festival, the rebirth of Yang and the universal presence of the Dao are celebrated.

Second Month

On 2.2 (as well as on 2.16), Ritual for the Tudi Gong. On the streets and family altars, sacrifices are presented, consisting of foodstuffs, incense sticks, and paper sacrificial money. Now the protective god of the community preserves the community from the dangers of the underworld, and bestows the blessings of the earth. The money is burned, the food is eaten at home after the ritual.

Third Month

On 3.3, one of the most important festivals of the year takes place, the Qingming ('pure and clear'). The graves of the deceased are cleansed, and sacrifices are offered to the ancestors. Lord of the Soil Houto receives a gift, that he may assure the strict division of the world of the dead from that of the living. This festival offers the opportunity for family picnics in the hilly surroundings of the cemeteries. These are centered on the youngest women, whom they especially honor. This is also the opportunity of these young women, under supervision, but without strict control, to mingle with youths from other families ('Bridal Show').

Fourth Month

4.8, Birthday of the Buddha Shâkyamuni (since the end of the third century CE). Washing of the statues of the Buddha, and processions with his image. Main interest: a festival of the communities of monks and nuns.

Fifth Month
5.5, Day of the Strongest Sun (Duan Wu). Beginning of the hot season. That that season may be rainy, for which, traditionally, the dragons, i.e., kites, are responsible, the dragon festival is held at rivers and lakes (dragon/kite boat-race). Since this is also the season of extra sicknesses, apothecaries gather plants, and children have protective amulet signs painted on their foreheads against illnesses (caused primarily by poisonous animals). Unlike 3.3, this is a feast on which especially the boys are honored. Daoists hold a fasting ritual, intended to serve for the lengthening of one's life span.

Sixth Month
In Southern China, 6.6 is celebrated as the summer solstice. Bedding is aired in the open, and the house is cleaned, before the second rice-planting begins. On 6.16, the birthday of Guan Gong is celebrated, patron of merchants and athletic competitions.

Seventh Month
On 7.7, a kind of feast of initiation is held. According to the ancient myth, the Seven Spinning Sisters of the Pleiades descend to earth and bathe in the river. A shepherd boy becomes enamored of the seventh Sister. Wrathful, the Emperor of the Hunt decrees the eternal estrangement of the two, as a pair of stars in the sky. Only once a year, precisely on this day, they are permitted to meet. On this day, women may make men a proposal of marriage. Ordinarily, the Seventh Sister is offered a sacrifice, with the entreaty for a fruitful marriage.

Other than the Chinese New Year, 7.15 is the most important festival of the year. For one, the earth is blessed before the harvest, for a good harvest. For another, the 'Feast of All Souls' is celebrated by Daoists as the day of the universal redemption of souls who have no one on earth to reverence them. This is pudu, the 'translation of all' souls in hell to the bank of redemption. Buddhists instead celebrate the solstice as Yulan pen (Sanskr., Avalambana or Ullambhana). Here too, fitting ritual and sacrifice are offered, so that the uncared for, wandering souls of the dead, or those detained in underground imprisonment, who have died a premature or unnatural death, or who have died abroad, may be transferred to the blissful meadows of the 'righteous' ancestors and thereby be redeemed.

Eighth Month
Performed by women, as a rule—although Daoist priests or Buddhist monks are indeed invited to take part, so that they may recite prayers or sutras—the family festival of 8.15 serves as a kind of thanksgiving for the harvest. Accordingly, freshly harvested delicacies are offered as gifts on the family altar, along with moon cake on the evening of the full moon of the harvest month.

On 8.28, the Feast of Confucius is celebrated. In villages on the main square, in larger cities in his Temple, his official rite is performed. Classical dance and music are included, along with processions of local officials bearing Confucius's memorial tablets to the altar of their patron.

Ninth Month
On 9.9, with Yin in the ascendancy, and Yang 'in the night,' one prepares oneself for immortality, climbing into the high mountains where, like the immortals themselves, one drinks the wine of deathlessness. Properly, this Feast is celebrated to the honor of the Pole Star and the Great Bear (who is thought of as ruler over life and death). Accordingly, a Daoist ritual to these deities, as well as to the God of Thunder, is performed. In its (frequently) secularized form, this day serves for picnics and kite-flying.

Tenth Month
Being mainly a Daoist festival, 10.15 is the feast of the principle of water, and thereby of the principle of life as such. At the locations, or in the temples, at which the Daoist Ritual of cosmic renewal takes place, this is the day on which the celebrations begin.

Eleventh Month
The important festival in this month is the Feast of Winter, at which the winter solstice is celebrated, since, from now on, the days grow longer, and more light appears.

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

II. Japan

1. Time Chart

Prehistoric Eras

c. 7000–250 BCE	Jômon Period
c. 250 BCE–250 CE	Yayoi Period	Mixture of Northern Asian, Austro-Asian, Austronesian, and Melanesian cultural influences: use of copper, bronze, and iron, as well as planting of edible rice.

57 CE		The Kingdom of Nu (presumably on Kyūshū) sends to the imperial court of the Han Dynasty the first legation from Japan mentioned in the Chinese sources.
238 (respectively 239)		Chinese chronicle Wei Chih mentions the tributary legation of the country of Wa (presumably on Kyūshū), ruled by priestess or shaman Pimiko (Himiko).
Transition Era
250–500	Kofun Period
275–350		Establishment of the realm of Yamato (old Japan), with the ruler (Tenno), who joined in himself world love and religious power.
5^{th} cent.		The country of Yamoto rules other clan states on the Japanese islands.
Early history (500–1185)
500–710	Asuka era
538 (respectively 552)	Adoption of Buddhism
593		Prince Shôtoko Taishi becomes regent; erection of the Shitennoji Temple in Naniwa (Ôsaka).
594	Buddhism becomes the state religion

604		Proclamation of the seventeen-article constitution (Kempô-jûshichi jô)—not a constitution in today's sense, but a collection of norms of comportment.
607	Erection of the Hôryûji Temple at Nara	The oldest surviving Buddhist temple in Japan.
623	Proclamation of the Sôni-ryô	Presents a regulation of the activities of Buddhist monks and nuns.
7th cent.	Introduction of schools	In 625, Hui-kuan (in Jap., Ekan) propagates the Buddhist doctrine of the Sanron-shû (headquarters: Hôryûji Temple in Nara). In 657, priest Dôshô founds the Hossô School (headquarters: Hôryûji, Yakushiji, and Kôfukuji Temples in Nara). In 660, Chitsû and Chitatsu, pupils of Hiuen-tsang, introduce the Kusha School of Buddhism into Japan.In 673, Korean Dôzô presents the Buddhist teaching of Jôjitsu-shû (625). In 674, Chien-Chen (in Jap., Ganjin) introduces the Ritsu-shû (headquarters: Tôshôdaiji in Nara).

701		Promulgation of the Taihô Codices (rit-suryô kyakushiki), Japan's oldest collection of laws.
710–781	Nara era
710		Founding of the first stable capital in Nara.
736–740	Kegon doctrine	Tao-hsüan (in Jap., Dôzen) first brings Mahayana Buddhism's Kegon teaching to Japan. In 740, Korean priest Shen-shiang (in Jap., Shinshô) establishes the Kegon sect (headquarters: Tôdai-ji in Nara).
741	Founding of the official government Kokubunji and Kokubunniji temples throughout the country, with the Tôdaiji Temple at Nara as their administrative center
752		Consecration of the great statue of the Buddha, Daibutsu, in the Tôdaiji Temple in Nara
781–1185	Heian era
784		Transfer of the capital to Nagaoka.

805/06	Introduction of more Buddhist schools	In 805, Saichô introduces the Buddhist Tendai School; beginning of Ryôbu Shintô. In 806, Kûkai introduces the Buddhist Shingon School.
927	Compilation of the Engishiki	Codification of the Shintô rituals and ceremonies
1123	Tendai priest Ryônin founds the national Buddhist sect Yûzûn-embutsu.
1175	Hônen-shônin introduces the Jôdo-shû, the School of the 'Pure Land.'	Headquarters: Chion'in in Kyôto.
Middle Ages (1185–1573)
1185–1333	Kamakura era Foundation of Zen Buddhist schools
1191	Eisai founds the Rinzai School of Zen Buddhism.	Main temples: Kenninji, Nanzenji, Daitokuji, Myôshinji, and Tenryûji, all in Kyôto.
1192	Minamoto Yoritomo is named the first shôgun.	Founding of the Kamakura shôgunate.
1224	Shinran-shônin founds the Jôdo-shinshû, the 'True School of the Pure Land.'	Headquarters: Higashi- and Nishi-Honganji in Kyôto and Tokyo.
1227	Dôgen founds the second of the Zen schools, the Sôtô School.	Headquarters: Eiheiji in Echizen, and Sôjiji in Noto.

1238	The great statue of Amida Buddha is erected in Kamakura.
1253	Nichiren founds the quasi-nationalistic Hokke-shû.	It is also known as Nichiren-shû, and has its headquarters at Kuonji, in Kai.
1255	Kakushin founds the Fuke School of Zen Buddhism.
1257	Ippen-shônin founds the Ji-shû School.	Headquarters: Shôjôkôji in Fujisawa.
1336–1573	Ashigaka (Muromachi) era
1338	Ashigaka Takauji founds the Ashigaka Shôgunate.
1484	Yoshida Kanetomo founds Yoshida Shintô in Yamashiro and Kyôto.
1549	Arrival of Jesuit Francis Xavier	Beginning of the Christianization of Japan.
1571	Oda Nobunaga destroys the Enryakuji Temple.
Pre-Modern Japan (1568–1867)
1568–1600	Azuchi Momoyana (Shokuhô) era
1587	Expulsion of the Jesuits	Toyotomi Hideyoshi issues his prohibition of Christianity, and orders the expulsion of the Jesuits.

1597	Twenty-six Christians are killed in Nagasaki.
1600–1867	Tokugawa (Edo) era
1614	Edict against Christianity	Tokugawa Ieyasu, become Shogun in 1603, publishes his edict against Christianity. The Japanese Christians, including Takayama Ukon, are exiled to the Philippines.
1622–1640	Christianity is repressed after violent religio-political confrontations.	In 1622/23ff., aggravated persecution of Christians, including, in 1622, a prohibition of the erection of new churches. A distinct Japanese Christianity survives until the opening to the West in the nineteenth century.
1635		Founding of the Supervision Office of Temples and Shrines (Jisha bugyô).
1637–1638		Christian uprising of Slhimabara
1638		Introduction of a countrywide system of membership of all households in the local Buddhist temples (Danka seido)
1639		Beginning of the closing of the country (Sakoku).

1640		Naming of the Commissars for Christian Affairs (Kirishitan-bugyô)
1641	Introduction of the Ôbako-shû teaching	Priest Yin-Yuan (in Jap., Ingen) brings the teaching of the Zen Buddhism of the Ôbaku-shû from China (headquarters: Mampukuji in Kyôto).
1665		Ordinances for the temples (Jiin hatto)
19th cent.	Founding of Shintô sects	In 1814, Kurozumi Munetada founds the Shintô sect of Kurozumikyô; In 1838, Nakayama Miki endows the Shintô sect of Tenrikyô; In 1859, Kawate Bunjirô founds the Shintô sect of Konkôkyô.
1859	Opening to the West	Beginning of the renewal of the Catholic and Protestant mission.
1861		Establishment of the Orthodox Church in Japan by Nikolai
1865		Bernard-Thadée Petitean discovers the Christian community at Nagasaki.
Modern Japan (since 1868)
1868–1912	Meiji era: opening to the West and state Shintô

1869	Division of Buddhism from Shintô (Shimbutsu bunri)	Reintroduction of the Shintô Offices (Jingi-kan); a state Shintô appears.
1871		Aggravation of the anti-Buddhist policy and secularization of Buddhist properties; elimination of the system of Danka seido
1873	Sanctions against Christians are lifted	The anti-Christianity decree is annulled. In 1875, Sunday is proclaimed a holiday.
1877		Founding of the office, incorporated into the Ministry of the Interior, of Shintô shrines and Buddhist temples.
1900		Deguchi Nao (Onisaburô) creates the Shintô sect of Ômotokyô.
1900		Introduction of the Shrine Offices (Jinja-kyoku) and Religion Offices (Shûkyô-kyoku), whose area of responsibility in questions of belief has been divided from that of the Ministry of the Interior.
1912–1926	Taishô era
1913		Subjection of the Religion Offices to the Ministry of Education

1925		Kubo Kakutarô endows the Reiyûkai, attached to Nichiren Buddhism.
1926–1989	Showa era
1929		Taniguchi Masaharu founds the Seichô no Ie.
1930		Makiguchi Tsunesaburô introduces the Sôka kyôiku gakkai.
1932		Prohibition of religious education in the schools
1939		The Law on Religious Organizations (Shûkyô dantai hô) comes into effect.
1941	Attack on Pearl Harbor	Japan's entry into the Second World War on the side of the Axis Powers ends with its complete military defeat at the hands of the United States, after the atom bomb attack on Hiroshima and Nagasaki.
1945/46	Religious consequences of military defeat	The Law on Religious Organizations becomes a dead letter. Introduction of the Shintô Directives (Shintô shirei), and the Ordinance over Religious Legal Persons (Shûkyô hôjin) The Emperor surrenders his divinity in a public address. Founding of an umbrella organization of Shintô shrines (Jinja honcho).

1951		The Ordinance over Religious Legal Persons (Shûkyô hôjin hôrei) becomes the Law over Religious Legal Persons (Shûkyô hôjin hô).
1985		First official visit to the Yasukuni Shrine by Prime Minister Nakasone Yasuhirô.
1989ff.	Heisei era
1995 March	Poison-gas attack of Neo-Buddhist Aum Shinri Kyo organization in Tokyo	After the assault in the subway, in which thirteen persons die, the religious group is interdicted, and its spiritual leader Shoko Asahara arrested. The organization forms anew in 2000 under the name 'Aleph.'

2. Japan: Festal Cycle (Nenchû gyôji)

The yearly festivals celebrated in Japan are difficult to assign to a specific religion. The individual religious or originally religious feasts largely consist of ceremonies and rituals whose elements have come out of Shintô and Buddhism alike, and which have merged into one feast over the course of time. Owing to the mixture of Shintô with Buddhism practiced in Japan for centuries, a separation between the two religious aspects is scarcely possible any longer.

a) Natsu-matsuri (Summer festivals)
A common designation for the Shintô, Buddhist, and Daoist influenced festivities, solemnly celebrated for the protection of the harvest on different days throughout Japan. The most important festal ceremonies are performed with the procession of the portable shrines, in Kyôto July 17-24 in the Yasaka Shrine (Gion matsuri), on August 4 in the Kitano Temmangu Shrine, and on September 15 in the Iwashimzu Hachimangu Shrine.

b) O-bon matsuri (Festival of the Dead)
Also called bon matsuri, or bon-e. O-bon originally presented Buddhist ceremonies of the cult of the ancestors or the dead, which ceremonies were mixed with autochthonous rituals in the course of time. The Feast of the Dead, among the most popular observances in Japan, was celebrated from the thirteenth to the fifteenth day of the seventh month (Jap., Fumizuki), and since the Meiji Restoration in 1868 it has been held, depending on local custom, on July 15 or August 15. The ceremonies, normally observed in the locality of one's original home (Furosato), begin with the lighting of the welcoming flame (Mukae-bi) at the door of the house, the placing of sacrificial gifts before the house altar, and the visiting of family graves. Two days later, the O-bon festival ends with the Okuri-bi ceremony (farewell fire for the accompaniment of the souls of the dead), and the Shôrô nagashi usage (placing lanterns on the river, to be carried away).

c) Aki-matsuri (Autumn Festivals)
Collective designation for festivities celebrated in late summer and in autumn, country-wide, in general as a harvest thanksgiving. Among these are:
—Hachinohe sanja taisai (Grand Festival of the Three Shrines) is observed August 1–3, in Hachinohe/Aomori.
—Shubun no-hi (autumnal equinox), on September 23.
—Mega-no-kenka matsuri (meeting of the portable shrines) is held on October 14–15 in Matsubara Hachimangû, in Hyôgo.
—Kannami sai (Festival of the New Rice) is celebrated October 15–17 in the two Ise shrines.
—Kinrô kansha no hi (thanksgiving for work) is held on November 23, and has its origin in the autumnal festival of Niinamesai.

d) Tennô tanjôbi (Birthday of Heisei Tennô) on December 23 is the birthday of the reigning Emperor (since 1990: Akihito).

e) Fuyu no matsuri (Winter festivals)
Shôgatsu (New Year) is the collective designation for a number of festal observances, that stand in connection with the dismissal of the old and the celebration of the new year. The Shôgatsu begins with the Ômisoka festival, on the last day of the old year, and accordingly, is closed with the Chinese lunar calendar only on February 3–4. Among these observances:

—Ganjitsu (New Year's Day), on January 1.
—Hatsumôde (Visit to the temple or shrine) is celebrated January 1–3. Seeking an especially important, nearby temple or shrine at the beginning of the year is currently practiced by over eighty percent of Japanese.
—Setsubun (seasonal change) on February 3–4.

f) Kenkoko kinen no hi (Day of the Founding of the Empire) is celebrated, according to the ancient chronicles (Kojiki and Nihongi) on February 11 (first day of the lunar calendar), the day of the Coronation of Jimmu Tennô (in 660 BCE), the first mythical Emperor of Japan.

g) Haru matsuri (Spring festivals)
—Shunbun no hi (spring equinox), on March 20.
—Midori ni hi (Day of Green), on April 29, is the birthday of the Shôwa Tennô, Hirohito, who died in 1989.
—Kempôkinen no hi (Constitution Day) is celebrated on May 3.
—Kodomo no hi (Childrens' Day)

Johann Nawrocki

III. Korea

1. Time Chart

Era 1: Religion in the ancient Korean principalities (late 4th cent. CE to beginning of 10th cent.)

528	Usual dates given for the introduction of Buddhism from China to Koguryŏ or Paekche; Buddhism privileged in Silla	The empires and principalities of China are the only models of progressive civilization in East Asia. Buddhism is the oldest form of trans-regional piety on the Korean peninsula. The peninsula gains access to the religious world of East and Central Asia.

513	Dispatch of a 'scripture scholar of the Five Classic Scriptures' from Paekche to Japan	The script of pre-imperial China, regarded as Confucian, is also known on the peninsula, and is transmitted to Japan.
530/1	Founding of the Vinaya (in Sino-Korean, Keryul, Yul) School in Paekche	The 'School of Monastic Discipline' is the first attested Buddhist 'school' or 'sect' on the Korean peninsula. By the end of the era, five schools appear based on writing (Ogyo, 'Five Teachings') and several meditation sects (Kusan, 'Nine Mountains,' so-called after the nine famous mountain monasteries). No Hīnayāna schools or tantric sects are among them. In addition, there are popular cults addressed to individual boddhisattvas such as Maitreya (Mirŭk) or Amitabha (Amit'a).
538 or 552	Gift of a statue of the Buddha, and other articles, to the Tennō in Japan by the King of Paekche	This gift is regarded as the trigger of the long expansion of Buddhism in Japan. By the first half of the seventh century, at least five priests from Koguryô in Japan begin activity, among them Hyeja as tutor of Crown Prince Shōtoku taishi (574–622).
682	Founding of a 'country' [nationwide] school (Kukhak) in Silla	The founding marks the beginning of formal education in Chinese orthography in Korea. In addition, many youth from Silla receive similar education in China, where Buddhist priests of Korean origin also polish their skills and knowledge.

717	Indications of Confucian culture in the 'country school'
Era 2: Powerful development of Buddhism (Koryŏ Age, 918–1392)
943	Founder of the dynasty recommends Buddhism as the basis of a good government.	In this era countless monasteries are built at government expense, and generously endowed with slaves and tax-exempt domains. Great portions of the general population escape the duty of contributions and service by entering monasteries, which also receive a stream of members from aristocratic circles, however. The Buddhist clergy engage in politics, at times even by military means. Along with the Five Teachings, which exist thanks to writing, there appear two schools that bring writing and the practice of meditation together: Ch'ŏnt'ae (in Chin., Tiantai) and Chogye (in Chin., Caoqi). By the end of the era, these have split into ten sects.

958; 992/3	Attempt to introduce an examination system on the Chinese model; founding of a first Confucian school of higher education	In order to counter the dominance of the aristocracy, an attempt is made to determine the selection of office-holders by competency, rather than by family provenance, and to pro-mote familiarity with the doctrines of ancient China as the norm of official competency. These undertakings attain no lasting success, although Ch'oe Ch'ung (984–1068), the 'Confucius of Korea,' lives in this period.
1st half of 11th cent. as well as 1237–1251	Printing of two Buddhist canons	Only the—more than 80,000—printing plates of the second attempt have remained, and they represent the greatest single undertaking in favor of the spread and maintenance of Buddhism that Korea has had. The larger part of the Japanese Taishō Canon rests on this printing.
13th/14th cent.	Erection of a Confucian temple; works of Paek Ijŏng	The erection of the temple, in the year 1307, means a continuing, and even growing interest in the teachings of old China in the area of social politics. So does the work of Paek Ijŏng (13th–14th cent.), the first Korean interpreter of the Neo-Confucianism, which received its normative contour from Zhu Xi (1130–1200). However, these have no lasting consequences for society and politics.

Era 3: Monopolistic claim of Neo-Confucianism (end of 14th to late 18th centuries) from 1390	Beginning of the revision of the entire cultic system: Fixing of rituals of the court, and government offices, according to Neo-Confucian foundations, proscription of Buddhist and Shamanistic cults or their transformation	The measures apply first and foremost to the domestic ancestor-rituals of the elite of Chosŏn times (1392–1910); and, in the first 100 years, are adopted even by this narrow circle only with hesitancy.
1402, 1405, 1406, 1423, 1424	Reduction in the number or Buddhist monasteries and their monks or nuns, as well as diminution of the extent of monastic lands	The measures are directed not primarily against Buddhist piety, but against the devastating power exercised by Buddhist monasteries over the economics and politics of Court and government. In 1424, the scholarly and meditation sects are forcibly joined, and the total number of monasteries falls to thirty-six. The measure reduces the scholarly Buddhism to the unimportance of its condition today.
1412	Adoption of Tan'gun and Kija in the cultic order	The Korean endowers of culture receive a place corresponding to that of the Emperor of China as 'Son of the Skies' (or 'of Heaven').

from 2nd half of 16th cent.	Increasing number of manuals for domestic and, later, communal rituals	Most of the handbooks are annotated or complemented versions, at times also translated into Korean, of the Jiali (home and family rites) of Zhu Xi (1130–1200), or of a text redacted by him for local rituals. The ritual of mourning, or of the ancestors, of the Neo-Confucian form reach out beyond the elite, to be performed in wider circles of society. Thus it becomes the bulwark of family ritual practice and kinship organization, and constitutes Confucianism in Korea even more authentically than does political organization.
Era 4: Christianity and other Neo-Korean piety (from late 18th century onward)
1784–1800	Baptism of a member of a Korean legation to the Imperial court of Beijing; increase in the number of Christians to some 10,000	The baptism introduces a more or less continuous history of the expansion of Christianity in Korea. From 1794 onward, Christianity quickly gains in impetus through the works of a Chinese missionary priest.
1801–1866	Proscription of Christianity	Despite repeated violent persecutions, the Christian mission continues to be maintained secretly by Franciscan priests.

1861–1864	Proclamation of the 'Way of the Skies' (or 'of Heaven') (ch'ŏndo), by Ch'oe Cheu (1824–1864), founder of the 'Eastern Teaching' (Tonghak)	The 'Eastern Teaching' understands itself as a religious response both to a deplorable state of social affairs and to Christianity, which latter is seen as foundation of the supremacy of foreign power and their penetration of Korea.
1905	Founding of the 'School of the Way of the Skies' (Ch'ŏndogyo) as a religious community in the tradition of the Tonghak Movement	Ch'ŏndogyo is the first of Korea's 'new religions,' of which there have been some four hundred. Today these have become marginal, however, or have entirely disappeared.
1916	Founding of the 'School of the Buddha Circle' (Wŏnbulgyo) by Sot'aesan Pak Chungbin	For this religious community, the circle is the sensory image of perfected Buddhahood. Next to the Unification Church (see below), the School of the Buddha Circle is the largest among the still existing syncretist communities, in the tradition of the New Religions.
May 1, 1954	Founding of the → Unification Church by Sun Myung Moon (Mun Sŏnmyŏng)	Its complete original name may be translated as "Society of the Divine Spirit for the Unification of World Christianity." Its name may be currently translated "Family Association for World Unity and Peace." It is the only one among Korea's 'new religions' that has found extension outside of the country, notably in highly industrialized societies.

July 8, 1995	Beginning of a Cult for Kim Ilsung (Kim Ilsŏng)	On the first anniversary of his death, Kim Ilsŏng's former dwelling and shop, a building from the 1970s, is dedicated—under the name Kinyŏm kungjŏng ('Memorial Palace')—as a mausoleum and memorial. At the same time, it is a place of a formal worship, initiated and performed under the auspices of the state. In character and appearance, it corresponds to the memorial palaces of Lenin, Ho Chih-min, and Mao-Tsedong.

Dieter Eikemeier

Christianity

Geographical Breadth and Organization

1. Together with → Judaism and → Islam, Christianity belongs to the scriptural religions (→ Monotheism), whose common origin is in the Near East. With a membership of almost one-third of the world population, it is the most widespread of individual religions. Its greatest dynamism within contemporary culture is in South, Central, and North America. There are Christian majorities in many lands of sub-Saharan Africa, on the western rim of the Pacific between Australia and the Philippines, and, in a shrinking active membership, in broad regions of Europe. On the Asian continent, including the region of its rise, Christianity finds itself constituted by small minorities at most.

In its expansion, Christianity was the forerunner of today's awareness of a worldwide network of humanity ('globalization'). Here it did not primarily follow the expansion of modernity; the historical connection is rather

Egyptian Christians of a Coptic Orthodox community have gathered in Cologne for the celebration of the Divine Liturgy. In a community hall placed at their disposal by an Evangelical community, a picture-screen (iconostasis, here mobile), which belongs to the liturgical accoutrements of most → Orthodox churches, assures a correct liturgical framework even in the → diaspora. Orthodox churches typically have no pews: here the core organizational element of the Christianity of all confessions and denominations symbolically gathers at the icon screen, as a group of faithful and their priest create a community by way of the cultic act. (Hubert Mohr) the other way around, and Christianity was mainly a European religion during only a small part of its history.

Structure

2. Christianity arose as a movement of renewal within Judaism. But it divided from the latter in disseminating its teaching apart from the Jewish people (→ Mission) and without continuing to observe the Jewish order of life and worship (halakha). Its early departure from a strict regime of life and living makes Christianity fundamentally flexible when it comes to its adoption by new cultures, and thereby its integration, more or less, into other ways of living – something only → Buddhism also out of the other major religions can manage. This factor is one of the two most important premises of the division of Christianity into various, mutually bounded, subgroups. The other is its framework as an organized → church, under the leadership of a hierarchy of priests, bishops, and a number of 'patriarchs' (highest office of leadership). This framework is partially determined by geographical division and the membership of various peoples, and partially by a diversity of doctrine. These two aspects are not clearly distinguishable, since the passage of Christianity into particular cultures and languages has repeatedly entailed apparent or actual differences in teaching.

In the lands of the Eastern Mediterranean and in the church regions to which those lands dispatched missionaries, popular membership has become the most important criterion of the organizational division of the churches, although here as well powerful dogmatic confrontations have occurred. The latter have occasioned the rise of a multiplicity of independent national churches, which designate themselves as → Orthodox Churches. The greatest expansion of an interconnected ecclesiastical organization across different cultures in the first millennium was that of Persian Christianity ('Apostolic Eastern Church'), with its mission to India, Central Asia, and China.

In Western Europe, Christianity was so closely bound up with Latin culture that an organizationally unified church could arise there too, embracing many peoples, and unified under the → papacy (the office of leadership of the Patriarch of Rome). This church calls itself the Catholic ('all-embracing') Church (→ Catholicism). Catholicism split into organizationally divided churches, along heavily marked lines of dogma or confession, beginning with the → Reformation and the rise of → Protestantism. On these grounds, starting in Europe, Western church membership has expressed itself in the concept of confession, in the sense of a profession of faith.

Despite its division into various church communities, Christianity maintains a consciousness of oneness in a world Church, (→ Ecumenical Movement). This was made concrete in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, as Western European Christianity made contact with Central and Eastern Asian Christianity. However, as Christianity in the Near East was pushed more and more to the margins of society, and came to be practically extinguished in Central and Eastern Asia in the fifteenth century, the impression arose in Europe that Christianity had been reduced to a European religion. An effort to afford relief and to produce a world Church once more was one of the decisive motives of European colonialism in its inception. From this time onwards, the effort to adapt Christianity to foreign cultures, more than its spread within European cultures, frequently became an underlying priority, and the European contradictions among the particular confessions were exported to other continents. In the churches thus founded, confessional boundaries are often felt today as an element of foreign, European culture. As a reaction, especially in Africa, independent churches are springing up that define themselves once more in terms of popular cultures, rather than under the concept of 'confessions.'

Doctrine

3. a) For its teaching, Christianity appeals to → Jesus, who appeared around the year 30 in Galilee as a Jewish preacher and miraculous healer, and after a short period of activity, on the occasion of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem for the festival of the Jewish Passover, was arrested, and executed by crucifixion at the hands of the Roman imperial power. His death was interpreted in terms of a contemporary Jewish model according to which the death of a just person can benefit others and cancel their sins. In

Resurrection

Christian conviction, Jesus rose from the dead, just as, at the end of the present world, all women and men will rise. As a point of departure from the Jewish concept of the Messiah (Gk., Christós, 'anointed one'), Jesus is interpreted as a figure who will play a decisive role at the final judgment upon all human beings. This is bound up with the conceptualization, originally produced in the confrontation with the Roman cult of the Emperor, that the risen Jesus is also presently at work in the world, and that therefore the one destroyed in terms of human measures is finally mightier than the political power that executed him and that persecuted his followers.

Doctrine of the Trinity

Between Christianity and Islam, the most important point of contention is whether Christian notions about Jesus are still reconcilable with monotheism. On the basis of the New Testament (→ Bible), Christianity teaches that Christ has proceeded from God, and that thus all of the power and glory ascribed to him, far from supplementing that of God, actually comes from it. With the means of expression adopted from Greek philosophy, there arose from these beginnings the teaching of the one God in three Persons (doctrine of the Trinity, 'triple-ness'), and of the one person of Jesus having both a divine and a human 'nature.'

From the awareness of being bound to a power that has been suppressed, and yet has been victorious, Christianity draws considerable social and political power of expression. This develops in two directions: movements have repeatedly arisen indicting injustice and demanding the liberation of the oppressed (→ Liberation Theology). On the other hand, Christianity itself has often aligned with political power to the point that political rulers have been stylized as participants in the presently active might of Jesus Christ himself.

Religion as Lived—Worship

b) In its aspect as a life experience, the religion of Christianity takes shape in Sunday celebrations, in festivals of annual and life cycles, and in the conduct of daily living.

→ Sunday is celebrated weekly as the day of Jesus' resurrection from the dead. Christian communities gather in the churches for divine service. A priest or minister leads the service. (In the Catholic and the Orthodox Churches, these leaders may only be men, while in many Protestant Churches they may be women.) Elements of divine services are songs, prayers, readings from the Bible, → sermons, and the → Lord's Supper. In addition, traditional elements of the Sunday observance by Christians are the wearing of festal garments (frequently with a special emphasis in white or black as symbols of life, death, and resurrection), a festive meal, repose from work, and time spent together as a family.

Christian Feasts

The course of the → calendar year is determined in its content by feasts or festivals, which recall the events surrounding the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. But traditions and usages of the principal feasts are also supplemented by celebrations of the change of seasons: Christmas as the feast of winter and Easter as the feast of spring. A four weeks' preparation in December (Advent) leads to Christmas as the feast of the birth of Jesus, followed by the festival of the New Year and of Epiphany (Gr., 'apparition'), which in the West has been associated with the visit of the 'Three Holy Kings' to the infant Jesus. A seven weeks' time of fasting prepares for several successive feast days in March or April: Holy Thursday (commemoration of the institution of the Last Supper or Eucharist), Good Friday (commemoration of the death of Jesus), and Easter (celebration of Jesus's resurrection). Forty days after Easter, on a Thursday, the Ascension of the risen Jesus into heaven is celebrated, and ten days after that, on a Sunday, Pentecost (Gr., 'fiftieth'), the feast of the Holy Spirit. Other feasts of the course of the year are dependent on region and confession. For example, in the Catholic and Orthodox Churches, events from the life of → Mary, the mother of Jesus, and Feasts of the Saints (→ Veneration of the Saints), play an important role.

In the life cycle, → Baptism has developed into a first festival, to be celebrated shortly after birth. Originally, and simultaneously, it symbolizes reception into the Christian community of faith and is also performed when persons enter Christianity later on in life (→ Conversion). In cases of infant baptism, conscious acceptance of the Christian faith is later symbolized through Confirmation (sometimes connected with a first sharing in the Lord's Supper), which at the same time fulfills the function of a rite of passage to the age of 'youth.' Marriage or matrimony is celebrated in Christianity with a divine service or church wedding, at which the spouses promise each other lifelong fidelity. Accordingly, the official Christian churches do not recognize divorce; if divorce nevertheless takes place, there is no corresponding religious rite. Dying is accompanied, before death where possible, by ritual and humane attentions. Burial in a cemetery, presided over by a priest, is generally preceded by a divine service. In many churches, the memory of the dead is also observed at precise intervals after their death.

By way of its ethics, Christianity permeates daily life. The Christian image of the human being is that of someone incapable on his or her own of being able entirely to meet the demands of right living. Only in the events of salvation (→ Salvation) of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ is a person delivered from an exclusive self-centeredness. Confession—to which Christian denominations attach varying degrees of importance—helps, by offering the possibility of forgiveness of sins, to overcome the tension between the ideal and the real in one's life.

4. The most recent development of Christianity is frequently described as the de-Christianization of societies hitherto marked by Christianity. This applies principally to Europe only, however; in North America, the corresponding phenomenon is somewhat different. Against a global horizon, this means that Christianity's center of gravity is quickly shifting to the cultures of the 'Third World'—that it is becoming more powerfully the religion of the oppressed once more. In a context of European development, it is disputed whether it is a matter of a religious collapse of Christianity, or rather of a process generated by Christianity and therefore still to be viewed as itself a form and type of Christianity (→ Secularization). Ever since the Reformation, Protestant Christianity has withdrawn much of its attention from the liturgical form, in the strict sense, of religion and turned to areas of everyday life and work. It is possible to interpret secularization as a prolongation of this movement, through which liturgical religion is losing its power to shape daily life. In several European countries, to be sure, the majority of the population still belongs to Christianity and participates in the traditional rites of the life cycle, but only a small minority attends Sunday divine services.

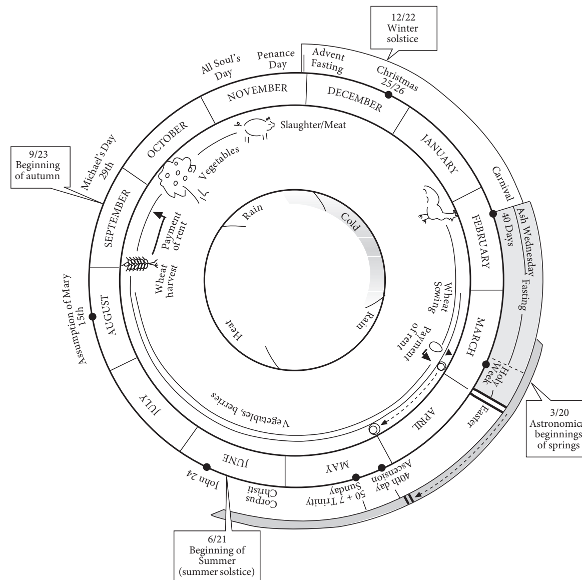
The meaning of Sunday is shifting—in common with the rest of everyday life and work—to becoming a day that is free of work, frequently prolonged into a 'weekend,' and framed as 'free time' for recreation and sports. It may be more decisive for the development of Christianity that European societies have not become irreligious through the partial retreat of official ecclesial Christianity from the area of the religious, but that the religious dimension of life is increasingly assuming form, alongside the churches, in the → New Age movement and in forms of spirituality borrowed from other religions, without thereby renouncing all elements of Western Christianity.



Literature

Ahlstrom, Sydney E., A Religious History of the American People, New Haven/London 1972; Chidester, David, Christianity: A Global History, San Francisco 2000; Fahlbusch, Erwin et al. (eds.), The Encyclopedia of Christianity, Grand Rapids/Leiden 1999ff.; Hastings, Adrian (ed.), A World History of Christianity, London 1999; Jedin, Hubert, Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte, 7 vols., Freiburg 1962–1979; McLeod, Hugh, Religion and the People of Western Europe 1789–1970, Oxford 1991; Woodhead, Linda, Introduction to Christianity, Cambridge 2002.

→ Africa II, Augustine, Catholicism, Central America, Christmas, Cross/Crucifixion, Europe I and II, Francis of Assisi, Gnosticism, Jerusalem, Jesuits, Luther, North America, Pilgrimage, Priest/Priestess, Protestantism, Rome, Salvation Army, Santiago de Compostela, Sin, South America

Andreas Feldtkeller

Christianity: Festal Circle

The Christian year marks the European year even after the collapse of the lifestyle oriented to agriculture, and a reorientation to an industrial society not bound by seasons. In the Western Christianity of Middle and Northern Europe, the great interruption of the farming year is rather in winter, around Christmas on December 25—unlike the summer interruption around Mary's Assumption, on August 15, in Mediterranean Southern Europe. Christmas is indissolubly bound to the solar year, on December 25. But Easter varies with the moon, as the first Sunday after the first full moon after the vernal equinox, and thus varies over a spectrum of thirty-three days. The basic structure is based on the Jewish → calendar: seven-day weeks, the feast day beginning on the eve (vigil), and so forth, however precisely differing by a nuance. Typical structural elements are the 'octave' (from Lat., dies octavus, 'eighth day,' denoting a time span of eight days and thus the Sunday after the respective feast), and 'Quatember,' either the forty days' preparation for a feast by fasting, or forty post-festal days. In addition, there is the mythical structure, key for salvation history, of the life of Jesus, of that of John the Baptist, and (especially since the seventeenth-century Catholic Reform or 'Counter-Reformation') of that of Mary: John is born a half-year before Jesus, Jesus is conceived by the word of God (Mary's Annunciation, on March 25), nine months before his birth at Christmas. Mary 'falls asleep' (and is assumed into heaven) on the fifteenth of August in the Mediterranean region, whether Orthodox or Catholic ('Assumption of Mary'). Her birthday is December 8, or 9 in the East. The church calendar was fixed differently, and quite early, between Eastern and Western Christianity, and it is not often that their Easters coincide. Easter, as the key feast of the Resurrection of the executed Jesus and his transformation into the Christ of the Church, stamps the movable Easter cycle: the church year is structured in respect of that feast: forty days before, meat has been bid farewell (Carnival and Ash Wednesday), determining a frugal diet of vegetables in winter. In Lent, expenses can be spared with 'Easter' rabbits and eggs. Otherwise, Easter occurred at Saint Michael's or Saint Martin's, and thus after harvest. Forty days later comes the Feast of the Ascension. The octave day before Easter, Palm Sunday, introduces Holy Week, and the octave after is the celebration of First Communion for children (Catholic 'White Sunday'). Fifty days later, Pentecost (from the Greek pentecoste, fiftieth; here, seven times the sacred number of days in the week, plus one) is the other great day in the Jewish calendar itself, whose Christian octave day is Trinity Sunday. The Christian festival cycle was originally matched with liturgical colors as early as the Middle Ages, especially for the color of ritual vestments:

- Green was the normal color for all days of the year for which another color was not specified.
- Red is for the great Sundays—Palm Sunday, Pentecost—and the feasts of Apostles. It is also the liturgical color of a martyr's day.
- Violet, as a color of penitence, indicates fasting (and today is the emblematic color of Protestantism).
- White, as the color of joy, is for Easter and Christmas.
- Black, the color of mourning, is limited to Good Friday, the memorial of the Death of Jesus.

The inner structural logic, the biographical element, and the investiture of the festal terms of the competing religions, create ever-new occasions for religious festivals. However, the economic disturbance caused by the festal plethora calls for rational limitation, sometimes including a political decision for their abolition. Feast and work, religion and economics, refer to each other, each of the two in its respective world. Only those who afford it can even have their names spoken out on the festival. Civil holidays, today, attempt to place new accents, to some extent in the framework of a → civil religion, as, for example, with the commemoration of the Shoah on the anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz extermination camp on January 27 (1945) in Germany. This kind of anniversary is also exemplified in American Independence Day, on July 4 (1776), in Christian areas the days that we have mentioned commemorating Jesus's life and passion. They transform to annual repetition that which historically was unique.

Christianity: Time Chart

Era 1: Cultural transgressions of a proscribed religion (1st–3rd centuries)

around 30 CE	Jesus begins his public life	After a short period of activity, the Jewish preacher and healer is executed. After his death, a belief appears in his resurrection from the dead.
around 30–70	'Apostles'	The first generation of Jesus's disciples is in confrontation over whether Jesus's message is to be only intra-Judaic or to be spread to other peoples as well. Paul's epistolary literature appears (later a part of the New Testament).
1st cent. CE	Mission extension in the Mediterranean Area	Christian communities appear in Palestine, western Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, and Rome, probably also in Egypt (Alexandria) and in eastern Syria (Edessa).
around 70–100	Separation from Judaism	Gospels (reports of Jesus's activity), a history of the apostles, and the Johannine apocalypse, the first important Christian literature, reflect the separation of Christian communities from Judaism and the conflict with the Roman Empire. In the Roman Empire, membership in Christianity becomes punishable by law.

around 110–180	Confrontation with Greek philosophy and Gnosis	Educated Christian authors ('apologetes') defend Christianity vis-à-vis Greek philosophy. The Church in the Roman Empire is organized under exclusion of teachings that promote a rejection of the world (gnosis; → Gnosticism). Confessional formulae, the leadership office of bishops, and the collection of New Testament literature give Christianity an identifiable structure.
2nd cent. CE	Christianity in Mesopotamia	The existence of the first Christian communities and groups is demonstrable in the region of the Persian Empire, in this case without exclusion of gnostic teachings.
around 225	Ecclesiastical organization in the Persian Empire	With the Parthian seizure of power, there are twenty dioceses, whose extension beyond Mesopotamia includes the central Persian territory and parts of the Arabian peninsula.
around 300	First mission in India	The Christian mission extends from the Persian Empire to northern India. According to legend, on the other hand, there were Christian communities in southern India as early as the first century.

Era 2: Changes in the field of interest of state power (4th and 5th cent.)
298/303	State religion in Armenia	The conversion of ruler Tiridates and the upper class leads to the first Christianization of a country 'from the top.' However, this occurs in the area of influence of the Roman Empire, where Christianity is still regarded as anti-state.
303–311	Bloodiest Persecution in the history of the Roman Empire	After earlier episodes of a systematic persecution of the Christians (e.g. 250 CE), the attempt under Emperor Diocletian to annihilate Christianity definitively, and to impose a unitary imperial religion, fails.
312–324	'Constantinian Turn'	After the conversion of the Roman ruler, Christianity acquires equal status with other religions. In 325, the first council of bishops from the entire extent of Christianity gathers at Nicaea. It formulates a compulsory confession of belief (doctrine of the Trinity).
340	State religion in Ethiopia	For the first time, the Christianization of a country out of diplomatic interests occurs, here in an alliance with the Roman Empire against the Persian Empire. Subsequently there are similar cases.

360	Christianity in Central Asia	Merw, on the northeastern rim of the Persian Empire, becomes the center of an extension of Christianity along the Silk Route, in the direction of China.
380	State religion in the Roman Empire	After the state order has been plural with respect to religions for a generation, the Emperor Theodosius makes the Christian faith legally binding. The Council of Constantinople establishes four principal offices in the Imperial Church: the 'Patriarchates' of Antioch, Alexandria, Rome, and Constantinople.
410	Church organization in the Persian Empire First mission in India	After a generation of persecutions, constant and fierce, Church and state in the Persian Empire strike an arrangement. India is declared a metropolitan seat of the Persian Church. Independence vis-à-vis the Byzantine (Eastern Roman) Church is certified.
412–426/27	Augustine: De Civitate Dei (Lat., "The City of God")	Rome is plundered by the Visigoths. A reproach is raised that this defeat is a punishment for the abandonment of the ancient Roman imperial religion. Now the most influential teacher of the Western Church steps forward against a religious exaltation of the political area. This event has a history of worldwide effect for the relationship between Church and state in the West to the very present.

Era 3: Reinforced regional differentiation and expansion (5th–10th cent.)
around 430	Christianity in Ireland	In Ireland, a particular form of West European Christianity arises, not tied to state power, and is primarily spread by itinerant monks.
5th cent.	Mission activity in Yemen	The Egyptian and the Persian Church vie for influence on the Arabian peninsula.
451	Council of Chalcedon	'Oriental' (i.e., Eastern) churches break off from the Byzantine and the Western church in matters of doctrine concerning the person of Jesus Christ.
498/99	Baptism of Frankish King Clovis	After the collapse of the Western Roman Empire (476), France becomes a new state entity in Western Europe, signed by Roman Christianity.
596	Beginning of the Christian mission in England	Gregory the Great, as first Roman pope, initiates missionary activity to proceed according to a plan.

		Here the vulnerability of Christian communities to persecution appears anew, unless they stand under the protection of a ruler.
635	Christianity in China	The missionary activity of the Persian Church reaches the Chinese capital Hsianfu. The year 638 sees the imperial Chinese authorization for the free expansion of Christianity.
from 635	Islamic conquests in Christianity's countries of origin	Within a few decades, Muslim Arabs overcome a large part of the Christian Mediterranean world, from Syria to Spain. Even the motherland of the Persian Church comes under Islamic rule. In the nuclear countries of the Islamic world religion, Christians at first retain their status, constituting, as they do, the majority of the population.
717–720	Juridical limitations on Christianity in the Islamic Empire	Caliph Omar II offers financial considerations for the conversion of Christianity to Islam, and limits the public activity of Christianity and other groups through a missionary prohibition.
776	Charlemagne compels subjected Saxons to accept baptism	For the first time in the history of Christianity, the principle that conversion may not be compelled is formulated. In 796, a regional bishops' conference once more proscribes compulsory baptism.

845	End of the mission in China	An imperial edict commands missionary monks and nuns to withdraw to a secular life. Thereupon their communities collapse.
around 866	Christianization of the Bulgarians, Serbs, and Croatians	The Byzantine Emperor's role of godfather for the baptism of Bulgarian Khan Boris becomes the model for the appearance in the mission to the Slavs of 'imperial families' of vassal princes bound by baptismal patronage.
988	'Baptism of Russia'	Prince Vladimir unifies the kingdom of Kiev under the Byzantine form of Christianity, and receives the royal crown from Byzantium.
Era 4: In quest of a worldwide church community (c. 1000–1500)
from 1021	Treaty negotiations between the Byzantine Empire and the Islamic Fatimid Empire	E.g., the rebuilding of the demolished Church of the Tomb (at the place of Jesus's resurrection) is settled in Jerusalem. Here, for the first time, the Byzantine Empire can be involved in the protection of Christian interests in the Islamic world (and vice versa).

11th cent.	Persian mission in the Mongolian Empire	The Keraite Turks, in the area of the Baikal Sea, convert, with their prince, to Christianity, and begin to spread Christianity among the Mongols in the vicinity of the capital Karakorum. This is presumably the origin of the legend of the priestly King John in the Far East, which stirred such yearnings in the Christian West, for centuries, for the unity of worldwide Christianity.
1054	Separation of the Roman and Byzantine Churches	The Pope of Rome and the Patriarch of Constantinople excommunicate each other. The longing for church unity will not sleep, but the separation remains in force until 1965.
1095	Beginning of the Crusades	Two centuries of military intervention in the Middle East on the part of the West are unleashed by the Seljuk capture of Jerusalem. On this account, the Fatimid-Byzantine treaties (see 1021) are no longer effective for the protection of Christians in Jerusalem. In 1098, the Fatimids recapture Jerusalem from the Seljuks. This does not, however, prevent the Crusaders from occupying the city in 1099, in a bloody massacre.

11th and 12th cent.	Christianization of the Scandinavian countries	After initial transitory successes on the part of Bishop Anskar of Hamburg/Bremen (ninth century), missionaries from England manage a lasting Christianization of ruling houses and population in Scandinavia.
from 12th cent.	Efforts at union on the part of the Western Church	The successful union with the Maronite Church in Lebanon (1181) ushers in an age of efforts for church unity with various eastern churches. However, this occurs only as partial unions (separations from the respective eastern mother churches).
beginning of 13th cent.	Founding of the mendicant orders	Franciscans and Dominicans become important vehicles of a spread of Christianity by peaceful means.
1229	Division of Jerusalem by peace treaty	A lasting effect of the Crusades is that Christians and Muslims approach each other not only as military adversaries, but also as partners in pact. This finally makes it possible for Christians to make new attempts at spreading their belief independently of political power.
around 1250	Mongolian expansion westward	Europe's Christendom wavers between fear and hope of a convention with the Mongolian Empire against the Islamic world. Christian soldiers and diplomats are involved in the Mongolian world-conquest. In this period, two Franciscan monks visit the Mongolian capital of Karakorum.

end of 13th cent.	The Persian Church at its zenith	The Church numbers twenty metropolises, and extends across Persia, India, Central Asia, Mongolia, and Manchuria.
from 1294	Franciscan mission in China	At the invitation of the Mongolian Great Khan, Franciscan monks begin to build Christian communities. Subsequently, an ecclesial unification is struck with the Christianity emerging from the Persian mission.
1368	Extirpation of Chinese Christianity	After the uprising of the Ming Dynasty against Mongolian rule, the new rulers turn against religions of non-Chinese origin.
1370–1405	Islamization of the Mongolian Empire under Timur Lenk	The Persian Church, spread across Asia, is destroyed. The land route to India and China is cut off from the West, and contact is lost with surviving Indian Christianity. This loss is a heavy blow to hopes on the part of the Western Church for a world Church by way of unions with the Persian church.

1415–1498	Efforts toward a sea route between Europe and India	Portuguese sailors ply the African coast; Vasco da Gama reaches India. A number of papal proclamations assign Portugal the right to found military bases and the duty to spread Christianity. Along with economic motives, the Pope is interested especially in the reestablishment of the connection with the Indian Church.
1431–1449	Reform Council of Basle	The Council is concerned with the reform of the Church, the limitation of the power of the Pope, and union with the Byzantine Church.
1453	Capture of Constantinople by the Ottoman Empire	Demise of the Byzantine Empire. The one-time Byzantine Imperial Church, now the Greek Orthodox Church, is now a religious minority in the Islamic region of rule. Subsequently, its juridical position (like that of other churches and Judaism) is defined in the 'Millet System.'

Era 5: In the tension between (colonial) state compulsion and religious freedom (c. 1500–1900)

1493	‘Division of the world’ between Portugal and Spain	After the discovery of America, a papal pronouncement consigns to Spain westward of a line through the Atlantic, similar rights and duties for transoceanic regions, such as are already in force for Portugal. Factually, this is read as a division of the world, with the right to unrestricted conquest and occupation.
from 1501	Spanish state church in America	A papal decree assigns to the Spanish Church the organization of the Church in America. In 1524, Franciscan missionaries are first placed in the service of the Spanish Viceroy, for the purpose of Christianizing the population of Mexico after the destruction of the Aztec Empire and its religion.
1515–1564	Bartolomé de Las Casas battles for the rights of the Indo-American population	In 1539, the Dominican monk publishes his Brief Account of the Devastation of the Lands of the West Indies. He brings about the termination of the enslavement of the Indo-American population—whose verso, however, is that Africans begin to be enslaved and carried off to America.

from 1517	Reformation in Central and Northern Europe	The Reformation movement refuses to accept obedience to the Roman church administration in questions of doctrine, appealing to freedom of conscience. Effective protection against the persecution mounted by Emperor and Pope is afforded by he fact that a list of regional states and cities introduce it as the official church of its region of control. In 1536–1539, Denmark and Sweden join the Reformation.
1532	English national Church independent of Rome	The Church in England is withdrawn from the influence of the Roman Catholic hierarchy, and submitted to the supremacy of the English Crown ('Anglicanism').
from 1534	Portuguese church organization in India	Goa becomes the center of the Catholic hierarchy for India, and the seat of the missionary orders.
1540	Founding of the Society of Jesus	The → Jesuits promptly become one of the leading Catholic missionary orders.
1549	Beginning of the Christian mission in Japan	Jesuit missionaries encounter various situations in the small principalities of Japan. Many local rulers join Christianity, and at times even persecute other religions in favor of Christianity.

1555	Peace of Augsburg: Cuius regio, eius religio	The principle is established for the German Empire that the respective lord of the land may freely choose the confession, and the population must follow him. The de facto application of this principle is found in other areas of Europe.
1572	'Saint Bartholomew's Night'	A massacre of 30,000 Protestant Christians ('Huguenots') in Catholic France leads to the politicization of the Protestant population, and to a number of religiously motivated civil wars. Alternating phases of tolerance and conflict end in 1685 with the prohibition of French Protestantism.
1597	Christian persecution in Japan	Accused of political intrigue, twenty-six Christians are executed. Japanese Christianity sees its strongest growth in the following years, attaining the number of some 300,000 believers.
1599	Synod of Udayam-perur	The old Indian church, product of the Persian mission, is forced into communion with the Roman Catholic colonial church (partially canceled by a revolt in 1653).

from 1601	Jesuit presence in China	Matteo Ricci works as a scholar at the Imperial Court, and receives permission to construct a church. His True Meaning of the Lord of Heaven (1604) seeks to demonstrate the agreement of Confucianism and Christianity.
1606–1656	Roberto de Nobili works among the Tamils	The Jesuit missionary practices a Christianity adapted to the Indian rites and the caste system, and himself observes strict Brahmin prescripts of purity.
1609	'Jesuit state' in Paraguay	Jesuits receive permission to construct with the Indians a Christian commonwealth that is tantamount to a state. It is out of the reach of white colonists, and in its flowering includes 200,000 persons. In 1767, this community is dissolved by violence, accused of having sought to have independence from Spain.
1606/20	'Pilgrim Fathers'	Representatives of a deviant direction of Protestantism ('Puritans') withdraw from the Anglican state church's pressure to conformity, by immigrating first to the Netherlands, then to 'New England' on the North American coast. Subsequently many very different groups settle in New England, in search of the free practice of their religion. This leads to the central position and value of religious freedom in the American Declaration of Independence in 1776.

1614	Expulsion of Christianity from Japan	Most Jesuit missioners leave the country. The few who remain begin to build an underground church, one exposed to murderous persecutions. What was left of the underground church still exists, with the readmission of Christianity in the nineteenth century.
1618–1648	Thirty Years' War in Europe	The war begins as a confrontation between Catholic and Protestant territorial states. It leads to the depopulation and misery of broad regions, especially in Central Europe.
1657	Ordination of the first native Catholic bishop in India	This is the seed of the structure, extensively operative until today, of a church hierarchy coming preponderantly from the Brahmin class, while the great majority of Christians belong to the lower castes, or are casteless.

1645–1704	Rites controversy vis-à-vis Chinese Christianity	A discussion begins, initiated by competing missionary orders, over the possibility of reconciling Chinese ancestor-veneration with Christianity. It ends with a papal condemnation of the liberal Jesuit practice. In the contrary direction, the Emperor of China admits only missioners who oppose the Pope in this question. This leads to the demise of the Catholic Church in China, which had crested, around 1700, with 300,000 members.
from 1680	Anti-slavery movement in England	Christians of different confessions side with the abolition of slavery in the English regions of North America. Only in 1807, that is, after the independence of the United States, do they secure a prohibition of slavery in the British Empire.
from 1687	Catholic underground Church in Dutch Sri Lanka	Missionary monks from India evade the proscription of the Catholic Church, decreed by Dutch colonial authorities. By accommodation of the phenomenon of itinerant monks to the minds of the population through Buddhism, they manage the construction of a church of varied membership, which is therefore distinct from the Dutch colonial church.

18th cent.	Missionary activity of Pietism	In 1706, in collaboration with the Danish Crown and German Pietism, two missionaries initiate the spread of Protestant Christianity in Tranquebar, in India. A short while later, the Unity Brethren (founded 1722), with their center in Herrnhut, become the most important vehicle of a worldwide Pietist mission, e.g., in South Africa (beginning in 1737).
from 1792	Resettlement of freed slaves from America to Sierra Leone	As a project of the Christian antislavery movement, the first British colony in Africa emerges from England.
1810–1825	Latin American national churches	As they become independent of Spain and Portugal, the Latin American states adopt the system of state control over the Catholic Churches practiced by the erstwhile colonial powers. Thus, state independence is not accompanied by the progress of a free development of Latin American Christianity.
1st half of 19th cent.	Founding of Protestant missionary societies	A multiplicity of missionary societies is founded, in England,

		North America, and Protestant continental Europe. These gather their means extensively from private initiative, and their goal is to spread Christianity worldwide. The foci of the work lie in Africa, India, and Southeast Asia, partly in connection with European colonial rule, and partly independently of it (and at first with no desire that it be otherwise).
1839/56	Reforms in the Ottoman Empire	Under pressure from European states, the juridical status of Christianity is improved in the Ottoman Empire, and proscriptions of a public exercise of religion are softened.
Era 6: Quest for new forms of worldwide community (20th cent.)
from c. 1890	African independent Churches	Movements in African Christianity withdraw from the European-led missionary churches, or arise independently of them as individual churches, partly with strong elements of African culture.
1910	First World Mission Conference in Edinburgh	Still prisoner of the thought structures of European expansion, an embryonic cell appears in the organization of the ecumenical movement. After the collapse of the colonial empires, this movement is able to develop, and subsequent conferences, in Jerusalem in 1928, and in Tambaram (India) in 1938, concern themselves with the challenge mounted against worldwide Christianity by other religions, as well as by national movements.

middle of 20th cent.	Independence of the churches that had emerged from the European Protestant mission	In close connection with the termination of colonial rule, the Protestant churches in Africa and Asia become independent in organization vis-à-vis the missionary societies that have founded them, and that, until now, have led them. Now it is possible to regulate interchurch relations anew, in partnerships and worldwide amalgamations.
1948	Founding of the Ecumenical Council of Churches	The Council gathers in Amsterdam for its first plenary assembly. At first it is a worldwide union of mostly Protestant churches, but, in 1961, the most important Orthodox Churches join. At the same time, the unification with the Organization of the World Mission Conference (see 1910) takes place.

1962–1965	Second Vatican Council	At the initiative of Pope John XXIII (1958–1963), the Council concerns itself with the adaptation of the Roman Catholic Church to conditions of the modern world. Now the extra-European regional churches can be taken into more consideration, and the Church can adopt an openness vis-à-vis other Christian confessions and other religions. One result is the lifting of the mutual excommunication of the Roman Catholic and Greek Orthodox Churches.
from 1968	→ Liberation Theology	Emerging from Latin America, theological movements even in Asia and Africa concern themselves with a new formulation of the Christian proclamation as a liberating message in contexts of oppression. Especially in Latin America, the tool of Marxist analysis of society is thereby brought into use. For organizational structure, the model of 'base church communities' is developed.

Andreas Feldtkeller

Christmas

1. Utz Jeggle has called Christmas the 'Feast of Feasts.'[1] And indeed, both intensively and extensively, throughout Europe and America, Christmas became the most popular feast of the twentieth century—precisely at the time, then, of a rapidly accelerating de-churching, if not de-Christianizing, of Europe in any case. The all but completely de-Christianized celebration of Christmas has shown itself to be so successful that, meanwhile, the churches, in whose self-concept Christmas ranks far behind Good Friday or Easter, have profited by its popularity: never are the Christian houses of God so full of (un)believers as at Christmas. It would not be a bad definition of the European (un)believer to say: someone baptized and confirmed (or having gone to First Communion), married in a church if convenient, almost certainly to be buried from a church (→ Life Cycle), and almost annually dropping in on a Christmas service.

Family Festival

2. The Feast of the 'Holy Family,' as expressly provided in the Roman Catholic Church calendar, was celebrated on the first Sunday after Christmas. Since around 1800, first in Germany, Christmas moved to the status of principal feast of the small family, middle-class in ownership and education. According to Schleiermacher's basic Die Weihnachtsfeier ("The Christmas Celebration"), its subject is each family, especially each mother and each child. They receive gifts, under the 'Christmas tree' (Tannenbaum—"Christ" is absent from the name); since the middle of the nineteenth century are visited by Santa Claus (no longer by the 'Holy Christ,' but now at best by the 'Christ Child'). European and North American winter as such, of course, is represented by snow, night, a star-bright sky, and evergreens, the gifts that arrive—especially for the children, of artwork or with fairytale figures—and a sumptuous family meal. All these features set the stage for a commercially staged Christmas mood, which far overspills Christian culture (although anticipated by a marathon of many weeks, through streets and stores filled with 'Christmas' decorations).

Political Festival

3. Christmas had always had a political side. In the New Testament legends, and massively since the 'Constantinian turn' of the fourth century, Christ's birthday in the Western Roman Empire was fixed on the Feast of the Rebirth of the ancient Roman Sun God, and had an important role to play in the framework of the new, Christian imperial religion. The originally Jewish Messiah and the Roman Caesar Augustus were so powerfully fused with each other, that in the Middle Ages, the German Roman Emperor discharged the office of deacon at Christmas Matins. As such—wearing the Imperial Crown, and with drawn imperial sword in his hand, with the inscription, Christus vincit, Christus regnat, Christus imperat (Lat., 'Christ conquers, Christ reigns, Christ rules [as Emperor]')—he solemnly intoned the Christmas gospel according to Luke, which begins, "In those days a decree went out from Emperor Augustus . . ." (Luke 2:1).

Festival of Western Consumerism

5. The political origin of the medieval Veneration of the Three Wise Men is still at work in the very popular practice of 'caroling,' that is, the political remolding of the Christmas festal cycle altogether. The feast of Christmas

A Christmas celebration in a First World War trench, somewhere on the western front. German soldiers have decorated a Christmas tree and lighted its candles. They are singing to the accompaniment of an accordion, and a comrade 'conducts.' For one moment, the "utopia of a safe and healed world" (I. Kellermann) becomes reality: The trench becomes a snug haven, 'home' for a men's community on the front, Christmas at a 'folk festival' laden with memories of the heart. Weapons wait for a moment, to be taken up once more after the Christmas truce is ended. (Hubert Mohr) and its cultural—not religious, however—emblem, the Christmas tree, globally underlie a political coordination rarely so clearly and aggressively expressed as by the Libyan head of state, who, a few years ago, decreed: "We [Muslims] have no interest in the Christmas tree, and are free of the liquor, drunkenness, and prostitution that typify Christian festivals." The fundamentalist colonel is not only laboring under a misunderstanding, when he regards the Christmas tree as the 'emblem of Christianity':[2] Khaddafi's religiously based opposition is to the commercial and cultural hegemony that relies on a political hegemony. For Khaddafi, the Christmas tree is the emblem of the American way of life. It stands for the general consumerism of Western capitalism. Considering the close alliance between them and the shaping of the Christian festival, Khaddafi's declaration may be 'up to date' for the present even from a religious viewpoint. Only Christmas no longer belongs to the Christian festal calendar in the Western industrial states, but is the principal feast of a (post-) bourgeios religion joining politics, family, and consumption: their 'big day.'[3]

1. Faber/Gajek 1997, 277.
2. Gurner, Peter, "Ghaddafis Philippika gegen den Weihnachtsbaum," in: Frankfurter Rundschau, 6 April 1992, 3.
3. Faber/Gajek 1997, 277.

Christmas under an African sun: in Burkina Faso, some ten percent of the population are Christians. The picture illustrates their custom that, during the time before Christmas, the children of the village erect small clay buildings, called crèches. These usually stand in the vicinity of the churches. They are built and painted with great care, and are compared with each other when finished. The walls are painted with Christmas greetings, Christian symbols, and pictures of the Holy Family, which is represented (self-evidently to the minds of the children, it would seem) as white. Here a young architect from the capital, Ouagadougou, the propriétaire (owner) of the crèche, taking pride in his work, poses for the camera. For the three most beautiful crèches, Burkina Faso awards an annual prize, which is accepted by the construction workers before moving television cameras. Conferral of the prize takes place in April—a few weeks before the rainy season, which frequently leaves no more than a pile of clay of the prestigious little objects. (Benita von Behr, after H. Tarnowski)

Literature

Connelly, Mark, Christmas: A Social History, London 1999; Faber, Richard/Gajek, Esther (eds.), Politische Weihnacht in Antike und Moderne. Zur ideologischen Durchdringung des Fests der Feste, Würzburg 1997; Gulevich, Tanya (ed.), Encyclopedia of Christmas, Detroit 2000; Pimlott, J. A. R., The Englishman's Christmas: A Social History, Hassocks 1978; Restad, Penne L., Christmas in America: A History, New York 1995; van Renterghem, Tonny, When Santa Was a Shaman: The Ancient Origins of Santa Claus and the Christmas Tree, St. Paul 1995; Waits, William B., The Modern Christmas in America: A Cultural History of Gift Giving, New York 1993.

→ Christianity, Economics, Exchange/Gift, Family, Feasts and Celebrations, Government/Rule/Politics/State

Richard Faber

Church

Concept

1. The word church is derived from the Greek (from kýrios, 'Lord,' and kyrikón, 'house of the Lord'), and denotes, on the one hand, a sacred (Christian) building (→ Architecture [sacred]), and on the other the community of believers (usually with reference to Christianity), and this either in the sociological sense of a religious organizational form or in the sense of 'true community of God,' the meaning maintained in Christian theology. In Latin texts, and in the Romanic languages, the synonym ekklesía is used (Gk., 'assembly,' 'gathering'; whence Span., iglesia; Ital., chiesa), which in the Septuagint also means 'people' or 'community.' Ekklesía was also the name other groups used for themselves (such as in → Gnosticism and → Manichaeism). Later, 'church' is used almost exclusively with reference to Christian communities, although the concept is occasionally applied to other religions (for example, Daoism). At present, this exclusive application is called into question and disputed, for example in the case of the Church of → Scientology.

Church as Organization

2. The earliest phase of Christianity is distinguished by the dominant presence of wandering charismatics, who, like the Cynic philosophers, led an ascetical life and moved from place to place. They lived on what the village dwellers gave them voluntarily, and thus constituted a principally rural movement, with small farmers their disciples and followers. Very soon, however, the rural movement became an urban one: the mission of Peter and Paul, especially in large cities like Corinth, encountered a middle class in whose milieu the radicalism of wanderers had spilled over into a 'patriarchalism of love' (according to Ernst Troeltsch, a developmental form leading to the establishment of churches).

In sociological terms, a church is an institutionally constructed religious form of organization, comprising both professional → specialists (clergy) and laity, within which a → hierarchy has been formed that, normatively and with sanctions, acquires influence on belief and value systems, interprets reality, constitutes meaning, and institutes ritual. The Catholic Church, furthermore, governs the Vatican, a politically sovereign ecclesiastical state with its own currency. In most Western countries, Church and state are separated (→ Secularization), although not always with a great deal of consistency: thus, in England, the Queen is the head of the Anglican Church.

Reception into the great Christian Churches is consequent upon → Baptism, which presupposes no special qualifications. G. Kehrer assesses this as a characteristic of church in contradistinction from sects, which latter know no lay membership in this sense. Still, various Churches have also sustained differentiations along whose lines some elements ultimately understand only the clergy as properly being the 'Church.'

Hierarchy as Potential for Conflict

3. Nevertheless, for the Christian community, compounded as it is of diverse social classes, the principle of integration has always been regarded as valid: "In Christ, all are equal." This norm, however, has frequently been reduced to pure theory. True, the Catholic Church has attempted, since the eighteenth century, and later, decisively, in the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965), and in 1983 with the Codex Juris Canonici ("Code of Canon Law"), to afford the laity a place, as well as a meaning, within the Church. → Baptism now suffices for a function in the Church: entry into the clergy is not a requirement for participation. When all is said and done, however, the lay members of the Catholic Church remain subordinate to the clergy, and their right to 'have a say' in the Church is very limited, leading, in recent years, to repeated protests on their part. In addition, there is the hierarchy's extreme hesitation when it comes to the integration of women, such as in the question of their admittance to the priesthood.

Today's Situation

4. a) As the twenty-first century gets underway, the great Christian Churches have new, hitherto unknown problems to confront, especially in that a complex, mass society is leading to further internal differentiation of church organization. Already in the nineteenth century there existed church associations and alliances; the twentieth added press and radio work, the erection of social institutions, and the holding of seminars (by Evangelical and Catholic Academies). Especially since Vatican II, relations among Christian confessions have advanced to the point of mutual recognition and even cooperative ministry, a development that can be described under the caption → 'Ecumenical Movement.' Ecumenical services, for example, are no longer a rarity, nor are 'mixed marriages' (marriages between partners of different confessions), or baptismal sponsorship by a godparent not of the confession of the person receiving the sacrament.

Relation to Other Religions

b) Certain problems in a relationship with other religions are more difficult: the Catholic Church still professes the formula, extra ecclesiam nulla salus ("Outside the Church [there is] no salvation")—with shifting interpretations, it is true: Jesuit Leonard Feeney's exclusivist interpretation was rejected as early as 1949 by Pius XII (1939–1958), who, with a view to non-Christians, insisted that the desire to belong to the Church was sufficient as a means of salvation, and that anyone striving for God has this wish. Vatican II takes its own point of departure in a universal salvific will of God, which embraces non-Christians as well, but understands the expression extra ecclesiam as a warning to Christians: only those who know the Church to be necessary for salvation also come under its stricture. Still, according to the International Commission of Theologians in 1996, the Church is still the 'universal sacrament of salvation,' and any inter-religious dialogue is useful as a preparation of one's interlocutor for the Gospel.

Church as Juridical Person

5. Since the concept 'church' is not legally protected, there are occasional confrontations between groups that explicitly lay claim to the concept and the confessional Christian Churches, which understand themselves, exclusively, as churches. This tension recently became current once more in the dispute over the → Scientology movement, which its proponents call the Church of Scientology, while from the Christian side it is regarded as a 'sect,' mental technique, or philosophy, the right to the concept being denied. Others speak of a 'psychic business,' emphasizing its strong economic characteristics. According to Scientology itself, it has had the designation of 'church' since 1954, three years after its first unification. The decision about the 'church' status of a community has significant implications on possible tax reductions in several Western countries.

Literature

Kehrer, Günter, "Kirche," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 3 (1993), 357-362; Theissen, Gerd, Sociology of Early Palestinian Christianity, Philadelphia 1985; Troeltsch, Ernst, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches, New York 1960 ([1]1911).

→ Catholicism, Christianity, Group, Salvation Army, Hierarchy, Papacy, Protestantism, Sect, Televangelism

Agnes Imhof

Circumcision

Definition and Distribution

1. The term 'circumcision' (Lat., circumcisio, a 'cutting around') denotes a certain surgical operation on the genitalia of boys and girls or men and women. With boys and men, several categories are to be distinguished: circumcision in the proper sense, which consists in the partial or total excision of the foreskin; amputation of the penis; castration; emasculation.

Male Circumcision

In Judaism and Islam, male circumcision is a rite of → initiation steeped in religious tradition. Here, boys are introduced from childhood into the condition of manhood, by the removal of a part of their foreskin. It is generally paired with the child's separation from his mother, in the sense that, henceforward the youth is reared essentially by his father and other male relatives. Arabic juristic parlance denotes male circumcision with the word khitan, or else with tahara, whose meaning is close to that of 'purity.' The circumcision of boys is also practiced in secular societies, but here usually for medical reasons. While in the United States and Canada male newborns are routinely circumcised, in other Western nations the procedure is performed almost exclusively for medical reasons (such as constriction of the foreskin; Lat., Phimose).

Female Circumcision

Female circumcision represents an especially delicate problem. Customarily practiced mainly in sub-Saharan and West African countries, it has relatively recently become a problem of political or economic migration, increasingly confronting gynecologists and urologists, as well as sex and family counseling establishments, in Western countries. In France and England, the circumcision of women and girls has long been regarded as a problem. It is estimated that between 2,000 and 3,000 girls are secretly circumcised annually in Great Britain alone. Female circumcision is called clitoridectomy or infibulation; in France, a linguistic distinction is also generally made between circoncision masculine and circoncision féminine. Here Arabic juristic parlance uses the concepts khafd or khifad. Internationally, female circumcision is today generally called 'female genital mutilation.' At least two forms are distinguished: (1) amputation of the clitoris, or excision of the clitoris and labia minora: practiced principally in Egypt; (2) the radical form of infibulation, or 'Pharaonic circumcision,' in which all of the female genitalia are removed, and the wound sutured except for a small opening remaining for urination and menstruation. Infibulation is practiced especially in the Sudan and in Somalia. Female circumcision is regularly integrated into a ritual of initiation, intended to introduce the sexually mature girl into the world of adult women, without regard for any physical or psychic consequences for the girl. In religious law, she is now thought of as having received her sexual 'purity' (Arab., tahara).

2. Circumcision is observed as early as the third century BCE on the evidence of Egyptian mummies, and was very widespread in the ancient East. The Philistines, according to the Bible, constituted an exception. For the Hebrews, this ritual differentiated them from the 'gentiles' or 'pagans,' as the 'sign of the covenant with God.' Christianity distinguished itself from Judaism by, among other things, abolishing the ritual of circumcision, in order thus to open to the 'pagans.'

3. a) Neither male nor female circumcision is mentioned in the Qur'an. Nevertheless, sura 2:124 is interpreted as legitimizing the circumcision of the male, since one of God's commandments to Abraham is regarded as having been that of circumcision. As Abraham is regarded as an example, a Muslim, according to sura 16:123, must follow him. The allusion to the tradition of Abraham reflects the Muslim principle that all norms revealed to the prophets before Muhammad are to be followed unless they are expressly invalidated. Thus, the Hebrew Bible becomes a source of law for Islam. There is no valid law text for female circumcision except on shaky grounds. Generally, in order to legitimize female circumcision, unsupported traditions are attributed to the Prophet Muhammad. In her analysis of twentieth-century Arabic legal decisions, Birgit Krawietz has shown that the Islamic juridical principle of corporeal integrity (Arab., hurma) is not observed in the circumcision of women. Female circumcision, therefore, according to Islamic legal principles, represents a breach of Islamic law as well. As a rule, female circumcision in Islamic countries originates in pre-Islamic customs and usages.

Although the procedure is not mentioned in the Qur'an, for many Muslims the circumcision of their male issue is the occasion of an important festival. The age of circumcision varies greatly by region: it can be performed as early as the day after birth, or not until the age of twenty. One tradition stipulates the seventh day after birth. The majority of Muslims are circumcised at seven or eight years of age, however, as is this small boy in Turkey, who, after the intervention of his male relative, proudly displays the foreskin that the latter has removed. The ritual is celebrated with great pomp, and, in compensation for the painful operation, the circumcised youth is 'spoiled' by those near to him, and receives rich gifts. (Benita von Behr)

Criticism of Circumcision

Numerous Muslim physicians of a modernistic and emancipating bent, such as Egyptian female physician Nawal as-Saadawi, have spoken out publicly against female circumcision. But male circumcision has also increasingly come under critical consideration on the part of Muslims, as in the artistic discussion of circumcision at the hands of Algerian French playwright Fatima Gallaire ("La Fête Virile" ["The Virile Festival"]; 1991), or its treatment in the Tunisian film "Halfaouine" (1992) by Farid Boughedir.

Judaism

b) In Judaism, religious law appeals to the Hebrew Bible. Male circumcision is considered a sign of the covenant struck by God with human beings (concretely, with Abraham; Gen 17:9-14). Only two other biblical loci allude to this covenant: Exod 12:44, and Lev 12:3. In Ethiopia, female circumcision is also practiced by Jews, the Falasha, and is presumably a pre-Judaic custom that survived the arrival of Judaism.

Literature

Denniston, George C. et al. (eds.), Flesh and Blood: Perspectives on the Problem of Circumcision in Contemporary Society, New York etc. 2004; Gollaher, David L., Circumcision: A History of the World's Most Controversial Surgery, New York 2000; Hicks, Esther K., Infibulation: Female Mutilation in Islamic Northeastern Africa, New Brunswick 1993; Krawietz, Birgit, Die Hurma. Schariatrechtlicher Schutz vor Eingriffen in die körperliche Unversehrtheit nach arabischen Fatwas des 20. Jahrhunderts, Berlin 1991; Walley, Christiane, "Searching for 'Voices': Feminism, Anthropology, and the Global Debate over Female Genital Operations," in: Cultural Anthropology 12,3 (1997), 405-438.

→ Body, Initiation, Islam, Judaism, Life Cycle, Puberty, Ritual, Sexuality

Assia Maria Harwazinski

Civil Religion

Determination of the Concept

1. Civil religion denotes a system of linguistic formulae (metaphors, citations, slogans), symbols, rituals, and myths, in representative public life and in politics, that defines the meaning and demarcation of a society vis-à-vis the state, legitimates its goals, works by bestowing meaning and promoting community, familiarizes the population with the values and basic attitudes it embodies, and mobilizes strength and energy for the realization of these goals. The language of the formulae, symbolic actions, and → collective representations avails itself of such already existent religious motifs, forms of expression, and systems of belief as can be accepted by the greatest number of members of society as possible, and seeks to create a comprehensive political culture and generally bonding system of values. Civil religion is part of a society's political culture and public discourse, without reverting to institutionalized religion. Motives in support of civil religion thus emerge from concrete organized spirituality and enter 'civil space,' in celebrations at monuments and memorial parks, in political rallies and addresses, on the occasion of civil festivals and burials, and in the political cult of the dead.

Civil Religion

The concept of civil religion was introduced, in 1967, by U.S. sociologist Robert N. Bellah, in the sense of a 'religion of/for the citizen.' Bellah had analyzed the inaugural addresses of important U.S.-American presidents and had established that religion and God played a key role, without reference to a particular religion. The point of departure of his investigations is the conceptualization that rituals and symbols are important and informative for the functioning of societies. Key elements of the U.S.-American civil religion are taken from the Hebrew Bible: the ideas of the Exodus, the Land of Promise, the chosen people, the covenant with God, and the New Jerusalem. The history of the United States—so runs the consensus of civil religion—is the product of divine providence: the presidents of the United States can be understood in this context as 'prophets,' the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution as 'sacred texts' of a civil religion. In festivals like Thanksgiving and Memorial Day, individual citizens and families are ritually integrated into civil religion.

The latter offers, from its side, the integrative design for a (national) citizen's religion as a system of basic political attitudes and moral values, of societal patterns for classification and perception—which, together, condition the lifestyle of a loyal and self-controlled, patriotic citizen.

Civil religion must be conceptually distinguished from

(a) state religion, where what is at hand is the legally fixed (by concordat, for example) close cooperation between the state and a religion;

(b) bourgeois or civilians' religion, where what is at hand are forms of privatistic, apolitical religion, in which a clear distribution of responsibilities is posited between the religious domain and public/political life. Yet civil religion also claims to lay an obligation on persons who belong to no specific religion, and 'functions' without religious institutions as a quasi-neutral instance;

c) political religion, which attempts to extend civil-religion projects to a totalitarian ideology, or even to a 'religion defined by the state,' and to replace existing religious communities and traditions—one recalls the state ritual and liturgical composite erected by → National Socialism.

2. The discourse of civil religion is conceivable only in the context of → modernity, the 'separation of church and state' (→ Secularization), and the demand for → freedom of religion. Important roots of the concept lie in the French → Enlightenment. In a letter to Voltaire, Jean-Jacques Rousseau responded to the question of the legitimization of the secular state as early as 1756, if the latter is to be altogether separated from religion, with the postulate of a religion civile ('civil religion'). For Rousseau, this construct is preponderantly this-worldly: a moral code, a kind of 'citizen's creed'; it includes belief in a powerful and 'rational' godhead, but its heart is the 'sanctity of the social contract and the law.' Rousseau's design was adopted in the French → Revolution, and liturgically translated in, for example, Robespierre's Culte de la Raison ("Cult of Reason").

3. Civil Religion in South Africa: One of the most interesting new models of civil religion is found in South Africa. In the time of → apartheid, Boer civil religion availed itself of motifs of the Hebrew Bible (exodus, chosen people), and of the belief that the foundation of the separation of the → races—that foundation being the difference in races—is in accordance with the will of God. In 'the new South Africa,' with the symbol of the 'rainbow people,' a very conscious attempt has been made to frame a symbolism that would obligate and integrate all. Both in its profane meaning (a 'people of many colors'), and in Hebrew Bible imagery (the symbol of the covenant between God and humanity—cf. Gen 9:12-16), the rainbow sends a reconciling and integrating message—obviously understood and received as such by great numbers of the population.

In his analysis of President Kennedy's inaugural address, Robert N. Bellah concludes that in the U.S.-American Civil religion, the unconditional, ultimate sovereignty is tacitly—and frequently even expressly—ascribed to God. This, according to Bellah, is the meaning of "In God we trust." This inscription is found on the one-dollar bill, for example, whose verso is pictured here. A further function of civil religion—integration—is elucidated in the inscription, "E pluribus unum" (Lat., "One from many," originally referring to the thirteen original states of the United States), to be found in the aura above the bald eagle ("American eagle") and the thirteen pillars of the United States coat of arms. With the eagle on the right and the pyramid on the left, the obverse and verso of the (double-sided!) Great Seal of the United States of 1782 are pictured on this bank note. The symbolism of the verso of the seal (design by William Barton, 1748–1831) is especially instructive for an intimation of the complexity of the U.S.-American civil religion. The latter finds its sustenance not only in a generalized Christianity, but in ancient pagan sources, as well: it is to the great exemplar of republican Rome, bound up with the Virgilian theology of law, that the American Founding Fathers felt indebted. "Annuit coeptis" (Lat., "He [God] has endorsed the beginnings") stands over the eye

4. As shown in the example of South Africa, civil religion is always the outcome of a political process, and can be 'founded' anew or changed. The question remains open whether civil religion, in tandem with the integration of diverse population groups beyond one's 'own' population, by way of the installation of a transnational or international symbolism, helps to overcome national boundaries.

Bellah himself saw the danger of the political abuse of civil religion, against the background of the foreign policy of the United States in the Vietnam War. Since then, comparable scenarios of the legitimization of foreign policy by civil religion have developed repeatedly, as in the 'War on Terrorism' after the 9/11 attacks. When soldiers die abroad for 'human rights and freedom,' civil religion will function as a solution to the problem raised by the obvious contingency of their dead. Fallen soldiers can be vindicated on the basis of civil religion, on the one hand; and on the other, it will be possible to sacralize battle even more by appealing to the grand theme of sacrifice.[1] Civil religion's legitimization of 'imperialistic adventures'[2] or of a military imposition of interests of a policy of power and economics, is just as possible under the banner of 'human rights and freedom' as it is under the mottos 'People and Fatherland' or 'God with Us.'

1. Bellah 1967, 34.
2. Ibid.

Literature

Bellah, Robert N., "Civil Religion in America," in: Daedalus. Journal of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences 96/1 (1967), 1-21; Bellah, Robert N./Hammond, Phillip E., Varieties of Civil Religion, San Francisco 1980; Breslauer, S. Daniel, Judaism and Civil Religion, Atlanta 1993; Cristi, Marcela, From Civil to Political Religion: The Intersection of Culture, Religion and Politics, Waterloo 2001; Henry, Maureen, The Intoxication of Power: An Analysis of Civil Religion in Relation to Ideology, Dordrecht/London 1979; Jewett, Robert/Lawrence, John Shelton, Captain America and the Crusade against Evil: The Dilemma of Zealous Nationalism, Grand Rapids 2003; Kessler, Sanford, Tocqueville's Civil Religion: American Christianity and the Prospects for Freedom, Albany 1994; Liebman, Charles S./Don-Yehiya, Eliezer, Civil Religion in Israel: Traditional Judaism and Political Culture in the Jewish State, Berkeley 1983; Parsons, Gerald, Perspectives on Civil Religion, Aldershot 2002; Rouner, Leroy S. (ed.), Civil Religion and Political Theology, Notre Dame 1986; Shanks, Andrew, Civil Society, Civil Religion, Oxford 1995; Thrower, James, Marxism-Leninism as the Civil Religion of Soviet Society: God's Commissar, Lewiston 1992.

→ Democracy, Fundamentalism, Millenarianism/Chiliasm, North America, Human Rights, Monument/Memorial Places, Political Religion, Values of the Trinity (the citation adopts Jupiter's response to Virgil's plea in the Aeneid, 9:625), and below, even more incisively, the theologico-historical prophecy of the new inception of the Golden Age under the consulate of C. Asinius Pollio (41 BCE), from Virgil's Fourth Eclogue (later adopted as referring to Augustus, and then to Christ), the "Novus ordo s[a]eclorum"—"new order of the world age" (cf. Virgil, Eclogues, 4, v. 5). Side by side with these pre-Christian elements of an ancient messianism and Roman state-utopia, another thread of tradition is present, in the symbolic representations of the eye and the pyramid: in the eighteenth century, neither symbol is still taken as primarily Christian, but is seen as emerging from the esoteric Enlightenment, as incarnating the Illuminati orders and the Freemasons; thus, they are to be ascribed to schemata for a religious humanism. (Claudia Haydt and Hubert Mohr)

Claudia Haydt

Clothing

Anthropological and Religious Aspects

1. According to the biblical myth, Adam and Eve, through personal sin, destroyed the harmony with God and nature that had prevailed in Paradise. The supervening shame at their transgression—not having followed God's word—and the nakedness of which they had become aware, they covered using fig leaves. Thereby they set themselves off as physically and spiritually distinct persons from each other, as well as with respect to God. The account of the Fall (Gen 3) underscores, among other things, the need to clothe and disguise the body, to adorn it, and to lend it expression vis-à-vis the environment in the form of a second skin. Unlike beasts, human beings—'naked apes' (Desmond Morris)—have received no natural blanket in the form of a pelt or feathers, and thus are defenseless against climatic conditions like warmth or cold. Therefore, they ordinarily need a 'second hide'—clothing—whose function, however, far surpasses that of protection from the conditions of the environment. It furnishes the opportunity of artificially changing one's outward appearance; it stirs creativity and fancy. Textiles, shoes, jewelry, → tattooing, body painting, headdress, and artificial scarring are coupled in their form, quality, and coloring to religious, as well as to cultural and social circumstances. Such circumstances are connected with specific conceptualizations of hygiene (→ Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming) and a code of conduct. Clothing therefore, along with language, skin color, and culture, is an essential stamp and indication for the establishment of individual and group-specific personal identity.

Functions of Religious Clothing

2. a) Judaism—sacred clothing as acknowledgment and ratification of religious traditions: Sacred vesture can have the function of a commemoration or representation of a event in religious history. Male Jews daily recall the covenant struck with God by wearing a prayer shawl—Hebr., tallit, whose corners have fringes (tzitzith)—during their hours of prayer, at home and in synagogue. These prayers serve as a constant admonition in the face of moral seduction, and are to direct one's thoughts to the will of God. The tallit separates the believer from his secular environment. This withdrawal is supported by prayer capsules and laces (teffilin), which are worn on the left wrist and the forehead. The capsules contain small pieces of paper with texts from the Hebrew Bible (Deut 6:4-9, 11, 13-21; Exod 13:1-16), with which one daily joins again 'the covenant with God.' In addition, a head covering (qippa) is used at prayer as a sign of humility.

b) Christianity—clothing as a medium of ritual communication: Christian sacred dress marks stages of life, the distinction between laity and religious specialists, and is a medium of ritual communication between believers

In some religions, priests or other 'functionaries of worship' emphatically distinguish themselves from the other members of their religious community and from society in all circumstances, even in their outward appearance. The daily garb of Western Christian pastors and priests, however, differs very little if at all from that of the laity. By contrast, Catholic priests wear special clothing for the performance of the sacred rites, conceived after the model current in the courtly society of late antiquity: not 'Celtic' hosiery, but 'Roman' (and therefore not, as appears to a modern eye, women's), a tunic as an ankle-length undergarment (a cassock or talar), here an alb. Over the latter, they wear the knee-length tunicella or dalmatic, whose embroidery renders it a vestment. On the left arm, they wear the maniple, originally a kind of handkerchief pocket. Sub-deacons have received only the first of the major orders. In the center, in black clothing, one observes a priest in his choir robe and tie. The bishop is not in vestments, but in his official cloak: the red color of his cassock, and his cingulum, mark his rank in the hierarchy. The Brotherhood of Saint Peter, of Wigratzbad, rejects the reforms of the Second Vatican Council, and thus retains 'old-fashioned' garb and insignia of office. (Christoph Auffarth)

and God. In ritual acts, dress can denote personal and status-conditioned changes in one's life course. On festivals such as baptism, marriage, the investiture of priests, and funerals, festal and funeral dress represents a transition to the next stage of life and symbolizes a change of status. Sacred dress is required in the performance of ritual or sacerdotal acts. Thus, a Catholic priest assumes the place of Christ by way of liturgical dress in the celebration of the Eucharist. His clothing is a medium of the exclusion of his secular individuality, for the purpose of rendering the Holy visible for believers. Certain features, such as ritual purity, are bound up with clothing. In addition, liturgical clothing is intended to present to the eyes the glory of God, in the splendid folds of the great vestments. The colors of the raiment, for one thing, represent the succession of ecclesiastical feasts, and for another, they indicate the hierarchy of the Catholic clergy: dark red is the bishop's color, cardinals wear scarlet, and the pope white.

The Protestant minister's gown, on the other hand, represents the Reformation break with a Catholic understanding of the faith. Its demonstrative approximation to everyday dress is a symbol of community with the laity, in the rejection of an accessorial dress, which would denote and represent a distinction of rank between the community and the clergy. The minister's gown, in its simplicity, serves less to glorify God or show hierarchical division, than it does to indicate the proclamation of the word of God.

c) Islam—clothing as identification: In the Qur'an, no prescriptions are found concerning dress for prayer and divine service, except one: in religious acts, clothing is to be correct and clean. Furthermore, there are instructions for pilgrimages (→ Mecca), on which men are to wear two white, unhemmed linen cloths, one around the hips and one around the shoulders, and in addition sandals or shoes that leave the ankles free. Donning clothing for the pilgrimage is to elevate the pilgrim into a state of consecration, as it were, and, by the doffing of indications of social differences, reinforce a sense of community. The typical Islamic headdress for men is the turban, which Muhammad is traditionally held to have worn. To be sure, based on regional and national distinctions of believers, the colors and multiplicity of form, as well as the size, of the Turban, are multifarious, so that no clear specification is to be observed denoting one's social, political, and religious position and membership. Descendants of the family of the Prophet Muhammad are nevertheless recognizable by their green turbans, as green was Muhammad's color. For woman, no specific headdress is prescribed, although it is written in the Qur'an (24:31) that they are to cover their nakedness in order to protect their sense of modesty (→ Hair; Veil). This declaration on the part of Muhammad, however, is to be appraised in the context of his positions with respect to woman, the house, marriage, child rearing, and slaves in general, and defines no theology of dress.

3. Clothing in ritual acts is not reserved to religious specialists. The faithful clothe or adorn sacred statues or images, to reverence them or to render visible the supernatural powers ascribed to the saints. This act satisfies believers' need for a 'human' interlocutor. In Hindu religions, the clothing of gods and saints is taken further, often being accompanied by daily food offerings.

4. The apparel of religious women and men is a sign of the division between the sacred and secular worlds. Here, clothing usually shows the tradition of a discipleship. For instance, the simple dress of Christian monks indicates a direct discipleship and following of Christ, and the Islamic mystic Sufis are recognizable by their woolen garments. Likewise, in the Hindu religions and in Buddhism, there are certain prescriptions for the dress of respective orders of monks or nuns, which are tied to religious traditions and their corresponding images of the appearance of their founders. Here belongs the known phenomenon that religions preserve the prescriptions for dress—themselves fashion—of earlier times: thus, an element of today's Catholic garb for Mass, the stole, is based on late Roman and early Byzantine secular insignia of office; the proportioned, harmonious costume of anthroposophy retains the veil of Isadora Duncan's expressive dance of around 1900. The dress and symbols of a religion, then, are understandable only in terms of their historical context, which can offer clarifications pertaining to the mechanism of a religious bestowal of identity. The Sikh religion offers a good example. This religion, formed in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, appeared as a community response, in spiritual comradeship, to repression and expulsion. Sikhs are recognizable by five distinctive marks: long hair and beard, a turban, a small wooden comb for tending the hair, an iron armband as a symbol of brotherhood, a dagger or sword for self defense, and breeches for better mobility.

Literature

Kraak, Deborah E., "Clothing: Religious Clothing in the West," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 3 (1987), 537-546; Mayer-Thurman, Christa, Raiment for the Lord's Service: A Thousand Years of Western Vestments, Chicago 1975.

→ Hair, Mask, Nudity, Tattoo, Veil

Annemarie Gronover

Collective Representations

Collectives as Produced Community

1. Collectives—insofar as this concept is not used to designate all groups, communities, crowds, unions, and gatherings of individuals—denotes 'produced communities' whose bond need not be presented in a real assembly or physical co-presence. They may come to manifestation only indirectly, through symbols, institutions, representations, and through the processes of power and government linked with them.

The concept of representation is usually applied in the meaning of 'presentation,' 'display,' 'portrayal,' 'image,' or 'substitution.' Generally, representation signifies first of all "that something temporally or spatially removed, not present, absent (and this may be a person, a plurality of persons, or a symbol), that has represented, in the representative (likewise not necessarily a person [. . .]) is presented or rendered present."[1]

The purpose of representation therefore is to render visible a collective and its ordering. What must come into being is a matter, interests, an idea, a fiction, a willing, or a belief, through one or more persons as a part of the represented whole—or else through signs. The process of representation may take place in acts of concrete persons or groups (substitute, delegate, and so on), and/or in signs. Insofar as the functioning representative comes forward not only for a concrete temporally and spatially bounded act—as, for example, an attorney appointed for her client comes forward in a juridical procedure—the representative may even be a symbol of content that is not part of the immediate act. This is the case when, for instance, simultaneously with his or her appearance, the representative indicates the existence of a collective, idea, attitude, or belief. Thus, the spokesperson of a religious minority who speaks publicly in favor of the social or cultural demands of those represented by him or her, not only directly points to a social or cultural situation, but also indirectly to his or her own concrete collective whose spokesperson she or he is, as well as to the existence and operation of the larger surrounding collective. The representative then indicates, by way of his or her direct act(s) and concrete person, something whose symbol this spokesperson is—something that through the latter, and the latter's act or acts, takes form in a vicinity and becomes perceptible.

With the processes of symbolization and representation, bonds between individuals are addressed, as well as connections of spiritual, psychic, and social meanings, for without such bonds and connections it is not possible to engender collectives. The collective whole in its quantitative and qualitative dimension cannot be the direct object of perception and experience, but is that object only in the transmitted forms of symbolization and representation. Collectives, which we designate with the symbols people, nation, state, race, ethnic group, or church, establish their reality through social links and through symbols, institutions, representatives, and, in given instances, through the determinations of law. Thus, not only are the parts bound to a whole, but also the real and the imaginary, the material and the ideal, the found and the engendered, are conjoined. By means of identification with representatives, symbols, and institutions, feelings of belonging can materialize for the individuals in question, which feelings allow the collective to appear as identical in a 'feeling of we.' With the represented designations and symbolized determinations, demarcations of the collectives are taken in hand that mark the 'other' not only from within, but also from without, and thus these become the source and foundation of hostile caricatures.

Symbolizing and Representation

2. When we consider the generation of the collective and its adjusted and adapted existence—along with its ordering and stabilizing, with its spiritual or psychic, social, political orderings, and religious relations—symbolizing and representation must be placed front and center. For this priority, it is helpful to determine more exactly what ought to be understood, on the one hand, under the concept of a representative and the process of representation, as well as, on the other hand, under the concept of symbolizing or symbol. Such determinations are recommendable not only on grounds of the general conceptual disorder in this regard, but also in respect of the question of whether, and in what sense, collective representation is possible at all. Thus, for example, in the public debates over representative democracy, the people or nation are usually regarded as a given fact, antecedent to representation. Not infrequently, we even encounter the tendency to personalize 'a people,' equipped with consciousness and a will, and thus susceptible of representation. But this represents not a factual reality, but a fiction whose function it is to shape reality, that takes form in, for example, the symbols, 'popular spirit,' 'national character,' 'national being,' 'people's will,' or the currently favorite and widely propagated 'collective identity.'

Representatives

a) The concept of representative is to be applied here in a restricted sense. It is to be applied only to persons who, through their thinking, feeling, speech, and activity, actually do present or represent the 'whole' that is at issue, and are acknowledged, in a self-binding mode, as doing so by the represented and presented. According to Eric Voegelin, the representative is the product of a societal process of articulation, in the wake of which the acts of this person are ascribed to the society in question with effect: the obligatoriness of the acting representative is produced by the understanding on the part of the members of the society that his or her actions are acts of the society. To this end, the representative must be 'representative' in the existential sense—that is, must be regarded as the embodiment of this society's key social ideas and of its psycho-social pattern of integration.[2] If the acknowledgment materializes in formal procedures, in organized collectives, for example by vote in a democratically organized society, such as the papal election by the College of Cardinals, or a synodal vote in Evangelical land churches, one can speak of formal or official representatives. Unofficial representatives, then, are such as are acknowledged as representative of the collective without formal procedures, through identification by their real or conceptualized signs and characteristics. Here we might well name artists, athletes, stars, saints (→ Joan of Arc as national saint of France), prophets, or heroes, who appear as objects for a collective identification. For the relationship between representative and represented collective, what Pierre Bourdieu has marked as original circle of representation is generally verifiable: "Since the representative exists, since he represents (which is a symbolic act), then there exists the represented, symbolized group, which, in a countermove against its own representatives, thrusts him into existence as representative of a group."[3]

b) The collective, then, is not a given state of affairs, existing independently of the symbolic actions and symbols, and independently susceptible of representation. The 'symbolic forms' (Cassirer) are—to speak metaphorically—the spiritual eyeglasses that we can use as a help for setting the objective and the nonobjective in order, so that we may again regard them in their symbolic representations. Against this background, the following can be said: the representation of collectives must be understood as symbolical representation; it bears on a construction composed by symbolizing. Processes of symbolizing logically precede their representations. The represented reality of the collective is a symbolical reality—which does not mean that it is only deceit and appearance; rather it means that it emerges from human awareness, with its fictitious and real participation, communication, acts, and power processes. With French philosopher and psychoanalyst Cornelius Castoriadis, we may say, by way of complementarity, that society's faculty of imagination must bind itself with reality wherever it occurs, and with its symbols.[4]

Symbolizing Processes

The symbols and representatives produced are then in that measure a component of social reality, as the individuals therein are capable of recognizing themselves once more, and thereby find their feeling, thinking, and willing expressed. The invisible bond of a collective is rendered visible only in symbols, institutions, and representatives when the symbolic process erects the unity of the collective and, in addition, labels meanings with respect to certain values, conceptualizations, manners of behavior, traits, formulations of wishes, fears, and ideals. Then these latter again function as re-cognition marks for individuals. With the statements made therein—regarding history, customs, practices of worship, preferences, key notions, social myths, character traits—perceptible offers of identification will be created. These will make it possible to inject a teleological and material order into the symbolically represented reality of the collective, or else will condition the processes of exclusion and boundary formation.[5]

Myths Concerning Collectivity/ies

When this instituted facticity of the symbolically represented reality of the collective is no longer understood as a product of human consciousness and action, but is rather objectified in narratives (historiography, myths, legends, vitae of the saints) as an independent, objective reality—as power and substance—the result is the formation of stereotypes and collective myths, which can also lead to the sacralization of the collective. The symbols of order that are produced—as, for example, people, nation, state, ethnic group, or race—can then be transfigured and glorified mythically, and can appear as collective beings, hence as sensing, thinking, and acting subjects. Where a collective appears as a collective subject, equipped with united consciousness, agency, or volition, then what we see is not a factual reality, but a reified symbolization of the collective. Myths, fictions, and fantasies can thus become a key part of collective reality, without any consciousness of this process on the part of the symbolizer.

3. The question of communalities and differences arises from the multiple forms in which the symbolization and representations of collectives appear.

Functions

a) Thus, one can inquire into, for example, the functions of the observed collective representations. In a functionally oriented perspective, the

On the six hundredth anniversary of the Kosovo battle on June 28, 1989, more than a million Serbs gathered there, in Kosovo, near Pristina. Standing before the church, they contributed the customary offering of the Orthodox, a candle. Although the Turks massacred the Serbs in this battle, Serbs still celebrate the day as a day of national rejoicing. According to tradition, before the battle the Virgin Mary asked their leader whether he chose the earthly or the heavenly life. His death is accounted a decision in favor of the Orthodox religion, thanks to which the Serbs were able to preserve their national identity. Thus their utter defeat became the triumph of the nation. (Christoph Auffarth) symbolic representations of the modern nation can then appear as the necessary functional fulfillment of a historical necessity for the development of modernity. The symbol 'nation,' then, as K. W. Deutsch points out, represents the political organization of an 'all-purpose communication network' that presents modernity with a common language and culture, and new skills in historical development.[6] With Durkheim, one can emphasize the meaning-bestowing function of integration. This function is attained through the summing up of the symbolical representations in a 'collective ideal,' which ultimately constitutes the 'soul of religion.' With a view to the democratic constitution of a nation, one might well, with E. Fraenkel, lay stress on the "lawfully authorized exercise of the functions of government."[7]

In a perspective focused only on functions, of course, one might run the risk of permitting the reality lying at the root of any functions—and thereby engendering functional tensions and needs—appear as a primary, unquestionable reality. Functions always relate to an already ordered reality. As collectives and their orderings must constantly be constituted, they are never a primary reality. In general it can be said that symbolic representations are not to be reduced to the fulfilling of functions, even though they surely fulfill such functions. Besides being the expression of functional imperatives, they are also the expression of potential processes that permit the given collective order to overstep—and thereby to change—in an imaginary manner the tyranny of functionality. The operation of the image-store overshoots its function—which is not only an invitation to freedom, but also a stage setting for dysfunctionality with respect to the order being represented.[8]

Meaning Content and Target Ideas

b) Now we may inquire into the aim of these 'symbolizings' as processes—into what meaning content they bring to bear on life in the collective, or what psychic, social, and religious experiences are brought to expression along with them. Besides having unity, meaning, and coherence as their goal, the symbolic representations of a collective can aim at ideas and concepts of a goal (→ Utopia), to be realized by and through the collective. We may cite, for instance, the ideas of 'liberty, equality, fraternity' that fired the French nation of the time of the Revolution and that became, in speech and picture (for example, the tricolor), the symbol of political modernity. Collective symbols can also work toward attributions of characteristics, as, for example, in the symbol of the 'German oak,' seen as a symbol of national 'solidity,' 'strength,' 'perseverance,' and 'endurance.' In symbolical representatives of the Germans, as Goethe, Schiller, or Luther, the 'genius' of the German culture and nation as a 'people of poets and thinkers' is seen as coming to expression.

The above-cited ideas and characteristics, and others, such as 'strength,' 'superiority,' 'perfection,' or 'progress,' indicate a tension between any experienced condition and the ideas of a goal that are being symbolized. Or again, individuals can experience this tension. These considerations likewise hold for the key negative concepts, as 'chaos,' 'destruction,' 'weakness,' 'decomposition,' or 'deficiencies,' which indicate life-threatening factors in the collective, or dangers for the continued existence of the collective order. In the symbolical orders of the collective, such tensions can be 'laid out' and brought into a compensating form. The individual may well feel small, unimportant, rejected, faceless, and weak. Through an identifying participation in the collectively compensating order, that individual can 'experience' the feeling of being great, important, sought after, famous, and powerful. To be sure, what is experienced here is not a simple, given reality, but participation in a fantasy-charged, 'symbolically representational' reality, which, as an expression, always points to another reality represented in it.

Scientific Models of Explanation

4. To achieve a scientific explanation, various approaches can be taken, by way of which we should hope to explain the fundamental pattern of experience, and the procedures and processes that condition collective representations.

—Ernst Cassirer has not introduced specific experiences into his clarification of symbolic forms, but has placed in view the spiritual modalities and functions with which 'I,' 'world,' and the objects of the world will be brought into an order. Cassirer calls them 'sources of light,' 'conditions of seeing,' as also the 'sources of all shaping.'[9]

—In a psychoanalytic approach, as established by → Freud, symbols indicate the experiences of the libido. What is at stake here is the representation of the somatic elements (drive and drive entelechy) in the psyche, which representation Freud designated, in various contexts, 'psychic Repräsentanz,' 'drive Repräsentanz,' and 'conceptualization Repräsentanz.' For the formation of the collective, these experiences become constitutive by way of an identification of the libido with leadership personalities and ideas.[10] The experienced tension in the libido shifts to collective objects of fulfillment and then returns to the individual as an identification ideal.

—In sociological perspectives, by contrast, it is rather social experiences that are taken as the basis. Thus, Émile Durkheim explains the 'collective ideal' from the social integration process, through which the individual first becomes capable of grasping the ideal, and which allows society to engender a morals and a religion.[11] George H. Mead has stressed that the system of general social means emerges from symbolic interaction. Pierre Bourdieu has divided society into different social areas and spaces, which produce different representations. These representations are the result of social relationships of strength and power processes, and are interiorized through a social 'habitus' of the individual.

Inasmuch as the approaches adduced here each set their sights on different areas, these areas must be symbolized as categories of human experience. The 'human being,' the 'individual,' the 'psyche,' the 'spirit,' and 'consciousness,' then, are not pure, essential expressions any more than are 'collective,' 'society,' 'community,' 'state,' or 'world,' 'cosmos,' 'God,' 'gods,' or 'the Holy,' but are symbols for distinguishable areas of human experience.

Collective Symbolism of 'Nation' and 'People': Fiction of the Political Body

5. In a historical perspective, for the modern symbols of the collective, 'people' and 'nation,' for example, one can demonstrate a religio-politically inspired pattern which came to stamp western history. It is the fiction of the political body. With the modern notions of 'sovereign nation' or 'people,' as it became a key historical idea in the American and the French revolutions, the problem of collective representation steps front and center. The political collective, with the symbols 'nation' and 'people,' is regarded as becoming the source of legitimate government, namely, of modern → democracy. Furthermore, membership in and demarcation of the démos (Gk., 'state people,' in the sense of the totality of the politically capacitated citizens) had to be defined. This dilemma for the constituting of the modern 'sovereign nation' quickly led to repeatedly adopted dependency on substantialized criteria of membership, such as origin, culture, language, territoriality, and history. Such features became 'national' symbols: the nation or people could thereby appear not only as a political union of living individuals, but also as a represented union of the dead (past/origin), the living (present/condition), and those not yet born (future/goal).

There was already a pattern for this model in European history that bears the stamp of Christianity: the doctrine of the Church as '(Mystical) Body of Christ' (Lat., corpus Christi mysticum). This teaching, dogmatized in the thirteenth century, and building on Paul (Rom 12:4), was understood as including all past, present, and future believers in a 'Mystical Body,' whose head is Jesus Christ, while the head of Christ is God. This teaching, as Ernst Kantorowicz has shown, was transferred to the medieval kingdom. The immortal, collective, political body was understood not only as represented in the concrete, natural body of the king, but also as having him as its head. The purpose of the modern cardinal ideas of a sovereign nation or of the people was not primarily the beheading of the natural body of the king—as was carried out in the case of Louis XVI—but the beheading of the sacred political body. This seemed to be the prerequisite for the concept of a head and members as identical in the political body of the nation. Each individual became head and member in a collective (national) body, which could speak only through its representatives, which for their part must certify that they are not only the head, but, at the same time, members of the whole. Head and members, the natural body of the many, and the political body, were to be identified in terms of the modern fiction of the corpus mysticum of the nation or people. The frequent application of biological metaphors in symbolic representations of the people, nation, or → race, has a solid root in this construction. Now any speaking head must present itself as a member of the collective mystical body at the same time, which can materialize only symbolically and representatively. This constraint, again, has the result that the representative must become the credible expression of the extensively acknowledged collective representations. Here was something on which the discourse upon a national or popular consciousness, a national character, a popular spirit, or a collective identity was able to build. But an imaginary collective body has no consciousness of its own, because it has no life of its own. Accordingly, there is no actual national or popular consciousness, but only a consciousness of nation, people, and ethnic group.

Natural and Political Body

Dominant Patterns

6. Collective representations must not only be produced, but also accepted by the participants of a collective. Not homogeneity, but dominant pattern defines the reality of symbolic representations. Besides the currency of linguistic representations—as demonstrated also, and especially, in their entry into 'self-evident' use in everyday speech (for example, the application of the collective singular for peoples, nations, or formulas like 'In the name of the people')—the content of consciousness in non-linguistic forms of representation are also at issue.

→ Clothing, too, and flags, hymns, art works, memorials and memorial parks (→ Monument/Memorial Places), buildings, personified allegories (Marianne in the French Revolution, Michel and Germania in the German National Movement), public celebrations and rituals, all stamp and extend the forms of collective representations.

The social extension of the contents of representations is all the more effective as different perspectives combine and supplement one another. The rhetoric of the 'sovereign (mystical) popular body,' as first created in the French Revolution, was provided with underpinnings in various approaches. An especially—and terrifyingly—effective one was the guillotine. It promised not only the equality of the members (a distinction in forms of execution according to social condition was abolished), but also a continuous 'recuperation' and 'renewal' of the body of the people. Like a scalpel, the guillotine was supposed to excise the 'pernicious' parts of the collective body. "Having annihilated the mystical body of the king, the guillotine produces the fictitious, colossal, and healthy body of the people again."[12]

Also in the objects of examination available to perception by the senses, both the existence of the represented is confirmed and characteristics and aspects are revealed. In German history, for example, the planting of a tree of liberty was supposed to point to the burgeoning life of liberty in the collective, as the German oak became a sign of duration and perseverance. The Hermann Monument recalled the myth of the 'birth of the nation of the war [of liberation]' and simultaneously suggested a story of the destiny of the German nation from antiquity to modernity.

Cult of Heroes

The idea of the immortality of the nation could be personified in the veneration of national → heroes and materialized in edifices, as with the Panthéon in Paris (a church transformed into the abode of the immortal heroes of the nation) or the Walhalla (resting place of the fallen heroes of Teutonic mythology) near Regensburg.

7. Collective representations are necessary dynamic patterns of orientation, which must not be plugged up in dank traditionalism in resistance to reasonable correctives. The penalty for doing so will be ideological petrification, in which they will lead the public concert and discord into blind alleys. Through the repeatedly objectified belief in which the collective comes forth as if it were a subject of activity endowed with consciousness, this collective survival—or, rather, supra-life—can advance to the status of a 'sacred reality' that would stand above the constant train of individual realities and condition them. This 'reality' not only becomes an object of worldly and pious wishes; on the contrary, as historical experience has shown, it can become one that that will seem to justify nearly any sacrifice—of oneself or of others—and any crime. Thus, the fiction of the vital political body, too, has contributed to the appearance that force, persecution, and annihilation were necessary for the 'self-preservation of the life of the collective,' at the cost of actual, concrete lives.

1. Rausch 1968, viii.
2. See Voegelin 1952.
3. Bourdieu, in: Ebbighausen, Rolf/Neckel, Sighard (eds.), Anatomie des politischen Skandals, Frankfurt/M. 1989, 36-37.
4. See Castoriadis 1987.
5. See Berghoff 1997, 69ff.
6. See Deutsch 1972, 204ff.
7. See Durkheim 1995; Fraenkel, Ernst, "Die repräsentative und die plebiszitäre Komponente im demokratischenVerfassungsstaat," in Rausch 1968, 330.
8. See Castoriadis 1987.
9. Cassirer 1994, 1:26-27; cf. Cassirer 1979.
10. Freud 1967, 7-82.
11. See Durkheim 1995.
12. Arasse, Daniel, The Guillotine and the Terror, London 1989.

Literature

Anderson, Benedict, Imagined Communities: Reflections on the Origin and Spread of Nationalism, London 1991; Berger, Peter L./Luckmann, Thomas, The Social Construction of Reality: A Treatise in the Sociology of Knowledge, New York 1966; Berghoff, Peter, Der Tod des politischen Kollektivs. Politische Religion und das Sterben und Töten für Volk, Nation und Rasse, Berlin 1997; Bourdieu, Pierre, Leçon sur la leçon, Paris 1982; Idem, Language and Symbolic Power, Cambridge 1991; Cassirer, Ernst, An Essay on Man: An Introduction to a Philosophy of Human Culture, Garden City 1944; Idem, The Philosophy of Symbolic Forms, New Haven 1953; Idem, Symbol, Myth, and Culture: Essays and Lectures of Ernst Cassirer, 1935–1945, ed. by Donald Phillip Verene, New Haven 1979; Idem, Wesen und Wirkung des Symbolbegriffs, Darmstadt [8]1994 ([1]1956); Castoriadis, Cornelius, The Imaginary Institution of Society, Oxford 1987; Deutsch, Karl W., Nationenbildung—Nationalstaat—Integration, Düsseldorf 1972; Durkheim, Émile, The Elementary Forms of Religious Life, New York 1995; Freud, Sigmund, Massenpsychologie und Ich-Analyse. Die Zukunft einer Illusion, Frankfurt/M. 1967; Kantorowicz, Ernst H., The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology, Princeton 1957; Rausch, Heinz (ed.), Zur Theorie und Geschichte der Repräsentation und Repräsentativverfassung, Darmstadt 1968; Ricoeur, Paul, The Symbolism of Evil, Boston 1969; Voegelin, Eric, The New Science of Politics: An Introduction, Chicago 1952.

→ Anti-Semitism, Blood, Body, Civil Religion, Conflict/Violence, Democracy, Fantasy, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Hero/Heroism, Immortality, Masses, Monarchy/Royalty, Myth/Mythology, Origin, Political Religion, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Race/Racism, Society, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Tradition, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Peter Berghoff

Probably no other 'possession cult' exasperated representatives of the colonial powers (also Muslims, and, after independence, African rulers) as much as did the Hauka cult of West Africa. Here men and women took on extremely expressive roles and presented vivid caricatures of members of government. A colonial ambient was produced, with scraps of material to stand for the Union Jack. The Hauka assembly opened with a public confession. After their admission of guilt, the culprits had to offer an animal sacrifice (chicken or wether). The wildest horror was provoked at the close of the ceremony by an extreme breach of taboo, the consumption of a dog. This was also interpreted as a sacrificial meal; but what it actually symbolized was the dissolution of all bounds. A round-table conference decided the preparation of the dog—raw or cooked. The dress of the actors (e.g., European trousers and shirt) reinforced their transformation into a hauka, a person possessed by whites. In the Slow March, Captain Maliya, pictured here, mimics the parade step of the British Army. The Corporal of the Guard wears the red sash of the Commandant. French documentary cinematographer Jean Rouch has recorded the Hauka ritual in his "Les Mâitres Fous" ("The Crazy Bosses"), filmed in 1954, at first arousing extremely controversial reactions. (C. Polzer)

Colonialism I: Economic and Political

When Columbus discovered the American continent in October 1492, Latin America had to embark on a trail of sorrow that is not yet over. In 1521, with unexampled cruelty, Hernan Cortes annihilated the Aztec Empire, the city of Tenochtitlan was razed to the ground, and the population was practically exterminated. Priests and missionaries supplied the coup de grâce by assuring the devastation of all works of art and all libraries, thereby forever depriving humanity of a rich and multiform culture (→ Mission).

Only twelve years later, the Spanish adventurer Pizarro overcame the Empire of the Incas, exploiting it unmercifully. Some two-thirds of all of the precious metals then possessed by Spain came from there. In 1991, Peruvian scientists calculated the value of the gold of which Spain had robbed Peru at some 600 million dollars, including interest. In 1992, the West indemnified Peru for the amount of twenty million dollars.

In the → Central America of 1519, there lived a total of some twenty-five million persons. By 1600 the number had descended to one million. Between 1519 and 1600, by today's estimates, eighty-five percent of the Indian population was killed in consequence of the Conquista and the colonization. This led to the colonists' importation, as early as 1510, of slaves from West Africa to Spanish America. By 1870, some 1.5 million slaves had been kidnapped and brought there. These statistics provide a glimmer of the enormous proportions of human misery that reached across continents in colonial times.

The foreign debt of the former colonial lands is the consequence and continued effect of their oppression, still visible today. The extent of this debt in comparison with colonial exploitation is small (see above). By 1991, it had grown to some 1,300 billion dollars, with the result that, between 1983 and 1991, a net capital income of approximately 250 billion dollars, mostly in the form of interest payments, flowed to the industrial nations from the poorest countries of the world. This means that these countries pay back more than they receive from the wealthy countries in new credits and assistance for development. In other words, the poorest pay for the development and growth of the wealthy. The colonial system could not have survived better, more covertly, or more insidiously.

Here, however, it becomes altogether questionable whether colonialism actually brought an advantage to the perpetrators. The greatest colonial powers of modernity—Spain and Portugal—scarcely count among the wealthiest nations of the world today. On the contrary, the countries riding the crest of prosperity—Germany, Japan, the United States, Switzerland, and so on—never possessed colonies, or did so only briefly. After the loss of its colonies in the Treaty of Versailles, the economy of the German Empire effortlessly overtook the colonial powers England and France. Historian of economics Paul Bairoch ascertains a negative correlation: the more the colonies possessed, the weaker the economy.[1]

The Roots of Colonialism

The question of colonialism's roots remains. Consciousness of being a Spaniard, a German, or a European dislodges consciousness of being human, "and precisely this difference becomes the operative moment in a colonial situation."[2] With the concept of a culture not generally human, but ethnic, territorial, and linguistically unified, the imperialism of colonial times has produced a nationalistic construct that divides human reality into hierarchically ordered cultures—which are then settled pseudo-Darwinistically on respective rungs of a scheme of progress, conceptualized this time as universal (→ Evolutionism). The simultaneity of all human cultures is either not acknowledged or ignored. A prerequisite for a genuine postcolonial world will be that the element of the national and the ethnic be cut down to size. After all, 'the others' are persons, too, and they are our contemporaries.

1. Bairoch, Paul, in: Krämer/Trenkler (eds.), Lexikon der populären Irrtümer, Frankfurt/M. 1996.
2. Horn 1998.

Literature

Fanon, Franz, Black Skin, White Masks, New York 1967; Grevemeyer, Jan-Heeren (ed.), Traditionale Gesellschaften und europäischer Kolonialismus, Frankfurt/M. 1981; Horn, Peter, "Interkultureller Eurozentrismus: Kultur-'austausch' mit der Dritten Welt," in: Trans (Internet journal for cultural studies) 5 (1998); Taussig, Michael, Shamanism, Colonialsm, and the Wild Man: A Study in Terror and Healing, Chicago/London 1987.
See also Colonialism II

→ Colonialism II, Mission

Gerhard Schlatter

Colonialism II: Anthropological

1. Missionaries were often the forerunners of colonialism. Colonial encounters occurred not only with non-Christian cultures in Asia, Africa, and America, but also between Western colonialism and indigenous Christianity—as on the western coast of southern India, with the Thomasine Christians as the Portuguese arrived in 1498, or again in the Ethiopia of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries as Portuguese Catholicism likewise met indigenous Christian variants. Frequently an appropriation of the land was followed by a demand for plantations and the recruiting of day laborers (e.g., in New Guinea and Melanesia). The latter were expected to meet their contracts precisely, or else there would be sanctions. In the area of religion, a joint advance of colonial administration and Western mission societies often entailed the prohibition of dances and festivals, and the destruction of sacred objects. Any contact with the Christian faith on the part of the colonized, however, was usually limited.

2. The reaction to forced Westernization and Christianization brought about by the colonial powers was wide-ranging.

Nativism

a) Over against the white colonial lords stood the native → ancestors, who represented the traditional system. These figures reminded the colonials of the freedom of their past. With its return, the troubles of this new age would disintegrate. The natives looked forward to a reversal of social positions and a subsequent bestowal by the ancestors of goods in abundance.

Cargo Cult

b) The deterioration or destruction of old social orders through colonial subjugation often occasioned the appearance of new, bizarre ideals, which were expressed also with the help of religious movements. The cargo cult (→ South Sea/Australia), for example, had its causes in social unrest. It encouraged a quest for a restoration of political and economic balance with the Europeans. However, it also contained a moral component, expressed in the natives' insistence that the whites robbed the local population of their marine cargo and used it for themselves.

Possession Cults

c) The religious phenomena known as possession cults had also been at hand in pre-colonial times; but under colonialism, they had a new importance: the political dimension had been added. In the cults of the Shona in Zimbabwe, for example, Europeans were caricatured most ironically. Varunga, the spirit of the dead Europeans, held the Shona to cleanliness. Central to the cult were white clothing, cutlery, and the everlasting washing of one's hands. Here, mimicry itself "was a caricature of that other imitation, to which Europe compelled the whole continent, and against which political awareness aroused support."[1] It was living in two worlds, which produced for many a double identity: many could participate in a possession cult (see illustration) by going to church.

Millenarianism

d) The Mahdi movement brought Sudan a brief period of independence. Its leader was Sheik Muhammad Ahmed, who, in 1881, declared himself El-Mahdi, the 'Rightly Led One.' His goals were the elimination of injustice, the revival of Islam, reduction of the bridal price, and, in view of the day of the Last Judgment, the conversion of all human beings to Islam. His was a millenarianist movement, which succeeded in establishing reforms (e.g., prohibition of alcohol, reduction in the bridal price, prohibition of pre-Islamic ceremonies). In 1883, the Mahdists overcame the Anglo-Egyptian Expeditionary Force, and in 1885 succeeded in gaining control of Khartoum. Only in 1898 did the Anglo-Egyptians at last regain control of Sudan.

Post-Colonialism

3. While missionary activity demonstrated little success in the early colonial phase, there was greater growth in the churches after the First World War. The defeat of the resistance of the old elites, material need, and the value of education, to which a growing importance was attributed as a means to social improvement, may have played a significant role. In many regions of Africa, for example, mission schools were the only educational institutions. In the course of this process, independent and very diverse ecclesial conformations developed at an accelerating pace, which led to an Africanization of the mission churches. By the 1980s, there were some eight hundred independent churches in Soweto alone. In the post-colonial phase as well, the churches remained especially attractive for the marginalized. A church base offered a chance for social improvement.

1. Kramer 1987, 128.

Literature

Bhabha, Homi K., The Location of Culture, London 1994; Breckenridge, Carol A./van der Veer, Peter, Orientalism and the Postcolonial Predicament: Perspectives on South Asia, Philadelphia 1993; Chidester, David, Savage Systems: Colonialism and Comparative Religion in Southern Africa, Charlottesville 1996; Comaroff, Jean/Comaroff, John L., Of Revelation and Revolution, vol. 2: The Dialectics of Modernity on a South African Frontier, Chicago 1997; Fabian, Johannes, Out of Our Minds: Reason and Madness in the Exploration of Central Africa, Berkeley 2000; Kramer, Fritz W., Der rote Fes. Besessenheit und Kunst in Afrika, Frankfurt/M. 1987 (Engl. as The Red Fez: Art and Spirit Possession in Africa, London 1993); Long, Charles H., Significations: Signs, Symbols, and Images in the Interpretation of Religion, Philadelphia 1986; Lopez, Donald S., Jr. (ed.), Curators of the Buddha: The Study of Buddhism under Colonialism, Chicago 1996; Prakash, Gyan (ed.), After Colonialism: Imperial Histories and Postcolonial Displacements, Princeton 1995; Pratt, Mary Louise, Imperial Eyes: Travel Writing and Transculturation, London 1992; Said, Edward W., Orientalism, New York 1987; Trompf, Gary W. (ed.), Cargo Cults and Millenarian Movements: Transoceanic Comparisons of New Religious Movements, Berlin 1990; Worsley, Peter, The Trumpet Shall Sound: A Study of Cargo Cults in Melanesia, New York 1968.

→ Africa II, Colonialism I, Mission, South Sea/Australia

Claudia Polzer

Commune

The 'Face-to-Face Society'

1. The commune (Lat., communis, 'common'), as a conformation of human community, is neither simple nor primordial. It is better understood as a complex process of 'communization' (Vergemeinschaftung, Max Weber), in which individuals learn to connect heterogeneous feelings and ideas, and to insert themselves into a community of solidarity. A commune is a → group, readily grasped as a unit, whose members are in underlying agreement in their values, interests, and inclinations, and who seek to experience, in the common life, security, confirmation, and kindness. For this they are prepared to expend a great percentage of their time, energy, and economic resources for the realization of communitarian goals. They direct their lives in function of the needs and requirements of the group. The result is the appearance of a face-to-face society, in which each knows, but also oversees, the others. The permanence of the group is a common end, which all members value more highly than they do certain individual goals, and which they regard themselves as warranted in pursuing.

Commune and Society

2. The commune was at first defined from the idea of community (communitas), as a counter-pattern to → society (F. Tönnies). Tönnies distinguishes community (Gemeinschaft), in which the will of all is in basic agreement, from society (Gesellschaft), which rests on a stricter individuality of interests. Until the Middle Ages, Tönnies holds, the community determined life, while, in modernity, society has gained increasing dominance. This romanticizing, evolutionistic conception was set by anthropologist Victor Turner (1969) over against an oscillation model of communitas and structure (→ Ritual). All through the history of humanity, Turner holds, situations of crisis and transition have repeatedly resulted in the appearance of communitas—the latter understood as an anti-structure that breaks out of a structure. Communitas suspends conventional, institutionalized norms and ideations, and erects, in a circumscribed group, for a short time the model of 'spontaneous' human life in common. According to Turner, 'structural' outsiders find themselves together in such a community, and, voluntarily and in common, live values such as equality, peace, and harmony, in counter-pattern to established society. In the course of its development, however, the communitas is institutionalized and itself becomes part of the structure, the 'establishment.' An example would be the Franciscan poverty movement. It had formed in the thirteenth century, around → Francis of Assisi, as a 'spontaneous' communitas, following the biblical poverty of Jesus and his disciples. With the creation of rules, the order became a 'normative' communitas, and, by way of papal sanction, a constitutive part of the existing structure, the Catholic Church. The Franciscan Spirituals, however, remained 'spontaneous' communitas and were persecuted and destroyed.

Models

3. On the other hand, the commune can certainly form a molding principle of relations within society (Schibel 1985). In the medieval village community, as in Benedictine monasteries and in the North American 'community,' communes were locally bounded societies, whose members organized important areas of their associations in life and work as

In the commune Rajneeshpuram ('The Holy City of the King of the Full Moon'), Bhagwan-pupils (sannyasins) work in the field. In the 260-sq-km area of Big Muddy Ranch in the highlands of Central Oregon, the sannyasins built a large spiritual commune, which until 1985 was the center of the → Osho Movement. Despite difficult conditions of soil and climate, over the course of two years the members managed to render the extensively neglected ranch arable once more, and turn the commune into an economically self-sufficient farm. Along with fields for fruit, vegetables, and grain, raised on principles of dynamic biology, there were 3,000 chickens, 450 cattle, and 90 beehives. Work was done without remuneration, regularly seven days a week and twelve to fourteen hours a day. Within the commune there was no monetary exchange. The 'residents' received clothing, board, shelter, and health care in exchange for a membership fee, often a considerable amount, and the surrender of private ownership. All activities were regulated in common, from housework and meal preparation to the rearing of the children, who were accommodated in a special living area. The commune replaced the family; life centered on work, to which was attributed a power of transformation. (Benita von Behr) equals. They took advantage of a weak central power in spaces lacking a great deal of 'government,' but did not oppose societal relations of power. Only after this mold of commune has been demolished and absorbed by the ambitions of a central state, does it become the familiar 'intentional' community: the model of the good society in a readily visualized group. Under pressure from without, a praxis heretofore lived only unconsciously becomes conscious of itself as oppositional, and thereby becomes a constitutive element of the commune. The ideas on which the sketch of this model stands are conscious, and common to all of the members of the commune. They usually come out of the mythical notion of a 'better past' ('original Christianity,' 'original Communism'), and are frequently nurtured by egalitarian ideals (community of goods, comradeship). This was the case with the Hutterites and Amish, who emerged from the Baptist movement of the sixteenth century (→ Baptists), and who still form endogamous communities in the United States. In the quest to actualize their backward-looking → utopias, communes often invent something new. Thus, the Christian Pietist community that emerged from the artisan community of the 'Bohemian Brethren,' in 1722 in Herrnhut/Oberlausitz, developed its own educational system and spread all over the world. Besides these, however, there were also communes whose utopias were future-oriented, and which understood their communities as germ cells of a new society. An example was the communistic experiment of Robert Owen, who in 1824 tried to build an independent organism, with a community of goods, in New Harmony, New York. Today, the Israeli kibbutzim can be understood as such communes.

The Charismatic Leader

4. The members of an intentional community nearly always place themselves under a charismatic leader, who, as founder of the commune, frequently seems to present the pure, perfect embodiment of its ideas. This leader must be imbued with the 'truth' of these underlying ideals and feel impelled to bring them to others. In the middle of the nineteenth century in the United States, the perfectionist commune of Oneida, New York followed this pattern, as did Christian Science in Lynn, Massachusetts in 1879. However, the embodiment of truth and perfection in the leader can suddenly change to → fanaticism, and then be expressed in violence and psycho-terror, within the commune or on the outside (e.g. Aum Shinrikyo in Japan). When the incarnation of the idea does not come to be dissociated from the person of the leader, the commune crumbles with his or her disappearance, as happened in Oneida. Christian Science, on the other hand, institutionalized their idea in 1892 and became a hierarchically structured organization (→ Church).

Communes Today

5. Communes exist today in the recesses of society, where they shape their lived existence in alternation between ideal aims and practical activity for life, along with model sketches of this life. For these special ways of living that deviate from the societal norm the commune needs a higher justification—a religious or ideological underlay. These latter supply the criterion for a distinction between religious and political communes. If a commune is to flourish, a certain outside pressure is important (e.g., through persecution or defamation), as well as inner norms (group pressure) and prohibitions as identity-shaping aspects. To the canon of slanders belong sexual excesses, filth, and intoxication (→ Anti-Cult Movements). These were reproaches lodged with the California hippies of the 1960s, just as they were with the apocalyptic commune in Waco, Texas, in 1993. Since communes can be integrated into existing economies only conditionally—after all, they usually present a conflicting model—authority regularly reacts with mistrust and attempts to absorb or destroy them.

Life connections as organized in hierarchically structured mega-institutions today deprive persons of the possibility of exercising a practical management over their own lives. Alternative living models and common practical interaction in a commune can give the individual's life a sense, a meaning. An example would be the → New Age Commune in Findhorn, in Scotland. Refugees from civilization have come here since 1962 to shape an esoterically based model for a new age.

Literature

Franz, Dietrich E., Saint-Simon, Fourier, Owen. Soziale Utopien des 19. Jahrhunderts, Cologne 1988; Hardy, Dennis, Alternative Communities in Nineteenth-Century England, London 1979; Schibel, Karl-Ludwig, Das alte Recht auf die neue Gesellschaft. Zur Sozialgeschichte der Kommune seit dem Mittelalter, Frankfurt/M. 1985; Turner, Victor, The Ritual Process: Structure and Anti-Structure, New York 1969.

→ Anarchism, Group, Monasticism, Society, Utopia, Zionism

Nils Grübel

Communication

Religion as Communication

1. From a communications theory perspective, religions are considered complex, structured, processes of communication, which separate themselves from other forms of communication through the development of specific 'communication interconnections' in space and time (→ Feasts and Celebrations; Sunday/Sabbath), particular conformations, and specific themes (→ Metaphysics; Heaven/Sky, Hell), and repeatedly by the acceptance of divine communication-participants. As they are communication processes that span broad times, spaces, and social elements, religions build themselves out of a reticulation of individual, outstanding, communications episodes—that is, out of pre-structured communications events, such as divine services, individual rituals, and religious gatherings, which regularly call for the personal presence of those participating. What is appraised as specifically religious communication in a society's store of themes is of course also dependent on the degree of social differentiation in that society, as well as on historical cultural imprints. At the same time, that content is constantly disputed.

Social Phenomenon

2. a) As a social phenomenon, communication consists in the synthesis of three components: (a) information, (b) the transmittal of this information, and (c) an understanding of this transmittal and its information. Each of these components is dependent on the cultural context of a society, and is therefore perceived collectively.

- Most generally, information is a meaningful 'selection' of elements found ranged along a horizon of various possibilities. This selection is first of all an actualization of meaning ('formation of meaning'). Only in a second step is information 'materialized'—connected with linguistic or non-linguistic signs or codifications.
- Transmittal, as a second element, is itself a selection. One can transmit the information, or omit to do so, and must at the same time select a relationship and a medium of transmittal, through which the corresponding information can be transmitted. Only this act of transmittal is directly visible for an observer of the communication. A characteristic of many religious transmittals is that they are ascribed at once to a human vis-à-vis, and to one understood as divine (→ Prophet; Channeling).
- Understanding, as a third moment in communication, presupposes that the transmittal of the information can be distinguished, so that the treatment of the transmittal can be filtered out of a current of perceptions (→ Perception). The difference between transmittal and information is generated by the fact that the transmittal is taken as a 'sign' of something lying outside itself (→ Symbol/Sign/Gesture). Here no exact duplicate is produced, of either the transmittal or the information, in the act of understanding; instead, information is transferred from an individual horizon of meaning to another individual horizon of meaning, without anyone's being able to guarantee the similarity of the criteria of selection. If, on the basis of understanding, an expression of 'consequence' is produced—that is, if another transmittal occurs—then the process of communication continues.

Types of Media

b) The concept of the medium is of elementary importance for an understanding of communication. Here three aspects are to be distinguished.

- First, it is improbable that the selection of meaning in the transmittal—in other words, the information—is understood as a moment in the communication. Media of communication—systems of signs—such as speech or speech 'images' ('cultural codes,' U. Eco) respond to this.
- Furthermore, it is important to notice that a transmittal reaches the addressee even without the latter's immediate presence. The development of specific means of propagation, such as books, radio, and television, is of importance in such instances.
- In many cases, however, communication not only is to be understood, but is also to be received as determinative of a relation. This imperative is the signal for so-called symbolically generalized media of communication, such as, for example, 'faith,' to enter in, along with symbiotic mechanisms such as 'ritual,' which bind communication back upon the organic and corporeal sphere (N. Luhmann).

All three types of media influence the possible content of communication, each in itself and in combination, inasmuch as they restrict the information that can be transmitted to a given addressee in a given medium.

Forms of Religious Communication

3. Religious communication systems are characterized by the simultaneous engagement of several media of communication. In clear contrast with everyday communication, in the case of (especially nonverbal) religious communication, the selection of the information and the transmittal is usually no longer ascribed to an individual person; rather, these are ascribed to a → tradition, a collective, or a complex process of transmission.

Religious communication is often characterized by asymmetries. Thus, the human being communicates with a god experienced as powerful, while a religious → specialist (priest, minister, shaman, and so on) endorses the communication with and for the divine being in question.

Form Binding

In comparison with everyday communication, complex religious communication, even in modern societies, demonstrates a high measure of 'form binding.' This applies especially to the core area of cultic communication, and less to the more social components of religion. Form binding occurs first of all, objectively and materially, through themes (like → transcendence or → God) presented by the classic texts of religion, and on the other hand, by those growing out of the societal position of religion. A temporal aspect of the form binding of religious communication is its imbedding in a time structure of its own. Here we find the periodical repetitions of the central communication events (Sunday service, → Christmas) and their time framing, as well as their bounding (→ Calendar; Time). In a social respect, manifold limitations characterize the public assemblies, for example in confession or meditation, or, in the case of preaching, in one-sided, asymmetrical communication and its binding to specialists. The primary scaffolding of form binding is the pre-formation of the itinerary of the communication, by means of liturgies. Form-bound communications (like a Mass or Islamic Friday prayer) have the advantage of high expectations on the part of participants. They make it possible to 'ease into' the event, as well as to experience a disappointment-free ending of the same. Unlike social conversation, participants seldom surrender religious communication processes to the randomness of individual contributions. This withdrawal of contingency and randomness, which is one of the aims of form binding, permits a raising of the level of the intimacy of the themes, and can also, beyond a mere understanding, foster the reception of the communication. On the other side, it works against a reflection upon the religious communication in progress and can to that extent become problematic, when that communication is abused in an exercise of authority. In dynamic religious traditions, surely, form bindings underlie a permanent, more or less rapid, and therefore more or less perceptible, cultural change. Thus, they are rebuilt and broadened into new molds, corresponding to new situations (liturgical reforms, services with babies, services with or for animals, divorce rituals). But neither do religious traditions that encourage spontaneous expression, such as charismatic movements, escape a high measure of form binding in their communication.

Verbal Forms of Communication

a) In many religions, preaching is a prominent form of religious communication, usually inserted into a liturgical framework (→ Sermon). Reflexively, it has a passage of a canonical text as its subject, and at the same time takes this text as a current transmittal to the listener, a transmittal rendered real by means of the sermon. Not least of all, through the development and application of rhetorical means, the sermon seeks to generate specific experiences with the listeners. Through the stark asymmetry of its transmittals, the sermon is especially directed toward making a similar horizon of meaning available to its listeners. In the understanding of Christianity, it is ultimately God who speaks through the sermon. The preacher, a human being, is therefore, in a certain sense, not only a transmitter, but also a medium through which the divine reality transmits itself.

Prayer

Prayer, whether that of the community or that of an individual, is a form of communication in which the transmittal from the believing human being is intended to be received, in the form of direct address, by the deity or another religious power, and in which an 'understanding' on the part of the deity is assumed by the subjects of the transmittal (→ Prayer/Curse). The very fact that the transmittal is made in a linguistic form presupposes the conceptualization of a personal correspondent that 'hears' the human speech and enjoys the capacity and opportunity to react to it. In order to experience the 'response,' the believer is dependent upon signs that are capable of being interpreted, or else applies the techniques of oracle in an effort to cancel the asymmetry of the communication. A person turning to God with a request, a grievance, gratitude, or praise usually appropriates speech configurations already at hand, such as traditional prayers. Only in more strongly individualized molds of piety does individually and spontaneously modulated prayer dominate.

Dogmatic and Canonical Texts

Even rudimentary forms of theology are at the point where a religious transmittal is at one and the same time proposed with existential earnestness and directed toward comprehensibility. So-called dogmatic and canonical texts of religious worlds of communication, however, go beyond these altogether elementary figures or structures.

Regarded in terms of communication theory, canonical texts, such as the → Bible or the → Qur'an, have twin faces. On one side they are documents—deposits, so to speak, of past religious communication. As such, they can become—by way of theological exegesis, for example—reflexively the subject of new transmittals and of communications proceeding from these. This occurs in conversation or discussion concerning these texts, within the religious community, in the broader culture, or even in reflexive theological scholarship (→ Text/Textual Criticism). On the other hand, for religious communities living today, the canonical texts are current proffers of transmittal, conveyed in the propagation medium of scripture, on the part of the authors of the texts, or indeed, on that of the divinities speaking through them.

Dogmatic texts are developed self-descriptions of religious communication processes, each of them 'orthodox' and 'heterodox' in varying proportions (D. F. Schleiermacher); that is, they both describe current religious speech and step beyond it by simultaneously correcting it, inasmuch as they indicate directions for its development. Unlike scholarly or philosophical approaches to religion, they themselves bear, inescapably and directly, on the pretension to truth of religious reality. For the establishment and defense of dogmatic cognitions, religious communities have at various times developed a broad spectrum of the regulation of religious communication. This spectrum reaches from supervision of the education of religious specialists, to the juridical effect of a confession, to proceedings of exclusion (excommunication, ecclesiastical ban), to the extermination of enemies (→ Inquisition; Fatwa). Religious apologetics, as a special form of theology, mount an argumentative defense of the proper rationality of the religious communication in question, and of its understanding of reality, against the criticism of other, nonreligious systems of knowledge with their own rationalities and conceptualizations of reality.

Nonverbal Forms of Communication

b) Religions appeal precisely to complex, nonlinguistic or presentative-symbolic, condensed, and polyvalent means of communication. These features pertain particularly to music, architecture, and sculpture, along with gesture and the human body in ritual.

Music and Song

As compared with speech, information can be communicated in the medium of → music only with far greater ambiguity. Religious → singing—usually heard in community—as formed communication, not only joins the medium of speech to music, but at the same time makes all of those singing not only participants, but understanding recipients of transmittals. Further, music is capable of generating its own space of experience, and this space not only stimulates intense feelings, but also leads the persons assembled to a relative harmony of feelings among themselves. Thus, singing done in common often forms a scaffolding for comprehensive phenomena of religious communication. In singing, the linguistic transmittal also adds a quality of experience that reinforces the evidential quality of what is sung. Accordingly, in some religions (Islam, Judaism, parts of Christianity), even the religious confessions are sung. As the example of Protestantism evinces, religious song and religious instrumental music can develop with very great vitality even where sculpture and the performing arts recede into the background.

Dance

In religious → dance, music is connected with the medium of communication that is one's own body or that of another. This combination makes it possible to transmit intense experiences. The intention to create a strong arousal of the sense and affect (ecstasy) through religious dance is an extremely controversial matter in the religions, and, accordingly, variously encouraged and cultivated.

Architecture

In all religions that construct their own structures for worship, the → architecture of these buildings is a medium of communication that contains a complex symbolism. The system of religious transmittals to the faithful and to the cultural milieu extends to the structural complex, the space that is bounded and created, and the architectonic details. This significance pertains to the arrangement, character, and dimensions of simple altars, as well as to the disposition, size, and shape of the pillars of Greek temples. Hindu temples in the mold of Stupas, for example, are signs of a sacred mountain on which the gods assemble. Both the Crystal Cathedral of television preacher Robert Schuller, in Anaheim, California (→ Televangelism), and the plain wooden churches of New England, are 'speaking' components of the religious transmittals of these churches: the Crystal Cathedral, built all of glass, transmits, in an age of glassy skyscrapers, not only self-concept and splendor, but also transparency, while wooden churches are rather signs of an ascetical piety.

Plastic Arts

Influential religious molds of transmittal include works of plastic art, as statues, steles, or materialized primary symbols of religion. Catholic tradition's characteristic crucifixes and representations of Mary not only find a place in central spaces of worship like churches, but focus popular piety in the everyday world as well. Within Protestantism, it is true, the reformed tradition (Calvin) is opposed to plastic representation, as well as to images, but the crosses to be found even in this form of Christianity are components of nonverbal religious communication (→ Cross/Crucifixion). An element of Buddhist religious communication is the statue of the Buddha, along with gesture and mimicry as important aspects of the form of transmittal (→ Buddha; Hinduism).

Pictures

The communicative nature of pictorial representations in Christian religious art in church buildings is evinced in the name biblia pauperum (Lat., "Bible of the Poor"; → Bible). Frescos and paintings were the 'Bible' of the illiterate laity. In Western churches, special visual forms of transmittal were the glass windows of the churches and the → icons in Orthodox churches of the East. Several of the religions of the Mediterranean basin, of course, are usually without images, such as Judaism and Islam. The target of a religious criticism of the image (→ Image/Iconoclasm) is a systematic confusion of (a) the image's mediation and character of transmittal with (b) the object itself.

Odor

In the context of religious acts, fragrances, such as that of incense or perfumes, are olfactory media of communication. On the one hand, they are very polyvalent; but on the other, they have the advantage of being altogether impossible to ignore. One of the purposes of olfactory communication is the unambiguous circumscription of one's own reality space (→ Perception).

Rituals

→ Rituals are highly patterned communications, in which the interconnection of the transmittals is so extensively fixed that they are repeatable, and with which linguistic media are complemented by a variety of nonlinguistic ones. Meaningful or unusual objects (bread and wine, → Lord's Supper), behaviors, and, not least of all, the human → body (→ Baptism; Circumcision; Nudity), become vehicles of religious transmittal, means of religious communication. By these means, rituals engender a space of intense perception, in which all becomes transmittal at once—that is, fraught with meaning ('total communication'). The incorporation of the persons present as media of religious transmittal does not require their faith, but only their presence and an acceptance of the execution of the action. However, they can occasion (bodily) experiences that are difficult to ignore, and can be moving and intense. The powerful form of this communication deprives the latter of its spontaneity, but at the same time delivers it from the danger of the openness and arbitrariness of the communication process. Ritual is a form by which, reacting to and together with religious power, religious communities communicate to themselves.

Reticulations of Processes of Religious Communication

4. Religious communication shapes specifically pre-structured communication phenomena, and does so apart from everyday communication. Masses, divine services in churches or synagogues, prayer times in mosques, central acts of worship, gather human beings into extensively ritualized acts of communication supported by interaction and mutual physical presence. Contrary to broadly extended interpretations of the phenomenon of → televangelism, any actually identity-marking and enduring turn to a religion requires direct communication and therefore a minimal degree of ritually structured situations of interaction that address the senses (É. Durkheim). Although even religious communication in the guise of piety permeates, multifariously and constantly, the everyday world of the faithful, these pre-structured communication phenomena can be regarded as paradigms of religious communication and of multimediality. Granted, in many religions there are also religious traditions that work consciously against such a dense multimediality and against too great a distance of these realities from the everyday. The Reformed tradition in Protestantism, for example, which cultivates such a sober space and shape for the divine service and accords such clear privilege to the medium of speech, may stand as an example.

Multimediality

a) Religious communication phenomena have been multimedial for thousands of years, inasmuch as they offer simultaneous or serial communications in a multiplicity of media of communication. For instance, they connect the acoustical linguistic transmittals of sermon or prayer, in song, with music. In many instances, olfactory elements, such as incense, or even the 'odor of sacrifice,' along with strongly visual sense impressions (pictures, statues, films), and elementary impressions of the cultic space. Motor expressions (dance, the act of kneeling, breathing, procession, pilgrimage, circumcision) are invoked, as are tactile sensations (ingestion of water, wine, or bread, imposition of hands at blessings, the sign of the cross). Natural material means of communication, such as sacrificial animals and harvest offerings—but also abstract material means (→ Money)—supplement linguistic media. In a combination that stimulates experience and fascinates the perception, the media of communication are mutually reinforcing. From the perspective of the criticism of religion, this phenomenon can be regarded as belonging to suggestion technique.

Simultaneity

b) Phenomena of religious communication combine in their transmittals, simultaneously or serially, several processes of communication. In the sermon of a Christian divine service, for example, a communication with the preacher takes place; in this communication, a communication with an authoritative text (e.g., from the Bible) occurs; in both of these together, ultimately a communication with God occurs; and to this communication, prayers—transmittals to God in the mode of direct response—react. At the same time, the faithful communicate with one another in song and social modes, and in song, meditation, and confession of faith, they pursue formats of self-address. According to the conceptualization of Jews and Christians, 'in' these communications a self-transmittal of God occurs (→ Revelation): the human transmittals become ascribed not only to a human vis-à-vis, but also to a divine one, although this is withdrawn from direct observation.

Convergence of Spaces and Times

c) The phenomena of religious communication unite communication in the small group (parish, family) with the communication of spatially and/or chronologically distant major units (e.g., with Muslim prayer, or the Jewish Sabbath celebration). They transcend the physically present community to reach the universal faith community and beyond it God or the deities, as well as, in many religions, spirits and the dead.

Network of Public Instances

Phenomena of religious communication engender and stabilize instances of the public sphere (→ Publicity). Small social public phenomena are first of all connected with the public sphere before the religious power, and can, at the same time, simultaneously merge with more comprehensive regional, national, or universal instances. The manner of communication whose dominance is across the length and breadth of society fashions and molds the (total) horizon of the 'public' sphere. In the functionally differentiated societies of modernity, this is not (only) religious communication, but the mass communication of the media system—which has itself however adopted forms of religious communication, as in the case of → television and the motion picture (→ Film) (G. Thomas).

Literature

Biernatzki, William E., Roots of Acceptance: The Intercultural Communication of Religious Meanings, Rome 1991; Binder, Gerhard/Ehlich, Konrad (eds.), Kommunikation in politischen und kultischen Gemeinschaften, Trier 1996; Idem (eds.), Religiöse Kommunikation—Formen und Praxis vor der Neuzeit, Trier 1997; Cobley, Paul (ed.), The Communication Theory Reader, London 1996; Eco, Umberto, A Theory of Semiotics, Bloomington 1976; Goffman, Erving, Frame Analysis: An Essay on the Organization of Experience, Cambridge 1974; Gumbrecht, Hans Ulrich/Pfeiffer, K. Ludwig, Materialität der Kommunikation, Frankfurt/M. 1988; Habermas, Jürgen, The Theory of Communicative Action, Boston 1984; Jansen, Sue Curry, Critical Communication Theory: Power, Media, Gender, and Technology, Lanham 2002; Knoblauch, Hubert, Kommunikationskultur. Die kommunikative Konstruktion kultureller Kontexte, Berlin 1995; Langer, Susanne K., Philosophy in a New Key: A Study in the Symbolism of Reason, Rite, and Art, New York 1948; Leach, Edmund, Culture and Communication: The Logic by which Symbols Are Connected. An Introduction to the Use of Structuralist Analysis in Social Anthropology, Cambridge/New York 1976; Luhmann, Niklas, "Was ist Kommunikation?," in: Idem, Soziologische Aufklärung. Die Soziologie und der Mensch, Opladen 1995, 113-124; Idem, Die Religion der Gesellschaft, Frankfurt/M. 2000; Schiller, Dan, Theorizing Communication: A History, New York etc. 1996; Thomas, Günter, Medien—Ritual—Religion. Zur religiösen Funktion des Fernsehens, Frankfurt/M. 1998; Tyrell, Hartmann et al. (eds.), Religion als Kommunikation, Würzburg 1998; Watzlawick, Paul et al., Pragmatics of Human Communication: A Study of Interactional Patterns, Pathologies, and Paradoxes, London 1968.

→ Architecture (sacred), Canon/Canonization, Dance, Emblem, Image/Iconoclasm, Liturgy/Dramaturgy, Mantra, Media, Miracles, Music, Perception, Prayer/Curse, Prophecy, Sermon, Symbol/Sign/Gesture, Translation

Günter Thomas

Composite Beings

Supernatural beings in composite form, whose outward appearance—in varying proportion—is partly animal and partly human, are a hardy component of the iconography of a great number of religions. Although gods are extensively encountered in human form ('anthropomorphism'), deviations from the norm are suited to certain purposes. A multiplication of bodily parts (heads, arms), a merging of the sexes ('androgyny'), or a combination of animal and human forms, has been a preferred stylistic means of designating the special, superhuman and supernatural capabilities of the divinities.

In Western history, however, composite supernatural beings have discharged only a secondary role in the shaping of apprehensions of God. But they have attained an altogether extraordinary prominence in the iconographical development of the notions of angels and demons. In contemporary culture, their representations in human form but with birdlike wings have important functions in purely secular and in neo-religious contexts; they can be understood as purely aesthetic clichés or as helpful spirits. By contrast, demons regularly enter the scene as horrid, fearful, menacing monsters, their bodies composed of grotesque exaggerations and distortions (devils with goat horns and cloven hoofs) of animal and human components. They have now even found entry into new worlds, as adversaries in computer games, whom the virtual → hero must encounter at the most sundry levels.

→ Angel, Demon/Demonology, God/Gods/the Sacred, Myth/Mythology, Sphinx

Gregor Ahn

Confession (Sacramental Act)

Acknowledging Oneself

1. As a result of the loss of significance of the large churches, the meaning of 'confession' has only marginally to do with a public or private religious act involving the acknowledgement of → guilt and → sin. On the other hand, the public 'confessions' on talk shows, especially of sexual misdeeds on the part of celebrities, or analogous acknowledgments on the part of politicians, enjoy high public notice. Historically, with the development of the various forms of confession as spaces of religiously defined self-thematizing,[1] the Christian churches in Europe have created important institutions of self-reflection: these have decisively contributed to the constitution of modern consciousness as individuality capable of being 'mirrored.' Through participation in confession, the penitent (Lat., poenitens, the 'regretting' one) acknowledged the power of the Church and its norms. (Since the Reformation, the tendency has been to replace these with → 'conscience'—which, it is true, threatened to elude ecclesiastical control, a problem that subsequently found various solutions in pastoral practice and church law.) Functionally, in the various cultural and societal modes of confession, this is a matter of admitting faults to God, to the accepted powers, or to the community, and of relieving them (for example, by works of penance), restoring cultic → purity, punishing or neutralizing transgressions of commandments, avoiding them in accordance with modifications of conscience, or, for instance, shaming persons who have violated a → taboo.

Christian Praxis

2. In the rite of the ancient Church, the collective confession both of sins and of faith belonged together (the Latin confessio means both). This practice is current once again in the Evangelical Churches, as part of the preparation for the Lord's Supper. Grave guilt could be remitted once after its public admission and a large-scale requital, and the sinner could now

For a public carrying a Puritanical stamp, American President Bill Clinton represented too free a dissociation of private morality and official duty, requiring that he answer for his sexual affairs. In September 1998, before a number of clergy at the annual White House prayer breakfast, under growing public and political pressure, Clinton finally admitted not having shown 'sufficient remorse.' Despite that, however, he failed to block the detailed legal and media-driven accusation and condemnation of his 'sins.'

be acquitted and 'reincorporated.' Emphasizing their individual gifts of the grace of the Holy Spirit, charismatics repeatedly sought to elude the regularizing or endorsing control of the Church; for this they were condemned up to and into the twentieth century (→ Charismatic Movement). More practicable forms of penance developed from → monasticism. Private confession, received from the Irish mission, combined acknowledgment and absolution according to scales of payment, and in the ninth century was raised to the status of a sacrament. In 1215, the Fourth Council of the Lateran enjoined yearly confession and attendance at divine service. For Luther, one's entire life consisted of penance, and only faith in the grace of forgiveness justified the sinner. The Reformation had Catholic abuses before its eyes, especially commerce in absolution from sins. These indeed threatened the interiorized examination of conscience, which had been urged normatively in Augustine's Confessions (fourth) and by Abelard's doctrine on sin (twelfth century) (→ Biography/Autobiography). The general confession of the Counter-Reformation, with its demand for one's biography of sins, as well as the confession of devotion (without absolution), consequently seemed to be a retreat and compromise.

Other Religions

3. Many religions recognize forms of guilt and their expiation. Monotheistic religions condemn as sin, first and foremost, a falling away from God; Judaism and Islam do not offer confession as a way of obtaining forgiveness. Conceptions of cultic purity condition the caste system in Hinduism. The Buddhist Pali canon contains a 'confessional mirror' (Pātimokkha) for monks and nuns; in Hinayana Buddhism its words are regarded as those of the Buddha. In tribal religions, violation of taboos is reckoned a transgression that calls for punishment. Very frequently, communities and official entities feel threatened by sexual misbehavior.

Social Control of Conformity

4. Therapeutic counsels and psychological tests in newspapers and magazines, among other vehicles, are forms of social control of conformity today. Television shows relate to the sacramental pattern of sorrow, acknowledgment, and (will to) satisfaction. Advertising reflects, with effect, popular norms and the dangers of their transgression, often as an admission that one has missed the right product, the right lifestyle. Historically, a Christian fear of sin was effective in the Stalinist sham trials in Moscow (1936–1938). With their 'voluntary' manifestations of conscience, and their public rituals of accusation and acknowledgment, they resembled the medieval Inquisition.[2] Freud's → psychoanalysis at first applied traditional ideas of purification from 'sin material' (catharsis), but through its adoption of the 'unconscious' it came in conflict with Catholic penitential praxis: now what had once been inadmissible, uncomfortable, or morally false became secular and banal,[3] to the point of actually being preferred. But in a rampant market of offers for counseling, the centuries-old influence of church control over behavior abides.

1. Hahn/Kapp 1987, 17.
2. Riegel, in ibid., 178.
3. Castel, in ibid., 146.

Literature

De Rosa, Peter, The Vicars of Christ: The Dark Side of the Papacy, London 1988; Hahn, Alois/Kapp, Volker (eds.), Selbstthematisierung und Selbstzeugnis. Bekenntnis und Geständnis, Frankfurt/M. 1987; Tentler, Thomas N., Sin and Confession on the Eve of the Reformation, Princeton 1977.

→ Conscience, Guilt, Oral Tradition, Penance/Penitent, Sin

Klaus Otto

Conflict / Violence

1. Conflict is usually seen as something negative. The general understanding is that, through conflict, persons' cohabitation is disturbed. Meanwhile, conflicts are no longer seen merely negatively, but are gradually being understood as a potentially productive thing. One of the contributing factors here is research into peace and conflict. Previously, 'conflict' was primarily understood in the sense of international conflict, the conflict of interests between different states. Conflicts were often defined as a preliminary form of war. Meanwhile, political, social, economic, and even religious confrontations have come to be designated as conflicts. At issue here, then, are usually an actual or construed collision of interests. In his sociological theory of conflict, Ralf Dahrendorf has labeled conflicts of internal policy a motor for better social solutions: "In conflict lies the creative core of all society and the chance for freedom—but at the same time the challenges of a rational mastery of social matters." The Dahrendorf theory of conflict was criticized to the effect that it bracketed structural causes of conflicts, and neglected the importance of 'pulling discord up by the roots.' With conflicts, however, the main question is whether or not structural causes play a role. Conflicts often have directly to do with violence or force. In that case, they are frequently a means of conflictive confrontation and the cause of conflicts.

What is Violence?

2. The most convenient and simplest means of confrontation and conflict solution, because it is always materially available, is physical force. Such direct (or personal) force is at hand when persons exert direct compulsion upon other persons. Some forms of direct violence are bodily injury, murder, scourging, robbery, and violence against children. Most probably, violence will exist so long as there are human beings. The compelling supposition, then, is that violence is a basic anthropological constant, which can be channeled and 'diverted,' but which will never entirely disappear (Konrad Lorenz and others). While not completely contradicting this, more recent psychological propositions are constructed on the premise that violence in today's societies is actually the result of social learning processes. Every growing child experiences violence as an omnipresent means of altercation and often enough experiences how violence is 'rewarded.' The question, however, is whether physical assault is the only mode of assault.

Personal and Structural Violence

a) Dom Helder Camara (→ Liberation Theology), former Archbishop of Recife and Olinda in Brazil, defines violence as follows. When someone comes and speaks of violence, we ought always carefully to ask, "What is the violence of which you speak? Is it the violence of the oppressed or of the oppressor?" Surely, the violence of the oppressor is often less visible than that of the oppressed. However, in whatever measure it creates or maintains an inhuman situation, a situation of poverty, the violence of the oppressor brings death no less than does the bloodiest war.

For Dom Helder Camara, social injustice is the 'mother violence.' This is a basic understanding of violence, that, granted, is typical of the theology of liberation, but that has never found but scant echo in the official Catholic Church. By contrast with direct, 'personal' violence, social injustice can be designated structural violence. Indirect, structural violence is at hand, then, when in a political system, a society, or a religious community men and women are exposed to conditions of poverty, disease, illiteracy, hunger, exploitation of their ability to work, or psychic compulsions. As Dom Helder Camara has defined it, structural violence can also be described as social injustice. The intermediate forms of violence, those between structural and direct violence, are recognizable when repression is exerted against individual persons or particular political or religious groups, and when on this account a climate of fear and intimidation arises (Lat., terror). Direct violence presupposes a subject—one or several persons—exercising an activity of physical aggression. Structural violence is built into the social system. Direct violence is perceptible by the senses and bears on body and life directly, while structural violence is (up to a point) a subjective experience. The saying, "You can't feel your chains if you don't move," expresses the fact that not every person will have the same perception of the consequences of structural violence.

Direct and indirect violence, however, prevent persons from living in self-determination. Johann Galtung has defined the absence of personal,

In South Korea, demonstrations have regularly been accompanied by raw force on both sides. In 1997, at the ceremony to usher in the New Year, student anti-government protests erupted: here, a Buddhist monk deals such a violent blow to a police shield that his stick splinters. But it is only a sign: the monk's energetic endorsement of the demonstrators provides moral support, but it does not disturb the phalanx of police. And despite the superior force of the latter, the monk remains 'unmolested'—after all, the public, in the form of the photographers, is looking on. The picture also contradicts the widespread bias that Buddhism is (always) peaceful. (Christoph Auffarth) direct violence as 'negative peace.' There is 'positive peace,' according to Galtung, only when personal, direct and indirect, structural violence is absent. Fine as this definition is, it is scarcely fit for everyday use, as the complete absence of structural violence remains an illusion.

Dahrendorf's theory of conflict, sketched above, was criticized to the effect that it bracketed structural causes of conflict. More recent theories of violence and conflict instead bring the cultural causes of conflicts into the foreground and inquire into relations of power. Thus, a distinction is made between nonequivalent and adequate resolution of conflict. Adequate resolution of conflict is at hand when the various parties dispose of similar means of seeing their interests prevail. Nonequivalent resolution of conflict means that, on the one hand, the adversaries in the conflict dispose of distinguishable means, and on the other, that distinguishable concepts of the conflictive situation are entertained. The conflictive formations just described could also be denominated horizontal or vertical conflicts. Adequate, or horizontal, conflictive formations can well be presented in terms of the relationship between two equally powerful parties, such as the Evangelical and the Catholic Church in Europe. On the other hand, the relationship between Christian churches and indigenous religions is a clear example of a vertical or nonequivalent conflict (→ Mission).

b) When, on 8 November 1968, Beate Klarsfeld boxed the ears of then Federal Chancellor Kurt-Georg Kiesinger for his Nazi past, it was clear to all: 'This is violence.' To be sure, this 'act of violence' was not physical violence in the sense described; thus, the prevailing of needs or interests according to the principle of 'might makes right,' in direct physical confrontation, were not present. This was symbolic violence with physical means of expression. By her action, Klarsfeld sought to erect a political sign. It was not a matter of personal confrontation between Klarsfeld and Kiesinger, then. Klarsfeld sought to call attention to a past that had not been clarified and that had not been expiated (→ Shoah; Anti-Semitism). Symbolic violence plays an important role in religions especially, in their auto-aggressive variant: → martyrs sacrifice themselves for their faith.

State Monopoly on Violence

3. Anyone exercising power or rule usually employs both direct and indirect violence in order to do so. State violence is defined by the exercise, on the part of the state, of violence over and for a determinate territory and over a population living there. The state-based organization of societies is therefore a fully accepted act of structural violence. Then the state has a monopoly—supported, accepted, or endured by the population and social institutions—over an application of violence that is perceived or labeled as legitimate. Concretely, this 'state monopoly on violence' is practiced through groups of persons who are competent in the exercise of direct force within the state (police) or without (military). Since Max → Weber, the factual presence of an institutionalized and monopolized violence, which is regarded as legitimate, is accepted as the pivotal identifying trait, as it were, of a state. In justification of the state monopoly on violence, it is alleged that this is the way in which one paralyzes independent direct violence, like lynch law, or the attempt to prevail on the part of the physically stronger. As a general rule, the state monopoly on violence prevails where religious communities are concerned as well. Of course, these can at times bring the 'power of the state' into play for their own ends. This influence is how → witches were always sentenced and burned—by secular judges and executioners, as → Jesus himself was handed over to the Romans as the 'secular arm' of justice (→ Cross/Crucifixion).

First of all, it is the state that claims the power to define what 'violence' is. Other instances influence the definition process, however: media, religious communities, religious or secular milieus. As for the reception of violence, these instances may operate with, alongside, or against the state and its means of power.

Counter-Violence / Nonviolence?

4. Discussions of violence in history circle repeatedly around the point whether it is legitimate for others besides the state to use force. In opposition movements, the question of 'counter-violence,' violence against the state, is repeatedly discussed. Thus, for example, the World Council of Churches claimed that the struggle against → apartheid in South Africa, which included violence in the classical sense, was to be classified as 'just rebellion' and 'necessary resistance' not as 'terrorism.'

Marx himself saw violence as very much akin to class struggle. In order to remove those who wield violence, revolutionary force was necessary. A 'dictatorship of the proletariat' was needed and must be exercised by the (strictly hierarchically organized) working class party. This revolutionary violence and exercise of violence by the party elite, however, very quickly hardened—especially in the Soviet Union—into a new repressive system of violence. Martin Luther King, Jr., the Baptist minister from Atlanta, countered with his famous sermon, "I Have a Dream," on August 28, 1963: "Let us not seek to satisfy our thirst for freedom by drinking from the cup of bitterness and hatred. We must forever conduct our struggle on the high plane of dignity and discipline. We must not allow our creative protest to degenerate into physical violence. Again and again we must rise to the majestic heights of meeting physical force with soul force." The elementary concept of nonviolence at the basis of King's speech generated a high morale in various nonviolent opposition groups. 'Nonviolence' in the full sense, however, is simply impossible: Structural violence, as we have said, is practiced in every pattern of human cohabitation. The question remains, whether societal changes are attainable by 'nonviolent' means (→ Peace; Gandhi).

5. The entire above-described palette of violence is to be found in the area of religions. Violence, in direct and indirect form, is practiced in religion across the board (→ Martyrs; Flagellants; Asceticism). The various religions relate very differently to violence, depending on their (religious) foundations. The praxis of those who adhere to these religions can, again, be very diverse.

The Qur'an has been so expounded that violence was a legitimate means of spreading the authority of Islam. In sura 2:190ff., for example, we read that the 'fight for God's will,' as a special 'exertion' (→ Jihad), can render the application of violence a duty. But this interpretation was not always maintained in the history of Islam. Instead of being interpreted as an application of violence, jihad was sometimes expounded as a readiness for suffering, and a 'spirituality of special endeavor.'

In Hinduism, a culture has been formed of the renunciation of force. Listed there, as salutary manners of relation, along with 'non-delusion,' 'self-restraint,' 'asceticism,' and 'acquisition of knowledge,' is the renunciation of violence (Sanskrit, ahimsa, 'non-violence'). Jainism (→ Hinduism) goes furthest here: the commandment of ahimsa holds not only regarding human beings and animals, but with respect to all elements (→ India, ill.). Mahatma → Gandhi was strongly marked by Jainism in his stance of active nonviolence.

But a religion-based application of force, as well, is an important element of Hinduism. Ever and again, in the epic Mahabharata (fourth century BCE–fourth century CE)—in recitation, religious → drama, → television series, and comics—the tradition of the warrior ethic is brought before the eyes of believers. Since Krishna commands 'dutiful battle' in the Bhagavadgita, it is possible to deduce a religion-legitimated application of violence—restricted, of course, to the group of warriors within the caste of the kshatrias (→ Caste).

In Buddhism, a renunciation of violence is likewise essential. The Buddha inculcates the Eightfold Path to salvation. Along this path of the 'elimination of suffering,' human beings must not be caused suffering by other human beings. "A monk restrains himself from the killing of living beings," said the Buddha. Those who practice violence against other living beings have new paths of suffering before them. Nevertheless, one should be aware of the existence of warrior monks in Tibet and, above all, in medieval Japan.

Judaism

In Judaism, in the time of the Hebrew Bible, violence was legitimate against outsiders, when the 'vengeance of the Lord' was shown, and the exercise of violence in war could be explained as being in accord with the will of God. Within the nation, violence was legitimate only in retribution for the transgression of the law. In all other cases, the use of violence was punished by exclusion from the community. Since the founding of the State of Israel (1948), religion plays an important role in the legitimization both of the military application of force and of the extension of the territory of the State (Erets Yisrael). The thousands of years of suffering of the 'People of Israel' has led to a culture of memory or memorial within Judaism that seeks to confront the traumatic events to which they have been exposed as a persecuted minority and victims of violence (→ Shoah), using religious means, such as holidays (Pesach, Purim) or 'Books of Commemoration' (of the persecutions and killings perpetrated in the communities),

Christianity

Christianity has an extremely ambivalent relation to violence. Without having the space to go into theological detail, we can say that this relation is essentially conditioned by two elements. First, the Bible's statements on violence are exceedingly contradictory. On the one side, there is the Commandment 'You shall not kill' and the Sermon on the Mount; and on the other, the position that authority has been instituted by God, belongs to the world, and is to be endured (Rom 13:1). Second, the radical institutionalizing scene of the Christian religion is itself an act of legalized violence: the execution of Jesus of Nazareth on the cross by the state. Third, the Christian ethic of violence has been strongly dependent on the question of power: whether, in some circumstances—as religion of the state, or as religion of the ruler and the elite—the Christian community was part of the power apparatus or was only a tolerated—and sometimes persecuted—minority (cf. the 'Constantinian turn' in → late antiquity).

Christian historical praxis, finally, is signed by excesses of violence, like that of the persecution of witches, or that of the → Inquisition in the Middle Ages, but also by self-sacrificing assistance rendered the victims of violence and attempts to prevent the application of violence. Nonviolence was propagated in monasticism, as also by groups like the Waldenses and the Bogomils, and by the Baptists during the Reformation. Quakers, together with related churches, mount a counter-police to the legitimization of state force by the large Churches. Both of these historical peace-Churches, especially in the nineteenth century, toiled for the spread of the idea of peace in many countries, laid the groundwork for the foundation of peace societies (e.g., in New York and London at the beginning of the nineteenth century), and influenced writers like Leo Tolstoy and Bertha von Suttner.

In the Churches today, there are both radically pacifist directions and others who—influenced by the theology of liberation—advocate changes even by 'violent' means.

Conflicts of Religions

6. Wars are frequently explained as confrontations between religions or conflicts of religion. Thus, it is repeatedly asserted of the conflicts or wars in → Northern Ireland, in → Bosnia, or of the second Gulf War of 1990–1991, that they are 'wars of religion' or 'conflicts of religion.' Here, however, some distinctions must be made. Basically:

- All of the conflicts cited have religious components; but they are not pure 'wars of religion.'
- Religions are frequently employed for the attainment of political ends (Bosnia, Northern Ireland).
- Many conflicts have causes that are unambiguously political. Here the religious membership of the mutual adversaries is actually only coincidental to the conflict. Still, such membership can be specially stressed, in the course of the conflict, as a symbolic partition of the parties, if not for other purposes (e.g., on account of the high mobilizing potential of belief systems).
- Membership (claimed, supposed, or actual) of persons in various interest groups during a conflict can be defined in terms of religious membership (in Bosnia, by identifying Serbs as Russian Orthodox, Croatians as Catholics, Bosnians as Muslims). A sense of group membership is reinforced by an exclusion from the outside: 'We and the "others"' (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes). This effect is a favorite means of domination.
- By way of such a group-molding process with religious underpinnings, the loyalty of one's 'own' can be recruited for an—organized or 'spontaneous'—application of power.
- The role actually played, however, by religious components in a conflict is observable only through a specific, tailored analysis of the concrete conflicts under examination (Bosnia, Northern Ireland).

Military Religion

7. Repeatedly, an essential element in religions' interplay with violence is their relation to the military and to → war. Already in the Roman military, there were forms of a 'field religion' (religio castrensis). The military often developed its own rites of the dead or of rites of male bonding such as the Oath of the Banner (Lat., sacramentum) and Cult of the Banner (cf. the → hero; or the 'Blood Banner' of the National Socialist martyrs' cult)—often 'trimmed' with the contemporary religion that happens to be dominant, which thereby, for its own part, is re-militarized (chaplaincy, field Masses). Examples of insertion and appearance of military religion are found all through history: the cult of Mithra, the Christian military orders of the time of the crusades (Templar, Maltese), the Ottoman Empire, and so on. Regarding → National Socialism (1933–1945), the question arises whether the designation 'military religion in power' was appropriate. These hybrid figures of religion and the military are still at hand in states of the present.

Religion and Violence Today

8. When we hear, 'Religion and violence today,' we all automatically sense reverberations–generated jointly by official policy and the media—of particular religions, as, for example, Islam. How have such associations arisen? Membership in a religion is often employed for political ends. None of the existing religions can be designated as 'violent.' Society by society, the various religions play a distinct role in human cohabitation; rarely are violent conflicts a matter exclusively of religious motives. Repeatedly, in conflicts in which what is at issue are power, or other interests, the 'religious card' is played—and particularly today, after the end of the East-West confrontation. Here then, it is possible to reach a (non)identification of population groups vis-à-vis opponents in a conflict. Religious membership is also repeatedly utilized with view to the construction of 'ethnic identity.'

Ideologically motivated violence, as once exercised by the Church and today practiced by modern nationalists, proclaims its exclusive right to that which it regards as belonging to it—be it the faith, or a 'cultural' or 'national' identity—that no longer leaves place for otherness, for those who live or think differently. The subjects of these must confront the decision—frequently a life-or-death one—either fully to conform their convictions and religious behavior or to be driven out, indeed 'eliminated.' In the Christian cultural domain, compulsory baptism is a symbolic act of unsalutary tradition, a violent act of incorporation, which came into force both during mission-endorsed colonial conquest and against the Jewish minority in Europe (Spain, 1492; Portugal, 1496). What a pair of Serbian soldiers are here inflicting on a

Within religions, violence plays a role, then, especially when, in a given religion, cultic phenomena have been produced in whose case (direct) violence is applied.

It is too facile to regard only obvious—physical, direct—personal violence when we address the theme of 'religion and violence.' Violence is multilayered and often indirect. For example, one must be permitted to ask the question, to what extent (the practice of) religion itself is a violent means. This possibility extends from compelled practice of religion, as many have experienced it in childhood, to dominance of (certain) religions in various societies (→ Tolerance; Freedom of Religion).

Literature

Abulafia, Anna Sapir, Religious Violence between Christians and Jews: Medieval Roots, Modern Perspectives, New York 2002; Appleby, R. Scott, The Ambivalence of the Sacred: Religion, Violence, and Reconciliation, Lanham 2000; Candland, Christopher, The Spirit of Violence: An Interdisciplinary Bibliography of Religion and Violence, New York 1991; de Vries, Hent, Religion and Violence: Philosophical Perspectives from Kant to Derrida, Baltimore 2002; de Vries, Hent/Weber, Samuel (eds.), Violence, Identity, and Self-Determination, Stanford 1997; Hall, John R., Apocalypse Observed: Religious Movements and Violence in North America, Europe, and Japan, London/New York 2000; Hamerton-Kelly, Robert G. (ed.), Violent Origins: Walter Burkert, René Girard, and Jonathan Z. Smith on Ritual Killing and Cultural Formation, Stanford 2000; Juergensmeyer, Mark, Terror in the Mind of God: The Global Rise of Religious Violence, Berkeley [3]2003; Schwartz, Regina M., The Curse of Cain: The Violent Legacy of Monotheism, Chicago/London 1997; Selengut, Charles, Sacred Fury: Understanding Religious Violence, Walnut Creek 2003;

Smith-Christopher, Daniel L. (ed.), Subverting Hatred: The Challenge of Nonviolence in Religious Traditions, Maryknoll 1998; Taylor, Christopher S., Sacrifice as Terror: The Rwandan Genocide of 1994, New York 1999.

→ Apocalypse, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Fundamentalism, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Holy War, Jihad, Martyr, Northern Ireland, Peace, Religion, Terrorism, War

Tobias Pflüger

Muslim they have captured in → Bosnia, in 1992 during 'ethnic cleansing,' is a cynical parody of a rite: the act of baptism, performed without authorization, and in the absence of religious specialists. It serves solely to humiliate and subject the enemy. And the reporter-photographer takes on his role willy-nilly in the evil play. (Hubert Mohr)

Confucianism

Life of Confucius

1. Confucianism is the philosophical tradition of China, coming down from Kong Qiu, later named Kong zi, or Kong fuzi, 'Master Kong.' In the seventeenth century, the → Jesuits Latinized the name to 'Confucius.' Little is known about Confucius (551–479 BCE) with certitude. According to some assertions, he lived 'without rank and in low relations' (Lun yu, 9:6), presumably a member of the lower nobility. Nevertheless, he received an education in writing, archery, and music. He is thought to have held two posts in the ministry of the little state of Lu, but then to have forsaken his homeland in disappointment. Moving through the courts of one principality after another, he offered himself to their respective rulers as a specialist in questions of rite, and as a political adviser. Finally, he journeyed back to Lu, where he founded a school in which he taught 'right behavior for courts' (etiquette), as well as the quintessence of his experience in dealing with rulers and students. He taught under a motto: "I transmit, but devise nothing new. I believe in the old, and love it" (Lun yu, 7).

Teaching

2. Confucius lived in a time of radical political change. Vying feudal lords had come to restrict their acknowledgement of the Chou kings to that of figureheads of a ritual institution, changing alliances left and right as they struggled for supremacy. Toward the end of Confucius's life, the situation escalated to the point of open civil war of all against all (Time of the Battling Kingdoms, 481–211 BCE). Now, in view of the accompanying political collapse and moral disintegration, Confucius's goal was to restore the old order. The only path to this goal, in his conviction, was to bring the kingdom back to its senses, so that it would care once more for traditional values. The ruler must conform to the ideal of the true king, as realized in the first Chou kings: he must reign by virtue and justice, and perform the rites in exemplary wise. Only so long as he thus conducted himself, was his rule legitimized by the tian ming, the 'mandate from heaven.' The true king rules by his good example. There was only one way out of the general crisis: an implementation of the gradual moral perfectibility of every individual. Only if all lived by the proverb, "What you do not wish yourself, do not do to others" (Lun yu, 15:24), could the world be improved. Expressed positively, everyone should live 'co-humanity' (ren), with reverence or 'piety' (xiao) as its root; children's respect for their elders, in life as in death, and 'brotherly obedience' (di)—the submission of the younger brother to the elder—are to be cultivated. Among the further components of a right lifestyle in the Confucian sense are the five virtues: deference, gentleness, uprightness, seriousness, and goodness. The requirement of piety and brotherly obedience establishes a strictly hierarchical ordering of society in the cultures of East Asia influenced by Confucianism. "Owing to their inherent characteristics," the Master says, "human beings are respectively near; still, owing to their diverse practice (xi,) they are respectively remote" (Lun yu, 17:2), and thus, by way of a corresponding training and education, they can be improved. Confucians saw one of their urgent tasks in the training both of teachers-to-be, and of future official government employees.

Cult of the Ancestors

3. Tradition attributes to Confucius a number of treasured pronouncements. (Pupil) Zilu asked how one ought to serve the (ancestral) spirits (→ Ancestors). "The Master replied: How can one who fails to understand how to serve human beings, serve the spirits?" (Lun yu, 11:12); or, "The Master spoke: The one bent entirely on tasks that regard the people, and attends to the Numinous [lit., 'specters and spirits'] without approaching it, this one can truly be called wise" (Lun yu, 6:22). Confucius did acknowledge the supernatural, but he approached it from a distance. Here Confucian administrators saw one of their major tasks in the eradication of the local cult, observed by the population with great outlay, and even with human sacrificial offerings. While the cult of the ancestors is older than Confucianism, many Chinese today have made them equivalent: the Confucian virtue of 'piety' prescribes the pious son the observance of the cult of the ancestors, which, in the broadest sense, can be regarded as religious behavior.

Ritual and Liturgy

4. Unlike → Buddhism, → Daoism, and popular religion, Confucianism dispenses with liturgical specialists. The cult of the ancestors is performed by the eldest in the family or clan, assisted by the master of ceremonies, with other helpers, of both sexes—all members of the family. At least up until the late nineteenth century, the Jiali (the 'Family Ritual') of Zhu Xi (1130–1200) was in use. The state cult was presided over by the Emperors and their provincial counterparts by the highest administrators, with other functionaries at their side. These had been recruited through state examinations, which had been drawn up on the basis of the classic Confucian texts.

5. Confucianism can be designated a doctrine of social ethics, and as such it has marked the mentality of the Chinese for centuries. At least since the Tang Dynasty (618–907), it formed the foundation for the state examination system for administrators. On the other hand, it is difficult to call it a → religion. Consequently, it is systematically excluded today from contemporary religious lexica of the People's Republic of China. The Communists' attitude toward Confucianism has by no means been consistent. In his How One is a Good Communist, 1951, Liu Shaoqi still seeks to combine the Confucian ethics and discipline with Marxism-Leninism; while in 1973, in the framework of the Cultural Revolution, a national campaign was waged against Confucianism. There it was branded as 'representative of a doomed slaveholding aristocracy.' Meanwhile, today Confucius himself is once more the object of a certain official esteem: in 1985, a grand symposium was held in Qufu on the subject of Confucius, at which special attention was called to the superiority of his pedagogy and ethics. And in 1994 in Beijing, the International Confucius Society was launched. In Taiwan, Confucianism is a fixed element of the educational system, where values are conveyed by readings from the Confucian texts. On September 28, annually, Confucius' official birthday (also called 'Teachers Day'), a grand ceremony is held in Taipei's Temple of Confucius, while pupils and students enjoy a free day. The Confucian-legitimated ancestor cult, together with a strict hierarchical structure of society, and the ideal of the five virtues, forms the basis for close clan ties. The Chinese generally look upon worldwide networks of relationships built on family ties as prerequisite for economic success.

Literature

Sources: Ebrey, Patricia Buckley, Chu Hsi's "Family Rituals": A Twelfth-Century Chinese Manual for the Performance of Cappings, Weddings, Funerals, and Ancestral Rites, Princeton 1991; Lau, D. C., Confucius: The Analects (Lun yu), Harmondsworth 1983.

Secondary Literature: Ching, Julia, Mysticism and Kingship in China: The Heart of Chinese Wisdom, Cambridge 1997; Chow Kai-wing, The Rise of Confucian Ritualism in Late Imperial China, Palo Alto 1994; Ebrey, Patricia Buckley, Confucianism and Family Rituals in Imperial China: A Social History of Writing about Rites, Princeton 1991; Metzger, Thomas A., Escape from Predicament: Neo-Confucianism and China's Evolving Political Culture, New York 1977; Wright, Arthur F. (ed.), Confucianism and Chinese Civilization, Stanford 1975.

→ Ancestors, China/Japan/Korea, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Veneration of Persons/Personality Cult

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

Conscience

1. The concept and functioning of conscience have always been controversial. An approach to the phenomenon of conscience in terms of cultural history emphasizes that, in conscience, a moral experience is expressed in which knowledge of a social norm is joined with the inner feeling of acknowledgment of this norm as one that imposes obligation. A survey of the modern sphere between the sixteenth and the twentieth centuries in Europe provides a point of departure in the fact that, during this period, there has always been a norm-defining class of theologians and philosophers (today broadened to include psychologists, sociologists, and so on) that seeks to formulate, at the seam between a 'scholarly culture' and a 'popular culture,' the norms of conscience perceived as necessary for the continuing existence of society, along with the mechanisms of their sanction. For the supervision of conscience, there is a broad spectrum of instances, in pastoral ministries ranging from Catholic → confession to elements of Protestantism, although here individual confession has practically disappeared. Neither must it be overlooked that norms of conscience have been inculcated not only in the worshiping community, but—since the pedagogical reforms of the Age of Enlightenment—in the modern 'bourgeois' family, as well. Today, along with the 'de-churching' of daily life, an extensive 'de-familyizing' has also come upon the scene, so that society confronts the sometimes-problematic phenomenon of a molding of conscience in 'peer groups.'

2. In the area of German Protestantism, → Luther's terrifying experience of conscience, oriented toward God and hoping upon rescue in justifying grace, has not gained general currency. Ministers treat the conscience of their community members as knowledge of the biblical norms, whose binding force, however, must be supplied only by a rewarding or punishing God. This religious approach to conscience, while at first prevailing in society, entered a crisis in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. In the first place, the old localization of the places of reward and punishment in heaven and hell was made obsolete by a new cosmology. The unfathomable God of wrath and grace became the God of the → Enlightenment, the Father who loved all persons equally. But the deciding experience was that the limited religious conscience of the clashing confessions turned out to be unserviceable for peace. It is the great achievement of the seventeenth-century philosophers (Descartes, Hobbes, Spinoza) to have deprived the confessionally bound conscience of its value and binding force, and sketched new strategies for control of the affect.

Enlightenment

Only against the background of a cultural stabilization reached in this way is it possible to speak of a new emergence of conscience in the eighteenth century. The rough draft of the basic structures of modern conscience is Kant's. No longer can there be a voice of God within us. It must be explained from a self-doubling of the 'I.' Kant has also placed virtue and grace in a new relation. In all delineations of Lutheran orthodoxy or Pietism, the grace of morality must lead the way, for it was vain to imagine the human being, weakened by original → sin, to be able to achieve any good at all. Kant reversed this conclusion. Virtue is followed by a hypothetical grace. Even the emotional side of conscience begins to change in the eighteenth century. What the worship community had foundered on, the family now takes upon itself: a rearing in the climate of an all-pervading love. At the same time, the social extent of the new education is now intimated: it is valid for the middle class, but not transferable a priori to the lower classes of town and country, which have a different family structure.

3. The nineteenth century wrestled free of the bond that had enthralled conscience, in the history of philosophy, since the Enlightenment. If conscience is no longer directed vertically, toward God, but toward a better future for humanity, then it stands or falls with the credibility of the teleological designs of history. With criticism of these designs, their subjective appendage, conscience, is also called into question. Schopenhauer solves it by 'fifths.' Conscience is one-fifth fear of human beings, one-fifth deisidaimonia ('fear of God'), one-fifth prejudice, one-fifth vanity, and one-fifth habit.[1] Nietzsche offers a genetic explanation, treating conscience as the turning of one's cruel, gruesome instincts, as soon as they no longer dare express themselves, upon the very 'I.' However, the nineteenth century as a whole still held to the Kantian concept of duty—true, now receiving its content from the state. This nationalizing of conscience began as early as the anti-Napoleonic wars. The years 1813, 1871, 1914 later formed the turning points of a German identity, which, at the beginning of the twentieth century, took on increasingly popular traits.

Nationalization of Conscience in Germany

After the First World War had been lost, this German conscience uncoupled itself from the ridiculed 'world conscience' of the People's Federation. For Heidegger, conscience is an understanding of the challenge of the 'call,' and a resolute 'design of the self upon one's very own being-guilty,' a project prepared for anguish.[2] For the existence, for which it is a matter of its own ability to be, this call is a rescue from entanglement in the irrelevant anonymity of a present set forth as a critique of civilization. In 1945, Paul Tillich called this conscience 'transmoral.' "The good, transmoral conscience consists in the acceptance of the evil moral conscience, which is inescapable wherever decisions are encountered and deeds done."[3] This pre-exoneration of evil moral behavior through good transmoral behavior is shown in the trauma of the Germans. They had shown themselves to be helpless before history, and must now overcome morality in order once more to attain to the power that invests history. This was the point of departure in 1933. It is the monstrosity of → National Socialism to have extensively succeeded in anchoring the genocide of the Jews to a good 'German conscience,' as a burdensome but necessary task. Hannah Arendt has pointed out that the content of Himmler's notorious speech of October 4, 1943, in Posen, was precisely this.[4] To awake from the 'destiny delirium' of 1933 (G. Benn) is identical with the rediscovery of a moral conscience short of what had been its ideological overlaying. Of course, it must be admitted that this occurred only with a small part of the German population, in the various facets of the resistance.

4. Since then, the conscience of the Germans has struggled with this invasion of morality. A first reaction was to expel a vulnerability to seduction, by way of an ideological conscience. Since the 1960s, the effort has been to identify with the victims, without any reflection on whether this would even be possible. This tactic has produced a commercialized perplexity that has bonded itself to artistry. The so emphatically vowed 'work of grieving,' however, can be done only if one knows that one must deliver oneself from all casts of a transmoral conscience referred to history.

1. Schopenhauer, Arthur, "Preisschrift über die Grundlage der Moral," in: Werke in fünf Bänden, ed. Ludger Lutkehaus, Zurich 1988, 3:548.
2. Heidegger, Martin, Sein und Zeit, Tübingen, 1953, 296f. (Engl. ed. New York 1972).
3. Tillich, Paul, "Das transmoralische Gewissen," in: Gesammelte Werke, Stuttgart 1965, 3:69.
4. Arendt, Hannah, Eichmann in Jerusalem: Ein Bericht von der Banalität des Bösen, Munich 1964, 139f. (Engl. ed. Harmondsworth 1994).

Literature

Baylor, Michael G., Action and Person: Conscience in Late Scholasticism and the Young Luther, Leiden 1977; Bebbington, David W., The Nonconformist Conscience: Chapel and Politics, 1870–1914, London/Boston 1982; Blühdorn, Jürgen (ed.), Das Gewissen in der Diskussion, Darmstadt 1976; Hübsch, Stefan, Philosophie und Gewissen. Beiträge zur Rehabilitierung des philosophischen Gewissensbegriffs, Göttingen 1995; Kittsteiner, Heinz Dieter, Die Entstehung des modernen Gewissens, Frankfurt/M. 1991; Idem, "Das deutsche Gewissen im 20. Jahrhundert," in: Faber, Richard (ed.), Politische Religion—religiöse Politik, Würzburg 1997, 227-242; Langston, Douglas C., Concience and Other Virtues: From Bonaventure to MacIntyre, University Park 2001; van Til, L. John, Liberty and Conscience: The History of a Puritan Idea, Nutley 1972.

→ Confession, Ethics/Morals, Memory, Psyche

Heinz D. Kittsteiner

Constitution

Concept

1. Since the Enlightenment, the concept of the constitution has been equated with that of the → laws that ground and organize the exercise of rule in a state. Generally, these laws are gathered into a single document of their own and placed above the other, simple, laws.

Originally, 'Constitution' (Lat., c*onstitutio*, 'setting together') meant the compilation of different elements into a unified structure. Just as we speak of the constitution of a person in terms of health, the constitution of a state consisted not only in the law, but in the conspectus of all of the factors determining the common entity. True, even the Constitutiones of Roman law meant the laws of the Emperor, which had the highest rank and importance. In the Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation the concept of fundamental laws emerges, which referred to the fundamental orders of law, such as the Westphalian peace agreements (1648).

Emergence of Modern Constitutions

2. The social depository of modern constitutional thinking was the middle class of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, as it struggled to rise. The primary interest was to limit or eliminate the power of the absolute ruler, which was frequently experienced as arbitrary. The economic and social interests of the middle class called for the sovereignty of the individual, the broadest possible exclusion of state interference in economic and social life, and the fundamental accountability of state actions. Thus, constitutional thinking appeals to the idea of natural right, which assigns the individual certain rights as inalienable, and not merely vouchsafed by person in power. From this line of thought the notion of the social contract developed, according to which the individual, autonomous members of a society regulate their relations with one another in relations of contract, as well as stipulating their relation to state power in terms of a legality. Since individuals are conferring a part of their sovereignty on a third instance, through a contractual relationship, the state is now constituted as a new sovereign. The great philosophers of the social contract were Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Thomas Hobbes, and John Locke (→ Secularization; Civil Religion; Enlightenment).

Where contracts could not be established by the violent overthrow of the old orders of rule, as had been the case in the French → Revolution of 1789, the absolutist rulers seized upon the concept of the constitution and guaranteed the demanded rights insofar as they were necessary for economic development, but did not actually call the absolute power of the ruling houses into question (e.g., the constitutions of German states, beginning in 1830, as constitutional monarchies).

Content of Constitutions

3. As a rule, documents of constitution are divided into three successive parts: (a) basic rights, (b) procedures relative to the formation of the will of the body politic, and to the transmission of power to the state, and (c) the basic principles whereby the state itself is to function. Among the principles of function fall, especially: the definition of state responsibilities (tasks), the rules for the collection and application of taxes, and the erection and tasks of the independent jurisdiction that tests state behavior in terms of their legality. The rules for the formation of the political will refer to the position of parties in the state, of the work procedures of the parliaments and their committees, and the competencies of the democratic instruments.

Basic Rights

The basic rights are to be distinguished into liberal and social basic rights. Liberal basic rights are also called rights of liberty. They ground (a) the liberties of the individual (freedom of ownership, freedom of profession and trade, freedom of association, freedom of religion), (b) the rights of defense against the state (inviolability of domicile, along with postal and 'distance' communications, telephone and telegraph), as also (c) the legal position of the members of a society, among themselves and vis-à-vis the state (principle of equality, prohibition of discrimination, right to the orderly and customary practice of the courts, prohibition of retroactivity of the laws). Social basic rights developed out of the demands of the labor movement of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Their purpose is a participation in societal life on the basis of equality of rights. Thus, the democratic principle was widened (equal electoral rights for all social classes, woman's electoral rights), and the rights of claim against the state were founded (right to education, right to work, right of alienation and bequest of private property).

Religions in Constitutions

4. In their concrete determination, constitutions are the expression of a compromise among the various forces of society. Compromise is also visible in the arrangement of the details of religious freedom, and the position of the religious communities.

The basic right to → freedom of religion comports a negative face and a positive one. The negative right of religious freedom is the freedom of the individual to belong to any religious community or none, or to leave the community at will. The positive right of religious freedom is the right of individuals and religious communities to the unimpeded exercise and practice of their belief. Religious freedom must also preclude endorsement of religion either by the state or by religious communities. On the other hand, the position of individual communities in the various constitutions reflects relations of power at the time of the generation of the constitution. The right to confessional religious education, and to a privileged position in the Basic Law of the Federal Republic of Germany legalized in terms of the constitution, shows the strength of the Christian Churches immediately after 1945, so that only a 'hobbling' separation of state and church was effectuated. In other countries, separation of state and church was more closely specified under diverse historical conditions (e.g., France under the anticlerical tradition of the French Revolution, the United States under the experience of European immigration). In Sweden, on the other hand, the connection and reciprocal patronage of church and state continued until 1995. But furthermore, as a rule, freedom of religion and the position of religious communities are concretized in the ordinary laws. Thus, many countries, in their formal constitutional acknowledgment of religious freedom, have created regulations that prefer the traditional churches, and are meant to prevent the appearance of new religions (e.g., in Russia, but also in Austria).

Competing Norms

5. These few examples show that constitutions are burdened with several structural problems. Their character of compromise not only reflects the relations of power at the time of their appearance, but also leaves free spaces open for the further development of the constitutions. In certain points, constitutions can even be read as a program to which reality does not yet correspond (e.g., equality of women, principle of the social state). It is further possible that the instrument documenting a constitution has adopted competing norms, which, in a given case of conflict, might necessitate a balancing of one element of law against another. In order to solve such problems, to interpret the constitution, and to develop it further, appeal is usually made to superior principles. These principles may be deduced from a comprehensive view of all of the constitutional norms (concordance), or they may exist apart from the constitutional text. These may be → human rights, but they may also be religious principles. In Islamic states, for example, reference is made to the Sharia (→ Islam), against which all constitutional norms must be measured, and through which, as well, conflicts between appeals to religious law and to a Western-influenced constitution are decided.

A few states—Great Britain and Israel, for instance—have no documents of constitution fixed in writing. Nonetheless, even here superior constitutional principles have value, and basic rights work their effects on simple laws. This effect follows from a historically formed recognition of basic rights as constituting a superior law, and is concretized both in the molding of the simple law, and by way of the legal determinations of the courts.

Literature

Abendroth, Wolfgang, Antagonistische Gesellschaft und politische Demokratie, Neuwied 1967; Bilder, Mary Sarah, The Transatlantic Constitution: Colonial Legal Culture and the Empire, Cambridge/London 2004; Blaustein, Albert P./Sigler, Jay A. (eds.), Constitutions That Made History, New York 1988 (collection of constitutions issued from 1639 to 1920); Böckenförde, Ernst-Wilhelm, Staat, Verfassung, Demokratie, Frankfurt/M. 1991; Boldt, Hans, Einführung in die Verfassungsgeschichte, Düsseldorf 1983; Dahl, Robert A., How Democratic is the American Constitution?, New Haven 2001; Friedrich, Carl J., Transcendent Justice: The Religious Dimension of Constitutionalism, Durham 1964; Gordon, Scott, Controlling the State: Constitutionalism from Ancient Athens to Today, Cambridge 1999; Hardin, Russell, Liberalism, Constitutionalism, and Democracy, Oxford 1999; Lane, Jan-Erik, Constitutions and Political Theory, Manchester 1996; Neumann, Franz, Demokratischer und autoritärer Staat, Frankfurt/M. 1986; Powell, H. Jefferson, A Community Built on Words: The Constitution in History and Politics, Chicago 2002; Tierney, Brian, Religion, Law, and the Growth of Constitutional Thought, 1150–1650, Cambridge 1982; Witte, Jr., John, Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment: Essential Rights and Liberties, Boulder 2000.

→ Civil Religion, Democracy, Freedom of Religion, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Human Rights, Law

Steffen Rink

Conversion

Determination of the Concept

1. 'Conversion' (Lat, conversio, 'return,' 'transformation') denotes a transit from one religious community to another, most often in connection with a new religious experience. Originally, in Christianity, conversi denoted non-ordained monks or women in a religious community/→ order. Later, the concept was broadened to apply to Jews who had converted to Christianity, and to fallen-away Catholics who had returned to the Church. Since the Reformation, the concept has also been applied to the case of a confessional changeover within Christianity. Today, it is understood to include a general changeover between organized religions or worldviews.

Conversion in Non-Christian Religions

2. Many religions have developed particular methods for the incorporation of new members. The respective prerequisites and initiations underlie the internal directions and tendencies of a religion, and are variously regulated by religious law, as well as nationally and institutionally. In →Buddhism, the concept 'conversion' denotes entry into monastic Buddhism, which entails a renunciation of secular life, and dissolves all social bonds. Whether conversion also represents a Buddhist's exchange of one school of Buddhism for another is disputed. The same holds true for the various ways of salvation in the Hindu religious system, or for the guru movements of Sikhism. In → Judaism, 'conversion' designates the process of entry into the Jewish community. In → Islam, it denotes reception into the Islamic community through the pronunciation of the profession of faith (sahada). A special case is represented by simultaneous membership in several religions, as we find it, for example, in Japan (frequently, → Shintô and Buddhism). We can also, however, speak of conversion in the case of a complementation of one 'religious truth' with one or more others, since a conversion always implies leaving the 'old faith,' and dissolving one's current community membership.

Conversion of Groups

3. Over the course of religious history, religions have repeatedly introduced conversion under various degrees of constraint. Especially in the case of belligerent confrontations, or in → theocracies, the prevailing power has forced subjects or minorities to make a change in religions (→ Conflict/Violence, illustration). But even disadvantages of tolerated religions, such as special social, economic, or juridical positions, have led to conversions to the dominating religion, from which one has then hoped for protection and improvement of one's own situation. Thus, Islam once knew different taxation for Muslims and for the faithful of other written religions (Judaism or Christianity), which, because of the higher rate of taxation, led to crossovers to Islam. A spectacular mass conversion occurred in the modern age, when some five million Indians emulated the adoption of Buddhism by attorney B. B. Ambedkar (d. 1956), to demonstrate opposition to Hindu discrimination against the casteless.

Outer and Inner Conversion

4. In the case of individual conversions, a distinction is to be drawn between internal and external conversion. Outer or outward conversion means a formal exchange of religions that can be motivated by one's need for personal security, in the presence of religio-political pressure, by the hope of obtaining a confessionally connected employment position, or obtained through the use of social institutions to be found in the administration of religious communities. Inner or inward conversion denotes an 'exchange' motivated by personal conviction, and is accompanied by an acknowledgment and acceptance of the doctrinal content and religious praxis of the newly selected religious community, as well as by embracing its postulated path of salvation and formal religious profession ('confession' of faith or belief). Such a movement or 'con-version' is often described as a deep-reaching process transpiring within the soul. Indeed, the course of a conversion is usually beset with conflict, both in the process of separation from the old religious community, and in the various phases of the new connection. The grounds of a conversion are manifold. Converts sometimes cite reasons that fail to do justice to the complexity of the actual phenomenon, just as may their frequent one-dimensional attempts at explanation (e.g., loss of orientation, structure of unconscious needs, 'psycho-structure,' 'brain-washing'). Nor is a sudden, subjectively experienced occurrence, such as a 'divine revelation' or direct enlightenment, always the cause of a conversion. It can just as well be the result of a rational confrontation with the religion's content. Far more often, however, conversion is the result of personal social contact with members of the new community, inasmuch as this manner of relation so frequently plays an essential role in the convert's coming to a decision. The conversion experiences reported by members can become important exemplars for converts. Too, migrants' 'exchange of religious milieu' (K. Goldammer) can motivate the desire for an exchange of religions, as can missionary and promotion activities. The religious market with its competitive situation has partially led to the development of refined promotional methods (→ Economy). For example, the organization of renewal and awakening movements (→ Charismatic Movements), with their occasional character of a 'media show,' serves to attract new members. For the individuals themselves, a conversion can readily lead to the intensification of an unfamiliar self-image and to alienation, but in other cases may introduce a positive, richer ego-development.

Literature

Buckser, Andrew/Glazier, Stephen D. (eds.), The Anthropology of Religious Conversion, Lanham 2003; Goldammer, Kurt, Die Formenwelt des Religiösen, Stuttgart 1960; James, William, The Varieties of Religious Experience: A Study in Human Nature, London 1952 ([1]1902); Leone, Massimo, Religious Conversion and Identity: The Semiotic Analysis of Texts, London 2004; Mills, Kenneth/Grafton, Anthony (eds.), Conversion: Old Worlds and New, Rochester 2003; Mohr, Hubert, "Konversion," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 3 (1993), 436-445; Muldoon, James (ed.), Varieties of Religious Conversion in the Middle Ages, Gainesville 1997.

→ Apostasy, Confession, Group (religious), Initiation, Proselytes, Psychoanalysis

Daniela Weber

Cosmology / Cosmogony

Emergence of the World

1. Cosmogonies (Gk., kosmogonía, 'world-origin') are explanatory models, developed by persons of nearly all times and cultures, describing the origin of the world around them, and of the conditions of life that they find there. Inasmuch, then, as cosmogonies not only refer to the genesis of specific, individual circumstances of life, but reflect a world-encompassing linkage of functions, structures, or orders, they form an integral component of cosmologies (Gk., kosmología, 'doctrine of the world-whole')—that is, of concepts serving to help explicate the respective given 'present,' of any world totality, as well as, it may be, future perspectives and implications for behavior. The motives, metaphors, dramatis personae, and patterns of argumentation employed in mythical recitals, theological reflections, or ritual representations of cosmogonic or cosmological interconnections are extremely varied, since they ordinarily reflect very diverse backgrounds in terms of specific culture and time. Hence it is only in geographically and historically connected cultural spaces (e.g., the → Ancient East), or in religions that build on common traditions (e.g., Judaism, Christianity, and Islam), that we find correspondences that reach beyond singular parallels in motif (e.g., creation from an egg, through birth, by way of artisanship, by the word, etc.).

Extra-European conceptualizations bearing on cosmogony or cosmology are therefore difficult to see, to unify, in the perspective so 'obvious' to Western thought: that of creation as an event occurring at the beginning of time and history. The Indian Yuga doctrine, for example, of a descending succession of world ages, involves neither a singular event occurring at the absolute 'beginning,' nor a history developing in an extensively linear direction and hastening to a goal or end. For the Indian concept, instead, an understanding of time and life abides in a rotation of the unfolding and disappearance of worlds, so that, in this context, cosmogonies form and depict not only the 'beginning,' but also the necessary sequel: the end of a given age. Again as an iterative event, although an event of the present, the process of the creation of the world is actualized and rendered present, for example, among the Cheyenne Indians, in a shamanic ritual. This ceremony wields the conception that not only the main or outstanding elements of the landscape, but every (consequential) sort of beast, and even individuals of the human community, are set in the world order with ritual rectitude. Clearly, then, it is not an outline of world history, with its integration of past and future, that stands at the center of this cosmogonic and cosmological concept; it is rather the constitution of the individual in her and his function for the present social community.

Explanatory Models of the Conditions of Human Life

2. Cosmogonic portrayals, which report the formation of a comprehensive world scenario, are often interlaced with narratives of the origin of gods ('theogony') and/or human beings ('anthropogony'). The origin of the existing world—in Hesiod's celebrated Theogony, as in the Japanese creation myths, Kojiki and Nihongi—rests on the transformation, over several successive generations, of a multiplicity of divinities into material components of the cosmos, into elementary conditions of life and the environment, or into affects of the human psyche. In a very wide understanding, then, notions of the origin of the world (of human beings and gods) can be described as explanatory models of the circumstances of human life, and as a legitimization of the prevailing interpretation of the world (cosmology). They embrace scenarios of clarification and foundation for the nature and state of the geomorphological, climatic, and biological surroundings of human existence. They likewise attempt to explain and root the forms of the social organization of communities, and the duties resulting from these framing conditions for individuals or groups.

Motifs

Among the pivotal motifs of many cosmogonies is the shaping of the earth along the pattern of the → landscape image meaningful to the culture at hand. The old Central American Mayas bound their conceptualization of mountains and plains, and the origin of cypress groves and pine forests, to the creation of the earth. In the same fashion, the formation of the Nile and the annual flooding needed for agriculture in the Nile valley belonged to the fundamental motifs of the ancient Egyptian narratives of creation. The present conditions of life do not by any means always receive positive evaluation in the cosmogonical texts. A Teutonic myth describing the transformation of the primordial giant Ymir, who had originated from drops of melted ice, into earth, seas, mountains, rocks, and sky, places the human being in barren, sometimes threatening, post-ice-age surroundings.

Similarly ambivalent, or even negative, appraisals are also to be found in connection with accounts reflecting the origin of partly biological, partly societal, life circumstances (e.g., work, sickness, death). According to Babylonian myths, the gods not only have presented human kind with the demon of death, but also burdened it with the huge basket previously borne by some of the gods on their backs, the 'gods' pannier,' one of the typical work tools of Mesopotamian urban culture.

Sociopolitical components of cosmologies, as well, are found partly rooted in cosmogonic myths. Among the aspects of this founding function of cosmogonies, therefore, the function of political endorsement in certain ideas of creation is one of those most clearly worked out thus far. The myths Kôjiki and Nihongi, cited above, are examples. Conceived as a 'theogony,' they climax in an account of the divine descent of the Japanese imperial house, and of the charge of world dominion enjoined by Sun Goddess Amaterasu on her grandchild. In the meantime, new religious movements introduce isolated patterns of argumentation comparable to the ancient ones, in order to legitimize elitist configurations of rule as over against those of democratic systems. For example, the Rael Movement, as it is called, an association founded in 1974 by French sports reporter Claude Vorilhon, takes its starting point in the idea that humanity represents the result of an extraterrestrial genetic experiment (→ UFO). This movement has rooted its call for a 'geniocracy' in the analogous exemplar of its supposed extraterrestrial creator, who had communicated this state of affairs to the association's founder in an 'encounter,' that is, during a stop of its spacecraft on Earth.

Maxims for Human Behavior

Although the essential purpose of a cosmogony is to explain the factual circumstances of the world in which we live, it often contains a perspective, characteristic of the cosmology and anthropology at hand, from which maxims for human behavior are defined, at least in part. Thus, over and above the establishment of the origin of the de facto world, experienced as imperfect, the interlacement of cosmogonic narrative can even format an image of visions of an ideal world and life regimen. Christian and Islamic cosmogonies, for example, while emphasizing the perfection and harmony of the divine work of creation, at the same time stress human beings' ethical co-responsibility for the perfection of this creation. Hindu and Buddhist forms of religion, by contrast, not only reckon with a cyclical, four-phase, degeneration of morality and world order (dharma), but place the present time in the worst of these ages, the kaliyuga. However, this very package of difficult and obstinate circumstances can be interpreted as a kind of divinely calculated and initiated catalyst for human salvific and redemptive behavior. Analogously in Theravada Buddhism, only the acknowledgment that life is suffering forms the decisive prerequisite for the final breach of the cycle of rebirths.

Western reception of the concept of reincarnation—and the consequent renunciation of classic Christian cosmogonical patterns, in which the human being is part of the one God's creation—marks, on the other hand, a characteristic displacement that is cosmological and anthropological at once: here, rebirth does not, as it does in Buddhism, contain the cause of suffering, but offers the individual the hope of further life opportunities in the present existence (→ Reincarnation; Fate).

Literature

Bolle, Kees W., "Cosmology: An Overview," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 4 (1987), 100-107; Long, Charles H., "Cosmogony," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 4 (1987), 94-100; Lovin, Robin W./Reynolds, Frank E. (eds.), Cosmogony and Ethical Order: New Studies in Comparative Ethics, Chicago 1985; Zeller, Dieter (ed.), Religion im Wandel der Kosmologien, Frankfurt/M. 1999.

→ Creation, Meaning/Signification, Myth/Mythology, Origin, Time

Gregor Ahn

Creation

When nineteenth-century scientists presented the claim that they could offer an exhaustive explanation of the world, the question of how life arose became a crucial issue. Their theories were set in competition with religious accounts. The confrontation climaxed on the horns of a dilemma: what need is there for a God if nature makes itself according to eternal rules? Or: what was there before the primordial soup, the Big Bang? To establish the nonexistence of God is no longer one of the goals of → science. The creation account is simply a → myth. A modern creation story, like Steven Weinberg's The First Three Minutes: A Modern View of the Origin of the Universe (1977), likewise seeks to transpose astrophysical observations in a 'story' or 'history.' The conceptualizations that we experience fictionally in films and images of the → apocalypse are produced by other cultures in the creation account. What if there were no sun? What if beasts lorded it over human beings? What if human beings were so mighty that they need pay no attention to one other, or to right and wrong? In narrative fashion, it can be run through as another order: "Once there was a time when . . ." The goal of proving that the really existing order is the best possible, still leaves a sticking point: it is not the ideal order. After all, it is possible to imagine a better one, and this one can be changed.

→ Cosmology/Cosmogony, Fundamentalism, Origin, Religion, Theory of Evolution, Utopia

Christoph Auffarth

Crisis

The word 'crisis' derives from the Greek, and means insecurity, hazardous situation, increasing gravity, moment of decision, turning point. In Hippocratic medicine, the concept of 'crisis' indicated the high point, and turning point, of the course of an illness, since either the sickness momentarily issued in catastrophe—death—or the crisis passed and there was an improvement. The more threateningly, and 'existentially,' a life crisis is experienced, the oftener and more 'elementarily' is it coupled to the religious dimension.

Life Crises—Crises of Meaning—Movements of Religious Quest

1. The course of a crisis can peak, or merely be chronic, and is often the decisive turning point of one's life, the moment to reflect anew on one's own life situation, and to experience an interior growth conducive a possible transformation. 'Crisis' can be defined as a loss of spiritual equilibrium, not usually attributable to disease but provoked by another outer or inner occasion, or even both. A distinction can be drawn between an individual and a collective crisis: the reasons for an individual crisis need not be particular events and their objectifiable dimensions, but may instead be the subjective attitude of the individual in question toward the event, her or his conscious or unconscious fantasies and emotions or physical reaction, the objectifiable consequences of the happening, and the victim's capability of dealing with new, unfamiliar, emotional, and burdensome situations. Each individual situation can be part of a collective crisis (natural catastrophes, mass unemployment, persecution, pogrom, deportation, war, genocide).

Individually burdensome crises are crises of changes of life, traumatic crises, or neurotic crises. Crises of life-changes are more or less inevitable: leaving one's parents home, → initiation (puberty), marriage, pregnancy, the birth of a child, a change of residence, the coming of age of one's children (→ Life Cycle). Religions offer a framework for the management and control of such crises. To an extent, they may be even become required and provoked as part of one's formation as a religious specialist (for instance, a shamanistic crisis with vision quest). Traumatic crises threaten the fundamental means of one's satisfaction (social safety, social contacts, psychic identity, physical health), through a sudden event generally acknowledged as painful. Examples are: the death of someone near and dear, the diagnosis of a life-threatening disease, sudden unemployment, a threat to one's partnership through illness, death, or divorce, and external catastrophes in the sense of a collective crisis (e.g., expulsion from one's home or region as a member of a religious minority). With neurotic crises, it is a matter of the critical culmination of an existing neurotic development, such as can result from a problematic personal or especially an unfamiliar experience.

Classic occasions of a neurotic crisis are, in particular, certain interpersonal experiences, especially disappointments and illnesses, with which the victim is momentarily unable to cope, so that symptoms of a crisis may develop, for example in the form of sleeplessness, irritability, depression and mood swings, fears. Crises that are not dealt with can become chronic, can occasion the desire to commit → suicide or the development of 'post-traumatic stress.'

Acute and chronic life crises are, or lead to, crises of meaning and value. They issue from crises of relationship, from disturbances in persons' relationship to the world around them: in their rapport with their inner world and their outer world, their immediate world and their environment. The question of the 'why' of the experience of a danger leads to the question of a religious providence (→ Theodicy), to the question of incurring guilt and being guilty. Tendencies to an interiorization of the concepts of atonement and punishment among one's religious convictions, can now become experiences of urgency. Life crises frequently lead to religious quest, and at times facilitate religious → conversion.

Religious Conversion as the Experience of Evidence, and of the Solution of a Crisis

2. Under 'religious conversion,' William James understood a sudden or gradual process supervening through which a self, divided until now, and experiencing itself as false, inferior, and unhappy, becomes whole again, and consciously experiences itself as just, precious, and happy, as a result of one's now surer standpoint vis-à-vis religious realities. Conversion and transformation can be experienced as a dramatic alteration in personality—as a 'Saul-Paul experience,' accompanied by a radical reorientation of one's identity. But conversion can also mean simply a change of commitment, or, for example, the abandonment of the power of an addiction. Through conversion, persons' basic psycho-social needs are satisfied, as they go in quest of fulfillment: with the sense of believing intensely, and with the sense of 'belonging.' Both of these experiences condition an increase in a feeling of self-worth and in self-respect.

Explanatory Models

Explanatory models of religious conversion can be reduced to the following six (Klosinski 1996). Points of departure are:

(1) As predisposing factors, situations of psychic conflict (crises of identity, stress, etc.) are often at hand, which, through the conversion process, can undergo—suddenly or gradually—a certain release.

(2) Existing personal relations or the construction of emotional ties to members of the religious group play an essential role, be it for motivation of the conversion or for the conversion process itself.

(3) Psycho-dynamically, conversion either denotes a regression leading to a dependency or a progression equivalent to a stabilization or integration.

(4) A savior (guru, leader, messiah), a redemptive principle (ideology and program), and a redeemed family (members of the movement), represent factors found especially in all (neo-) religious movements, to all of whom or which a decisive meaning for conversion is ascribed.

(5) Specific 'offers' on the part of the religious group correspondingly attract 'apt' potential converts. Then the respective personality variables and the sort of psychic conflict at hand lead to the selection or discovery of the respective specific movement.

(6) Often decisive for conversion is the experience of extraordinary or 'dissociative' states (e.g., a short-term loss of awareness of one's identity), and these states can coincide with the conversion experience itself, or with an interpretation of the experience as a demonstration of the occurrence of the conversion. Thereby, an experience of conversion would be an experience of proof (→ Visions/Auditory Experience).

From time to time, religious groups attempt to influence and manipulate pre-converts massively (→ Anti-Cult Movements). Forced creation of extraordinary states of consciousness (such as hyperventilation, extreme forms of meditation, dancing in trance, etc.) produces the perception of the extraordinary, the special, that is then taken for a demonstration of the divine, and/or taken in a connection with the religious movement. This involves the production of familiar, psycho-physiologically explainable states of consciousness, in which interior images and thinking in terms of a 'primary process' are possible, that is, thinking and fantasizing not censored by the ego.

Crisis Management and the Sharpening of a Crisis through Receipt of Religious Influence

3. Many crises of life changes, like neurotic crises, represent crises of relationship. Persons under such burdens get control of themselves and stabilize, if they are then gathered in and supported by a religious community. Positive images of the divine (e.g. the Good Shepherd, the Guardian Angel) that symbolize forgiving, reconciling aspects that heal inner fractures, can lead to an enduring crisis control. A crisis always grows acute, on the other hand, when interiorized images of the divine or God lead to exaggerated self-incrimination, self-contempt, and self-punishment, as with not a few compulsive-neurotic individuals who are beset by religious problems. In this connection, one is dealing with 'religious neuroses' (Hark 1990), or even 'ecclesiogenic neuroses' (→ Psychopathology). Anorexic young women, for example, are often confronted with a 'double morals' in their role as women: they stand between 'sinful Eve' and 'pure Mary.' They perceive soul and body as 'radically irreconcilable images' in the Cartesian sense. They suppress their oral and sexual needs and are tormented by an almighty super-ego. Images of God as a God of retribution and punishment, anchored in these patients, are often the images they have to work with, and that they have received from their religious upbringing as they strive with their consciences. A depressive decompensation (reactive depressive illness) can be seen as a 'pathological final lap of a religious struggle,' especially in the case of someone who has received a rigid, rigorous religious training (Hole 1994; → Asceticism; Fundamentalism).

Exit or exclusion from a religious community is often accompanied by the personal experience of a crisis, with a depressive upset and loss of orientation, in some circumstances matched with guilt feelings vis-à-vis those whom one has left behind.

Threatening or incipient spiritual crises may be manically repulsed, in the framework of an affective psychosis with pathological forms of ecstatic exhilaration. Psychopathologically striking—especially hallucinatory—behavior has always been interpreted in many religious groups as → possession, conditioned by evil spirits and → demons, to be dealt with in a spiritual or religious framework, for example with the help of a shaman, a spirit healer, or an exorcist (→ Exorcism).

4. A religious upbringing or influencing is Janus-headed: it can be fortunate or hazardous. Persons in life crises are therefore, on the one hand, especially compliant and receptive to alternative religious pictures of the world, especially when the latter are conveyed through persons offering relationship and reliability. But life crises in the sense of a reorientation, transformation, and maturation can also open a previously unknown religious dimension that will then contribute to an appeasement of conflicts of spiritual ambivalence.

Literature

GROF, Stanislav/GROV, Christina (eds.), Spiritual Emergency: When Personal Transformation Becomes a Crisis, Los Angeles 1989; HARK, Helmut, Religiöse Neurosen—Ursachen und Heilung, Stuttgart 1990; HOLE, Günter, "Die depressive Dekompensation—pathologische Endstrecke einer religiösen Anstrengung," in: KLOSINSKI, Gunther (ed.), Religion als Chance oder Risiko, Bern 1994, 209-222; JAMES, William, Varieties of Religious Experience: A Study in Human Nature, New York 1902; KLOSINSKI, Gunther, Psychokulte. Was Sekten für Jugendliche so attraktiv macht, Munich 1996; LEUNER, Hanscarl, Guided Affective Imagery: Mental Imagery in Short-Term Psychotherapy: The Basic Course, New York 1984; PETIT, Jorge R., Handbook of Emergency Psychiatry, Philadelphia 2004.

→ Conversion, Psyche, Psychopathology

Gunther Klosinski

Criticism of Religion

From Mythos to Logos?

1. In comparison with the various religions, philosophy and the sciences, both physical and natural, are of late appearance. As demonstrated by the emergence of Greek philosophy in the sixth century BCE, they emerged from a criticism of the religious apprehensions and praxis of their time. Philosophy, which always understands itself as, among other things, criticism of religion, sees itself confronted with the task of demythologizing the world, and of leading culture from 'mythos to logos.' Such a conception, however, presupposes two assumptions that are problematic in today's view. One is that mythos itself is pre-logical and presupposes a kind of primitive consciousness. A second assumption, closely akin to the first, is that the transition from mythos to logos is an evolution, in the sense of a → progress, and that it represents a higher development. Both assumptions presume an understanding of culture whose norm is European development. But since Lévi-Strauss, research in anthropology has shown that such concepts precisely contain scraps of a European self-consciousness, as was characteristic of cultural science of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth. The same holds for criticism of religion on the part of → Marxism as well, which explains religion as 'opium for the people.' Here as well, the point of departure is that religions presuppose, or engender, certain forms of 'weak intelligence.' Akin to this position is the critique of religion mounted by Sigmund → Freud, who likewise sees religion as a pre-logical field, in which all forms of → psychopathology appear once more.

The Scientific Concept

2. A scientific concept of the criticism of religion must take its distance from all of these notions, and appropriate a concept of criticism such as Kant developed in his critical philosophy. Here, criticism is a self-critique on the part of → reason, which creates elucidation of the possibilities and limitations of knowledge. Criteria are laid down corresponding to reason itself, first and foremost the criterion of freedom. But historically it was not Kant, but J. W. G. Fichte who was the first to write a critical treatise on religion. Relying on Kant, and in a work originally taken for Kant's, his work on religion, Versuch einer Kritik aller Offenbarung ("Attempt at a Critique of All Revelation"; 1791), we find the basic principle of all criticism of religion: that of testing all religious revelations on whether they can be justified, and represented, ethically. As Kant says, for his own part, in Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft ("Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone"; 1796), which appeared shortly after Fichte's essay, ethics must come before religion; but, on the other hand, morality leads undeviatingly to religion. In agreement with Fichte, Kant says that, as moral legislator, God can reveal nothing contrary to the principles of morality. Consequently, God cannot reveal himself on the strength of a supra-reasonable authority, but, in his revelation, himself submits to the principles of reason. A revelation proclaiming anything non-reasonable, or actually against reason, is to be rejected, and held for superstition. This connection of revelation with reason not only establishes a critical boundary for the possibility of revelation, but, more than this, actually offers the content that will be normative for a revelation. Consequently, a revelation has to present, and render available, nothing but the moral law, which Kant has found in the 'categorical imperative': "Act in such a way that the maxim of your will could at any time be a general law" (→ Ethics/Morals). Freedom, immortality, and God are notions that make this law plain. Therefore they are the proper content of revelation—only insofar, however, as they give moral behavior, as specified by the categorical imperative, a goal and purpose.

Accordingly, by no means is the criticism of religion → atheism, but a claim and attempt to try revelations as to their truth content. According to the meaning of criticism as found in idealism, according to which reason is to conduct a critical confrontation with all presuppositions of experience, criticism of religion is the critical investigation of, and confrontation with, human beings' religious experience. Even there, the basic approach of a criticism of religion is maintained, even where the criticism of religion is no longer to be ordered to a Kantian and generally idealistic philosophy. This outline is valid for the greatest critics of religion of the end of the nineteenth century, Ludwig Feuerbach (1804–1872) and Friedrich → Nietzsche. From Feuerbach comes the pronouncement, which became so well known, that in religions humans project wishful thinking, through which they find justification. Not even for Nietzsche does the criticism of religion comport a rejection of religion. He rejects only the Judaeo-Christian religion, which he holds to be the offspring of the resentments of the weak. This resentment has produced the falsification of moral values, and the transformation to their contrary. For Nietzsche, this is especially verified in the dislocation of the meaning of good and evil, which were not originally contradictory, but—in correspondence with the derivation of gut (Ger., 'good') from reich ('rich'), and schlecht ('evil') from schlicht ('plain,' 'unpretentious')—expressed the gradations of nobility. Meanwhile,

Nietzsche goes on, the Judaeo-Christian belief, in crass contrast with this, makes precisely the selfless good, and all self-interest, all egoism immoral in one fell swoop. Just as a religion of the weak has materialized in this reversal of values, Nietzsche proclaims a new 'religion of the strong one,' and makes 'Zarathustra' its prophet.

It is precisely Nietzsche's criticism of religion that has had far-reaching effects on the cultural history of the twentieth century. Thus, Nietzsche has become one of the greatest inspirers of new mythology (→ New Myths/New Mythologies), as well as of research into mythology and religious studies itself.

Is Religious Speech Non-signifying?

4. Criticism of religion penetrates the root of the discussion still further when it finds that an analysis of religious propositions shows them to be illogical. Beginning with Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889–1951) and his school, criticism here is directed towards religious speech itself. A chief criterion here is the examination of the 'suspicion of non-signification or senselessness.' Thus, propositions about God are non-signifying, on the basis of their actual content; but they involve religious feelings, such as reverence, or the feeling of being loved, and posit therein a relation among human beings. But with the theory of the 'speech act,' going back mainly to John Austin (1911–1960), the content and function of speech, which distinguish speech from its various act forms, can be identified (→ Language).

This direction is also the one taken by the criticism of religion growing out of the ethics of Emmanuel Lévinas (1905–1995) and his distinction between 'totality' and the 'infinite.' While totality indicates the attempt to grasp transcendence with a concept or system of thought, the infinite stands for the fundamental unavailability of transcendence presented by 'the other' and its 'visage.' The unavailability of transcendence is experienced in an 'atheism of the soul' (Lévinas's appellation), in which human beings experience themselves as being altogether 'on their own.'

Literature

Sources: Austin, John, How to Do Things with Words, Oxford 1962; Engels, Friedrich, Über Religion, Berlin 1958; Feuerbach, Ludwig, Vorlesung über das Wesen der Religion. Nebst Zusätzen und Anmerkungen (1846), in: Werke 6, Berlin 1984 (Engl.: Essence of Religion, Amherst 2004); Fichte, Johann Gottlieb Wilhelm, Schriften zur Religionsphilosophie, in: Werke 5, Berlin 1971; Freud, Sigmund, Der Mann Moses und die monotheistische Religion, Frankfurt/M. [9]1997 ([1]1939) (Engl.: Moses and Monotheism, New York 1955); Kant, Immanuel, Die Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der bloßen Vernunft. Die Metaphysik der Sitten (1793/1797), Berlin/New York 1969 (see Kant, Immanuel, Religion and Rational Theology [The Cambridge Edition of the Works of Immanuel Kant], Cambridge 1996); Lévinas, Emmanuel, Totalité et infini: essai sur l'extériorité, Paris 1961; Marx, Karl/Engels, Friedrich, Über Religion, Berlin 1958 (Engl.: On Religion, New York 1964); Marx, Karl, Fragen der Gesellschaft/Ursprünge der Religion, Studienausgabe vol. 9, Frankfurt/M. 1989; Nietzsche, Friedrich, Also sprach Zarathustra, Kritische Studienausgabe 4 (Engl.: Thus Spoke Zarathustra: A Book for Everyone and No One, London 1969); Idem, Jenseits von Gut und Böse. Zur Genealogie der Moral, Kritische Studienausgabe 5, [2]1988 (Engl.: Beyond Good and Evil: Prelude to a Philosophy of the Future, London 1973); Wittgenstein, Ludwig, Philosophische Untersuchungen, Frankfurt/M. 1977 ([1]1958) (Engl.: Philosophical Investigations, Malden 2001).

Secondary Sources: Bloechl, Jeffrey, Liturgy of the Neighbor: Emmanuel Levinas and the Religion of Responsibility, Pittsburgh 2000; Harvey, Van A., Feuerbach and the Interpretation of Religion, Cambridge 1995; Kamenka, Eugene, The Philosophy of Ludwig Feuerbach, London 1970; Kaufmann, Walter, Critique of Religion and Philosophy, New York 1958; Kosky, Jeffrey L., Levinas and the Philosophy of Religion, Bloomington 2001; Moore, Adrian W., Noble in Reason, Infinite in Faculty: Themes and Variations in Kant's Moral and Religious Philosophy, London 2003; Palmquist, Stephen R., Kant's Critical Religion, Aldershot 2000; Phillips, D. Z./Tessin, Timothy (eds.), Kant and Kierkegaard on Religion, Basingstoke 2000; Preus, J. Samuel, Explaining Religion: Criticism and Theory from Bodin to Freud, New Haven 1987.

→ Atheism, Enlightenment (Age of), God/Gods/The Sacred, Marxism, Religion

Stephan Grätzel

Cross / Crucifixion

The 'Crucifix Affair'

1. In the folk schools of Bavaria, a crucifix hangs over the chalkboard—a 'Cross with the Nailed One,' the suffering Christ. In 1995, a parental couple insisted that children not be required to gaze upon this mute sign of Christian faith unless they shared the faith. In the Weimar Constitution, they argued, and in the German Basic Law, the state had obliged itself to 'neutrality of Weltanschauung,'—neutrality when it came to a worldview—so that this display of the crucifix contradicted the basic rights of every citizen. True, unlike the case of France and Italy, with their strict, 'laicist' separation of state (including schools) and religion, the churches have rights in the Constitution of Germany—for example, the right to confessional instruction in public schools; but the Federal Constitutional Court declared the cross unconstitutional in classrooms. Adversaries sought to keep the cross in the classroom as a 'cultural symbol' of Europe. The Court once more distinguished between Christianity as a cultural factor and as a religion. Signs and meaning can vary by times and places; they are not, however, to be defined arbitrarily.

Crucifixion—an Ancient Method of Execution

2. Scandalous Cross: a) Punishment by crucifixion was a brutal capital punishment, which in antiquity was imposed only on non-citizens. The condemned had to carry the crossbar, the patibulum of the cross, through the city, and were then hoisted to the post or pillory that stood before the gate; a spike was driven at an angle through the heels. The moribund might repeatedly stiffen up against death, until his strength failed, and after several hours he suffocated in agony. That Jesus had died in that way was an extreme abasement and disgrace, a sign that he had failed terribly. But was it a failure? Here theology enters the scene, with an understanding of this death. The 'Messiah' must suffer, as foretold in Isaiah 53. He is the lamb that dies at Passover, enabling human beings to find a way out of their imprisonment. God's wrath could not be appeased until someone dies—and Jesus has done that, once for all. The 'scandal for the Greeks' is reinterpreted. Nevertheless, the cross is far from becoming a sign of Christian identity; it is rather, for instance, the fish sign that serves that purpose.

b) Only when the Emperor Constantine defeated his enemies under the sign (standard) of the cross (312), did the latter become the sign of the Church Triumphant. The dead Christ on the cross reigns in the triumphal arch (Romantic architecture), the crowned king of the Church.

In 1994, a Jewish settler demonstrated against the policy of Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, which aimed at an agreement with the Palestinians. The cross serves as a sign of senseless torment and vicarious suffering; ketchup-blood flows in streams. Entirely apart from religion, or the meaning it has in Christianity, the Christian symbol may have been chosen here because of its familiarity as a sign of the 'innocent victim of power.'

The Red Cross

c) As its logo, the cross is also borne by the organization that provides help in various ways, especially at the occurrence of a catastrophe—the Red Cross. In Islamic countries where this organization is present, the cross is replaced with a red crescent, in Israel with the Star of David. The organization has no church roots, however, or even Christian ones. When Swiss Henri Dunant was organizing aid for the wounded and dying (beginning in 1863), he searched for a sign that would make it clear that his physicians and other personnel were with neither side in the conflict. The Swiss flag had long been a symbol of neutrality, so that he simply interchanged the colors, yielding a red cross on a white background.

The Cross as a Protective Amulet

3. The Cross in religious usage: a) As the cross served for a sign, so it also pledged the protection of individuals. The shield, the cannon, the sword belt, were provided with this sign, and the one displaying it expected God to protect his 'own' people in a very special way. The small gold cross about the neck is not only a precious object, but jewelry and amulet, as well. Children in Greece have no Christian name before baptism, and so they are protected by an amulet, in the form of a blue eye worn on the back: at baptism, the amulet is removed, a Christian name is bestowed, and a small cross hangs about the neck (→ Evil Eye; Amulet).

b) In the popular piety of Mediterranean lands, the Good Friday procession becomes a festival, and society—guilds, the quarters of the city, the brotherhoods—tread the Way of the Cross. Vying with one another, each group in the procession bears a sacred image through all parts of the city. Carrying the weighty frames often itself becomes a torment. The Franciscans were the first to take as their objective the 'following of Christ,' the 'imitation of Christ,' as practiced along the Via Dolorosa (Lat., 'Sorrowful Way') in Jerusalem.

Modern Interpretations

c) Translating from the far-away 'historical past' to the present of today often means transgressing what the Church, or even Christianity itself, allows. In 1928, George Grosz drew a Christ with a gasmask and military boots, to protest the Christian theology of war. The inscription reads: "Shut your mouth and keep serving." Grosz explained his picture: Christ ran about amidst the trenches, crying: "Love one another!" So he was seized, a gasmask was placed over his face, and he was chained to the cross. Thus, he must 'keep serving' (imperialism). The courts did not accept the interpretation, and convicted the artist of → blasphemy. Jürgen Moltmann goes still further, depicting a scene in Auschwitz: Seeing a prisoner hanging on the electric fence, a fellow prisoner whispered, "Look, Christ on the Cross!" After Auschwitz, Moltmann explains, the cross can no longer be interpreted as a sign of triumph. As we see, it has become a sign of compassionate solidarity, no matter the particular religion.

The Swastika

4. The National Socialists selected the swastika (Sanskrit, svastika, 'well-being,' term for this ancient sign; in German, the term is Hakenkreuz, 'hook cross') as their official sign, and as an intimation of their → anti-Semitism. True, they cited the fact that it is a very ancient, 'Aryan,' symbol of the sun; but they did call it a cross. Thus, they supplemented their own symbolism with a Christian one: they inserted their counter-claim precisely in the accustomed interpretation (→ National Socialism). Just so, as an allusion and as a parody, the inverted cross of → satanism must be understood: a provocative countersign, which nevertheless presupposes the Christian tradition.

Literature

Moltmann, Jürgen, The Crucified God: The Cross of Christ as the Foundation and Criticism of Christian Theology, London 1976; Baert, Barbara, A Heritage of Holy Wood: The Legend of the True Cross in Text and Image, Leiden 2004; Rennstich, Karl, Die zwei Symbole des Kreuzes. Handel und Mission in China und Südostasien, Stuttgart 1988; Ross, Ellen M., The Grief of God: Images of the Suffering Jesus in Late Medieval England, New York 1997; Schiller, Gertrud, Ikonographie der christlichen Kunst, vol. 2, Gütersloh [3]1998 ([1]1968); Turner, Victor, Process, Performance and Pilgrimage: A Study in Comparative Symbology, New Delhi 1979.

→ Christianity, Evil Eye, Jesus, Lord's Supper/Eucharist, Procession, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Christoph Auffarth

Cult

In its widest sense the term 'cult' refers to different aspects of worship within a religious tradition. Examples of this include various devotional services, both communal and private. 'Cult' can also be used to denote a set of beliefs and rituals surrounding a certain object of worship. In this sense it can refer to a religious cult like the cult of Virgin Mary or even a non-religious 'cult,' like the ones associated with famous popular music or sports icons.

A more narrow meaning is used in the social scientific study of religion. In this sense 'cult' refers to a religious → group or organization that has beliefs differing from conventional religious organizations and is considered deviant. The term → 'sect' is sometimes used in relation to 'cult.' The difference is the novelty of the belief systems of cults, as compared to sects, who are best characterized as deviant organizations within traditional beliefs. In this sense 'cult' refers to the organizational status of a religious group.

In popular usage the term 'cult' has often had a pejorative meaning. Influenced by the views of the → anti-cult movement, mind control, brainwashing, deviant sexuality and destructiveness are some features associated with this pejorative meaning. Stereotypical examples of this kind of usage have been Jim Jones's People's Temple, The Unification Church ('Moonies') and the Heaven's Gate group. Association with the kinds of groups mentioned above have made religious groups shun the label of cult, even in cases where it is used in the social scientific sense.

Because of the large discrepancy between the social scientific and popular use, the concept of 'new religious movements' (→ New Religions) was introduced in the 1970's. Although more value-neutral, it has been claimed that the term has no recognition in popular usage and in the media, so the concept of cult should not be abandoned. The academic use of the term should be made better known instead.

Literature

Bainbridge, William Sims, The Sociology of Religious Movements, New York/London 1997; Bromley, David G./Shupe, Anson D., Jr., The Great American Cult Scare, Boston 1981; Campbell, Colin, "Clarifying the Cult," in: British Journal of Sociology 28/3 (1977); Robbins, Thomas, Cults, Converts, and Charisma: The Sociology of New Religious Movements, London 1988; Stark, Rodney/Bainbridge, William Sims, The Future of Religion: Secularization, Revival, and Cult Formation, Berkeley 1985; Troeltsch, Ernst, The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches (1911), trans. Olive Wyon, Chicago 1981; Wallis, Roy, "The Cult and Its Transformation," in: Idem (ed.), Sectarianism: Analysis of Religious and Non-Religious Sects, London 1975.

→ Anti-Cult Movements, Group, New Religions, Sect

Titus Hjelm

Dalai Lama

Office and Institution

1. The title Dalai Lama (usually translated 'Ocean of Wisdom,' from the Mongolian talai, 'Ocean wherein wisdom is enclosed,' and the Tibetan lama, 'teacher, master') denotes the highest office in the political and spiritual system of Tibetan → Buddhism. In 1578, it was conferred upon the third Great Lama of the Lamaistic Gelugpa ('Yellow Caps') by Mongolian sovereign Altan Khan, then Protective Lord of → Tibet, in recognition of Buddhist teaching, and posthumously extended to both of his predecessors. In the Tibetan Buddhist conceptualization, the Dalai Lama is the incarnation of Avalokiteshvara, the Bodhisattva of Compassion (in Tibetan, Chenrezig), and is incarnated after his death once more in order to contribute to the redemption of all persons. The frequent designation of the Dalai Lama as 'God-King' is a misunderstanding, as the Buddhist conception of God does not agree with that of the West. In 1642, the fifth Dalai Lama also became the political leader of the Tibetans. Since then, he has had at his side the Panchen Lama, who is accounted the reincarnation of the Amitabha → Buddha, and for religious purposes officially ranks above the Dalai Lama.

The Fourteenth Dalai Lama: Life and Work

2. The current, fourteenth, Dalai Lama was born in 1935, in the Amdo Province of northeastern Tibet, the fifth of seven children of a family of small farmers. Discovered at the age of two by a delegation of monks, he was brought to the capital Lhasa in 1939, where in 1940 he was installed as supreme spiritual ruler of all Tibetans, and was ordained a novice. He received the spiritual name of Tenzin Gyatso, which, however, like the title of Dalai Lama, is used only in the West. Tibetans call him Kundün in personal address (the 'Present' time and moment), or Gyalpo Rimpoche when that address is formal (freely translated, 'Treasured King'). Shielded from the population and subjected to a strict protocol, he undertook an education in Buddhist philosophy, culture, and meditation as a five-year-old. The political crisis provoked by the entry of the Chinese military into Tibet in 1950 led to an early naming of the fifteen-year-old Dalai Lama as political ruler of Tibet. In 1959 he fled to India, and since 1960 has headed the Tibetan government-in-exile (not officially recognized by any state), which is concerned for the preservation of Tibetan culture and tradition in the → Diaspora (worldwide, some 110,000 refugees), and a recovery of the autonomy of Tibet. The Dalai Lama took advantage of the new orientation prevailing in exile for the reform of the traditional theocratic system. The effect was both the dismantling of strict prescriptions of etiquette, and an effort of democratization. This sudden irruption into modernity failed to arouse a purely positive echo in the tradition-oriented members of the Tibetan community.

In 1967, the Dalai Lama undertook his first foreign journey of the exile, traveling to Japan and Thailand. Since then his travel activities have steadily intensified, especially in the Western world. Out of politico-economic interests vis-à-vis China, he is always received purely in his function as spiritual ruler. This attitude first showed signs of change in 1987, as, in an address to the Human Rights Commission of the United States Congress, he proposed a 'five-point peace plan' for Tibet. In 1989 he was awarded the Nobel Prize for Peace, on the basis of his "constructive and farsighted recommendations for the solution of international conflicts, questions of human rights, and global problems in the protection of the environment."[1] Further honors and awards followed. In 1990, he astounded the public with the announcement that, in a free Tibet, for the sake of a democratic direction in that state, he no longer wished to be political and religious ruler of the country. Unlike the life circumstances of his predecessors, those of Tenzin Gyatso fostered a confrontation with Western culture. On the fundament of the teaching of Mahayana Buddhism, and as a function of his own declarations, his work was to be signaled by three principal concerns: a commitment to the recognition of our 'universal responsibility' vis-à-vis our fellow human beings and nature; to peace among the religions, and interreligious dialogue; and concern for a nonviolent solution of the crisis in Tibet.

As 1995 ended, nuns debated for a month on topics in Buddhist philosophy, for the first time since the beginning of the northern Indian exile. In Dharamsala, before the Dalai Lama's chief temple, a two-hour debate was held among the nuns of various convents of the exile, which the Dalai Lama followed as an observer. Debating Buddhist philosophy is characteristic of the Gelugpa school of philosophical thought, to which the Dalai Lama belongs. (Ž. Marković)

Reception and Mythologization

3. Tenzin Gyatso is seen as open to the world, and a person of many-faceted interests. He is appreciated in the West not only for his concern for dialogue, genuine personality, and general comprehension, but also for his interest in science and technology, as specifically Western values. In particular, since he was awarded the Nobel Prize, he has become, internationally, one of the most publicly present and media-effective religious representatives of the present day. Along with visits to numerous public presentations around the globe, he is represented on the German book market alone by more than forty of his own publications, while an additional sixty, by other authors, also deal with his person. Especially through his engagement for nonviolence, tolerance, and understanding among peoples, he enjoys a very high regard, and the status of a myth in his own time. As representative of a high culture, theocratically organized until 1959, as a protagonist of the peace movement, and of an oikoumene of the religions (→ Ecumenical Movement), and as the indefatigable advocate of a Tibetan people against the foreign rule of superpower China, he has become a symbol and icon, in whom are reflected, on many levels, not only authentic values, but also the yearnings of the Western societal system. Thus, his charismatic personality possesses a magnetic efficacy for the propagation of the Buddhist doctrine in the West. The fascination of the mystery-emanating land of snow on the roof of the world, and an idealization of the monastic state as the last refuge of spirituality in a radically demythologized world, turn Tibet into a 'paradise lost,' a point of fascination for Western post-modernity (→ Orientalism/Exotism; New Age; Esalen Institute). That land of allure finds its incarnation in the figure of the Dalai Lama, and lends him the status of symbol for the most diverse groups. Motion-picture stars, guests at various religious gatherings, believers in an ecumenical direction, and devotees of the New Age scene, are all in agreement in their enthusiasm for the Tibetan ruler.

1. Munzinger Archiv 45 (1994), no. 14, "Dalai Lama."

Literature

Sources: Tenzin Gyatso (Dalai Lama), Freedom in Exile: The Autobiography of the Dalai Lama, New York 1991; Idem, The Way to Freedom, San Francisco 1994; Idem, The Collected Works of Dalai Lama XIII, New Delhi 1981ff.

Secondary Literature: Davidson, Richard J./Harrington, Anne (eds.), Visions of Compassion: Western Scientists and Tibetan Buddhists Examine Human Nature, New York 2002; Goodman, Michael Harris, The Last Dalai Lama: A Biography, Boston 1986; Marcello, Patricia Cronin, The Dalai Lama: A Biography, Westport 2003; Pommaret, Françoise (ed.), Lhasa in the Seventeenth Century: The Capital of the Dalai Lamas, Leiden 2003; Stewart, Whitney, The 14th Dalai Lama: Spiritual Leader of Tibet, no place 1996; Ya Hanzhang, The Biographies of the Dalai Lamas, Beijing 1991.

→ Buddhism, Lamaism, Theocracy, Tibet

Benita von Behr

Dance

Dance: Essence and Potentialities

1. The rhythmically unified body movement of dance is a universal expression of human aliveness, of human life. Dance 'acts out' the most fundamental human traits—corporality, and the urge to move. It shapes space and → time in dynamic periods, and opens them up to sensory experience. Not only can it express → feelings of gladness, sorrow, emotion, power, → love, and → eroticism; it can also generate and channel them. As 'life exponentially' (T. Berger), dance has the capacity to transmit harmony, intensity of life, and a transcending of the moment. It can rip everyday perceptions asunder, and generate the intimate identity of a community. Dance does not cut a sharp boundary with other bodily techniques, such as striding, → procession (Indian mudras), and sacred → drama. The latter two offer, besides, a more powerfully narrative element of expression.

Dance in the Religions

2. The positions of religions on dance and its potentialities are adversarial in the extreme. Many religions have integrated it, shaped it, and used it for their purposes. Often enough, in traditional cultures, dances even stand at the midpoint of collective, as well as of individual, life as the most important of cultic actions, such as the Kachina dances of the Hopi, or the Sun Dance of the Prairie Indians.

Motifs and Functions

According to the positions adopted toward dance in the respective religions, it is possible to make a distinction between sacred or cultic dance (dances connected to cult or worship, with a clearly → ritual character), and religious dance (dances accompanying religious practices and festivals; → Feasts and Celebrations). We know a plenitude of motifs or contexts for dance, which bind a communicated meaning of the belief community, and contact with supernatural beings:

- Dances make a contribution to the ritual construction and interpretation of realty. Danced myths or sacred dramas explicate religious knowledge. The cosmos and its beings are presented symbolically, and its movements are executed in concert, thus becoming available 'here below.'
- In this fashion, dances also authenticate and legitimate the social order with its roles and values. In particular, masked dances by cult groups that present → ancestors frequently demonstrate strength and power. We find, at times, innovative, role-free conduct as well as normative behavior executed in dance.
- Dances are intermediaries: they provide contact with supernatural beings. They serve for veneration, communication, or the receipt of fertility and cosmic order, as with festivals of the agrarian cycle.
- Dances can evoke or document an outer transformation, by preparing individuals for an ideal condition, changing their status in rites of initiation or passage, and healing or purging an evil.
- Dances can also work an inner transformation, usually temporarily. Many dancers make a connection with spirits or gods, enter a condition regarded as sacred, array themselves with spiritual capacities, or embody a supernatural being. Ecstatic practices introduce dance as a trance technique, as in → shamanism or → possession.

It becomes clear that the individual motifs and functions of the concrete dance phenomenon can usually be divided only artificially, for purposes of a typology.

3. As an image, as well, dance is frequently applied by and for religions: in order to describe an attitude or mood (joy, mystical experience), or to grasp the cosmogony or the dynamic harmony of the sacred cosmos. The cosmos as a dance of the elements, its fashioning and destruction by the Dance of Shiva, the medieval Dance of Death as an eschatological picture of damnation, and later, of earthly finitude (memento mori) and vanitas. This macabre roundelay stands over against the motif of the celestial ballet of the angels and the blessed, which, throughout Church history, functions as the allegory for a redeemed existence before the face of God.

4. Real dancing on earth, of course, was renounced almost as thoroughly as the wafting of the angels was accepted. Hierarchically organized,

Classic European ballet is a dance form without a religious tradition. Arising in the princely courts of the Renaissance and their absolutism, dance, along with opera and → theater, developed into one of the most influential arts of the urban social horizon of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. One basis for the alienation of this art from religion may have been its decided 'bodiliness,' which stands diametrically opposed to the remote quality of Christian liturgical dance. All the more sensational, then, are attempts to 'dance' sacred and, especially, Christian themes—to transport them into the corporal code of the ballet dance, its steps, motions, and bodily gestures. Trail blazing theologically developed doctrines, with their absolute claim, stand in a special attitude of mistrust vis-à-vis dance as a menacing and competing expression of life. These codes make an effort to limit dance to certain forms, occasions, or persons, to control it, or to prohibit it altogether. Hinduism restricts the art of the classic dance to particular castes and groups, thereby avoiding a conflict with social and ascetic norms.

Western Christianity and Islam also quite unambiguously reject dance, in contrast with many currents of their Jewish mother religion (→ Hasidism). The attitude of Church authorities was hostile to the → body, as can be exemplified in the dictum of Church Father John Chrysostom, "Where dance is, there is the devil." The irresolute address to liturgical dance, with its theological underpinnings,[1] over the past two decades, has not delivered dance from its position of a suspect, marginal phenomenon of popular religion. A completely different image, on the other hand, is offered by many extra-European churches who integrate their lively, often extra-Christian, dancing into their divine services.

This scenario entirely corresponds to the dialectical relation of tension between dogmatic theology and powerful institutions, on the one hand, and persons' spiritual experience, upon which they build, and which they manage, on the other. In currents of folk religion and → mysticism (the God-seized dancing nuns of the Christian Middle Ages, and the dervishes of → Sufism), dance—in most striking bodily demonstrations—plays a most positive role. In practices and images of opposing currents, dance became an element of heretical movements, or even of an orgiastic, Satanic, or → carnival reversal of the order of daily life (Witches' Sabbath, dance epidemics). Many alternative spiritual directions, too, discover for themselves a contribution of dance among their elements. The ambivalent attitude of many religions vis-à-vis dance may be owing to its sensory, worldly, aspect, suggesting entertainment. In dance, too, it comes clear that sacred and profane areas in the behavior of individuals, as also in the overall culture, seldom constitute a dichotomy.

5. If we would consider the relation of both life expressions, then not only dance in religion, but religion in dance must figure among our concerns. Independently of their cultural position, astonishingly many dancers (from professional dancers to Techno-Ravers) speak of their activity in concepts of spiritual or mystical experience. Dance seems religiously charged and thereby more intimately connected with personal, untrammeled forms of an experience-centered piety than do the hierarchical, abstract theologies. Differently from other forms of art, dance in the West developed apart from, indeed even in opposition to, religious institutions. But in today's secular world, religious motifs seem to press their way out of the area of dance into society itself. Modern ballet often stages religious content. 'Modern dance,' post-modern dance-theater, dance-therapy currents, and dancing esoteric circles speak of dance as a ritual—a transcendence or redemption.

6. In the overwhelming number of cases, religious dances, like religions in general, have a conservative and stabilizing social effect. But in dance, as an expressive cohesion of the most intimate emotions, and yet of the highest transcendence, there also resides a boundary-crossing potential, with a huge explosive force where the prevailing order is concerned. Ideal-typically, one could distinguish between, first, a body control, a disciplined and attentive, assimilation, with strict formal shaping (classical ballet, Balinese temple dance), and then wild, 'Dionysian,' spontaneous performance. It is precisely such ecstatic dances (→ Trance) that constitute an effective means of altering the individual, as well as the religious and social order. They can emit forms, rip down restrictions, and generate a new order, identity, community, and vision.

No wonder, then that millenarianist, messianic, or other charismatic cults often work with 'trance dances.' They offer capacity for action, very concrete orientation, and powerful experiences, in times of need, and of a disintegration of the social, cognitive, or emotional order. And they can mobilize masses, rapidly, and without great outlay. Impressive examples are offered by the spirit dance of the North American Indians (→ North America [Traditional Religions]), or the 'cargo cult' in Melanesia (→ South Sea/Australia), both of which appeared in reaction to the padlocked desperation imposed by violent colonial destruction, were perceived by their respective Puritanical administrations as dangerous and hysterical, and were proscribed. In both cases, along with ethics, prophets taught easily learned, syncretistic forms of trance dances, earnestly calculated to introduce a utopian world restored anew, not only in the experience of vision, but also in the reality of the everyday.

7. All forms of dance and their ascriptions of meaning are contoured and conveyed culturally. It is only the projected longing of a modern primitivism to speak of a primordial oneness of dance and cult, or to regard dance as the pre-cultural, unconscious expression of a primary quality of experience, that could be directly found once more in the supposed 'wild dances' of 'nature peoples.' For example, African dances nearly always for the contemporary ballet scene, in this respect, are the choreographies, since 1973, of John Neumeier, with the Hamburg State Opera Ballet. Neumeier, born in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1942, and educated in a Jesuit school, calls himself a 'Christian and dancer.' In works like his "Magnificat" (1989, music: J. S. Bach), "Requiem" (1991, music: W. A. Mozart), or "Messiah" (1999, music: G. F. Händel and Pärt), which he developed in collaboration with music researcher and director of church music Günter Jena, he interprets chefs-d'oeuvre of European sacred music, and central Christian formulas of faith, with a powerful dance style, nor one that shies way from pathos. Bach's "Saint Matthew Passion" presented Neumeier's pioneering choreography with power. In a pregnant gesture, he transferred the composer's sacred work from a liturgical framework to the theatrical, first by choreographing "Skizzen zur Matthäuspassion" in Saint Michael's Church in Hamburg (see illus.), and then, in a second move, by presenting the completed dance piece on the stage of the Staatsoper, and thereby 'withdrawing it to the secular sphere.' The quest for a 'language for religious content,' under the sign of the dance, had begun. (Hubert Mohr)

When spring begins, the men of Somma Vesuviana, a community on a ridge of Mount Vesuvius, on the Gulf of Naples, literally stage 'a dance on the Volcano.' On one of the mountain peaks, in a fashion handed down from time immemorial, they celebrate the Mountain Festival of the Madonna di Castello, called "Mamma Schiavona." Their Festival features a great deal of wine, dance, and song—without, however, the presence of their wives (women must remain below). The festival commences on Easter Saturday, Sabato dei Fuochi ("Feast of the Flames")—when the men light fires of celebration, set off fireworks, and bivouac on the mountain the night through—and climaxes and terminates on May 3. The dancing continues unabated represent exceedingly complicated, highly artificial bodily practices that can be understood as the concentration of tension by way of a 'centering' of various parts of the body. Individual body parts, with precision and elegance, evince a polyrhythmic structure. The climax is reached when the outward movement comes to a stop, and is replaced by a condition of mind and soul suffused with worth and value, with moderation, a restfulness of heart, a calm, an ordering into the community. In the West, the corporeal codification and charge of meaning residing in strange and foreign dance is readily overlooked, and a 'return' is suggested, possible in dance, to an 'original' experience of something that modern persons miss and regret.

1. Berger 1985; Vogler et al. 1995.

Literature

Adams, Doug/Apostolos-Cappadona, Diane (eds.), Dance as Religious Studies, New York 1990; Baldissera, Fabrizia/Michaels, Axel, Der Indische Tanz. Körpersprache in Vollendung, Cologne 1988; Berger, Teresa, Liturgie und Tanz. Anthropologische Aspekte, historische Daten, theologische Perspektiven, Sankt Ottilien 1985; Calendoli, Giovanni, Storia universale della danza, Milan 1985; Highwater, Jamake, Dance: Rituals of Experience, New York 1978; Katz, Richard, Boiling Energy: Community Healing among the Kalahari Kung, Cambridge 1982; Lonsdale, Steven, Animals and the Origins of Dance, London 1981; Manor, Giora (and the eds. of the Dance Magazine), The Gospel According to Dance: Choreography and the Bible: From Ballet to Modern, New York 1980; Racki, Christian, The Sacred Dances of Bali, Denpasar 1998; Rouget, Gilbert, Music and Trance: A Theory of the Relations between Music and Possession, Chicago 1985; Schechner, Richard, Between Theater and Anthropology, Philadelphia

1985; Roth, Gabrielle, Sweat Your Prayers: Movement as Spiritual Practice, New York 1997; Spencer, Paul (ed.), Society and the Dance: The Social Anthropology of Process and Performance, Cambridge 1985; Vogler, Gereon et al., Tanz und Spiritualität, Mainz 1995.

→ Body, Eroticism, Illness/Health, Music, Possession, Rhythm, Drama (Sacred), Ritual, Shamanism, Trance (Techniques)

Dietmar Neitzke

until the exuberant Feast of Fertility, around May 1, as it is known throughout Europe. Now a three-meter-long walnut stick is hung with needle-furze twigs, apples, lemons, and all manner of delicacies, and handed to the honored ladies with exultation and song. First, however, there is a great deal of drinking and dancing up on the mountain. The dancers are organized into associations called paranze (from Lat., par, 'equal,' 'same,' 'similar') and accompany their songs, and the dance of the tammurriata (in Ital., tammorra or tambura), with simple, often self-fashioned instruments, whose type can be traced almost to antiquity. In the photograph, which shows the men on the mountaintop, rhythm instruments predominate: the castanets of the two dancers, the large tambourine (as also used, throughout Southern Italy, for the tarantella), as well as the triccaballácco, which the accompanists hold in their hands to left and right. This last instrument is made of wooden hammers, with little tin plates affixed, of which the midmost one is rigid, while the other two are loose, that they may be clapped together. Finally, i sischi, the double flute, may also sound forth. (Hubert Mohr)

Daoism

"Ritual of Cosmic Renewal" (Jiao)

The most important religious event for the village community (or population of a city quarter) is the celebration of the "Ritual of Cosmic Renewal" (jiao), which is to take place after temple renovations, after temple foundations and expansions, and at least once every sixty years. It is usually three days and three nights long, and it involves not only the entire village, but also associated communities, relatives, and friends from elsewhere, all of whom are invited to take part in the great banquet of the third day. Equally important is the invitation issued to the → ancestors, and to the homeless souls of the deceased who have had no progeny, and thus cannot enjoy the cult of the ancestors. Just so, an invitation is issued to the souls of those who have died violently, or far from home. And again, various divinities from famous temples of the country are invited. For them, a tent with a tan (altar) is pitched at various locations in the village, as temporary sacred space in which the deities reside for the duration of the cult. The more prosperous families finance these tan. The most important guests, however, are the 'Three Pure' (san qing), the three supreme gods of the Daoist pantheon.

The meaning of the jiao consists in the gaining of 'spiritual merit' (gong de) for the entire community, through the ascetical endeavors of that community, its recitations in the temple, its almsgiving, and the great banquet it celebrates for the gods and the population. The effect of this spiritual merit is that heavenly powers are promoted in the hierarchy, the unhappy souls are let into heaven, and the living are blessed with health and profitable employment. The considerable expenses are shared by all of the villagers, depending on their economic resources.

The ritual itself is extremely complex, and features not only actions to be performed within the temple that take place with the exclusion of the population ('I' here denotes within the temple), but also processions and actions to which the villagers are admitted as 'audience' ('O' outside the temple).

By way of preparation, the gods normally venerated in the temple are removed from their inherited places (of honor) at the northern wall (→ Orientation) and installed on either side of the entryway at the southern gate. The population prepares by fasting, and bestows generous alms on beggars and the handicapped, who are attracted in swarms by these temple festivals. The actual jiao ritual can be divided into four parts:

(1) Creation of the ritual space (→ Place [Sacred]);
(2) Rites for the acquisition of 'religious merit' (gong de);
(3) Communion, and renewal of the covenant between human beings and heaven;
(4) Rites of parting to be celebrated before the gods, and the dismantling of the ritual space.

First day: Morning

The first day begins long before sunrise, with the purification of the altar space by the Master, followed by the composition of an official notification, in red ink, with explanatory document, by which the gods are officially informed of the impending ritual (I). Then the priest enters the court and burns these documents, that they may ascend to the gods as smoke (O). There follows the invitation extended to the highest gods and the local deities, that they may all enter the sacred space (I).

Outside the temple, three high bamboo poles are erected, a sign that it is for the 'Three Pure' that the jiao is about to be held (O). In order to exhibit the cohesiveness of the community, the village dignitaries (hui shou) mark the boundaries of the village at crossings with ten paper figures, some one meter in height, all accompanied by a praying and bell-ringing populace (O). Subsequently, five priests visit the residences of the dignitaries, and offer sacrifices on the home altars (O; this rite takes place on all three mornings, with the entire community symbolically included). The Master's pupils hold recitations at these ceremonies (as during all three days) of lengthy penitential texts (I).

First Day: Afternoon and Evening

The afternoon belongs to the Noonday Sacrifice and further penitential recitations. In the evening, the 'new light' is kindled, and the Daoist myth of creation (Daode jing, 42) is recited. Thereby is the universe symbolically renewed (I). The most important and most secret ritual takes place shortly before midnight, and represents the beginning of community renewal (I).

Second Day: Morning

The second day begins between three and five o'clock in the morning, with the greeting of the first of the Three Pure; then the penitential recitations and the Midday Sacrifice of the day before are continued (O).

Second Day: Afternoon and Evening

The afternoon belongs to the laity. Starting from the temple area, a great procession begins to move, whose participants, carrying unlighted lanterns, and accompanying floats entirely covered with unlighted lamps, proceed to the nearest river, lake, or seashore. After nightfall, the lamps are lit and set upon the water. The floating lights are an invitation to all souls to take part in the great banquet to be held on the following day (O). In the afternoon and evening, the Master has an audience with the second and third of the Three Pure.

Third Day

On the third day, a banquet is prepared for the Three Pure, for the sealing of the New Covenant. Now these gods are simultaneously present in heaven, at the center of the cosmos (the village temple), and in the body of the Master: thus they produce the cosmic 'communion.' The essential of the ritual, and the names of the participants, are consigned to writing, and the document is displayed before the gods (I). Then it is shown to the whole community (O). Now the great banquet begins, at which every possible tasty delicacy is spread before the souls on hundreds of tables—every family in the village prepares a twenty-four hour menu, which is then consumed by the villagers, their guests, and those who have come from other places (O).

On many platforms throughout the village, theatrical productions and puppet plays with religious content are staged. At the same time, the people thank the gods as manifestations of the Dao, take their leave of them, dismantle the altars, burn the paper figures, and reproduce the previous order of things. Through the merits acquired in and around the ritual, the unhappy souls are delivered, persons and nature are renewed spiritually, the village community is strengthened, and all enmities come to an end.

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

1. 'Daoism' (from the Chinese dao, 'way,' 'right way,' 'track,' 'principle'; whence, 'principle of the origin of the cosmos') is properly the high religion of China. It has specialists available who have spent years in formation under a Master before receiving the certificate of ordination. The office of priest can be handed down from father to son, for example in the tradition of the 'masters of heaven.' There are, however, monastic traditions as well among which at least the members of the Quanzhen ('complete perfection') tradition live in strict celibacy. Daoism's pantheon is a broad one, ever open to expansion, and observes a very differentiated liturgy, whose texts are recited and sung by priests. The majority of these texts have been composed in classical Chinese, and thus are not understandable by the public. Daoism is a 'way' to individual salvation (→ Road/Path/Journey), as well as an institution that seeks to assist persons in the defeat of crises and diseases, and offers them rites of passage; but also provides society in general with universally directed rites of renewal.

As an institution, Daoism is not even a cohesive image, let alone a centralized one, but rather is very heterogeneous—the result of centuries-long developments, as new threads of tradition formed, and existing and foreign elements alike were integrated from popular religion and Buddhism.

The jiao banquet is here celebrated for the souls—and for the members of the community, with their guests, friends, and erstwhile enemies—on the third day of the “Ritual of Cosmic Renewal” (see box). The dainties readied and brought to the banquet by the denizens of the village (or city) are all but endless. Souls of the departed and living population alike celebrate the greater community and cosmic renewal in a festal meal.

Philosophical Daoism

The founder of philosophical Daoism (Daojia) is reputed to be a certain Lao Tzu (Laozi, Laotse), mythical author of the Dao-te-king (Daode jing). He was deified in the second century CE: in 164, a pillar with an inscription was built in his honor by imperial command. At about the same time, with the help of commentators like Heshang gong (‘Master of the Riverbank’) and the Xiang'er (presumably the name of an immortal), the original ‘philosophical’ Daode jing was reinterpreted in a religious sense. Since at least that early, the Daode jing has ranked as a sacred text, with appropriate supernatural characteristics (its possession and recitation are freighted with blessing).

Goals and Methods

2. The goal of the Daoists is to become one with the Dao, the indefinable absolute, the self-settled original principle of the cosmos. This attainment will reverse the process of age and decay, provide a long life on earth, and, finally, even render a person immortal. In order to reach this goal, it is true, there is no 'royal way.' Rather, there are as many ways as Daoists. Nevertheless, some 'techniques' (shu) or 'methods' (fa) can be brought into play.

Alchemy

a) Beginning in the first century BCE an alchemy developed, whose purpose consisted, first, in transmuting ignoble compounds into noble metals—as a rule, gold. It was assumed that this process was found in nature spontaneously, but that it took long for it to be completed. The task of the alchemists consisted in accelerating the natural process of transmutation by way of effective procedures. For example, a dish could be produced of these refined metals. Whoever ate from this ennobled dish would be able to attain immortality. More important, however, was the search for the 'pill of immortality.' For the production of such drugs, mercury compounds were usually applied, for example cinnabar (dansha) mixed with other, usually inorganic, materials. In the Tang era (618–907), an entire series of emperors died from the ingestion of suchlike poisonous ores or compounds. According to Daoist readings, they may nevertheless have become immortal. After all, one form of immortality consists in shijie—here the corpse is buried, but after a short time the transformed person returns to the cadaver as an insect pupa; then, later, after the grave has been opened, only a few personal objects (such as a pair of shoes, or a wooden staff) are still to be found. The person in question is either still walking the earth, in another body and another identity (but still as the same person), or has secretly and directly transmigrated to heaven, where he now sojourns with his fellows and the gods.

Techniques of 'Inner Alchemy'

b) With time, this 'outer alchemy' (waidan) developed into an 'inner alchemy' (neidan), which adopted the technical terminology of the other, but reinterpreted the processes metaphorically. When the removal of substances by 'smelting' is spoken of, it is no longer a concrete operation that is understood, but an interior process of the purification of the adept.

Meditation

Presumably the oldest technique of purification in Daoism consists in the various types of → meditation. The method of the 'preservation of oneness' (shou yi), means, first of all, visualizing the three divinities—san yi. These have emerged from the three primordial pneumata, and the Dao has produced the latter in turn in the three 'higher heavens.' Now one must have them descend into one's own body in meditation, and have them reside in their already determined place in the person: namely, in the three 'fields of cinnabar' (the first being in the head, the second in the region of the heart, the third behind the navel). When the human being fails to meditate, these gods return to their heavens, which weakens the human being, and renders her and him susceptible to diseases. Other types of meditation consist in visualizing the divinities of the body as settled in the various organs and thereby holding them fast, or having planets and stars—analogously to the san yi—descend into the body where they will spread their light, render the body lightsome, and finally bring it to its condition as a heavenly body. Frequently, Daoists preface their meditation exercises with lengthy recitations from the sacred scriptures. Indeed, if they manage to recite a scripture, for example the Huangting jing ("Classic one of the great yellow room") several tens of thousands of times, this may itself suffice for the attainment of immortality.

Dietary Prescripts

An important role in Daoist practice is also performed by dietary prescripts (→ Eating/Nourishment). By way of example, included here is abstinence from cereals, as they further the prosperity of malevolent corporeal demons, whose only concern is to have persons die as promptly as possible, lest, after death, they partake of the enjoyment of the offerings for the dead. The most pure nourishment of all is early-morning dew on a blade of grass, pure air, or a ray of sunlight reflected from a bronze mirror. Depending upon the exercitant's tradition, one or another of the techniques mentioned, or a combination, is applied.

Becoming a Daoist

3. A person—man or woman—who would become a Daoist, seeks out a master at a mountain monastery or in a town temple, who, after careful scrutiny, receives the candidate, and then, over the course of years, and with frequent assessments, initiates the pupil into his knowledge. The pupil not only gradually receives holy scriptures from the Master, which he or she must copy out and commit to memory, but also the indispensable commentaries, without which the text will not be intelligible. The Master transmits this 'parallel knowledge' orally only. When the Master is at last convinced that his pupil has made such progress as to be able to perfect the Dao alone, or with another master, then, in a vow ceremony, the certificate of ordination is transmitted that lists which texts the pupil has received and which spiritual power he or she possesses.

Duties of the Daoist Priest

4. Along with the individual instruction of the pupil by the Master, Daoists also perform religious functions for the laity. To be sure, a temple is rarely administered by the Daoists themselves. As a rule, the village temple (or the temple of an urban quarter) is consecrated to a local divinity, and is run by the villagers. For cultic acts, a Daoist priest is invited, and borrowed, who—depending on the scope of the desired ritual—himself invites other priests to function as 'subcontractors,' almost always his sons and priest friends, who, when possible, have been ordained by the same master as he. Although priests are locally established, they can be summoned to any locality in which they can be useful. Daoists often also receive 'offers' from various priests, before they decide on a particular one. (Priestesses usually lead a monastic life, and perform ritual functions only within the monastery.) One of the tasks performed by the priest is that of celebrating the very expensive Ritual of Cosmic Renewal (jiao) (see box). Of analogous structure, but costing a great deal less, is the Ritual of the Dead (jie), which, after the death of a member of the community, the Master celebrates in a tent pitched next to the house of the deceased, in order to smooth the way to heaven for that soul. The principal activity of the Daoist priest, however, consists in the performance of other, minor rites, usually exorcisms, on his own home altar. As a rule, it is persons suffering from a disease, and who could not be helped by medicine, who seek out the priest's services. Since disease is ascribed to the action of evil spirits (ordinarily unattended souls of the dead), the remedy will depend upon identifying the latter, and then expelling them from the patient's body. The priest performs this service free of charge, without, however, refusing a token of gratitude. By contrast, for the great public rituals, (negotiable) remuneration is in order.

Pragmatic Religiosity

5. In the Western world, right into the modern age persons were born into a religion, received their socialization at the hands of their parents, and entry into another confession was rather the exception. Here, the Chinese behave more pragmatically. The satisfaction of spiritual needs is sought with the instances that have shown themselves 'effective' (ling). When petitions are not heard by the divinity, or when sacrifices have not had the desired effect, one simply changes divinities. For individual medical help and public rituals of renewal, application is made to the Daoists; funeral rituals, on the other hand, are more often sought from Buddhists.

Daoism Today

6. Daoists are found throughout the Chinese world today, even in Chinese colonies in the United States. In the People's Republic, they have survived the Cultural Revolution (1966–1976), and may once more celebrate their rituals publicly and without hindrance, especially in Southeastern China, where relations with Taiwan are especially close. For one thing, many Taiwanese are bound to the mainland by ties of blood. For another, temple associations (fan xiang; → Place [Sacred]) span the space between the mainland and Taiwan. Again, there are considerable Taiwanese investments on the mainland.

In the 'Monastery of the White Clouds,' for example, in Beijing, young Daoists are certainly educated in a program encouraged by the state. But if these students subsequently apply to the Maoshan center (south of Nanking), the monks do not initiate them into the higher practices of meditation, nor into certain rituals, since they have 'not yet pacified their spirit'—are not yet regarded as capable (Saso 1990). There is a ritual alliance among the monks of the three centers of Maoshan, Wudang shan, and Longhu shan (→ Mountains, Five Sacred). They recognize one another's rites, and certificate of ordination; however, they do not issue higher certificates to Daoists who have sought their education in lower-ranking institutions, or with unimportant Masters.

During the Cultural Revolution, certain Daoist centers (not all!), or their temples and monasteries, were destroyed, were deprived of their means, along with many local shrines, and nuns and monks were expelled. Since 1979, however, these places have been reconstructed—with financing from pilgrims, but also through the contributions of prosperous Chinese abroad. While, for example, in Shaanxi Province the number of Daoist temples had decreased from 696 to 188 between 1948 and 1965, and then in the Cultural Revolution to five, they have continuously multiplied since then, and by 1992 their number was eighty-six. Comparable numbers have been reported from other regions. The number of ordained Daoists, male and female, will always be small, however, by comparison with that of Buddhist monks and nuns, since Daoists, as decided individualists, are not particularly concerned with official status.

Literature

Sources: Bokenkamp, Stephen R., Early Daoist Scriptures, Berkeley 1997; Bolz, Judith, Survey of Taoist Literature: Tenth to Seventeenth Centuries, Berkeley 1987; Kohn, Livia, The Taoist Experience: An Anthology, Albany 1993; Lopez, Donald S., Jr. (ed.), Religion of China in Practice, Princeton 1996.

Secondary literature: Bumbacher, Stephan Peter, "Cosmic Scripts and Heavenly Scriptures. The Holy Nature of Taoist Texts," in: COSMOS. The Journal of the Traditional Cosmology Society 11.2 (1995), 139-154; Despeux, Catherine/Kohn, Livia, Women in Daoism, Cambridge 2003; Kohn, Livia, Monastic Life in Medieval Daoism: A Cross-Cultural Perspective, Honolulu 2003; Kohn, Livia (ed.), Daoism Handbook, Leiden 2000; Kohn, Livia/Roth, Harold D. (eds.), Daoist Identity: History, Lineage, and Ritual, Honolulu 2002; Lagerwey, John, Taoist Ritual in Chinese Society and History, New York 1987; Porter, Bill, Road to Heaven: Encounters with Chinese Hermits, London 1993; Robinet, Isabelle, Histoire du taoïsme des origines au XIVe siècle, Paris 1991; Saso, Michael, Blue Dragon, White Tiger: Taoist Rites of Passage, Honolulu 1990; Schipper, Kristofer, The Daoist Body, Berkeley 1993; Welch, Holmes/Seidel, Anna (eds.), Facets of Taoism: Essays in Chinese Religion, New Haven 1979.

→ China/Japan/Korea, Confucianism

Stephan Peter Bumbacher

Death and Dying

Death as a Boundary Rejected

1. a) Death and human attitudes that are to be observed in connection with it, underlie a transformation. Death concerns all human beings. The precise entry of death, and 'life' thereafter, has its own meaning for every culture. The scientific biological connections, the 'itinerary' of death, are, of course, available to documentation: Western school medicine can describe the gradation between clinical death as cessation of the circulation of the blood, as brain death, and as cellular death as components precisely, and finally, death is defined as the irreversible end of life. In child development, it can be observed that, only from about the sixth year of life, with an increasing sense of reality, does someone grow conscious of the meaning of categories like 'dead' or 'living,' that death becomes a decisive boundary. But that this means life is 'finished'—that actually 'nothing' of the human being remains—thus, propositions concerning an 'absolute' end after death—are relatively rare. → Rituals that accompany the 'passing on,' or concerning an extended existence after death in a Beyond (→ Hereafter), or by way of → reincarnation in a new phenomenality in the present world, are to be found nearly everywhere in religious history.

b) The experience that one has with the death of others has left deep traces—in mythology, in religious systems, and even, for example, in art and architecture. Based on archaeological evidence of the burial of human corpses, frequently accompanied by gifts (such as tools, bones of animals), the death of persons was dealt with differently in prehistoric times from that of animals. Evidence of the former is found as early as the Middle Paleolithic (c. 70,000 BCE). In the history of the evolution of humanity, the evidence from burials presents a new (and perhaps first) horizon of reflection on death. Here is a phenomenon suspect of being a decisive turning point. Cultures have been identified by their tombs over and again (for example, the pyramids, or the tombs and burial temples in the Valley of the Kings in Egypt; the Mausoleum of Halicarnassus as one of the Seven Wonders of the Ancient World). All of this, and more, draws tourists even today (e.g., the Taj Mahal, from the seventeenth century in Agra, India). This manner of experience is ambivalent, however, so that one both avoids the area and 'beautifies' (i.e., aestheticizes it). This same trend is shown with great transparency in language: in the euphemisms with which one

Catania, Sicily, 11 August 1992. Sergio Lo Giudice lies dead on the street, shot from his motorcycle in an exchange of fire between rival Mafia clans. A Franciscan cleric stands beside him and pronounces the "Prayer of Departure" which, in Catholic rite, is spoken over the dead. The "Prayer of Departure" is a prayer at once of impetration and of accompaniment. Like the blessing in which this priest raises his hand, it supports the soul that, in Christian belief, is divided from the body at the moment of death, and now comes 'before the face of God.' The solace and pastoral care of the sick and needy, sinners, and the dying, is surely a great privilege and service of the Christian churches, and of the religions generally. In Sicily, true, representatives of the Church are increasingly 'caught' in the exercise of their spiritual obligations, between the 'fronts' of state power and organized crime. While the father confessor of a Mafia boss sits in prison because he has refused to reveal the misdeeds confessed, appealing to the 'seal of confession,' various clerics who have spoken out publicly against the terror of Cosa Nostra, have paid for their commitment with their lives. (Hubert Mohr) describes the act of death (as 'passing on,' 'passing away,' 'falling asleep'); or by being careful not to pronounce the proper name of the departed, but substituting 'blessed one.' An ambivalent attitude toward death is also illustrated by two French expressions: 'defunct' (as also in English); and the expression that death is a mal-heur (that is, something that comes in at an evil or unsuitable hour, even when one has sought to manage the course of death with rites. 'Defunct' is a modern form of the Latin word defunctus, referring to someone who has 'entered into rest,' someone who has 'successfully endured,' for example, the present existence.

Death the 'Taboo'

2. Let us permit a chronological leap into the present, but at the same time into a geographical distance, to relativize the Eurocentric perspective of the end of the twentieth century. From missionary and ethnographical reports of Indian ethnic groups of South America, there frequently emerges an attitude of obviousness about death, and a perceived 'public' characteristic of death, in speech about the same. Oriented neither to fear, nor to a (Western) sense of tact, it has at least surprised, if not shocked, the observer. Missioner Cocco[1] reports, impressively, of his illness during a sojourn with the Yanomamo on Orinoko, when the village medicine man assured him not only that, of course, he would die of the disease, but also that the village community of the Yanomamo would care for him after his death—first burning his corpse, and then ingesting the ashes of his bones (endocannibalism). All of this was intended altogether as an expression of compassion and solace, and of the high esteem in which the missionary was held by the village community.

Causes of Death

3. a) Death and dying are a generally human phenomenon, of course, but a concrete death-and-dying calls for a respective concrete explanation. Often, not only can a connection be observed here between human imperfection and the 'first' death, but also a perceived connection between death and evil: dying is the final misfortune. A further connection, produced in

In the year 1950, in Southern Indian Tiruvannamalai (Tamil Nadu), ascetic Ramana Maharishi died of cancer. Surrounded by his devotees, his body, adorned with garlands of flowers, was prepared for the funeral ceremony. In a traditional Hindu funeral, the corpse is burned and the individual soul leaves the body through its cracked or pierced skull. But Ramana Maharishi was buried in a sitting position. Born in 1879 in Southern India, at the age of sixteen he had a mystical experience that he later described as the 'death of the body,' and as a realization of the 'I' that extends beyond the body. In this ordeal, he had endured and overcome the fear of death. Since then he had lived as an ascetic on the sacred mountain of Arunacala, at Tiruvannnamalai. He had given up his asceticism of silence for the sake of the instruction of others, after his disciples had surrounded him and erected an ashram. Ramana Maharishi, also reverently called Sri Bhagavant ('Exalted'), was regarded as a representative of the 'mysticism of oneness' (Sanskrit, advaita, 'nondual'). At his formal passage into the existence of an ascetic, a Hindu dies a social and ritual death. Many Shivaite ascetics therefore lie on a funeral pile at the ritual of passage. If he is married, his marriage is dissolved. His possessions are distributed as an inheritance, and the ritual duties of care of the ancestors no longer apply to him. Before his physical death, Ramana Maharishi had also died to the world. (S. Stapelfeldt / Kirsten Holzapfel) myths, obtains between death and sexuality, where the symbolical and complementary character of life (or of the fertility that emerges from sexuality) and death becomes clear. The various mythological explanations of the origin of death worldwide have been categorized by T. P. van Baaren in eight types:[2]

- Death is a natural and God-willed determination of the human being.
- Death began with the death of a deity or mythical being, rather than being causally determined by human behavior.
- The conflict among individual deities is the cause of human beings, too, having to die.
- A deity has deluded human beings, and consequently they became mortal.
- The necessity of death is the result of human imperfection.
- Death results from the human being having made a faulty decision.
- Disobedience, or (usually human) guilt vis-à-vis deities or mythical beings entails the necessity of dying.
- The human being dies because precisely the human being has called for it. The various myths concerning the origin of death can—as far as the human attitude toward this phenomenon is concerned—be reduced to two formulae, more complementary than antithetical: "Death heals all earthly exigencies," and "Better destitution than death."[3]

b) Preparation for death as a process of leave-taking: The separation of the dying person from those who will live on is accomplished in steps, in which, gradually, the inescapable becomes conscious: a psychological (perceiving, realizing) and social process (the one dying 'must not know'). A five-phase model has been observed here, in terms of the manner in which individuals deal with the recognition that they themselves must die. (1) The first brief phase of not wishing to realize is followed by (2) a phase of angry rejection and disbelief, as well as (3) an effort of postponement. There follows (4) a phase of resigned 'facing the facts,' before (5) acceptance, finally, becomes possible. The social process of separation corresponds to the process of mourning on the part of survivors, which, however, is frequently kept for another time.

Unexpected Death

c) If someone dies suddenly in a traffic accident, this unexpected death will be felt as more tragic than when some relatively long illness ends with death. Death as a necessity ought to enter in with forewarning, lest it nullify the world order and become a simple instrument of the wrath of a deity, or of blind chance. This notion can be observed as general in Europe until approximately the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Accordingly, the progressing age of life is the time in which one's presages of death multiply, so that one begins to 'adjust.' The afflictions of age, then, are not only an occasion to become aware of one's age, but also signs that one is approaching one's 'concealed house and home,' and that 'dust returns to dust.'[4] In becoming conscious of their age, it is true, the aged come upon the prospect of death, but also efforts to cling to life. To some extent, the concept arises in European folk belief, that young persons die more readily, more easily, than do the old, and we find various notions of why dying can be difficult. Often, sins are the alleged cause for someone's 'dying hard,' so that the reciprocal conclusion is also drawn that one who dies a difficult death must have been an evil person. One dies more easily when one has reconciled with one's enemies, or gathered the extended family to one's deathbed. Death comes to children more easily, if their godmother is present, or if their mother averts her eyes. Although the concrete day and hour of death is unforeseeable, many days are seen as favorable. The conception is also present that it is advantageous to die soon after the death of a child among one's relatives, since the child has already opened the way to heaven—inasmuch as, according to the sixteenth-century Reformation and its Catholic correlation, the whole of life ought to be led in a Christian fashion. Life becomes seen 'in the light of eternity' (sub specie aeternitatis) that precedes death. Behind all lust for life, grins the mask of death. This annihilates the medieval → ars moriendi. The question of what one ought to do, supposing that one faced immediate death, will have an answer: Continue to do what you are doing. After all, for a person who has prepared for death lifelong, every moment of life is like the immediate moment of death. In the twentieth century, finally, appears the recent change in Western culture: death is expelled from public view, and thereby neither is life any longer a preparation for death. Now the nature of death as a process is gone, and a view of the individual, concrete death inclines more powerfully to the negative.

Rituals of Dying

4. The process of dying is accompanied by a series of → rites of passage. Both for the dying and for those remaining, there is an ambivalence of emotions to overcome or manage. (1) One must fill the void of the loss of a member of the community by a regrouping, and (2) dispose of the corpse, and yet not seem unloving.

a) From the perspective of the person dying, those rites are to be cited through which one settles one's 'temporal affairs.' That is, one takes leave of one's near and dear, asks friends, and, yes, enemies, for pardon—since the unreconciled die a difficult death—and one commends one's soul to God. These ritualized elements in the dying process have to some extent been consigned to writing (for example, the Buddha's discourse of departure in the Parinirvanasutra; Plato's report in the Phaedo of the farewell of Socrates; the Jewish literary genre of the "Testaments" of the Patriarchs; Jesus's leave-taking in the Gospel according to John). Reconciliation and commendation of the soul to God, for instance, also constitute a central

The unheard-of fact, according to Christian belief, that God was executed, has made death and dying a central matter of this religion. In the Christian European cultic tradition, the drama of the violent death of Jesus of Nazareth has produced a rich store of images, which recall the mytho-historical event to the minds and hearts of believers in the most diverse presentations. Or ought one to say: confronts them with it? After all, it is not only the body of the dead God on the → cross on the altar, in home prayer niches, or on the neck of a girl that picture this event—it is the meticulous image of the steps of the act one by one, from the taking down from the cross, to the Pietà (the Sorrowful Mother; → Suffering), to the burial, that present, in detail, the images element of the Church's Viaticum ('supplies for the road')—i.e., reception of the Eucharist by the dying—evidenced as early as the fourth century. From the fourth century, this rite followed the last anointing (today called the Sacrament of the Sick), as a strengthening for the journey in the beyond, and so the penitential and reconciliation character was rather overshadowed. That the process of death can be made easier ritually has already been mentioned; to an extent, this form of assisted dying (→ Euthanasia/Assisted Suicide) can assume altogether concrete forms, by hastening death. Until into the seventeenth century, for example, mortally ill persons in Baltic lands were asphyxiated. Anthropology knows of various cases in which the dying are either exposed, so that death supervenes, or elderly persons abandon their village communities to die in the uncivilized wilderness, apart from their relevant (micro-) cosmos. Other rites are used in the case of those who have just died, for example by addressing the corpse by name, to which it gives no answer—a sign that the person in question is actually dead. This rite is used, for example, in the Catholic Church, in order to ascertain the death of the Pope ritually. A similar function is that of the 'sagdid rite'—the 'canine glance,' in → Zoroastrianism. The eyes of a dog are directed toward the eyes of the deceased, whereby the priest appointed for the execution of the funeral rite receives the assurance that death has actually occurred.

b) From the moment of death and later, rites of separation can be observed, for helping in the management, or even defeat, of the new situation of loss. Here we may cite the ritual closing of the mouth and/or eyes of the deceased, the washing of the corpse, or the destruction of (part of) the deceased's possessions. This last ritual has different functions. Either one wishes to prevent anything from the sphere of the deceased remaining in the world of the living, so that no endangerment can emerge from it; or one wishes to be certain that the deceased have everything available in their new existence that they have had in their preceding manner of existing. As to this last aspect, the primary intent, once more, bears more upon the deceased and less upon the community of the living, with the hope that the different kinds of gifts and bestowals may fulfill this function as well. One of the rites of separation from life performed in the course of the process of dying—in the belief in an existence after death—is the burial itself, which can fulfill several functions, both for the departed and for the bereaved. Oriented toward the community, there are the announcement(s) of the death that make the loss known to others, and thereby serve to help overcome and manage grieving. Specialists are frequently assigned to rituals intended to soften the unaccustomed blow that individuals have suffered, as with the bemoaning of a death by professional wailers, funerals at the hands of burial institutes, or of gravediggers or priests. Rites of grieving occasion an interruption of normal life. Forms of expressing grief are manifold (→ Mourning). There are food prohibitions, sexual taboos, omission of attention to one's outward appearance, self-wounding, clothing prescriptions, or body painting. After the end of the grieving period, everyday life takes once again its wonted course, with the end often coinciding with an ultimate admission that the deceased has now been incorporated into the new environment of the beyond. For the West, it is to be observed that—while, until the end of the nineteenth century, excessive public expressions or mourning were often the order of the day—in the twentieth century grief gradually began to be regarded as somehow shameful, and to be tabooed, and it began to be concealed, which can lead to psychic impairment.

In sum, it becomes clear that rites of dying, with differing accentuations and fleeting transitions, are oriented both to the dying and to the community of the bereaved: these rites perform functions for both. The withdrawal of dying from the life of the community and the increasing privatization of death occasion the appearance of a new set of problems. The more 'private' death becomes, the less room is there for the community-related situation of the rites in question. The result is not only a de facto disappearance of this kind of rite, but also, thereby, an infringement on the management of death on the part of the bereaved. A funeral rite in which only one friend or relative of the deceased takes part today is indifferent to the dead, it is true, but it is more problematic for relatives and friends, who have to overcome or manage the separation.

5. Myths identify the fear of death and dying by narrating the 'crossing' of the subject into another form of existence. While in Christianity this transition is but rarely accorded any attention, many peoples are found in the history of cultures who entertain and cherish rituals bearing on this 'crossing,' and descriptions of the 'right way to travel this road.' Here the journey to the next world is usually beset with difficulties, dangers, and trials that the soul must endure. As 'guides' to ensure order in after-death procedures, ritual books can give instructions for coping with the transition involved. Egyptian Books of the Underworld not only describe the topography of the journey, that the soul may find the right route, but also give concrete instructions as to what the deceased is to say or do in the face of diverse ordeals. Descriptions in the liturgy of the 'ascent of the soul' of the gnostic Mandaeans show a forty-five-day journey in the beyond, of the corpse en route. Here, in contemplation, in a presentation of the → ars moriendi, persons may meditate on their own inescapable destiny, the end of life—an accomplishment of religion not to be underestimated. Even more powerfully, the memento mori, the 'remember your dying' one day, is set before our eyes, when, in Catholic Holy Week processions, Christians behold the suffering and dying of Christ in groupings of life-size statues, or even in role playing. The little girl who, in Sicilian Enna, hesitantly, and yet with curiosity, gazes upon the crudely naturalistic corpse of the Lord lying in state in its splendid Baroque sarcophagus, sees death right here: sunken cheeks, withdrawn lips with teeth exposed, traces of blood—signs of human frailty. She is dressed as a little nun; the privilege is hers because her father, who stands behind her in a white cowl, belongs to a brotherhood (Ital., confraternità), which will reverently bear this 'Grave of Christ' through the streets of the city. There it will elicit community sorrow, just as do the human departed, when led to their last rest, in hearses, with windows, in sorrowful convoy. (Hubert Mohr)

On November 1–2, Mexican tradition celebrates the Day of the Dead (Día de Muertos). It stands in the tradition of the old Mexican celebration of the day of remembrance of the dead, and of the Catholic Feasts of All Saints and All Souls. Publicly, the dead are remembered with a celebration at the cemetery; privately, deceased family and relatives are welcomed with gifts, on a house altar (ofrenda). On this altar belonging to a Mexican-American family in Sacramento, photos and personal objects recall the departed while they were alive. They are entertained with pan de muertos in human shape, and tamales (a dish cooked in corn leaves). A statuette of Mary and votive candles likewise have their place on the altar. The bow is hung with heavily scented cempasúchil blossoms. The large velvet-like flowers (tagetes erecta) are also called flores de muertos ('flowers of the dead'). This is an artistic family, and much of the decoration is homemade. Merry, colorful, and shrill are the skulls (calaveras), made of papier mâché and sugar, as well as the skeletons, who ride, play music, and have fun—altogether in the spirit of the Día de Muertos: the dead should finally have enjoyable times. Bones and wooden snakes (right foreground) at the girl's feet recall the fashioning of the present-day human being, whose emergence was as follows. Since the gods wished to people the earth, the god Quetzalcóatl ('feathered snake') rode into the Realm of the Dead, looking for the bones of the man and woman. With all manner of 'tricks,' he managed to get them away from the Lord and Lady of the Realm of the Dead. Of these 'Precious Bones,' which had been ground to a powder by the goddess Quilatzli/Chihuacóatl ('female snake'), blended with the blood that Quetzalcóatl let flow from his penis, sprang the new race of human beings. In Mexican tradition, the bones and skull left after the decomposition of a corpse are not simply symbols of disintegration. They point to human durability, victory over death, and a potential refashioning. From 1974 onward, the Mexican-American community of Sacramento has celebrated the Day of the Dead publicly, as well. The ofrenda has been portrayed in a picture book intended to explain this festival to other American children. It is part of the Mexican cultural legacy. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

during which the soul must pass through the spheres of the planets and zodiacal progressions, along with facing a court of judgment, before it finds access to the 'realm of light.' In the Tibetan Book of the Dead as it is today, a number of texts are joined, which, among other things, explain the process of death, apparitions of light at the moment of death, and techniques for the quest of the place of rebirth. Just so, concepts in the beliefs of various Indian ethnic groups of South America have been handed down which specify that, after death, the soul must choose between two routes, and that only by traversing the more difficult one will it be enabled to attain to new life in the Realm of the Dead. If the varying durations of such a crossing are to have any meaning, then they are precisely the appropriate time for the bereaved to say prayers or perform rites for the departed. Otherwise the soul will be in danger of failing to manage this transition, and will find no rest. In this case, the dead return, wandering over the earth as spirits, and terrifying the living, or 'reminding' them to execute the corresponding rituals, in order that the dead may reach the beyond (→Zombie). The transit of the dying into the beyond is also described in, for instance, their near-death experiences, or in those of persons who have been reanimated. The agreement of the images in these literary and personal descriptions, respectively, of an after-death experience, is frequently a striking one. They picture the leaving of the body, a road through dark tunnels, an encounter with spiritual beings, or the experience of light, and so on. In sum, it is clear that between physical death and an absolute end of life after death, or a reincarnation of the soul, lies a variable length of time. This interval not only molds death and dying into a continuum, but also provides the possibility of contact with the dead through intermediaries or mediums (→ Spiritism).

Death as a Taboo

6. The twentieth century, in the West, has led to a new orientation and alteration in persons' attitude toward death and dying. Older European history (along with, most often, anthropology) have explained death and dying as a public and community affair. The European twentieth century, on the other hand, shifts death into concealment behind hospital walls (explaining this, altogether rationally, with the necessity of intensive medicine, to be sure). In terms of cultural history, death has replaced sexuality as the 'greatest social taboo.'[5] Everyday death, until the beginning of the twentieth century, had directly touched the respective social groups of the (village and small-town) community. Now it usually exists only in a technological form. Death—usually violent death—now has its place in daily life, for the most part, only on the television set in the living room. Of course, this new death and dying scarcely touch the individual any longer. Concrete death has been mostly expelled from the life of the community—again with the 'technologized exception' that, for example, funerals of internationally known personalities, as a media event, are available to all: we have the cases of Mother Teresa of Calcutta, or of Princess Diana of Wales, in September 1997. Despite greater numbers of viewers worldwide, such events remain merely punctual ones. Given their tabooing, the rites of separation wither: grief expressed in dress is reduced to the moment of the funeral, and announcement of the death is buried in the death notices in the newspaper—notices now with only informational (and often euphemistic) content. In the Middle Ages, a solitary death was an 'ugly' one, which often could be successfully avoided. Now, in our own age, it has overtaken the dying and the living.

1. In Cipoletti 1983, 16.
2. Van Baaren 1987, 252.
3. Ariès 1995, 26.
4. Qoheleth 12:61.
5. Von Barloewen 1996, 85.

Literature

Sources: Ariès, Philipe, Images de l'homme devant la mort, Paris 1983; Budge, E. A. Wallis (ed./trans.), The Book of the Dead, London [2]1953; Evans-Wentz, W. Y. (ed./trans.), The Tibetan Book of the Dead, Or, The After-Death Experiences on the Bardo Plane, London [3]1957 ([1]1927).

Secondary Literature: Ariès, Philipe, Geschichte des Todes, Munich [7]1995 (French [1]1978); Beltz, Walter (ed.), Lexikon der Letzten Dinge, Augsburg 1993; Borst, Arno (ed.), Tod im Mittelalter, Konstanz 1995; Cipoletti, Maria Susana, Jenseitsvorstellungen bei den Indianern Südamerikas, Berlin 1983; Davies, Jon, Death, Burial and Rebirth in the Religions of Antiquity, London 1999; Garland, Robert, The Greek Way of Death, Ithaca 1985; Helmers, Sabine, Tabu und Faszination. Über die Ambivalenz der Einstellung zu Toten, Berlin 1989; Johnson, Christopher J./McGee, Marsha G. (ed.), How Different Religions View Death and Afterlife, Philadelphia [2]1998; Klimkeit, Hans-Joachim (ed.), Tod und Jenseits im Glauben der Völker, Wiesbaden 1978; Nuland, Sherwin B., How We Die, New York 1994; Obayashi, Hiroshi (ed.), Death and Afterlife: Perspectives of World Religions, New York 1992; Stephenson, Gunther (ed.), Leben und Tod in den Religionen, Darmstadt 1980; van Baaren, Th. P., "Death," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 4 (1987), 251-259; van Gennep, Arnold, The Rites of Passage, London 1977 (French [1]1908); von Barloewen, Constantin (ed.), Der Tod in den Weltkulturen und Weltreligionen, Munich 1996; Widengren, Geo, Religionsphänomenologie, Berlin 1969, 394-419; Wittkowski, Joachim, Psychologie des Todes, Darmstadt 1990.

→ Cemetery, Funeral/Burial, Grave/Tomb, Hereafter, Mourning, Mummification, Ritual

Manfred Hutter

Death (Personification of)

1. "We must defeat death!" Arrogant illusion of an → immortality to be achieved by technology? Surely. But out of the mouth of someone who is ill, it can express the conceptualization of death as a person attempting to lay hands on his victim and can lend courage for the battle against → death and dying. That God will defeat death as 'the last enemy' is a religious proposition with a long pre-Christian history. This mythological figure is the subject that we here seek to address: death as a person.

In the process of death and dying, physical death marks a caesura that can be variously defined. To be sure, from a perspective of anthropology and religious history, the accent lies less on the moment of medical death than on the entire phenomenon of dying. Here, death is seen as personified. This personification imposes facets on the cultural world of conceptualizations regarding death.

Death as a God: Polytheism

2. a) In Vedic mythology we find lore regarding Yama and his wife Yami. The tale claims that he was the first human being to die, wherefore he not only was the first to enter the beyond, but also became the God of Death, or Death personified. More recent traditions develop Yama's task as death: thus, to a person who is to die he dispatches his Death Bird, Yamaduta, to announce the death. Finally, Yamaduta conducts the deceased to the Realm of Death, and before Death personified, who pronounces judgment on the deceased. In the "Baal Mot cycle," Ugaritic mythology describes the confrontation between the Ugaritic national god Baal, who brings fertility and life as dispenser of rain, and Mot, who brings death. The ideas linked up with Mot as God of Death are manifold (cf. Hebrew mavet, 'Death'). For example, he is seen as the drought that (in summer) causes everything to wither—but he also has anthropomorphic traits, such as a gigantic mouth, which, insatiable, gulps down humans and gods alike. Since Mot, in the Ugaritic religion, was seen as a negative and hostile being, with whom no one wished any contact, no cult was practiced in his honor. In the Greek tradition, Thanatos is regarded as the blood brother of (likewise personified and deified) Sleep (Iliad 14, 231; 16, 672). Pictorial presentations of Death on vase paintings represent him as a winged man. In inscriptions on tombs, he is depicted as a cruel, hostile, passionate and furious, unmerciful demon, especially in Etruria. The three mythologic testimonials that we have selected here to stand as examples, illustrate the same ambivalence of the position of death and dying. As a divine person, Death is depicted as negative and hostile; yet he certainly can send his premonitions to human beings as a warning or 'reminder' and convey to a person a sense of death in sleep. Besides, there is the image of death as a friend, who delivers one from suffering. This picture has opened a 'pagan' alternative for European history of religion—one that, especially in Romanticism, facilitates an aesthetics of death.

Death as God's Adversary: Monotheism

b) Some propositions in the Bible, referring to mythic traditions comparable to those from Ugarit, apply the image of a personified death as well. The Apostle Paul identifies death as lord of human beings from Adam to Moses (Rom 5:14) and as the last enemy (1 Cor 15:26, citing Isa 25:8). According to the Revelation of John (Rev 20:13 ff.), Death, with the personified Underworld, will be cast into the sea of fire at the end of the world, so that 'eternal' life can then begin. By way of Christianity, whose power stamped and molded European culture, such personifications have stayed vivid, supplemented to some extent by the legacy of a non-Christian European antiquity. They result in various conceptualizations of Death as a person, although corporeal depictions of death are missing until the twelfth century.

c) With its point of departure in the equivalency between the dead and Death, the notion appears of presenting death as a skeleton, a man of bones. In a context of the catastrophes of the fourteenth century plague, this presentation finds entry into the visual arts. Victims of the plague are taken into captivity by Death the skeleton, or they lie at his feet. An especially important type of presentation is that of the Dance of the Dead, which equalizes all social classes. The nature of the human being as transitory, connected with the symbolism of a harvest, inspires the presentation of death as a reaper (at times, again, as a skeleton), carrying his inevitable

American airbrush artist Dru Blair, working on an assignment by the Georgia Air National Guard, is decorating a B1-B bomber of the 116th Bomber Squadron of the Guard with an image of death as a person, thus sarcastically illustrating the death mythology of a "Defense Ministry." Subtly (and particularly forcefully), the image of death is here used as an aggressive power in order to control it and to transfer images of the → Apocalypse to reality, thus inverting the premises of religious history and anthropology. As part of a war and death mythology for a military interpretation of religion, death as a person once more wins a place in a de-sacralized and public venue.

attribute, a scythe or sickle. Sometimes male Death is accompanied by a 'Death-ess,' who bears, as her attribute, a rake. The symbolism of the harvest is unmistakable: the scythe is the attribute of a Death reaping a harvest among human beings, which had already been a concept in antiquity. The fact that speech is often affected by images and ideas is clearly shown in the figure of the 'Death-ess': in Slavic as well as Romance language areas, Death is a woman, owing in part to the fact that, in these languages, the word 'death' is feminine in gender. Other conceptions, appearing in the Renaissance, such as that of Death holding an hourglass in his hand, indicating the amount of time that human beings still have left to live, connect death once more with notions from antiquity (e.g., Chronos). That of (the Demon of) Death, astride a white horse, harks back to the Apocalyptic Four Horsemen of Rev 6 and 9.

In the cultural climate around 1900, during the fin de siècle, the complementarity of death and life in the broadest sense finds a new expression—Death personified in an erotic context, for instance as "Death and the Maiden." This motif is hardly specifically European: for example, we find it on presentations of pre-Columbian moche ceramics (100–600 CE) presented as tomb-offerings. Not only does the imagery on these ceramics refer to various sexual practices, but an ever-returning type of presentation shows a male skeleton-corpse having sexual contact with a living woman. That life and death are two closely connected things finds here a clear embodiment.

Corresponding to the transformation of the attitude taken toward death in the twentieth century, which has led to a stronger and stronger withdrawal of death from the public gaze, death as a mythological person disappears from the same milieu. Although new religious currents of the present attempt to re-animate mythical material, such as a tradition of goddesses (as well as gods), a personified death remains practically ignored. Human experience with death and dying plays scarcely any role in this new religiosity. Death, here, is regarded simply as a transitional phase, a necessary stage of development, to a new existence and reincarnation. It is not the object of special interest, so that neither does the question of death as a person continue to have any role.

Literature

Field, David et al. (eds.), Death, Gender, and Ethnicity, London 1997; Guthke, Karl S., The Gender of Death: A Cultural History in Art and Literature, Cambridge 1999; Lins, Heinz-Maria, Todesursachen in der Mythologie der Antike, Frankfurt/M. 1993; Praz, Mario, Liebe, Tod und Teufel. Die schwarze Romantik, Munich [2]1997; Todd, Janet, Gender, Art and Death, Cambridge 1993.

→ Ars Moriendi; Death and Dying, Soul, Cemetery

Manfred Hutter

Demise of a Religion

1. The demise of a religion is nearly always tied to the simultaneous rise of new religions or ideologies. The better term, then, would be 'supersession' of religions, since no empty psychosocial cultural and philosophical space remains. Often this process is bound up with an official division of a religious community into groups. The narrower concept of 'demise' or 'disintegration' may be applicable at best in the case of this kind of fragmentation of a comprehensive religious system. Elements of a disintegrating religion often remain behind (cults, ritual objects, or myths); these then, refilled with meaning—with their old meaning or a new one—become components of a 'successive faith.'

External Causes

2. a) Externally, the disintegration of a religion has social or political causes, as, for example, the demise of the social class that has practiced it, the subjugation of the region by peoples of other beliefs, or the alteration of relationships among the generations. Additionally, new conditionings of the environment can make cults superfluous, or with time, render their content unintelligible. An example of the disintegration of a religion owing to external causes would be the violent Christianization imposed by the Spaniards in the → Central America of early modernity. Indeed, in a framework of → colonialism, Christianity was met in many regions by autochthonous or 'tribal' religions. When their followers were completely subjected to new conditions, as in the case of the Africans abducted to America, one may speak of disintegration, or better, annihilation of the original religion. In areas in which at most some missionaries exerted pressure and everyday structures were scarcely touched, the original religion was only lightly covered over. Outer influences often lead to a mix in the content of various religions, and a syncretism appears, so that essential content and effects are often lost (e.g., in the 'cargo cult' of the Western Pacific; → South Sea/Australia).

Internal Causes

b) An inner cause of the disintegration of religion is the appearance of new intellectual developments (e.g., science, a political ideology), when the latter answer questions, in a way satisfactory to society, that had previously been handled as religious themes. In this case, they dissolve the respective religious references. Socially binding rites and cults are assumed by other instances and/or are rededicated to exclusively secular references. One may say that, in a more or less strongly changing environment, the only religious content and interpretations that endure are those that seem judicious to the individual and to society. Of course, no religion has ever perfectly represented its time and place. Epochal designations like 'ancient Greece,' or the 'Christian Middle Ages,' are possible only from a temporal distance. Thus, only in retrospect is the disintegration of a religion (that has been dominant in time and place) identified with a historical breach and societal caesura. What is usually at hand is a slow process, simply not perceived by the generations of its contemporaries. The outstanding example in a European context is the end of antiquity, as an upwardly moving Christianity suppressed a whole series of Mediterranean belief systems—integrating, however, some of their components into its own religious system.

In the case of religious communities with a tendency to close themselves off (so-called 'sects'), a total demise is theoretically possible. If they have left no traces or alterations in society, even memories of them disappear after a time.

Religion in Secular Societies

3. In contemporary secularized societies, the manifold appearance of new spiritual instances has led to the point that their carriers are forced forward into the areas of competence of the religious specialists. For one thing, the inner sphere of the religious no longer retains much of a connection with human beings' external reality. Except perhaps in the United States, piety and church attendance effect no change in the position of an individual in society. Religion has become a private affair. For another thing—once again with the exception of the US—elucidations of scientists and opportunities for influence on the part of politicians and economists, all of whom usually act without reference to religion, have reinterpreted core concepts that originally were religious. Existential fears, insofar as these have to do with material issues, are entrusted to insurance agencies; and insofar as they have to do with spiritual issues, they are entrusted to psychologists. Spiritual health is reinterpreted as physical or mental health and becomes a matter of medicine. Injunctions and prohibitions become merely socially binding, and are comprehensively explained in juridical terms, their premises being always open to critical questioning. Resorting to unquestionable, ultimate, foundations is generally no longer admissible in social discourse. They are traditions of parts of a group and/or they persist as historically discredited in the memory of people who regard themselves as enlightened.

The post-Enlightenment de-Christianizing of broad areas of life has caused a → disenchantment in the Western world (Max → Weber), and has powerfully repressed the churches in their quality as socially organized religion. Strongly structured religious communities (e.g., the Catholic Church or certain Protestant groups in the United States) or those with an extraordinary claim to regulation (certain schools of Islam) often react to this kind of loss of influence with fundamentalist tendencies (→ Fundamentalism). Others attempt to accommodate by reforms, or else withdraw.

Although explicit religion in everyday life is more and more 'invisible' (T. Luckmann), the need for a religious interpretation of meaning seems to abide. In the West, especially in Western Europe, a waxing individualization leads to the invention by searchers after meaning of eclectic 'individual' or 'virtuoso' religions, which lead, if anywhere at all, to the formation of small groups. At this point, the high standard of the informational media makes it possible to reach back to the religious and cultural traditions of all of the civilizations of the world (especially those of so-called 'nature people'), and it scarcely plays a role whether this knowledge reflects the current condition of those cultures. If these neo-constructions are transported back to the regions of their origin, for instance by ethno-tourism, they can hasten the collapse of cultures often already weakened by brachial modernization in any case.

Literature

Bourdieu, Pierre, Choses dites, Paris 1987; Luckman, Thomas, The Invisible Religion: The Problem of Religion in Modern Society, New York etc. 1967; Zinser, Hartmut (ed.), Der Untergang von Religionen, Berlin 1986.

→ Disenchantment/Re-Enchantment, Intellectual Religion, Private Religion, Secularization

Stefan Rademacher

Democracy

Democracy as the Principle of the Legitimation of the Political

1. Democracy was already discussed in the philosophy of antiquity; only in modern times, however, has it become the principle of the legitimation of government. Unlike the traditional typology of the constitution, essentially molded by Aristotle, democracy today no longer posits merely one form of government among the many that might be possible; instead, it molds the modern versions in terms of the traditional concept of the 'common good' (bonum commune), on which the legitimation of the political rests across the board. In order to be legitimate—so runs modernity's core democratic notion—political power must originate from the will of the people. It must guarantee a periodic election, general, fair, and free, and the distribution of power among legislative, judicial, and executive organs. Furthermore, it must observe principles of governmental legality and of publicly declared basic rights. Today the demand for democracy or democratization has its effects beyond the governmental and political area. It spreads throughout any society in which democracy has won broad effectiveness as a form of life. Even religious communities see themselves confronted with this demand.

Historical Retrospective

2. Looking back on European history, we find the relationship between the religious communities—concretely, the Christian churches—and democratic movements to have been complex and by no means free of contradictions. While demands for democratization frequently adopted religious concepts and doctrines, the churches related rather skeptically to them, even openly repudiating them. Admittedly, the → Reformation doctrine of the priesthood of all the faithful marks a decided transformation vis-à-vis the hierarchical conceptual world of the Middle Ages. As a result of the distinction between the spiritual and the secular political domains, as inculcated especially by → Luther, the reformation idea of equality nonetheless did not directly lead to political demands for democratization. At most, the latter were occasionally suggested by certain free-church groups of radical Protestantism—the 'stepchildren of the Reformation' (Ernst Troeltsch). It would be equally inadequate to understand modern democracy as a merely Protestant phenomenon, or even as having arisen from general Christian impulses. The European wars of religion of early modernity and the accompanying crisis of traditional ideas of the legitimation of the political occasioned the appearance of an enlightened attitude toward the state. That attitude sought its exemplars in non-Christian antiquity and found its expression in, for example, seventeenth- and eighteenth-century theories of a social constitution. In his Contrat Sociale (1762; Fr., "Social Contract"), Rousseau calls for a religion civile (→ Civil Religion), in which the laws of the republic would be rooted in the hearts of its citizens. But his orientation is explicitly non-Christian and looks instead toward the exemplar of the ancient city religions.

The Churches and Modern Democracies

3. Although, in its initial phase, the French → Revolution found support among some elements of the clergy, it soon came into confrontation with the Catholic Church. Church status and power overshadowed the relationship between Christianity and democracy in continental Europe until the early twentieth century. Not only Catholic thinkers of the Counter-Revolution like Joseph de Maistre (1753–1821), but also conservative Protestants like Prussian philosopher of law Friedrich Julius Stahl (1802–1861), emphatically rejected the revolutionary doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, labeling it rebellion against religion and Church. The tendency of the Catholic magisterium to reject the democratic constitutional state reached its climax in the Syllabus of Errors of Pope Pius IX, a catalogue of 'eighty errors of our time.' Here the principal objects of criticism were elements of the secular state such as civil marriage, equality of religions, and → freedom of religion. Meanwhile on the Evangelical side, resistance was principally focused on the imminent separation of Church and state, and then Church and school (→ Secularization).

The cultural struggle between democracy and Christianity meanwhile has become a thing of the past, a fact that is related to the experience of totalitarianism in the twentieth century. A broad consensus has now emerged on liberty and democracy as strict prerequisites for human association, at least so in Western countries. As early as the nineteenth century, there were confessional parties in many European nations, usually of Catholic orientation. Although these parties are concerned to ensure the influence of the Church on public life, they have an altogether positive attitude toward democracy, and therefore have occasionally come into conflict with the foreign policy of the Vatican. Democracy today, then, is extensively acknowledged and supported by the Christian churches, where it becomes a political expression of moral responsibility grounded in human worth. Meanwhile, as much as ever, controversies continue to rage over questions of intra-church consent and democratization.

Front and Center Today: Islam and Democracy

4. In recent times, confrontations over democracy have occurred in the communities of other religions. An example appears in various Islamic conceptions of democracy. These have been set forth and examined both by individual Muslim theoreticians and by Islamic organizations, such as Al-Azhar University in Cairo. Of course, conceptions differ considerably. On the one hand, there are authoritarian conceptions of a 'theo-democracy' (Mawdoodi), in which, as the collective representative (khalifa) of God on earth, the people of believers is to observe proposed religious norms. On the other side, there are also express evaluations of a liberal democracy that, in function of religious concepts of equality and the Qur'anic principle of consultation (shura), can also be grounded in Islam.

Literature

Cladis, Mark S., Public Vision, Private Lives: Rousseau, Religion, and 21st-Century Democracy, Oxford 2003; Maddox, Graham, Religion and the Rise of Democracy, London 1996; Ravitch, Diane/Thernstrom, Abigail (eds.), The Democracy Reader: Classic and Modern Speeches, Essays, Poems, Declarations, and Documents on Freedom and Human Rights Worldwide, New York 1992; Sartori, Giovanni, The Theory of Democracy Revisited (Part I: The Contemporary Debate; Part II: The Classical Issues), Chatham 1987; Shapiro, Ian, The State of Democratic Theory, Princeton 2003; Stout, Jeffrey, Democracy and Tradition, Princeton 2004; Terchek, Ronald J. (ed.), Theories of Democracy: A Reader, Lanham 2001; Thiemann, Ronald F., Religion in Public Life: A Dilemma for Democracy, Washington 1996; Tocqueville, Alexis de, Democracy in America, New York 1956 ([1]1835); Troeltsch, Ernst, Protestantism and Progress: The Significance of Protestantism for the Rise of the Modern World, Philadelphia 1986 ([1]1911).

→ Catholicism, Civil Religion, Enlightenment, Freedom of Religion, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Human Rights, Political Religion, Protestantism, Revolution, Secularization

Heiner Bielefeldt

Demon / Demonology

Daimon with the Greeks

1. The word daemon is the Latinized form of the ancient Greek daímon. In English, it has become 'demon.' In the Greek tradition, daímones referred to supernatural beings who intervened in the destiny of human beings, partly as bringers of luck and happiness, partly as messengers of the insalubrious. Even Plato still interprets Eros, messenger of → love, as a 'great daímon,' in correspondence with this interpretation, and thus as a being 'between a god and a mortal' (Symposium, 202d-e). In the later Plato, in the Apology, an extension of the concept sees Socrates's daímon as his guiding 'inner spirit.' Finally the daímon appears as a metaphor of religious speech for the human being's transcendent share in the soul, lent by the divine to the human person to be his and her 'guardian spirit' (Timaeus 90a-c).

Negative Evaluation

2. The gradual negative re-evaluation of the concept 'demon' developed only in the post-Platonic era. A normative proportion of the new, pejorative force was that of, especially, the Christian apologetics of the Fathers of the Church since Tertullian. In the new meaning, by way of an interpretatio Christiana, the concept of demons was inserted into an explanatory model of the world that was extensively dualistic (→ Dualism). Within this model—alongside God and the Devil—the good angels and the evil demons are posited in a relation of contrariety. In the framework of the theological systematics in question, the angels are the living prototypes and guardians of the good life willed by God. To the demons are exclusively ascribed activities and intentions directed toward endangerment and sabotage of wholesome life. Christianized Europe based upon this schema a demonology in which strokes of fate and the destiny of the life of individuals are interpreted as effects of the assaults of evil demons. This interpretation extends far beyond the Middle Ages, remaining vividly alive, especially in popular belief. Such belief is reflected in the Catholic usage of inscribing the first letters of the respective names of the 'Magi from the East' mentioned in Matt 2:1-12 (i.e. 'C+M+B') with chalk over a doorway on the Feast of the Three Holy Men. This symbolism (meanwhile extensively secularized, and frequently misunderstood) was intended as a means of banishing, with the help of the Sign of the → Cross, any evil demons who might have been lurking in the living space of one's dwelling.

Here and there, notions of demons are also conveyed along Christian routes, and can be found in texts of the 'new religious movements.' The spectrum of reception extends from the direct adoption of the dualistic value-pattern and its implications to its radical reversal (especially in → Satanism).

The bond to a worldview stamped by a dualistic ethics, so obvious for the European context, makes the concept of 'demon' a problematic category in a scholarly comparison of cultures. Frequently, conceptions that, at first sight, seem comparable with that of demons (as, for example, with that of the dakin of Tantrism or the Islamic djinn), are basically contextualized and evaluated differently than the 'evil demons' of the Christian European tradition, because of the discrepancy in worldview. On the other hand, a more appropriate approach to a description of this kind of thinking, one that will be less the victim of misleading biases, is offered by the category 'religious frontier-striders' (Grenzgänger; → Angel).

Literature

Colpe, Carsten, "Geister (Dämonen)," in: Realenzyklopädie für Antike und Christentum 9 (1976), 546-553; Ferguson, Everett, Demonology of the Early Christian World, New York 1984; Habermehl, Peter, "Dämon," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 2 (1990), 203-207; Levack, Brian P. (ed.), New Perspectives on Witchcraft, Magic and Demonology, New York 2001; Maggi, Armando, Satan's Rhetoric: A Study of Renaissance Demonology, Chicago 2001; McGrath, Malcolm, Demons of the Modern World, Amherst 2002; Robbins, Rossell Hope, The Encyclopedia of Witchcraft and Demonology, New York 1981; Summers, Montague, The History of Witchcraft and Demonology, Edison 1992.

→ Angel, Devil, Dualism, Magic, Witch/Persecution of Witches, Zombie

Gregor Ahn

Denomination

Denominations (from Lat., denominare, 'to name') are legally equal religious bodies. Originally only Protestant communities formed in the United States were called denominations. Today the designation denotes a religious community of likeminded individuals formed on the groundwork of a common belief, even if they come from other religions, as in the case of the American Native Church. Denominations are dependent on common conceptions of value and reciprocal incumbency of duties, and require their members' voluntary cooperation and financing. This dependence on acceptance by their respective clients leads to a situation of competition, sometimes sparking alliances or understandings to the point of a denomination's monopolization by a limited number of its members. Besides having various views, the belief communities may vary in their organizational forms, social strata, political and moral apprehensions, or kinds of religious experiences. Although denominations have no official connections with a civil power, nevertheless a situation of state influence can arise through recognition of the state on the part of a denomination or the withdrawal of privileges (e.g., tax exemption) on the part of the state.

Literature

Bedell, G. C. et al., Religion in America, New York [2]1982; Scherer, Ross, P., American Denominational Organization: A Sociological View, Pasadena 1980.

→ Group, North America, Sect

Daniela Weber

Destiny / Fate

Conceptualizations

Unforeseeable events that radically alter persons' lives can be seen as their 'destiny' (Lat. de-stanare, 'stand down,' solidly 'stand') or their 'fate' (Lat., fatum, 'oracle,' from far-, 'speak'). Since such events differentiate what happens to one person from what happens to another, in most cultures they call for an explanation. In Europe, the emergence of conceptualizations of destiny that would become traditional is first and especially inspired by Greco-Hellenistic religions. In these religions, reflections on destiny suggest a kind of 'fixing' of human life by divinities or powers imagined either personally or impersonally. The Olympian gods often influence the course of events in a very direct manner. Destiny is thought of as the 'lot' or portion (Gr., moira; also actively personified as moirai, 'apportioners') that an individual possesses of the course of events as a whole—'the apportioned' (Gr., heimarmene, the Stoa's 'necessity of destiny')—or as what 'strikes,' 'affects,' 'touches' human beings—or again, as happiness or misfortune (Gr., tuche/tyche)—or finally, in Roman religion as fatum, what 'has been said' by the goddesses of destiny (Parzai) at a person's birth (→ Fatalism). The juxtaposition of these motifs with the Jewish-Christian concept of the omnipotent, omniscient, and unique creator-God then entailed in Christianity—and later, especially, in Islam—the development of the field of tension between predestination (→ Determinism) and human freedom of → will and activity. Besides this theological discourse, however, popular piety has retained impersonal concepts of destiny, as, to an extent, has literature (like the ineluctable 'power of destiny,' or the unforeseeable, coincidence-oriented 'wheel of fortune') as favorite patterns of explanation. Thus, Western conceptualizations of destiny are traditionally bound to the most heterogeneous cycles of problems, ranging from the question of human beings' responsibility for their actions to individuals' entanglement in connections of tragic events or in astrological predictions of 'things to come.' "Destiny" has thereby advanced to the status of a common expression, which can include—depending on the respective model of interpretation—quite different, sometimes even contradictory, concepts. It includes every extraordinary determination of individuals' life conditions (or, less often, those of groups), by one or more instances. The latter are thought of as supernatural, or worldwide, and as working their effects either according to plan or arbitrarily.

Fundamental Patterns in Religious History

2. Investigations in the history of religions have usually been informed by only isolated aspects of the typical explanatory models of the traditional Western conceptualizations of destiny. In Western concepts of Islam, for instance, the topic of destiny was subordinated for centuries to strictly fatalistic thinking, by analogy with Christian problems of predestination. Muslims were called upon to surrender themselves to the destiny that Allah had mapped out for them inalterably. Their special motto could even be found in the 'Oriental novels' of adventure-story-author Karl May, author of a number of much-loved adventure stories (→ Orientalism/Exotism). The word was the Turkish kismet (→ Fatalism).

Actually, however, the trove abiding in the history of religions is far more complex. As we have already indicated for European notions of destiny, the respective dominant conceptions of destiny are seldom represented exclusively. They must compete with other notions, or else are combined and harmonized with them. But in spite of respectively distinct constellations and formations, basic patterns can be discerned and identified.

b) Destiny as the outcome of divine activity: Many religions assign the origin of the destiny of individuals or groups to a determination of human life circumstances by the deities of their respective pantheons. Others say that it has only been by the intervention of these deities in a history underway. Here, the invitations to a differentiation of the polytheistic ideas of the gods permit a clear appraisal of the varying degrees of the power over destiny exercised by the gods of a pantheon. Certain deities can be understood as, decidedly, gods of fate (e.g., Ger. Heimdallt, Baltic Laima, Gk. Moirai), who extensively predetermine persons' lives. Others (e.g., Loki or Wotan, or indeed the gods of Olympus) are only attributed situational opportunities of influence.

In the monotheistic religions, by contrast, the reduction of the pantheon to a single, all-eclipsing divine figure has led to a systematic difficulty. Given this God's omnipotence and omniscience, necessarily premised, how could the freedom of the human will, and an ethical responsibility dependent upon it, even be imagined (→ Theodicy)? Especially in Islamic theodicy, the question of how to maintain an ethic of responsibility in the face of a theologically deduced doctrine of predestination, find expression in two opposed traditions. The Mu'tazilites represent a tradition emphasizing the freedom of the human act. The Ash'aritic interpretation takes its point of departure in the concept that human acts are generated by Allah; however, human beings appropriate their roles voluntarily and are therefore independent of predestination in their acts, for which they are now responsible.

Destiny as the product of an impersonal providence: In this case, it suffices to cite two characteristic examples of the acceptance of an impersonal instance of destiny that would dictate the course of the world through a 'blind' providence and thereby predetermine the life of the individual. First, let us recall the Hellenistic heimarmene conception. Then there is the twentieth-century European belief in the products of celestial constellations, products unmanageable, and 'foreseeable' only by → astrology. (This belief has been thus delivered from the conditions of its original theistic framework.) The concept of an impersonal providence characterizes destiny as a succession of events without a plan, neither established in connection with the moral behavior of those concerned, nor open to reference to the eccentricity of a capricious God.

c) Destiny in a universal context of justice: In the high cultures of the ancient East, and especially in Hindu and Buddhist religious forms, the concept of a world-embracing 'interconnection of justice' is the decisive instance of the generation of destiny. Destiny as a consequence of one's own deeds constitutes a just compensation, in return for good or evil activity, as determined by the prevailing ethic. Indian models of → reincarnation frankly and readily permit the interpretation of a person's social status and character (even along with unexpected happenings in that person's life) as consequences of the karma gathered in a previous existence. In practice, of course, even Hindu societies frankly discuss alternative options for explanation. For instance, there was the case of a thief, in which a Tamil village population was unable to agree. Was the theft to be ascribed to an arbitrarily predetermined 'head writing' on Shiva's part? Or had the deed been willed, so that karmic consequences were included in the causality?[1]

d) Destiny in magically provoked connections: Diametrically opposite to the fatalistic acceptance of destiny is the attempt to appropriate power over one's own destiny, as well as over that of others, through magical techniques in → ritual. Here the starting point becomes a ritually selected causal nexus, through spells cast by the use of analogical objects or notions, oral recitation, sacrifice, etc. for the purpose of an automatic effect. The associated claim is that these can be the means not only of warding off the looming insalubrious influences, but also of exerting influence over other persons, as for example with love potions (→ Magic).

Ideologization and Politicization

3. In the course of the nineteenth century, the concept of 'destiny' was introduced into a philosophy of the various series of periods in history. The subsequent doctrine of culture developed by O. Spengler in his monograph Der Untergang des Abendlandes (Ger., "The Decline and Fall of the West"; 1918) was based on that same phenomenon. And both teachings supported the durable politicization and popular national explosive charge of the concept of destiny, which was advancing to the status of a slogan in the first half of the twentieth century. This concept was seized upon in → National Socialism's ideology and concept of history. The 'Nordic-Germanic' picture of destiny was then said to stand in diametrical opposition to the 'Near Asian Semite' notion of the same. While the latter was stamped by fatalism, the former was seen as having accepted destiny as an 'assignment'—as a 'task' to be performed. Now, for the first time, 'destiny' was stylized as the norm of all norms for the activities of political propaganda.

4. The Second World War was followed by an extensive effort, lasting several decades, to render the concept of destiny taboo, in reaction to National Socialism's utilization of it for its own purposes. Then came the Europe of today, once more marked by concepts of destiny—by various different concepts, right next door to one another—and new syntheses of the same. In the meantime, at least for some practicing Christians, it seems as altogether compatible with their faith regularly to consult their horoscopes, and, rather than commit their destiny to the mighty God of history, tacitly to entrust it to the impersonal might of providence, or of a constellation. With new religious developments—by no means always materializing outside the Church—it has come to the point, over and above an acceptance of the notion of reincarnation, of the adoption of Indian conceptualizations of karma. Granted, the latter are more usually perceived as the sign of a destined opportunity for the individual to have another chance at life on earth.

A good example of this connection between the idea of reincarnation and individual fate is the 1991 film "Dead Again" by Irish Shakespearean actor and director Kenneth Branagh. The plot tells the story, staged in 1990s California, of a detective (Kenneth Branagh) and a stranger, a woman suffering from amnesia. But the latter has engaged the services of a hypnotist and recovers memories of a tragic earlier life in Los Angeles in the late 1940s: Shortly after her marriage to a famous director (Kenneth Branagh once more), the young woman is murdered and her unjustly suspected spouse is sentenced and executed. In the next life, in the 1990s, the long-since married couple meet again. The old murder is unmasked and the loving couple receives a new chance for a happy life together—although in somewhat altered circumstances, as man and wife have switched bodies! In a key scene, the 'detective story of a reincarnation' is told and interpreted as the result of the intervention of a certain destiny resting on karma. With a cynical undertone, an ex-psychologist (Robin Williams) explains to the protagonists that there is no way for this destiny-laden chain of rebirths to have been a coincidence—to have come about by chance: "People do not always meet this particular other person! Thanks to destiny, the only cosmic power, with its tragic sense of humor, two persons, who have been bashed to bits in a previous life, get a chance to revenge themselves on someone in their new life, today. That is the Karma Credit Plan. Buy now, pay for all eternity."

1. Daniel, S. B., "The Tool Box Approach of the Tamil to the Issues of Moral Responsibility and Human Destiny," in Keyes/Daniel 1983, 27-62, 40ff.

Literature

Bolle, Kees W., "Fate," in: Encyclopedia of Religion 5 (1987), 290-298; Ringgren, Helmer, Fatalistic Beliefs in Religion, Folklore, and Literature, Stockholm 1967; Keyes, Charles F./Daniel, F. Valentine, Karma: An Anthropological Inquiry, Berkeley 1983.

→ Astrology, Determinism, Fatalism, Predestination, Reincarnation, Will (free)

Gregor Ahn

Determinism

1. Determinism is a Weltanschauung or worldview that holds all processes of inanimate and animate nature, together with human acts, to be causally conditioned. In other words, inorganic, organic, cultural, and psychic life presents a tight succession of cause and effect. Between causes and effects, therefore, no objective undetermined, random uncaused moment can be introduced, and this in principle. Therefore natural, cultural, and psychic processes are basically (pre-)determinable.

2. The ancient protagonists of this theory are Democritus, Epicurus, and Lucretius. By way of the early modern naturalism and the mathematically geared understanding of nature as we find it in Johannes Kepler (1571–1630), Galileo Galilei (1564–1642), and Isaac Newton (1643–1727), the concept of determinism has undergone an essential amplification. The mathematical calculability of physical processes gives rise to a picture of the world in which not only physical processes, but human activities as well, seem to have become susceptible of calculation by the methods of mathematics and physics.

Fate and Determination

The ethical consequences of such a view affect first of all an evaluation of → fate. Determinism in the strict sense replaces the conceptualization of a divinely created cosmos with that of a nature grounded in itself and ordered by itself. The idea of → predestination, which is to be distinguished from determinism, is indeed itself deterministic to the extent that worldly and human fate is subject to divine providence. But an essential difference between determinism and predestination lies in the fact that, in the hypothesis of predestination, individual human beings are reserved a greater or lesser margin of cooperation in this fate; after all, they are basically free beings. To be sure, the margins fall out differently with their various representatives (→ Augustine, → Luther, Zwingli, and Calvin). None of these, however, go so far as to hold that human beings' life and actions are deterministically controlled. The essence of determinism is the denial of freedom on the basis of a radical causal mechanism. Under the coercion of a strong determinism, human life would be decided by destiny. Predestination is to be distinguished from fate or 'fatalism,' the latter being the form of life in which a human being entirely lacks freedom.

We find this radical form of determinism not only in its ancient proponents, but also in the French materialism of Paul Heinrich Dietrich d'Holbach (1723–1789). His work De la nature ("On Nature"; 1770) ranks as the best-known work of this inclination. The earlier Julien Offray de La Mettrie (1709–1751), especially with his famous L'homme machine ("The Human Being a Machine"; 1748), seeks to abandon the Cartesian division of body and soul and to demonstrate the ensoulment of matter in this premise. But for Holbach, nature is a giant machine and keeps itself in motion. The basic law of this mechanisticism is blind fate. Subsequently, materialism and determinism were identified with each other, being regarded as faces of a basically atheistic Weltanschauung. But our examples from French materialism show that this equivalency is not correct. Instead, the materialists had different, usually pantheistic, notions of God. This fact demonstrates its complement: that the strongest argument for → atheism is not materialism, but determinism.

Criticism

3. A fundamental criticism of determinism is to be found in Kant, and in his conception of the enlightened reason. Determinism, Kant argues, is the outcome of an uncritical use of understanding and reason. Thus, the human being's cognition, and therefore the concept of causality as well, is tied to experience. This circumstance means that human understanding is not in a position to cognize and to identify determinism or deterministic processes. The rejection of determinism as a theoretical model and its disqualification in the practical area is a fundamental note of → Enlightenment thinking. This measure, however, eliminates belief in causality and fate. In science, as well as in everyday thinking, determinism in these two basic forms continues to play a leading role. At the same time, progress in physics in the early part of the twentieth century—with Albert Einstein's theory of relativity, Werner Heisenberg's principle of indeterminacy, and the subsequent development of quantum mechanics—has seriously caught the physical foundation of determinism into question.

Determinism as a Religious Worldview

4. Despite this, determinism abides as a Weltanschauung. This persistence obtains especially for various methods that strive to foresee and predetermine one's destiny, as in parts of → astrology. These current forms constitute a testimonial to determinism's presentation not so much of a scientific problem, but of a psychological one. In its method lurks the wish to be able to make life, and especially one's personal history, completely transparent and available to inspection, in all of its relationships and connections.

If all of this is valid for the West, it must nonetheless be regarded in a different way with respect to Eastern thought, to avoid falling victim to the prejudice that Eastern philosophy hosts at least a proclivity to fatalism. Thus, while the Ājīvikas can indeed be considered as espousing a doctrine based on fatalism, the pan-Indian concept of karma, (Sanskrit, karman, 'deed,' 'consequences of one's deeds') is not fatalistic in the Western sense. Thus, in → Buddhism, a strict distinction is to be made between the natural, in the widest sense, necessity of a causality principle, and the alien ascription of causes and their consequences. Agents seemingly live in the context of a law of cause and effect that would be necessary by nature. Still, with their freedom of decision, when all is said and done, they retain the freedom to transcend the inclusive context of their activity. In Buddhism, then (as in Hinduism), the Western concept of fatalism—and therefore of determinism as well—is inapplicable: after all, neither alien attribution nor natural necessity petrifies the further course of human deeds.

Literature

Balaban, Oded/Erev, Anan, The Bounds of Freedom: About the Eastern and Western Approaches to Freedom, New York etc. 1995; Bobzien, Susanne, Determinism and Freedom in Stoic Philosophy, Oxford etc. 1998; Dilman, Ilham, Free Will: An Historical and Philosophical Introduction, London 1999; Stent, Gunther S., Paradoxes of Free Will, Philadelphia 2002.

→ Astrology, Atheism, Ethics/Morals, Fatalism, Fate, Predestination, Will (free)

Stephan Grätzel

Devil

1. It is the property of the mechanisms of psychic release in all cultures to project vague fears and unfulfilled aggressions on nonhuman beings. In tribal religions—as in the medieval popular belief of Europe—the dead (and various animals), as dangerous revenants, in manifold versions, become hostile demons of this kind. Devils (Gk., diáboloi, 'pell-mell throwers') appear in collective myths or in the 'theologized' form of such (→ Demon/Demonology; Evil/Evil One).

Hebrew Bible

2. Judaism regarded the highest of the fallen angels as the—admittedly always inferior—adversary, complainant, and tempter par excellence of the human being (cf. Job 1-2). In Christianity, the principal biblical names of the Evil One, like Lucifer, Leviathan, Satan, Beelzebub, Behemoth, Belial, or Asmodeus, became those of individual demons, often with Satan or Lucifer as their head. In Islam as well, there is a Devil, the prince of the evil Djinn.

Christianity

3. Systematizing descriptions of detailed hierarchies of devils finally appear in Western Christianity, but only in the spiritual drama of the late Middle Ages. Next we find them, particularly, in the theology and preaching of early modernity, for example, in Aegidius Albertinus, Lucifers Königreich ("Realm of Lucifer," Munich 1616). In the rich diabolic literature of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, distinctions are drawn among diabolical specialists, such as lovers, drinkers, and cursers. Popular theology, however, made no distinctions among devils and → demons.

In traditional Christianity, the Devil was the instance that alone made it possible to complete a → theodicy, inasmuch as his activity from Genesis onward must serve as an explanation for the existence of → evil in the world. The Devil was seen as the cause of every misfortune, as Luther still taught in his Hauspostille: "The Devil always has crossbow drawn and cannon loaded, and aims at us, to shoot at us with pestilence and French disease [syphilis], with war and fire, with hail, with thunderstorm."

Until the High Middle Ages, diabolophobia remained primarily limited to monasteries and convents, but beginning in the twelfth century, an intensified catechesis gradually instilled it in the faithful. Numberless demonic presentations in church statuary and paintings, from the Romance period to the Renaissance, are visible manifestations of the fascination with the diabolical that prevailed in the age. Dualistically oriented religious groups (→ Dualism) in the tradition of → Manichaeism, especially the Cathari (Albigenses), ascribed to the Devil an all but divine power, as creator and ruler of the world, and identified him with the creator God of the Hebrew Bible. By way of reaction, even Catholic theology and seminary instruction, especially from the thirteenth century onward, manifested an ever-greater interest in the Devil. The late Middle Ages were marked by a pan-demonism that ascribed extraordinary power to the devil. Cistercian Abbot Richalm von Schönthal, for example, saw human beings in the thirteenth century as besieged by millions of devils, around them and within them. Beginning in the fifteenth century, → witch trials were added to the combination, based, among other things, on a belief in the possibility of pacts or sexual commerce with the Devil, as well as on the imputation of a Sabbath devil-worship, with which the Cathari and the Knights Templar had already been charged. Whether organized sects of Luciferians actually existed in the Middle Ages is disputed; it is certain, on the other hand, that there were individual cases of a Luciferian mold (as the demon worship of Marshal of France Gilles de Rais, executed in 1440). In early modernity, further, spectacular public exorcisms, invoked as proofs of the superiority of Catholicism over the Reformed Churches, marked the historical climax of → fear of the Devil. Abroad, missionaries saw themselves confronted with a whole host of new, popular 'devils' (read, indigenous divinities).

At the same time, the Devil was presented as executioner of God's sentences, in the horrible camps of → hell. The extraordinarily widespread, hand-written, medieval literature of → vision surpasses all of the sadism of today's horror-film industry. Such fantasies of fear were represented in numberless representations of the Last Judgment, from Gislebertus to Bosch to Rubens. Scholasticism may have taught only the torment of fire as a purgatorial punishment, but devils also figured in model sermons and reports of visions. Their form in iconography and theater shows them as animal-human → composite beings, partly under the reception of ancient traditions (Pan, satyrs).

Guise of the Kobold

Alongside this horror, however, popular currency featured the less terrifying kobold form, as in the legends of mute devils, the Devil as servant, or the Devil's grandmother. Or again, numerous legends of pacts with the Devil, first found in Byzantium ("Theophilus"), climax in the deception of the Devil and the sinner's redemption (cf. Goethe, "Faust").

The Devil after the Enlightenment

4. Since the Enlightenment, the image of the Devil has paled. He becomes the poor, or comic, Devil, and a philosophical figure à la Goethe's Mephistopheles. Kant and Protestant theologians—altogether unbiblically—repeatedly qualify him as a personification of abstract → evil. By contrast, all of the popes, including those of the second half of the twentieth century, have held fast to the Devil's personhood in their doctrinal pronouncements. At the same time, in some subcultures, and all the way to rock music, a sometimes criminal → Satanism is cultivated, a phenomenon of resistance to an established culture still marked by Christianity.

Literature

Cini Tassinario, A., Il diavolo secondo l'insegnamento recente della Chiesa, Rome 1984; Dinzelbacher, Peter, Angst im Mittelalter. Teufels-, Todes- und Gotteserfahrung. Mentalitätsgeschichte und Ikonographie, Paderborn 1996; Feinberg, John S., The Many Faces of Evil: Theological Systems and the Problem of Evil, Grand Rapids 1994; Kretzenbacher, Leopold, Teufelsbündler und Faustgestalten im Abendlande, Klagenfurt 1968; Lyons, Arthur, Satan Wants You: The Cult of Devil Worship in America, New York 1989; Messadié, Gerard, A History of the Devil, New York 1996; Muchembled, Robert, A History of the Devil: From the Middle Ages to the Present, Cambridge 2003; Russell, Jeffrey B., The Devil, Ithaca 1977; Idem, Satan, Ithaca 1981; Idem, Lucifer, Ithaca 1984; Idem, Mephistopheles, Ithaca 1986; van Boheemen, Petra/Dirkse, Paul, Duivels en demonen, Utrecht 1994.

→ Anti-Semitism, Composite Beings, Demon/Demonology, Dualism, Evil/Evil One, Exorcism, Fear/Dread, Satanism

Peter Dinzelbacher

Diaspora

1. Diaspora (Gk., 'scattering') in the context of its early Jewish origin denotes the Jewish communities in diverse places outside the 'Land of Israel' (Palestine), and far from Jerusalem. Since the sixteenth century, the term has been used to designate Protestant and Catholic minorities living in an environment of different Christian confessions. Over the last three decades, the concept of Diaspora has achieved a great popularity in social and cultural scientific research. It is often applied in a very general way, to signify any ethnic, national, or cultural minority far from the land of its origin.

Concept in Early Judaism

2. In the Septuagint, the Greek translation of the Torah and the Apocrypha, diaspora was coined as a technical term. The early Jewish Alexandrian translators of the third and second century BCE did not render the Hebrew terms gola and galut ('exile,' 'abduction,' 'the banned') with the Greek word diaspora. Rather, the term expresses a life far from the Land of Promise, as distinguished from the Babylonian expatriation (gola, galut) interpreted in historical theology as God's punitive sentence. The geographical 'scattering' of the Jews in the post-Exilic age was indeed interpreted as misfortune, oppression, and punishment ensuing upon disobedience of Jewish law. At the same time, however, an anticipation of God's 'gathering' of the people once more, and escorting them to the Land of Promise, when atonement had been made and the Law faithfully followed, would color the whole concept. Thus, the concept of Diaspora was understood negatively, and imbedded in a salvation history scheme of disobedience, scattering as punishment, atonement, and return. The Christian polemic of the Church Fathers against Judaism truncated this connection with the aspects of penance and return, and one-sidedly emphasized the punitive aspect of the 'scattering' (→ Anti-Semitism).

Diaspora as an Academic Concept

3. As against this religio-historical use, the concept has recently found broad application in the social scientific literature. Now it is applied to

Due to the colonial British system of contract labor the nineteenth century saw an emergence of Hindu communities in overseas—the Caribbean, East and Central Africa, and Southeast Asia. After the Second World War, economic and educational migration (sometimes refuge as well, such as from East Africa and Suriname), Hindu diasporas were founded in North America, Europe, and Australia. In addition, Tamil Hindu diasporas consist of refugees from Sri Lanka etc. in Canada, Europe, and Australia.

any situation signalized by a minority who lives 'abroad.' This wider application, however, excludes the possibility of labeling concrete situations and bounding them off from others. In the direction of a more exact determination, the geographical and sociological content of the concept ought to be emphasized and the early Jewish interpretation in terms of salvation history bracketed. Now the determining element in a situation of Diaspora becomes the identification of a 'referral back to' a fictitious or really existing, geographically distant, land or territory and its cultural religious traditions. In the absence of such ongoing referral—which can be expressed in terms of symbolic content or materially—a situation ought not to be labeled Diaspora. Characteristic of a situation of Diaspora is the triangular cultural relationship of origin, Diaspora group, and host or residence society. A Diaspora group usually—but not always—lives as a minority abroad and preserves cultural usages and religious identifications different from those of the majority of society. There are Diaspora groups that have become a majority in a land, and whose cultures extensively determine those of their countries of residence (e.g., Hindus on Mauritius and Bali).

4. Many Diaspora groups have materialized in a framework of → migration and → mission. Researchers speak of the Greek, Indian, Islamic, Kurd, or Lebanese Diaspora, or the Diaspora of the Sikhs, the followers of Zoroaster (Parsee), the Hindus, and many others.

A situation of Diaspora is characterized by an effort to preserve the cultural and religious traditions that have been transferred from one land or region (e.g., Gujarat, in western India) to another country (e.g., Kenya, Great Britain), and to transmit them to the next generation. This effort can lead to a cultural and religious 'encapsulation' and isolation, and to a rigid preservation of the relocated rites and usages. On the other hand, the loyalty to what has been brought over does not generally exclude processes of transformation. Adaptations to the new social, cultural, and religious situation, and distance from the (once upon a time) homeland tradition and its guardians, make it possible, first, to undertake changes in religious content, rituals, and organizational forms, and second, to erect other focal points. Is the language (e.g., Hebrew, Arabic, Sanskrit) unconditionally required for the continuation of the religious actions, or are translations into the language of the country possible? To what extent can converts (→ Conversion) enter into the hitherto ethnically coupled tradition and be full members? Extensive adaptations to a dominant culture are possible: Hindus on Trinidad, for example, hold Sunday morning meditations, with song and addresses. There are benches in the temple, as in Christian churches, and a 'profession of faith' has been formulated ("Our Creed") that renders key assertions of Hindu tradition normative. Diasporas, then, at one and the same time constitute nurseries for a conservative emphasis on tradition and spaces for change and for opportunities of innovation.

Literature

Baumann, Martin, Diaspora als analytische Kategorie, Marburg 1999; Braziel, Jana Evans/Mannur, Anita (eds.), Theorizing Diaspora: A Reader, Malden 2003; Cohen, Robin, Global Diasporas, London 1997; Cohen, Shaye J. D./Frerichs, Ernest S. (eds.), Diasporas in Antiquity, Atlanta 1993; Gold, Steven J., The Israeli Diaspora, London 2002; Karim, Karim H. (ed.), The Media of Diaspora, London 2003; Levi, Scott C., The Indian Diaspora in Central Asia and Its Trade, 1550–1900, Leiden etc. 2002.

→ Conversion, Ghetto/Ghettoization, Identity, Judaism, Migration, Mission

Martin Baumann

Disciple

The word 'disciple' is derived from discipulus (Lat., 'pupil,' from discere, 'learn'), a word occurring in the Latin → Bible. It designates certain followers of → Jesus, especially the → Apostles. At the same time, the term points to the age difference between the teacher and his pupils.

Those pupils are designated 'disciples' who "depend on a personality to whom they ascribe extraordinary characteristics as his or her charismatic gift."[1] They submit to the authority of the teacher (→ Master/Pupil). Master and disciples usually live closely together, either 'on the road' in a common wayfaring or in a fixed place (e.g., in an → Ashram). Through the elimination of everyday social conditions and contexts, discipleship produces an especially close bond among the disciples. This attachment is fostered by their separation from the 'outside' ('in-group'/'out-group'), their common manner of living together, and their collective concentration on their master. J. Wach speaks of a 'circle of disciples,' one grouped around a central figure with whom the disciples stand in intimate sympathy. This model tends to entail a limitation on the possible number of disciples. Owing to their concentric orientation to the master, such groups usually have a low degree of organization. Besides the care of the master, the disciples' task frequently consists in winning more disciples, through their preaching and reports of their religious experiences.

1. P. Honigsheim, "Jüngerschaft," in: Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart 3 (1959), 1009.

Literature

Auffarth, Christoph, "Jünger," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 3 (1993), 326-329; Wach, Joachim, Sociology of Religion, Chicago 1944; Idem, "Master and Disciple: Two Religio-Sociological Studies," in: The Journal of Religion 42/1 (1962).

→ Apostle, Ashram, Group, Master/Pupil

Christian von Somm

Discourse

'Discourse' is not a religious term; it is used in attempts to describe, interpret, or explain religious phenomena. The term refers to linguistic phenomena beyond the basic units of word and sentence, but the extent of this 'beyond' can vary widely, from larger linguistic units to the widest possible historical, social, and cultural contexts. Although often used in writing about religion, the term is seldom defined, and the theoretical allegiances that frame its use are rarely made explicit.

Defining 'Discourse'

Like 'religion,' 'discourse' is a term whose definition presupposes a theoretical perspective. It is useful to think of meanings of discourse ranged along a spectrum: from a naïve view that interpretation is a matter of straightforward textual analysis; through a more nuanced hermeneutical recognition that interpretation must always take account of the contexts of author and reader; to a radical constructionism which holds that human lives take shape within a web of language that literally constitutes self and world, a web with nowhere outside of it. In the first of these cases, 'discourse' is generally synonymous with 'a characteristic way of speaking.' In the latter cases, it points to, but can never completely capture, the fundamental role that language plays in constituting the historical, social, cultural, and personal networks within which all communication takes place.

From the sixteenth century, the word 'discourse' referred in English to spatial movement, to the act or faculty of conversation, to the movement of reason from premise to conclusion, and to a formal treatment of a subject at length. In the late twentieth century, the concept was developed in two fields: cultural studies, examining the historical, social, and cultural conditions that make possible specific statements and their effects; and linguistics, aiming primarily at an empirical analysis of texts.

Cultural Studies and Linguistics

In cultural studies, discourse refers to a body of text structured by rules outside the control of, and often the awareness of, an author or speaker. On this view, discourse shapes or constitutes the subject, in opposition to the view that language is simply a tool used by autonomous subjects. Several threads converge here. Mikhail Bakhtin's work on genre, polyphony, and the 'dialogic principle' argued that literature both reflects and shapes its social conditions. Drawing on Bakhtin, Julia Kristeva later developed the concept of 'intertextuality' to suggest that every text is in essence a complex network of relations to other texts (e.g., reference and influence). Linguists Ferdinand de Saussure and Émile Benveniste analyzed the systematic aspects of language in ways that laid the foundations for structuralism and for the extension of the concept of discourse to non-linguistic realms. Antonio Gramsci and Louis Althusser developed Karl Marx's concepts of ideology and hegemony, holding that illusory forms of thought come to be accepted as objective fact, thus perpetuating existing modes of domination and hierarchal social relations. Michel Foucault's early works analyzed 'discursive formations' in history, i.e. systems of thought that define the basic categories through which the world is seen and understood. Foucault defined discourse as a set of rules or constraints that make certain statements possible—and others not—in specific historical, social, and institutional contexts.

Critical or cultural views of discourse have had more effect than linguistic approaches on the study of religion. This is especially so in areas where critical analyses of texts reveal systems of domination, e.g., post-colonialist and feminist studies. Drawing on Foucault, Edward Said argued in Orientalism (1978) that academic works on Islam were examples of imperialist as well as scholarly discourse. Said made two distinct claims: one about the content of a specific discourse, i.e. that → Orientalism presents a racist, hegemonic portrayal of Islam as the inauthentic, backward Other of Christianity and the West; and one about the function of discourse in general, i.e. that it helps create the reality it appears to describe, thus entrenching long-lasting biased representations of others. Scholars of religion are often quick to make the first sort of claim without adequately theorizing the second.

Language and Power

The presence of the term 'discourse' is no guarantee that one is reading a critical analysis of relations between language and power, such as Said's; nor does its absence imply that one is not. Elisabeth Schüssler Fiorenza, in her feminist analysis of early Christianity, In Memory of Her (1983), speaks of androcentric language, texts, translation, interpretation, transmission, redaction, theology, and historiography where, as her later work attests, 'discourse' might be used. The fact that discourse can stand for all these terms and others has the advantage of reminding us that all uses of language are potentially implicated in relations of power. It has the disadvantage of vagueness.

The 'Discourse of Sui Generis Religion'

The most prominent discourse of 'discourse' in the recent study of religion is the debate over 'the discourse of sui generis religion.' Russell McCutcheon argues that this 'regnant discourse'—with the work of Mircea → Eliade as its prototype—functions to draw four sorts of boundaries: between religious and non-religious phenomena (religion is unique and irreducible); between religious studies and other disciplines (a unique phenomenon demands a unique methodology and institutional location); between the interior, private, belief-oriented domain of religion and public, practical spheres like that of politics; and between tradition and modernity (authentic human life is rooted in traditional relations to the sacred). McCutcheon's 'oppositional discourse,' echoing the work of Talal Asad, Timothy Fitzgerald and others, critiques these distinctions. Again, the fact that discourse serves as an umbrella term to cover such a wide variety of issues has both advantages and disadvantages. Richard Terdiman has introduced the concept of 'counter-discourse' to suggest that all discourses come into being against a background of competing, contrasting utterances. In this light, McCutcheon's explicitly polemical stance is an example of the construction of a discourse as well as an analysis of the construction of 'religion' through discourse.

Linguistic Discourse Analysis

In linguistics, discourse refers most simply to a unit of analysis larger than the sentence and more generally to the set of utterances constituting a speech event. Linguistic discourse analysis developed into a bewildering variety of forms in the 1970s and 1980s. In general, these approaches relate three domains that are often kept separate: semantics (how language conveys meaning), syntax (how linguistic elements are organized), and pragmatics (how meaning relates to use in specific contexts).

Since the early 1990s a number of scholars have developed the application of discourse analysis to the study of the New Testament, as pioneered by J. P. Louw and K. Callow in the 1970s. Four distinct approaches have contributed to this work. The South African school analyzes relations between the smallest units of meanings of texts, i.e., individual nominative-predicate structures. The American Summer Institute of Linguistics (SIL) school has made important contributions to biblical translation studies through close sentence-level analysis. The Continental school explores relations between the micro- and macro-structures of texts. The English/Australian, or functional, school proposes a more developed theory of types of discourse and their relations to grammatical forms in specific linguistic contexts. However, apart from the narrow field of biblical studies, linguistic approaches have had little impact on the study of religion.

There are dozens of distinct approaches to linguistic discourse analysis. Although scholars of religion rarely use them, a few examples might indicate their potential value. (1) Drawing on poststructuralist discourse theory and critical linguistics, critical discourse analysis (Teun van Dijk) analyzes texts as forms of social action that occur in social contexts shaped by ideology and by differences in cultural capital. It has developed a complex set of techniques for analyzing broad text structures, as well as sentence structure and word-choice, as expressions of 'cultural logics.' (2) Rooted in phenomenology (Alfred Schütz) and ethnomethodology (Harold Garfinkel), Conversation Analysis (Harvey Sacks) empirically describes formal organizational details of ordinary conversation (e.g., turn-taking and sequencing), on the view that discursive practices mediate social actions and social settings. (3) Drawing on Marxism, feminism, and ethnomethodology, institutional ethnography (Dorothy Smith) grounds research in the texts produced by, and in the self-knowledge of, research subjects examined in their institutional contexts. It begins by analyzing everyday social relations rather than a 'given discourse,' holding that the latter approach necessarily imposes ruling ideologies on the social scientist's own discourse. (4) William F. Hanks has modeled an analysis of the components of ritual in terms of 'participation frames' and 'discourse genres.' (5) Taking issue with Clifford Geertz's view of culture-as-text, the natural history of discourse (Michael Silverstein and Greg Urban) analyzes relations between strategies of 'entextualization' and processes of 'contextualization.' This approach views the distinction between shifting discursive practices and established texts as one that is constructed in specific social and historical situations.

Literature

Fairclough, Norman, Discourse and Social Change, London 1992; Gee, James Paul, An Introduction to Discourse Analysis: Theory and Method, London/New York 1999; Hanks, William F., "Exorcism and the Description of Participant Roles," in: Michael Silverstein/Greg Urban (eds.), Natural Histories of Discourse, Chicago 1996, 160-200; Jaworski, Adam/Coupland, Nikolas (eds.), The Discourse Reader, London/New York 1999; McCutcheon, Russell, Manufacturing Religion: The Discourse of Sui Generis Religion and the Politics of Nostalgia, Oxford/New York 1997; Porter, Stanley E./Reed, Jeffrey T. (eds.), Discourse Analysis and the New Testament: Approaches and Results, Sheffield 1999; Terdiman, Richard, Discourse/Counter-Discourse: The Theory and Practice of Symbolic Resistance in Nineteenth-Century France, Ithaca/London 1985.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Colonialism, Gender Stereotypes, Knowledge, Language, Literature, Religion, Science

Steven Engler

Disenchantment / Re-enchantment of the World

1. The concept disenchantment of the world (Ger., "Entzauberung der Welt") reflects experiences of the nineteenth century. Industrialism and the triumph of science, together with the art of engineering, fostered the belief that, in principle, everything can be experienced and then conquered by calculation. Max → Weber, with whose work the concept of disenchantment is especially connected, traced this conviction back to Western intellectualization and rationalization, which, he thought, is reflected in an endless process of the dismissal of incalculable powers through technological knowledge. The disenchantment of the universe makes it possible to see the latter as a causal mechanism, and thus leads to the suppression of the ethical postulate that the world is a cosmos ordered by God and directed toward a goal (→ Teleology). Further, Weber thought, after a phase of the unitary rationalism of a manner of life in keeping with Christian ethics, the disenchantment of the modern world has led to the 'battle of the disenchanted gods'[1]—to the appearance of a multiplicity of conflicting values and spheres of value. This conflict, Weber held, is signalled by the fact that there is no longer any supreme instance that might be able to posit ultimate normativity. At the same time, Weber was aware of the fact that disenchantment created certain deficits that were to be filled by various other cultural systems. Hence, disenchantment and rationalization is not identical with → secularization but has to be interpreted in a dialectic of disenchantment and re-enchantment.

2. The idea of re-enchantment played an important role since the 1980s, in a framework of new religious currents (→ New Age): 'return of the imaginary' and 're-enchantment of the world' are mottos of various approaches to a reevaluation of myth and nature, of magic and of spirituality. For Morris Berman, a protagonist of the program of re-enchantment, a disenchantment of the world stands for the breach with a pre-modern tradition of an independent, participating consciousness (alchemy, mysticism). According to Berman, the cause of this breach—the Cartesian paradigm of the division of spirit and body, subject and object—is to be defeated by way of a modern form of re-enchantment, embracing especially the areas of a totalizing thinking: a disappearance of the 'I'-consciousness and modern individualism, in behalf of a reconciliation of the human being with → nature.

1. Weber 1988 ([1]1922), 605.

Literature

Berman, Morris, The Reenchantment of the World, Ithaca/London 1981; Bochinger, Christoph, "New Age" und moderne Religion. Religionswissenschaftliche Analysen, Gütersloh 1994; Dassen, Patrick, De onttovering van de wereld: Max Weber en het problem van de moderniteit in Duitsland, 1890–1920, Amsterdam 1999; Weber, Max, "Wissenschaft als Beruf," in: Idem: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Wissenschaftslehre, Tübingen 1988 ([1]1922), 582-613; Idem: Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie I, Tübingen 1988 ([1]1920), particularly pp. 536-573.

→ Esotericism, Industrial Society, Modernity/Modern Age, Mysticism, Nature Piety, New Age, Teleology, Weber

Georg Hartmann

Drama, Sacred

1. The theatrical production of a mythological story in a → ritual connection before a community of believers can be designated as sacred drama. In the Christian tradition, one is familiar today with the manger play at Christmas, for instance, or the Passion of Christ as performed at Easter (recall the Spanish or Italian Good Friday processions). In many threshold rituals (→ Rites of Passage) celebrated in ethnic religions, such as the →initiation of a youth into the adult world, a vivid presentation of gods, demons, or spirits frequently comes into play. Here arise the problems of distinguishing between ritual and → theater (V. Turner).

Historical Sketch

2. The origins of European drama lie in Greek antiquity. After the time of Athenian tyrant Peisistratos (c. 545–528/27 BCE), Greek tragedy was formally presented as sacred drama of the cult of Dionysus, in a framework of the festival of the "Great Dionysia." This does not mean, however, that its

The incarnation of the goddess Uccitta, taken in Azhikode (Kerala, India), April 1993, at a Teyyam festival.
In this photograph, one sees the goddess in full, solemn array, sitting on glowing coals and held by two assistants, in the last stage of the ritual presentation of her apparition. She has just sung her history, to the accompaniment of a drum. She now no longer speaks through her medium to the community of onlookers and believers; instead, she reveals herself in wild dance and sign language. Next, she will determine solutions to their problems, with which she has already been presented. (H. Moser-Achuthath) content always fulfilled the criteria for sacred drama, namely, that it present religious myths: a not inconsiderable part of the material of tragedy is formed by political plays presenting current events, of which the earliest extant example is Aeschylus's The Persians (472 BCE). The extent to which one of the latest pieces, Euripides's The Bacchae (presented posthumously after 406 BCE) contains elements of sacred drama is disputed. However, sacred dramas were presented in a framework of the mystery cults, as the Demeter-Core myth at the Great Eleusinian Mysteries.

In the Middle Ages, the spiritual drama developed from the Christian → liturgy. The presentation of Christian religious stories, at first sung in the Latin language, was mingled with vernacular elements of popular mythology, as soon as the place of the production was no longer the church, but the open marketplace. In the age of humanism, with its accentuated interest in antiquity, modern drama gradually arose, seen as independent of religious worship. The link was not altogether broken, however: the Protestant 'school drama,' which took its dramatic material from the → Bible, did lend expression to the religious struggles of the time of the Reformation (for example, in Strasbourg), and the tension between Christian mysticism and a this-worldly Renaissance was likewise clearly reflected. A reaction came, in mid-sixteenth century, in Counter-Reformation Jesuit drama ("Triumph of Saint Michael," Munich 1597; Jacob Bidermann, "Cenodoxus," 1602). But this form is no longer religious drama. An exception is to be found in the mystery plays (Fr., mystères), a form of spiritual drama known from the fourteenth to the sixteenth centuries, found especially in England and France. Theater in Europe shifted to the secular stage in the seventeenth century at the latest. Only in the nineteenth century were attempts begun to revive the long production cycles of the mystery plays, which often went on for weeks. Hugo von Hofmannsthal's "Jedermann" (Ger., "Everyone"), 1911, based on the English play "Everyman" (printed 1509), figures among these revival efforts. The piece is still given annually on the steps of the Salzburg Cathedral, as a tourist spectacle and social event.

Sacred Drama in Southern India

3. A vivid image of manifold forms of ritual drama, and presentation linked to forms of worship, is available for our contemplation in instances around the globe. We know the sacred dramas of the culture of Lama monasticism or of that of the American Southwest (Hopi, Navajo, Pueblo). Let us cite southern India as an example.

a) Darśan, the gaze of the divine, plays a significant role in India. On the countryside, plays presenting splendid figures, painted in highly stylized fashion and wildly adorned, replace a written religious communication. Here the gods, with their histories and teachings, are directly presented to the eyes of an often illiterate public. However, the educated priestly upper class also cultivates the dramatic production of divine myths as a part of the liturgical calendar. In Kerala, the Cākyār male and Nannyār female players, with their Kūtiyāttam theater presentations in Sanskrit, are a fixed element in the annual ritual cycle of large temples. Only two castes are allowed or obligated by their status to present specific dramas on particular, ritually determined days of each year, in theater edifices expressly constructed for the purpose within the temple enclosure. The stage, consecrated by a priest on the first day of a presentation sequence, faces the gaze of the divinity, which is represented by an audience of priests, nobility, and other select figures.

Actors and actresses are ritually purified at the beginning of the process of applying their makeup, and they are elevated to a special position. At the end of the last day of a play cycle, the oldest presenter will go on stage once more, without head adornment, and extinguish the fire that has been brought from the shrine of the divinity at the opening of the presentation and used to light oil lamps.

b) On the west coast, annual rituals are performed on the grounds of village temples, where a divinity appears incarnate in a mortal (see plate). Singing and gesturing, it announces through that mortal its mythological history and seeks to resolve social tensions in the community by way of addresses and oracles (Brückner 1995; Richmond 1990). The social components and complexity here are shown in the fact that the 'incarnations' come from lower castes, but suddenly possess the right—exclusively in the name of the divinity, of course—to pass judgment on, and issue reprimands to, the ranking figures of the village. The incarnations of these gods and goddesses, designated Teyyam, or Bhūta, take place in a framework of precisely prescribed behavior.

Here we have an example of 'controlled possession.' Although seized by the essence of the divine, the performer-incarnation nevertheless follows the prescribed ritual course and brings the essence and history of the divinity to presentation.

This constellation becomes riddled with problems when, itself tightly bound to an act of worship, such a production is understood as 'pure art' and brought to presentation in worldly staging—when sacred dramas are secularized into theater pieces, and gods are 'played' (Ashley/Holloman 1982). Political considerations are frequently decisive for such phenomena. Sacred dramas are thereby intimately requisitioned by their social and political ambiance and milieu, and can be misused as means of power.

4. For European modernity, the reverse process, as well, is observed—the rediscovery and re-forming of sacred drama in → art. The most familiar example is Richard Wagner's Bühnenweihfestspiel (Ger., 'play for the dedication of a stage') Parsifal—originally permitted only in the Bayreuth Festival Playhouse (first performed in 1882). The anthropology of → theater deals in depth with these entanglements.

Literature

Theoretical literature: Barba, Eugenio/Savarese, Nicola, A Dictionary of Theatre Anthropology: The Secret Art of the Performer, London 1991; Schechner, Richard/Schuman, Mady (eds.), Ritual, Play, and Performance: Readings in the Social Sciences, New York 1976; Schechner, Richard/Appel, Willa (eds.), By Means of Performance: Intercultural Studies of Theatre and Ritual, Cambridge 1990; Turner, Victor, From Ritual to Theatre: The Human Seriousness of Play, New York 1982.

Historical examples: Ashley, Wayne/Holloman, Regina, "From Ritual to Theatre in Kerala," in: The Drama Review 26,2 (1982), 59-72; Brückner, Heidrun, Fürstliche Feste. Texte und Rituale der Tulu-Volksreligion an der Westküste Südindiens, Wiesbaden 1995; Richmond, Farley P. et al. (eds.), Indian Theatre: Traditions of Performance, Honolulu 1990; Schömbucher, Elisabeth, "Gods, Ghosts and Demons: Possession in South Asia," in: Brückner, Heidrun et al. (eds.), Flags of Fame: Studies in South Asian Folk Culture, New Delhi 1993, 239-267; Tydeman, W., English Medieval Theatre 1400–1500, London 1986.

→ Catharsis, Dance, Liturgy/Dramaturgy, Myth/Mythology, Ritual, Theater

Heike Moser-Achuthath

Dream

Dream as a Universal Phenomenon

1. An unambiguous, if at first very limited, definition of dream is available if one considers dreams as → experiences during sleep.[1] On the other hand, there are also dreamlike phenomena apart from sleep, such as 'daydreams' and hallucinations. Furthermore, a thought-like experience during sleep can occur that does not present the usual 'dreamlike' characteristics, as bizarreness, incoherence, condensation of 'events.' Psycho-physiologically, the dream is a universal human phenomenon, but content and iconography lead at once to the interpretation and understanding of the dream as dependent on culture: in some cultures, as that of the → Aborigines of Australia, the dream plays a far more central role than with us: in the spirit of the preeminence of reason, rationality, and a control of reality, Western culture has ultimately stylized the dream as anti-phenomenon, so that it becomes either the subject of scientific investigation (experimental dream research; → Psychoanalysis), or, in esoteric doctrines or religions, the sphere of a truth transcending reason. The dream thereby affords a purchase on extra-rational knowledge—messages from the gods, for example, or visions of the next world. But the dream is also used, in various contexts, for the development of life-controlling practices.

Our cultural tendency to distinguish between dream and reality on the basis of rationality and conceptual thought leads to a disjointed and very diversified understanding of the dream, and to just as diversified practices of its interpretation. But although exposed to the pressure of a marginalization, it emerges in many phases and locations of socio-cultural life.

Understanding of the Dream in Antiquity

2. The ancient understanding of dreams, which is one of the roots of the modern perspective,[2] shows a great acceptance of the dream phenomenon, and its equal status among various socio-cultural domains (medicine, religion, literature, philosophy, and the professional interpretation of dreams). In 'incubation' (Lat., incubatio), the 'temple sleep,' which was practiced in the sanctuaries of the healing cult of Asclepius (e.g., in Epidauros in the Peloponnesus), the dream served as the sphere in which God and the sick could meet. The secularized interpretation of dreams, as it has come down to us in the form of Artemidorus's handbook Oneirocritica (Gk., "Distinguishing Dreams"; second century CE), attempted to combine a systematic and an encyclopedic elaboration of the dream science of its time. On the basis of a typology of the causes and kinds of dreams, Artemidorus was concerned in particular with dreams that could be used as tools for a view of the future. He was interested not in the bizarre and irrational quality of the dream image, however, but only in its use in the life of waking.

Christianity

Christianity reinforced the tendency to devalue and marginalize the dream, a propensity that came to characterize European culture. The suprasensory and the interpretation of dreams as a medium for foreseeing the future lost their status, in view of the divine salvific plan, and even came to be combated. The dream became accepted at most as a measuring stick for the depth of one's faith. Unlike → visions, then, the dream could not profit from a Christian transcendence of worldly reality. Still, this marginalization has been unable to prevent the persistence, down to our own day, of popular dream interpretation, where the dream continues to be used as a medium for a view of the future—as, for example, the Smorfia, the dream-book popular in Naples, attests.

Modern Interpretation of Dreams

3. Modern interest in the dream, and corresponding interpretations thereof, are signed by two antagonistic tendencies: on the one hand, a scientific concern with dream research, and on the other, an evaluation of the dream as counter-world to the world of facts and reason, with a reality-consciousness of its own. This evaluation is manifested most of all in art (surrealism), literature, and film.

Sigmund Freud

Sigmund → Freud's study Die Traumdeutung ("The Interpretation of Dreams"; 1900) is of epochal importance. There, in a certain way, both of the above tendencies are linked. On the one hand, Freud connects the scientific approach with the science of his time. On the other hand, he sees the dream as a linguistic hermeneutic imaging. At the same time, Freud's interpretation of dreams is both the groundwork of a science—the science of the unconscious—and, in psychotherapy, a revival of the practices of coping with life as it had been available in Artemidorus's Oneirocritica or in the popular interpretation of dreams of the different ages.

C. G. Jung

But the matter is by no means laid to rest with Freud's interpretation of dreams. C. G. Jung, at first Freud's student, then his antagonist, does not question the concept of the unconscious in principle. But, unlike Freud, he sees, alongside the respective individually determined dream activity of a person, a collective part also. By way of determinate dream images, occurring, in variations, in all cultures and times (e.g., serpents), a person reproduces what Jung calls archetypes. According to Jung, these were an expression of the conflicts inherent in the conditio humana, to be reworked by each individual. This interpretation of dreams, which is oriented rather to manifest content and thus provides a more holistic interpretation, is propagated, often in a radically simplified way, by the contemporary → New Age scene.

Within → psychoanalysis itself, the understanding of dreams has been broadened and altered after Freud. The key criticism has been directed at Freud's neglect of the dream's manifest content—those so often ludicrous and bizarre images and image sequences from which, after all, art and literature have precisely drawn their attachment to the dream.

Experimental Dream Research

4. The experimental investigation of dreams, so closely bound up with brain and memory research, is less interested in the interpretation of the dream than in its physiological conditions. The breakthrough to differentiated views on the question has been produced especially by E. Aserinsky's and N. Kleitman's recent discovery of what are called the REM ('rapid eye movement') phases. In the REM phases—which alternate with no less important non-REM dream phases—that human beings have in common with other mammals, an increase in brain activity is to be observed, along with an irregular pulse and blood pressure, and the like. Sleepers awakened during an REM phase can ordinarily remember a dream. In subsequent investigation, a connection is seen between the amount of REM sleep one has and the ability to learn, and consequently between dream and memory. In terms of these discoveries, dreaming serves the shaping of information concerning what has been perceived in the day, and there follows not only an orderly insertion of the new material into already given values of experience, but also the excision of unimportant facts. Dreaming, especially the REM phase, therefore consolidates "important ego functions, such as learning, situation control, memory recall, and problem solving."[3] But this by no means explains the phenomenon 'dream' in its comprehensive, and very individual, effect on the wakened person as well. Advanced experimental dream research therefore combines scientific experiments with an interrogation of the subject, for the purpose of a closer determination of the place of the dream in human life.

1. Strauch/Meier 1992, 11.
2. Freud, Traumdeutung, 1900, chap. 1.
3. Vedfeldt 2002.

Literature

Sources: Artemidorus, The Interpretation of Dreams (Oneirocritica), trans./comm. by Robert J. White, Park Ridge 1975; Freud, Sigmund, Die Traumdeutung (1900), in: Studienausgabe, vol. II, Frankfurt/M. 1972 (Engl. as The Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, vol. IV/1: The Interpretation of Dreams, London 1953).

Secondary literature: Bulkeley, Kelly (ed.), Dreams: A Reader on the Religious, Cultural, and Psychological Dimensions of Dreaming, New York 2001; Cox Miller, Patricia, Dreams in Late Antiquity: Studies in the Imagination of a Culture, Princeton 1994; Lamoreaux, John C., The Early Muslim Tradition of Dream Interpretation, Albany 2002; Marinelli, Lydia/Mayer, Andreas, Dreaming by the Book: Freud's 'The Interpretation of Dreams' and the History of the Psychoanalytic Movement, New York 2003; Pick, Daniel/Roper, Lyndal (eds.), Dreams and History: The Interpretation of Dreams from Ancient Greece to Modern Psychoanalysis, London etc. 2004; Shulman, David/Stroumsa, Guy G. (eds.), Dream Cultures: Explorations in the Comparative History of Dreaming, Oxford 1999; Strauch, Inge/Meier, Barbara, Den Träumen auf der Spur. Ergebnisse der experimentellen Traumforschung, Bern 1992; Szpakowska, Kasia, Behind Closed Eyes: Dreams and Nightmares in Ancient Egypt, Swansea 2003; Vedfelt, Ole, The Dimensions of Dreams: The Nature, Function, and Interpretation of Dreams, London 2002.

→ Fantasy/Imagination, Freud, Psyche, Psychoanalysis, Soul, Vision/Auditory Experience

Christine Walde

Drinking / Drink

1. Drinking, like eating, belongs to the elementary processes that maintain the human → body biologically. At the same time, however, its religious, social, and cultural implications far transcend these natural functions. The twin relationship of a natural and a cultural 'membership,' along with the status of 'world-openness' (H. Plessner)—that is, human beings' ability to establish themselves in different environments—make the process of drinking a symbolical field of activity as well, that is not only defined by biological needs, but can be freighted with extracts of cultural, religious, and social meaning (for a more extensive treatment, → Eating/Nourishment).

Drink as Means of Nourishment and Pleasure

Drinks can be distinguished into means of nourishment and means of pleasure, and the latter are often identified with culture-specific drugs like alcohol, caffeine, or coca. Thus, in the European and Western tradition, a distinction is made between alcohol-free nutritional means, as water, milk, or fruit juice, and alcoholic liquids like beer, wine, or spirits. The boundary seems fleeting: a change of cultural habits, in the social functions of drinking, and in customs of consumption have led to a shift in the purpose for which alcoholic drinks are used. Previously they had found application mostly by virtue of their nutritional value, whereas today they are consumed by and large as vehicles of pleasure. In the pre-industrial world of Central Europe, for example, beer essentially played the role of a basic nutrient with the agricultural class, from breakfast, where it was drunk in the form of warm beer soup, to the evening meal, in the most varied forms. Today, beer is consumed practically only in one's free time, as a means of pleasure. In work-related environments, beer drinking is often morally, socially, and, at times, even juridically prohibited. On the other hand, since the eighteenth century, the drugs coffee and tea have leapt to social respectability (cf. Schivelbusch).

Ambivalent Evaluation of Drinking in the Religions

2. As a vital basic need, in many religions drinking can be cast positively (as an expression of the joy of living, here and now) and negatively (as succumbing to the world). The ingestion of wine, for instance, in the Judaic and Christian tradition, is reckoned, on the one hand, as 'rejoicing man and God' (cf., e.g., Judg 9:13, Matt 6:31); on the other hand, its consumption beyond the need to still the thirst is deemed an index of a lust for pleasure and a godless lifestyle (Prov 31:4, Matt 24:49). The psychic elevation stimulated by drinking alcoholic beverages can lead, as a limit experience, to uncontrollable passion, but also, as in the ancient cults of Dionysus and Bacchus, to fulfillment and → ecstasy. Positively appraised, it enables a person to be filled with divine power and grants a share in the divine itself (→ Mysticism).

Drinks Permitted and Forbidden

3. In many religions the distinction between clean and unclean nourishment holds for solids and fluids alike. The multiple food taboos motivated in religious considerations refer mainly to the consumption of animal products, it is true, and only rarely to plants or fluids. Conceptualizations that are obviously magical configure prevailing attitudes toward nourishment universally, in respect both to the effects of the ingested substance and to a belief in the transfer of its essence and power to the eater or drinker. Here the ingestion of animals is deemed threatening in principle, and that of plant substance or liquids less threatening. Alcoholic drinks as a means of euphoria and relaxation are especially ambivalent and open to religious prohibition. On the one hand, they foster the intensity of religious experience; on the other hand, its consumption carries the drinker along distorted pathways, so that he or she loses control, and leads a 'depraved life.'

In Islam, those whose aim was a sober following of the law were first forbidden wine, and later, any alcoholic drink. Its pleasure belongs to the great sins. In Islamic Sufism, admittedly, wine served poetic elevation. Even sura 16:69 praises it as God's gift. Nevertheless, in sura 5:92 it is labeled devilish. Coffee, meanwhile, underwent great extension in Islamic Arab cultures, where it found application since the tenth century at the latest, first as a medication and detoxifier, and then, since the fifteenth century at the latest, as a popular drink.

In Buddhism, the influence of alcohol is understood as a hindrance to spiritual concentration. The fifth great commandment of Buddhism therefore forbids monks and laity the ingestion of mood-changing drinks. In Buddhist milieus, some drinks were nonetheless promoted, such as tea, which, while it elevates the psyche, also bestows sobriety.

The prohibition of certain drinks is not always joined with religious motives. In the secularized Europe of modern times, new norms and rules have appeared for the ingestion of drinks. These placed scientific, dietetic, and medical cognitions in regard to the body, as well as the cultural orientation of sobriety, at the focus of restrictions. In nature healing and life-reform movements (see parag. 4a) however, drinks are important in a positive context. The pathologizing of alcohol consumption—in Christianity as well, especially in Protestantism during the era of industrialization—evoked efforts of moderation, culminating in 'Prohibition,' 1920–1933, in the United States, when the production and sale of alcoholic beverages were prohibited under Federal Law.

Ritual Functions and Applications

4. The use of drinks and actions performed in the drinking context can fulfill purifying, sacrificial, and community-establishing functions.

Purification

a) The conception of the purifying and restoring effect, not only of washing, but also of drinking, is very closely connected in most cultures and religions with the life-giving fluidity of → water, which composes human beings and the higher animals in a proportion of sixty to seventy percent. Extensively colorless and tasteless, water—on the basis of its life-supporting function, along with its classificatory neutrality—is eminently suitable for symbolizing → purity and life. After the demise of the medieval system of baths, accompanied by pestilence and war, it was the medically based 'drink cures,' established in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, that first introduced a renaissance of the culture of the water cure. The cleansing, restorative application of mineral and other waters, especially since the nineteenth century, was professionalized to the point that naturally and artificially enriched mineral waters reached consumers through the mail-order trade—no longer merely at health spas, wilderness baths, and cure institutes. The life reform movement as well, and the therapeutic prescriptions it absorbed, propagated the practice of the 'simple drinking' of 'natural' drinks like water or milk. In institutions for natural healing built expressly for this purpose, such as Monte Verità in → Ascona, 'purgative' drinking cures belonged to the program, through which the self-healing powers of nature were supposed to be mobilized. Even body fluids like urine can be ascribed a purifying function, as they can eliminate, by means of the kidneys, superfluous salts, water, and albumen. Urine is not always regarded as a bodily waste product whose ingestion can occasion a psychic reaction of nausea. In India, for instance, the drinking of urine on therapeutic grounds is no rare phenomenon, and even Western fears of excreted fluids are repeatedly met with claims of the healing functions of urine.

Drink Offerings

b) Drink and pouring → sacrifices (libations; from Lat., libare, 'moisten,' 'pour out'), in which beverages are ritually poured out, are gift offerings (sacrifices), made in order to render the gods gracious. Further, the libation can institute sacramental drinking communities, through which the oneness of human being and divinity can be achieved, so that human beings can share the power of the divine.

Commensality: Rituals of Community Drinking

c) Drinking, then, accomplishes more than the satisfaction of nutritional needs. In all cultures and religions ritually regulated ways of drinking show forth interpretations of the world and assign meaning. Thus in Christianity, a special sacramental character attaches to drinking (of wine) in the celebration of the → Lord's Supper, which is at once a memorial rite, a mystical unification (bread and wine as Jesus's body and blood), and a ratification and renewal of the bond between God and the community of God.

In the diversity of daily and festive drinks, as well as of drinking customs, one may experience, in a sensible and visible mode, the partition of profane time and sacred time, the division of the daily and the festive. In the course of life, specific fashions of drinking mark biographical transitions, such as birth, betrothal, or marriage. In the course of the year, the special nature of festival days is brought out and emphasized by special forms of drink, for example, champagne at New Year's (→ Life Cycle; Rites of Passage; Ritual).

De-ritualizing of Drinking Behavior

To the participants, drinking rituals open up the opportunity for identification with and participation in groups and communities. In the act of drinking in common, individual and community fuse into a unity. Consequently, in modern Europe drinking customs, as a rule, are gradually losing the all but legally binding function that they formerly had. For instance, while drinking to brotherhood and friendship, in symbolic reinforcement of emotional ties, or in usages such as a pledge, has survived (→ Friendship), the establishment of places of business and legal relationships by drinking in common has generally lost its meaning and importance. Thus, over a length of time, a process of the de-ritualization of drinking behavior can be observed. The separation of work from free time, a disintegration of life into distinct areas, social processes of differentiation and individualization, as well as the separation of the worlds of private and public life, have finally led to the dissolution and meaninglessness of collectively obligatory drinking patterns. Granted, this certainly does not mean the elimination of drinking rituals. New, relatively adjusted drinking fashions attest rather a transformation and function-change of drinking behavior in particularized societies. Certain drinks and their ritual ingestion have assumed the task of generating the effect of a community underpinning on delimited social groups. The educated middle class prefer dry white wine on the Vernissage, health food enthusiasts pour their ayurvedic or ginseng tea. Specific drinks have their binding character only within certain milieus and for certain social groups. They serve social distinction by demarcation from others.

The New Rites of Social Distinction

Literature

Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Obbink, Dirk, "Dionysus Poured Out: Ancient and Modern Theories of Sacrifice and Cultural Formation," in: Carpenter, Thomas H./Faraone, Christopher A. (eds.), Masks of Dionysus, Ithaca 1993, 65-86; Schivelbusch, Wolfgang, Tastes of Paradise: A Social History of Spices, Stimulants, and Intoxicants, New York 1993.

→ Asceticism, Body, Eating/Nourishment, Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens, Purification/Hygiene/Bodily Grooming, Water

Friedemann Schmoll

Druids

Etymologies

Greek and Roman authors who wrote about Gaul or Britain between the second century BCE and the fourth century CE designated the religious specialists and scholars there as 'druids.' Two etymologies are adduced: (a) In the Celtic dru-vides, 'much knowing' or 'farseeing,' could be the correct one (the Old Irish drúitheach means 'impressive,' 'piercing,' 'influential'); (b) the other conjectural derivation, 'oak expert,' goes back to Pliny the Elder, who also describes the importance of mistletoe, which grows on oaks, in druid worship. Archaeologically, only the functions of the druids in worship can be established. Unambiguous pictorial presentations or graves have not as yet been found.

Ancient Description and Reception

The direction for the druids' reception originates especially with Caesar. According to him, aside from the nobility, the druids constituted the only respected and privileged class in Gallic society. They were charged with the interpretation of religious precepts, the sacrificial system, the administration of justice, consultation of the rulers, the art of healing, and → divination. Druid and sorcerer Merlin (in Welsh, Myrrdin) has achieved fame, first through the literature of Geoffrey of Monmouth, then through his Romantic reception by Schlegel, Uhland, or Lenau. A second strand in his reception leads to the founding of the Druid Order in the eighteenth century, where subsequently Enlightenment impulses accompany Romantic ones. A further contribution to popularity was supplied by the erroneous ascription to Celtic art of the megalithic stone monuments (Stonehenge).

Modern Druidism

In the context of → Paganism/Neo-Paganism, modern western → shamanism, and parts of the → New Age movement, Druidism experienced a revival in the twentieth century. Several Druidic groups formed in Britain,

Druids at Stonehenge during a ceremony of the British Circle of the Universal Bond, in 1958. The ceremonies at the solstice are the occasion of constant confrontations among defenders of the monuments and the druid orders. After a prohibition of some years, in 1998 a limited number of druids and believers were once more permitted to celebrate the solstice at Stonehenge. (Benita von Behr) among them the Order of Bards, Ovates and Druids, and the Ancient Order of Druids, which uses Stonehenge for its rituals despite the lacking historical connection between Druid traditions and this site. In the United States, the Reformed Druids of North America began in 1963 as a satirical protest against required attendance at church at Carleton College in Northfield, Minnesota. Becoming more serious, the RDNA developed rituals and lore from Celtic history and poetry, considering Druidism a philosophy rather than a religion. Other American Druidic groups include the New Reformed Druids of North America (founded in 1966) and Ar nDraiocht Fein ("Our Own Druidism," founded in 1983). The latter, currently the largest Druidic movement in the U.S., sees itself as a neopagan religion with Indo-European roots that are adapted to the needs of modern people.

Literature

Adler, Margot, Drawing Down the Moon: Witches, Druids, Goddess-Worshippers, and Other Pagans in America Today, New York 1997 ([1]1979); Ellis, Peter Berresford, A Brief History of the Druids, London 2002; Green, Miranda J., Exploring the World of the Druids, London 1997; Jones, Leslie Ellen, Druid, Shaman, Priest: Metaphors of Celtic Paganism, Enfield Lock 1998; Piggott, Stuart, The Druids, London 1968; Raoult, Michel, Les Druides: les sociétés initiatiques Celtiques contemporaines, Monaco 1988.

→ Celts, New Age, Paganism/Neo-Paganism, Reception

Silvia Kurre

Dualism

We / Not-We

1. The most unambiguous and most simple way to ascertain one's own place in a complicated reality consists in dividing the world into 'We' and 'Not-We.' The social identity determining which individuals belong to 'We,' and which as 'Not-We' are to be left out, is constituted as the result of many criteria. After all, in many ways the members of a group are alike, while they are distinct in others. Culture operates precisely through the perception of difference. Since no individual case is unambiguous, dualism contributes to a perception into which all differences blend. It simplifies the lack of clarity of reality, narrowing it down to the one criterion, which must be valid 'in principle' (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes): the world is divided into mutually exclusive alternatives. What is not to be found in the real world of life, since this actuality is far too complex, is reduced to a recounted, fictitious counter-world: the world of long ago, the story of the beginning, the world of heroes and villains, and in a few cultures also the world beyond, still more rarely the ideal world of the future. Dualism renders it difficult to perceive the variegated nature of the world at hand, but relies on the world recounted; what that world lacks in demonstrability, can be substituted by sacralization. Complexity and 'modernity' are reckoned as threats. The potential for action that results from dualistic thinking goes from dreaming of an unambiguous world—which renders personal decisions unnecessary—to the radical change of the world—accomplished in disregard of human beings, insofar as this purification involves 'cleansing' the world from evil elements to the point of genocide. But the dreamers are inclined to agree with the murderers: they are inclined to let them have a free hand, to cooperate with them.

Redemption

2. The dualistic counter-world: Those who experience their own world as the place where a small elite is prevented from realizing the ideals of the true world, see actual reality only as 'bad': as set athwart the good world. The adversary disposes of superior powers, that are invisible to boot. Whereas few images are available of the radiant corpus of the good, sadistic fantasy can let go the reins when contouring the Evil One (→ Devil) and his assistants, as it can in traditional images of their inhuman behaviors and bigotry. The Enemy's dependents are of overwhelming powers. However, on the side of the good minority stands the Hero, the 'Redeemer.' In many a battle, he must stand forth to fight the Evil One, who, in his diverse and always new shapes, is difficult to recognize—indeed he even appears as the false Redeemer (Pseudo-Messiah, → 'Antichrist'). The Redeemer well nigh suffers the fate of his followers, including death, but in a cosmic final battle, with God's help, he annihilates the superior adversary (→ Millenarianism/Chiliasm). From dualism appears, ontologically, an eschatological monism.

Creation

3. Anthropological dualism: Rational processing seeks to replace the narrative with a decision in principle as to how to act meaningfully. At all events, exceptions need not be appraised as good or evil (adiáphora, 'indivisibly'). A division into mutually exclusive alternatives in reality is difficult to establish. It would call for evidence, unambiguous substantiation. The argument (of radical dualism) becomes unassailable if 'from the beginning' there were already two gods at creation, a good one and an evil one—or better still, if creation is altogether evil, created by the evil god (the demioûrgos, 'craftsman,' from Plato's Timaeus). The good, then, is imprisoned in the bad matter of the body, and its quest is for reunification with the good God; it must be redeemed. Especially in late antiquity, fear of survival was rediscovered, both in Plato's philosophy and in the expectation of redemption maintained by Gnostic outlooks on the world (→ Gnosticism). The body was from the Devil, therefore sexuality as well, and in the prevailing male view, 'the' woman. The soul, however, and the capacity for (re)cognition, were evaluated as a correspondence to the good God. The philosopher and theologian, even if unrecognized by the world, stand in nearness to God and are capable of understanding his mysteries. Whether pessimistic or optimistic ('idealistic'), the dualism of soul and body, flesh and spirit, nature and idea, life and death, has also—and especially—been a stamp and model for the conceptualizations of meaning in the European history of religion. And yet the thesis abides, in the self-understanding of European culture, that dualism is 'oriental.'

"Dualism is Non-European"

4. a) Christianity was close to adopting radical dualism; but it decided programmatically against doing so. In the second century, Marcion wished to set the 'Jewish' God of creation over against the good Christian God as adversaries. As the fourth century was closing, → Augustine abandoned the radically dualistic Manichaeans (→ Manichaeism), and began to teach a 'moderate dualism': the good God, the only one, had created the world, but the human being had decided against his commandments. Thus, besides Lucifer, the human being had 'fallen' out of God's world—here, out of Paradise. Augustinian dualism raises the human being to the potential anti-God—an argument that culminated in the discussion on 'autonomy' and enlightenment: Why does God forbid the human being to eat of the Tree of Knowledge? Why does he give human beings freedom to decide against him?

b) By about the end of the nineteenth the century, Catholicism, then on the defensive, had developed its picture of a 'West' that had created the ideal synthesis between a godless self-realization (Enlightenment) and a passive awaiting of salvation (the East). But in Catholic monasticism, Benedict of Nursia had come upon the golden mean: 'pray and work' (ora et labora). The thesis of Arno Borst (1953, with an anti-Communist point) goes further, that in the thirteenth century European Christianity had withstood the dualistic temptation by annihilating the Cathari. This was also a loss, however: had dualism prevailed, Europe today would be 'ärmer und wärmer' ('poorer and warmer').[1]

1. Borst, Arno, Barbaren und Artisten, Munich 1988, 231.

Literature

Borst, Arno, Die Katharer, Stuttgart 1953; Fontaine, P. F. M., The Light and the Dark: A Cultural History of Dualism, Amsterdam/Groningen 1986ff. (19 vols. until 2003); Lambert, Malcolm, The Cathars, Oxford etc. 1998; Widengren, Geo, Religionsphänomenologie, Berlin 1969.

→ Antichrist, Apocalypse, Devil, Evil, Fantasy/Imagination, Gnosticism, Manichaeism, Orientalism/Exotism

Christoph Auffarth

TO THE HONOURABLE SPEAKER AND MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED.

The Humble Petition of the Undersigned aboriginal people of Yirrkala, being members of the Balamumu, Narrkala, Gapiny, Miliwurrwurrpeople and Djapu, Mangalili, Madarrpa, Magarrwanalmirri, Djambarrpuyngu, Gumaitj, Marrakulu, Galpu, Dhaluangu, Wangurri, Warramirri, Naymil, Rirritjingu, tribes respectfully showeth.

1. That nearly 500 people of the above tribes are residents of the land excised from the Aboriginal Reserve in Arnhem Land.
2. That the procedures of the excision of this land and the fate of the people on it were never explained to them beforehand, and were kept secret from them.
3. That when Welfare Officers and Government officials came to inform them of decisions taken without them and against them, they did not undertake to convey to the Government in Canberra the views and feelings of the Yirrkala aboriginal people.
4. That the land in question has been hunting and food gathering land for the Yirrkala tribes from time immemorial; we were all born here.
5. That places sacred to the Yirrkala people, as well as vital to their livelihood are in the excised land, especially Melville Bay.
6. That the people of this area fear that their needs and interests will be completely ignored as they have been ignored in the past, and they fear that the fate which has overtaken the Larrakeah tribe will overtake them.
7. And they humbly pray that the Honourable the House of Representatives will appoint a Committee, accompanied by competent interpreters, to hear the views of the people of Yirrkala before permitting the excision of this land.
8. They humbly pray that no arrangements be entered into with any company which will destroy the livelihood and independence of the Yirrkala people.

And your petitioners as in duty bound will ever pray God to help you and us.

(English language translation.)

[illegible]

(Australian matha.)

I certify that the Petition is in conformity with the Standing Orders of the House
28/8/63. Clerk of the House

In 1963, the Australian Parliament decided to excise 360 km² from an Aborigine reservation for bauxite mining, in the vicinity of Yirrkala, Northeast Arnheim Land. With their country already settled through decisions of religious and military authorities, the hunting and gathering cultures of the North Australian tribes were now threatened in their daily life and subsistence by the economic sector of Western industrial societies. The operative factor here was the particular structure of Aboriginal religion: the local myths were, among other things, titles to possessions, and only owners might commemorate and recite them. In October 1963, members of the Gumatj tribe, of the Yirritja group, reacted, and dispatched a bilingual petition (the "Bark Petition"), inscribed on eucalyptus bark and painted with ocher, to the Parliament in Canberra, in which they observed that "places sacred to the Yirrkala people [. . .] are in the excised land." The figured lath frame was intended as evidence of the tribe's right to its places of worship and its land. It presents the mythical totem ancestors in the form of creatures of land (below and left), and water creatures (right and above). In times of great demand for raw materials, the myths have of course lost much of their power: In 1968, after a brief delay, a contract was signed between the government and a mining firm in the matter of the mining of bauxite. (Hubert Mohr)

Jizo Bodhisattva figures in front of a Buddhist temple (Kofu, Yamanashi Prefecture) in Japan. Jizo Bosatu is the patron saint of children, and is especially venerated by family members who have had an abortion, miscarriage, or stillbirth. The figures are gently and attentively provided with caps and bibs as if they were babies. Usual offerings are vegetables, baked goods, sweets, and toys. In so-called 'abortion temples' (e.g., Hasedera, Kamakura), those concerned find guest books in which they may inscribe prayers, testimonials of gratitude, or confessions to obtain inner peace. (S. Beyreuther)

The phenomenon of the trance, or possession, is one of the most important features of Afro-American religion. In the course of a Candomblé ceremony in a private locale reserved for worship, the Babalorixá (high priest), in a state of trance, incarnates an American Indian spirit of the forest. The green color of his cloak symbolizes the forests. (C. Mattes)

Rice-planting Festival (Ta-ue-matsuri) in the field of the Fushimi-Inari Shrine in Kyôto, Japan. Celebrated in June in honor of Inari, Goddess of Rice and Nourishment, this festival invokes her blessing on Japanese rice farming. The celebration commences in the Shrine, where a Shintô priest consecrates rice plants. These are then borne in procession on wooden trays to a field belonging to the shrine, where the shoots are solemnly planted. Traditional music, and dancing over the field in honor of Inari make up part of the ceremony. Along with its cultic function, the festival has become a tourist attraction, drawing many visitors. (Benita von Behr)

A woman strews flower petals on the crimson altar in a temple of Dakshinkali in Nepal. Thus she offers a sign of her reverence for the goddess, who is represented by a picture, and at the same time beautifies the sacred space here, as have others before her and as others will after. She has taken the petals from a bowl on the stone. The red part of the altar is enclosed, and functions as a conduit for offerings. The sacred image over the altar is that of the dark-blue Kali, standing at a cremation site dedicated to the god Shiva. In Tantrism, Shiva and Kali embody the tension between the static and the dynamic, essence and vitality. For the believers, Kali, because of her destructive force, can be a terrible person; but she is mighty and one may well place oneself under her protection. (Christoph Auffarth and Kirsten Holzapfel)

In his house in Lomé, Togo, priest André Kunkel has set up a room for a Voodoo ritual to be performed over the telephone. As persons can use this modern medium to carry on conversations with one another, so here the priest inserts coins into imaginary slots, and then, through the handset, makes inquiries of the guardian spirit, represented by the figure, into possible solutions to his clients' problems. The traces left after preliminary rituals, usually drink offerings, remain at the altar, thus testifying to the importance of the protective spirit, while orderliness and aesthetics withdraw into the background: what is asked is 'mighty deeds.' (Christoph Auffarth)

“Rama’s Game,” the Rāmlīlā, following its version in the Indian epic Rāmāyaṇa, is presented on a boat in the Ganges at Benares. Seated in the center of the picture is the main figure of the epic, royal prince Rama, regarded as the incarnation of Vishnu. To his left sits his wife Sītā, and to his right his brother Lakshman. The three are surrounded by three of their allies, members of the army led by monkey god Hanuman. Young men present the figures. Unlike the renowned month-long presentation under the sponsorship of the ruling Maharaja in the Ramagar Quarter, the producers here are the quarter committees of Benares. They vie with the Ramagar production over the more magnificent presentation of the scenes. (J. Gengnagel)

In an interesting reversal of positions, the modern artistic avant-garde develops religious traits out of blasphemous criticism of Christianity itself. The “Orgies Mysteries Theater” of Vienna activist Hermann Nitsch in Prinzendorf makes explicit use of Christian symbolism, often transformed in its opposite: crucifixion, slaughter of a steer, releasing of lambs from their pasture, defilement of Mass vestments with blood and excrement. Behind his overt concern to shock the bourgoisie, Nitsch’s determination nonetheless predominates: to lead Christianity back to its pagan Dionysian origins, and to the ‘basic excess’ of pagan lustfulness. Unsublimated, the latter is now to be revived and experienced once more in ritual. The six-day dramatic presentation staged by Nitsch as the pinnacle of his ritual ‘actions’ in 1998, came into conflict, however, less with the Church than with the animal protection league: the state’s attorney filed a charge of animal torture. The lawsuit was resolved in favor of Nitsch who today lets the animals be slaughtered according to the official Austrian laws. (Hubert Mohr)

The picture shows a minaret destroyed by an explosion in Ahmici, a village of Bosnia-Herzegovina. Until the beginning of the war (1992), there were many communities in Bosnia-Herzegovina with religious buildings of (often) two or (rarely) three of the three primary religious communities of Bosnia-Herzegovina: the Catholic Church, the Serbian Orthodox Church, and Bosnian Islam. Besides these, Jewish communities had synagogues in the large cities. In smaller communities, often enough, a religious house was built in the center, while another, more often, was constructed outside. All of this reflects the relationships maintained by the majoritarian communities in the village populations. Since one of the goals of the military leaders of the various parties was the expulsion, even the annihilation, of the other groups, 'ethnic cleansing' comported the destruction of the symbols and testimonials of the other religious cultures. The ruins of former places of worship are either left standing as triumphalistic monuments of war ('destruction aesthetics'), or—more frequently—razed to the ground to erase any memory of the faith community that has been expelled and preclude its return (method of the damnatio memoriae, 'extinction from memory'). Finally, again and again, houses of faith are destroyed even when members of the religious community are still living in the vicinity. In Bosnia-Herzegovina, all three approaches to religious structures have been employed. But it has also happened that 'alien' religious installations have been maintained and protected, despite the expulsion of the population groups that once used them. (T. Pflüger)

Built in the form of a Qur'an lectern, this newly erected gate stands at the frontier of Mecca's haram district. Al-haram means "the sanctuary," and designates a 'sacred, inviolable place' strictly off-limits to non-Muslims at all times. This haram extends, at its narrowest width, from five kilometers from the Ka'aba in all directions, and stretches thirty kilometers to the southeast, enclosing Mount Arafat and all other locations at which the pilgrimage ceremonies take place. During the period of pilgrimage, everyone coming from outside Saudi Arabia must have a pilgrimage visa in his passport in order to set foot in the haram at all. (A. M. Harwazinski)

Cultic veneration of the Buddha at first played a subordinate role in Buddhism. It was recognized only as a means of producing a salvific state of consciousness. In the course of time, however, the wish spread, especially from the side of the laity, for a piety that could be practiced on a daily basis. On models borrowed from the various Hindu religions, an elaborate cult developed, at whose midpoint stands the representational image of the Buddha and various bodhisattvas. Here, in a little Buddhist temple in Hong Kong, a monk makes his daily meditation. (T. Oberlies)

A devoted young woman from Hong Kong gives the departed a drink. It is the Ching-Ming Festival, and relatives bring their departed a sumptuous meal, serving them the food in front of their headstones. Here the dead are represented as photographs. (Christoph Auffarth)

The double world in which the Australian → Aborigines live since their 'discovery' by the Europeans is reflected in this multicultural cemetery scene on the island of Melville in the north of Australia, around 1990. In conformity with indigenous burial rules, hollow eucalyptus trunks are erected, which contain the bones of the departed. These are the burial pillars for a second burial: the dead are originally placed elsewhere, for example on a tree, until the process of decomposition has left only whitened bones. These are then gathered and hidden in the trunk receptacles, which are decorated with symbols from Aboriginal mythology. Western and Christian burial usage is demonstrated by the grave in the middle: relatives have also adopted a simple wooden cross, and the molded shape and religious symbolism, of a European grave. (Hubert Mohr)

Russian Orthodox Christians, as here in Volgograd, visit the cemetery at Easter for a common meal with the departed as part of their celebration of the Feast of the Resurrection. The grave is fenced off; the dead are present as images of the living. Their share of the meal consists of red-colored Easter eggs, which are blessed at the Easter Liturgy, and then laid before them at the gravestone. Freshly planted flowers, and the well-tended grave, testify to the visitors' lasting solicitude for the dead. (Christoph Auffarth)

Romuald Spira prays before the grave of an ancestor, cabbalist Nathan Spira (c. 1585–1633), whose work Discoverer of the Depths (posthum., 1637) became fundamental as a text for the modern Ashkenazi → Kabbalah. The Remu Cemetery (founded 1551), where the grave marker in the middle of the photograph is found, shared the fate of the Israelite religious community in Poland who buried their dead here: at the beginning of the Second World War, the SS built a shooting target range on the forty-seven mazzewe (monuments) still standing, destroying all of them but one. Excavations at the end of the 1950s unearthed more than 700 gravestones intact, which, owing to the destruction of Jewish culture in Poland, had received neither scientific attention nor any maintenance. Spira, one of few survivors, has documented the inscriptions, which he has taught himself to do. Today, in Poland as in Germany, the Jewish communities that kept them up and needed them have mostly disappeared, since their members were driven out or killed. (Hubert Mohr)

The story of the naughty, lovable god-baby Krishna is one of the commonplaces of Vishnu mythology. In today's India, however, the presentation of child divinities is not limited to Rama or Krishna: Shiva and Hanuman, too, appear as children in color pictures. The god in monkey form is one of the most popular gods in the Indian pantheon and ranks as the ideal, devoted, venerator (bhakta) of Rama, as well as the incarnation of Shiva. In the Indian national epic, the Rāmāyana (c. 300 BCE–300 CE), several episodes of Hanuman's childhood are recounted, and today have been taken from the powerfully emotional bhakti tradition and re-worked in 'soft focus.' (I. Keul)

Temporary shrine in Hong Kong in honor of the 'Great Deity, King of the Seas,' and other divinities. In the south coastal regions of China, such shrines are the regular scene of rituals for the welfare and prosperity of fishing and sailing. (S. P. Bumbacher)

In the commune Rajneeshpuram ('The Holy City of the King of the Full Moon'), Bhagwan-pupils (sannyasins) work in the field. In the 260-sq-km area of Big Muddy Ranch in the highlands of Central Oregon, the sannyasins built a large spiritual commune, which until 1985 was the center of the → Osho Movement. Despite difficult conditions of soil and climate, over the course of two years the members managed to render the extensively neglected ranch arable once more, and turn the commune into an economically self-sufficient farm. Along with fields for fruit, vegetables, and grain, raised on principles of dynamic biology, there were 3,000 chickens, 450 cattle, and 90 beehives. Work was done without remuneration, regularly seven days a week and twelve to fourteen hours a day. Within the commune there was no monetary exchange. The 'residents' received clothing, board, shelter, and health care in exchange for a membership fee, often a considerable amount, and the surrender of private ownership. All activities were regulated in common, from housework and meal preparation to the rearing of the children, who were accommodated in a special living area. The commune replaced the family; life centered on work, to which was attributed a power of transformation. (Benita von Behr)

On November 1–2, Mexican tradition celebrates the Day of the Dead (Día de Muertos). It stands in the tradition of the old Mexican celebration of the day of remembrance of the dead, and of the Catholic Feasts of All Saints and All Souls. Publicly, the dead are remembered with a celebration at the cemetery; privately, deceased family and relatives are welcomed with gifts, on a house altar (ofrenda). On this altar belonging to a Mexican-American family in Sacramento, photos and personal objects recall the departed while they were alive. They are entertained with pan de muertos in human shape, and tamales (a dish cooked in corn leaves). A statuette of Mary and votive candles likewise have their place on the altar. The bow is hung with heavily scented cempasúchil blossoms. The large velvet-like flowers (tagetes erecta) are also called flores de muertos ('flowers of the dead'). This is an artistic family, and much of the decoration is homemade. Merry, colorful, and shrill are the skulls (calaveras), made of papier mâché and sugar, as well as the skeletons, who ride, play music, and have fun—altogether in the spirit of the Día de Muertos: the dead should finally have enjoyable times. Bones and wooden snakes (right foreground) at the girl's feet recall the fashioning of the present-day human being, whose emergence was as follows. Since the gods wished to people the earth, the god Quetzalcóatl ('feathered snake') rode into the Realm of the Dead, looking for the bones of the man and woman. With all manner of 'tricks,' he managed to get them away from the Lord and Lady of the Realm of the Dead. Of these 'Precious Bones,' which had been ground to a powder by the goddess Quilatzli/Chihuacóatl ('female snake'), blended with the blood that Quetzalcóatl let flow from his penis, sprang the new race of human beings. In Mexican tradition, the bones and skull left after the decomposition of a corpse are not simply symbols of disintegration. They point to human durability, victory over death, and a potential refashioning. From 1974 onward, the Mexican-American community of Sacramento has celebrated the Day of the Dead publicly, as well. The ofrenda has been portrayed in a picture book intended to explain this festival to other American children. It is part of the Mexican cultural legacy. (Kirsten Holzapfel)

The incarnation of the goddess Uccitta, taken in Azhikode (Kerala, India), April 1993, at a Teyyam festival.
In this photograph, one sees the goddess in full, solemn array, sitting on glowing coals and held by two assistants, in the last stage of the ritual presentation of her apparition. She has just sung her history, to the accompaniment of a drum. She now no longer speaks through her medium to the community of onlookers and believers; instead, she reveals herself in wild dance and sign language. Next, she will determine solutions to their problems, with which she has already been presented. (H. Moser-Achuthath)

Eastern Mediterranean

Historical Region

1. The countries of the Near East that border on the Eastern Mediterranean between Asia Minor and Egypt belong to the regions of the earth that, with their Eastern and Southern hinterlands, possess special meaning for the history of religion. The area is one of the oldest regions of human habitation. In the ninth millennium BCE, the Neolithic Revolution began in this region and spread out from here. Since the seventh millennium BCE, medium-large urban settlements are in evidence that also give indications of particular forms of cult (e.g., the burial of artistically prepared skulls at Jericho in → Palestine, or ornamented public space in Çatal Hüyük). The development of writing in ancient Eastern societies since the third millennium BCE (hieroglyphics in Egypt, cuneiform lettering in Mesopotamia) considerably expanded relevant documentation for the history of religion. Around 1500 BCE, coastal inhabitants of Syria and Palestine began to use the alphabets that eventually prevailed in the Mediterranean region by way of Phoenician and Greek colonization. The religions of the region were polytheistic. Due to intensified communication, they came in contact with one another in the first millennium BCE. Certain cults even spread to the European coasts of the Mediterranean. Hellenization, since the end of the fourth century BCE, and the later establishment of the Roman Empire, reinforced these processes, especially since the first century BCE.

Since mid-first-millennium BCE, on the foundation of the cult of YHWH in Jerusalem and in close contact to the Canaanite traditions, the Jewish religion appeared here, the first religion to—albeit slowly—turn explicitly to → monotheism, with the Hebrew → Bible as its key collection of texts, and corresponding traditions. In addition, oral traditions also existed, later to be compiled as 'oral Torah' in the Mishnah and the two Talmudic redactions of the fourth and sixth centuries CE (→ Talmud). Beginning in the sixth century BCE, Jewish communities spread outside Palestine, in a polytheistic environment, and were rapidly Hellenized in the Mediterranean area (e.g., the Septuaginta Greek translation of the Bible in Alexandria, third to first century BCE). In the first century CE, the second monotheistic religion Christianity formed in this framework with a biblical tradition derived from the Jews; and, in the region between Egypt and Asia Minor, it received its various normative and institutional foundations. Through the fourth and fifth centuries CE, the Mediterranean area was extensively Christianized, while the influence of Judaism was contained. Against a Judeo-Christian background, and in a framework of ancient Arabian polytheistic religion, Islam arose in the seventh century CE, in Mecca and Medina in the West of the Arabian Peninsula. Here was a third monotheistic religion of biblical tradition, with the Qur'an as its revelatory text and a rich corpus of tradition in the Arabian language. With the Arab Islamic conquest, Islam spread as the religion of the rulers. First the Arabization, then the Islamization of the area began, and the Islamic religion formed in its inner multiplicity. The other religions, especially Judaism and Christianity, were gradually relegated to minority status. The Near East also received, in view of the universalization of Islam, its role as a center, with → Mecca as its central place of cult

BULGARIA
BLACK SEA
RUSSIA
LEBANON
Beirut
GREECE
Istanbul
Grave of mystic Maulana Jeladdin Rumi Ankara GEORGIA
Tbilisi
CASPIAN SEA
ARMENIA
AZERBAIJAN
Yerevan
Baku
Ejmiadsin
Konya
Syrian Orthodox, formerly also Nestorian monastery
Antalya
Çatal Hüyük
Tabriz
Grave of Sheikh Adi Ibn Musafir
Tur Abdin
Lalish
Mosul
Aleppo
Nicosia
SYRIA
Tehran
Bkerke
IRAQ
MEDITERRANEAN
Antelias
Beirut
Damascus
Samarra
IRAN
Haifa
ISRAEL
Omayyad Mosque
Baghdad
Tel Aviv
Amman
Esfahan
Alexandria
Jerusalem
Monument of martyr Husain, son of Ali and Muhammad's daughter Fatima Kerbela
Najaf
Monument of Ali Ibn Talib, fourth caliph and first imam
Azhar University
Cairo
JORDAN
Basra
Aqaba
Holy City → Map Jerusalem
Monastery of Saint Anthony
First Egyptian cenobitic community
Asyut
Monastery of Saint Catherine
Founded 324, icon treasury, manuscript collection
BAHRAIN
EGYPT
SAUDI ARABIA
Manama
QATAR
Doha
Medina
Riyadh
Abu Dhabi
Muscat
Tomb of the Prophet Muhammad
UNITED ARAB EMIRATES
OMAN
Jedda
Mecca
Umm al-Qura University
Central pilgrimage place → Map Mecca
RED SEA
SUDAN
Khartoum
ERITREA
San'a
YEMEN ARABIAN SEA
ETHIOPIA
Aden
F.D.2005
EASTERN MEDITERRANEAN
Sacred Topography
Archaeological Site
Muslim
Muslim (Shi'a)
Islamic School/University
Jewish
Yezidi
Christian
Coptic
Greek Orthodox
Dominant religious affiliations
Muslim (Sunni majority)
Muslims (Shi'a majority)
Jews
Christians (various denominations)
Orthodox Churches
Armenian Apostolic Church
0 250
500 km
Christian Patriarchal Sees
1. Ecumenial Orthodox
2. Armenian Orthodox
3. Georgian Orthodox Katholikos
4. Armenian Apostolic Katholikos
5. Maronite
6. Armenian Apostolic Katholikos
7. Armenian Catholic
8. Syrian Catholic
9. Greek Orthodox
10. Syrian Orthodox
11. Melkite Orthodox
12. Melkite Catholic
13. Armenian Orthodox
14. Greek Orthodox
15. Roman Catholic
16. Coptic Orthodox
17. Coptic Catholic
18. Chaldaean
Religious Minorities:
Alawites (Islamic)
Druses (Islamic)
Jesids (other)
Mandaeans (other)
Copts (Christian)

The Omayyad Mosque in Damascus is a classic example of continuity of cult in the Near East. It is built on the foundation of a Christian church, whose Byzantine frescos are still partially visible. The church, in turn, stood on the foundation of a Roman temple. Caliph al-Walid widened the mosque between 705 and 715, by including the space formerly occupied by Christian Saint John's church. The carpeted interior of a mosque is entered without shoes, and may be used for relaxation outside the times of prayer, although guards ordinarily awaken sleepers. (Agnes Imhof) and pilgrimage. Over the centuries, → Palestine, as the 'Holy Land,' was the goal of Jewish, Christian, and Muslim pilgrims.

2. a) The contemporary religions of the area are monotheistic (exact, up-to-date membership tallies are rarely available). The majority religion is Islam, mainly in its Sunnite version, with strong Shiite communities (in → Iran as the majority, in Iraq, and in Lebanon). There exist besides, often only here, smaller denominations important for the history of religion, that stand on the periphery of the majority Islam and manifest strong syncretistic traits (Ismailites in Lebanon and Syria, Druses in Syria, Lebanon, and Israel, Alawites in Syria and Turkey, Alevis in Asia Minor). Their representatives are concerned to move closer to majority Islam, and to be accepted by it. In rural regions, there are also unique communities such as the Yezidis. The → Baha'i religion arose, as a new universal religion, from the Shiite environment in the region at the end of the nineteenth century. Its center is now in Haifa, in Israel.

b) The second largest religious group is the Christian, with strong confessional differentiation. Apart from Cyprus, Christians form minorities, larger in Syria, Lebanon, and Egypt. They are members of churches with Chalcedonian and post-Chalcedonian rites, mostly Greek Orthodox and Greek Catholics. 'National' churches, as it were, are the Maronites in Lebanon, in union with Rome, and the Copts in the Nile Valley. Western Christian churches and communities have done missionary work in the region, especially since the nineteenth century. While their effectiveness among Jews and Muslims has usually been modest, their work has occasioned the appearance of Catholic and Protestant denominations in the autochthonous Christian communities. Currently, indigenous Christians are disturbed especially by the activities of Pentecostal ministers from the United States. For years, efforts are to be noted in inter-confessional and inter-religious dialogue, which generally is even endorsed by the state. The conversion of Christians to Islam usually has social reasons. New religions have scarcely any footing in the region.

c) Outside of Palestine, the strong Jewish communities in the region are almost decimated, or have all but entirely disappeared by reason of emigration to Europe, America, and Israel.

Structural Change in the Twentieth Century

3. The twentieth century was accompanied by basic changes for the region. At the beginning of the century, large parts still belonged to the Ottoman Empire. But after the First and Second World Wars, new states appeared, frequently with artificial boundaries. Members of numerous peoples live in the region, with ethnic membership often, but not always, coinciding with religion, as in the case of the Armenians. The peoples of the Near East belong to different linguistic communities. They are mainly Arab and Arabized peoples with their Arabic language, as well as Jews with Hebrew (a Semitic language), Turks and other Turkish peoples with Turkish languages, Iranians, Kurds, Armenians, and Greeks with Indo-European languages, along with numerous others, for example members of Caucasus peoples, like Circassians and Chechens, in Syria and Jordan. The ethnic and linguistic landscape is extremely variegated; however, there are clear tendencies toward assimilation to the majorities and their officially promoted cultures—Arabization, therefore, in Arab states, and Turkish assimilation in Turkey.

Urbanization and Population Movements

In the twentieth century, the population of this region grew rapidly. Many rural residents moved to the cities, especially in the closing decades, so that great metropolises such as Cairo (more than 15,000,000 inhabitants) and Istanbul (some 7,000,000) expanded unchecked—with all drawbacks of forced urbanization, such as slums, environmental degeneration, and deficient infrastructure. At the same time, profound demographic and even religious changes have taken place, noticeable throughout the region. The Christian population has lost its share of the territory mostly by way of emigration and expulsion, for example the persecution and massacre of the Armenians in Anatolia in 1915–1916, the resettlement of the Greeks of Asia Minor by treaty in 1923–1924, and the continuous emigration of Christians from all countries to Europe and America. Arabic Jews have emigrated from the region to Israel, Western Europe, and North America, especially since the founding of Israel in 1948 and the Arab-Israeli conflict. By reason of these changes, and a rapidly growing population (2% annually in Egypt, 3.5% in Syria, and 2.1% in Turkey), the proportion of the Islamic population is expanding in nearly all states.

→ Palestine—and especially, → Jerusalem, with its places sacred to three great religions—has a special religious meaning in this region. That fact was taken into consideration when, for instance, in 1947, the UN decided on the division of Palestine by the formation of an international zone in the region of Jerusalem. After the Second World War, and with the founding of the State of Israel, in 1948, Palestine became the center of the Near East conflict between Israel on the one side and Arab states and Palestinian Arabs on the other. Under the influence of the Cold War, this conflict gained a trans-regional importance. It was addressed by political, economic, and military means. In spite of the progress attained with the establishment of peaceful relations between Israel and Egypt, Jordan, and the Palestinians, there has been no comprehensive resolution. On the level of ideology and propaganda, the sides immediately concerned by the presentation of the conflict offered preponderantly nationalistic conceptualizations, while religious dimensions were usually relegated to secondary consideration. Activists, however, and militant groups striving for political and religious ends—Islamic and Jewish, as well as Western Christian—repeatedly sought to place more emphasis on religious considerations. Since the 1980s, these have enjoyed growing attention. In the interest of Islamic ecumenical tendencies, as also with hegemonic endeavors on the part of Islamic states, Palestinian affairs were used in several different ways for activities concerned with solidarity and international interests. Thus, the assault on the al-Aqsa Mosque of Jerusalem occasioned the formation of the interstate Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC).

Modernization and Reform Movements

4. All of the religious communities in the region have modernized over the last two decades—in their conceptualizations as in their institutions. Now religious heritage and legal traditions coming down (for example) from the time of the Ottomans, and colonialism, all continue under new conditions. With their specific opportunities and possibilities, religious communities now take part in political life, and, through new kinds of organization, address social and educational tasks with greater power. Beginning with the abolition of the Ottoman Caliphate in 1924, and the exclusion of religious institutions from Turkish public life under Kemal Atatürk—all under the sign of a secular nationalism—a consistent policy of laicization in Turkey has had effects on the entire region. At the same time, political and social reform movements arose in Islam itself, such as that of the Muslim Brothers, founded in 1928 in Egypt. Beginning in the 1930s with attention to local peculiarities, the Brothers have spread throughout and beyond the entire region, while nowadays they are frequently proscribed. They have become a model for various configurations of Islamic political and social engagement. Nationalistic forces that have come to power with the gaining of state independence have partially followed the Turkish pattern, but have entered compromises, as they are supported by national traditions. In states with a Muslim majority—except in Turkey—the constitutions, on the one hand, acknowledge Islam or its ideal law as a basis for the state, and require both a corresponding respect to be paid to the maintenance of Islamic norms, and honor to be accorded Islamic symbols in public life. Islamic institutions are supervised by the state, thereby lending religious legitimization to the political power of the state. On the other hand, the same constitutions usally fix the legal equality of all citizens, independently of their religious or ethnic membership. At the same time, members of the Islamic majority have the de facto privilege of having the most important state offices reserved for them. The relationship between the Islamic majority and non-Islamic minorities is dependent on internal as well as external considerations, and can be often complicated under dictatorial conditions, as in situations of crisis. Under normal conditions, political forces are generally interested in a balanced relationship, with a practical tolerance. The nationalistic ideologies prevailing in Arab countries include Islam in their considerations as a component of culture, and a specific heritage, and see to these claims being upheld in state educational entities as well.

Islamization since 1970

Owing to the oil boom in certain states of the region, the revolutionary changes in → Iran since 1978, and critical developments within the states (and the differences prevailing among them), a modernized normative Islam has gained in importance. Now the latter, with its intra-state and traditional differences, and peculiar neo-traditionalist tendencies, has partially repressed secular attitudes. Prevailing political forces are concerned to make use of these phenomena for a solidification of their power, and for the confrontation with opposing secularist groups. But at the same time—in only partly democratic contexts—they must take up the challenge of various forms of political opposition with religious Islamic motivations. Here, militant Islamic groups have also sprung up, eager to gain political power by violent means, even at times by → terrorism. To boot, they consciously strive to disturb fragile relations among the various religious communities by encroaching upon them. Differentiations appear within the Islamic communities, at times in the observance of the local, regional, and even ethnic specifications of Islamic practice, with simultaneous exchange among these. One effect of the transformations in question is the expanding Islamic → diaspora in Western Europe and North America.

Literature

Arberry, Arthur J. (ed.), Religion in the Middle East, 2 vols., Cambridge 1969; Bottéro, Jean et al., Ancestor of the West: Writing, Reasoning, and Religion in Mesopotamia, Elam, and Greece, Chicago 2000; Bunzl, John (ed.), Islam, Judaism, and the Political Role of Religions in the Middle East, Gainesville 2004; Esposito, John L. (ed.), The Oxford Encyclopaedia of the Modern Islamic World, 4 vols., New York 1995; Esposito, John L./Burgat, François (eds.), Modernizing Islam: Religion in the Public Sphere in the Middle East and Europe, London 2003; Gilsenan, Michael, Recognizing Islam: Religion and Society in the Modern Middle East, London [2]2000; Halliday, Fred, Nation and Religion in the Middle East, London 2000; Idem, Islam and the Myth of Confrontation: Religion and Politics in the Middle East, London [2]2003; Knappert, Jan, The Encyclopaedia of Middle Eastern Mythology and Religion, Shaftesbury 1993; Lewis, Bernard, From Babel to Dragomans: Interpreting the Middle East, Oxford 2004; Lipton, Edward P. (ed.), Religious Freedom in the Near East, Northern Africa and the Former Soviet States, New York 2002; Ma'oz, Moshe/Sheffer, Gabriel (eds.), Middle Eastern Minorities and Diasporas, Brighton 2002.

→ Ancient East, Christianity, Egypt, Fundamentalism, Islam, Jerusalem, Judaism, Laicism, Mediterranean Region, Palestine/Israel

Holger Preißler

Eating / Nourishment

Eating as Basic Need and Social Activity

1. Eating and drinking 'keep body and soul together,' we say. The adage points to altogether distinct dimensions of the taking of nourishment. On the one hand, eating satisfies, and thus serves to maintain the human being biologically. But the expression also refers to dimensions of eating by which the human being is distinguished from the beast: psychic elements, which can be realized in cultural, religious, and social dimensions. Between the organic need of hunger and its satisfaction enter religion

This meal is in violation of the rules of thirteen religions—together observed by around sixty percent of the population of the world

1. Components of the meal

1. Caffeine-containing refreshment (e.g., Cola)
2. Bun
3. Milk product (cheese)
4. Pork
5. Beef
6. Pickle
7. Cutlery
8. Ketchup
9. Salted French fries

2. Survey of Dietary Prohibitions

(3, 4) Adventists, like Jews, eat no pork. Often they avoid cheese, as well, since it is frequently prepared with an enzyme taken from pork.
(4, 5) Buddhists often avoid meat, since they are not to kill animals. Theravada monks and nuns may eat no meat from animals killed expressly for them.
(5, 7, 9) Hindus eat no beef, since cattle are sacred animals. Many Hindus eat with no cutlery that has touched beef. They also avoid salted foods, such as salted French fries, since these are associated with lust and madness.
(6,8) Members of ISKCON (→ Hare Krishna) eat no pickles or ketchup, for the vinegar in them is a fermented product, which decomposes and causes mental impairment.
(1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8) Jains take no caffeine. They eat no milk products, meat, pickles, ketchup, or salted French fries. They may not eat bread covered with sesame seeds. Incidentally, neither do Jains eat when it is dark—they might inadvertently swallow small insects.
(3, 4, 5) For Jews, pork is unclean (Lev 11:7). The laws of Orthodoxy require that one wait at least an hour after consuming beef to eat milk products, for it is not seemly that a person eat the meat of an animal that has been boiled in its mother's milk (Exod 23:19). Even eating the meat of ritually clean animals is allowed only when the animal has been slaughtered according to certain rules. (The animals must be bled to death, in order to preclude consuming the blood. The meat is then kosher.)
(4, 3) Catholics and Orthodox Christians traditionally avoid meat on certain days of the week—especially on Fridays, in order to fast in memory of Jesus's Passion.
(1) Mormons live without caffeine.
(4, 5) Muslims eat beef only when, as prescribed, the animal has been slaughtered under invocation of the name of God. The Qur'an forbids the consumption of pork (cf. Jews).
(3, 4, 5) Russian and Greek Orthodox monks eat no meat on Mondays, Wednesdays, or Fridays, in order to show, by fasting and abstinence, their participation in the Passion of Christ. They avoid pork and beef generally, as being difficult to digest, and distracting at prayer.
(4) Rastafarians eat no pork (as neither do Jews or Muslims).
(5) Sikhs eat no beef.
(2) Daoists traditionally refrain from bread, as spiked worms live in wheat silos.
(4, 5) Zoroastrians eat neither beef nor pork when in mourning. Likewise on the days of the month that are sacred to gods Ram, Rahman, and Gosh (who protect animals), they avoid taking meat. (COLORS and Hubert Mohr) and culture, which organize body and sense. Like every living being, the omnivorous ('all-eating') human being must eat. What human beings eat, however, how and with whom they assimilate food, or how they reflect thereon, is dependent on respective social, religious, and cultural norms. They satisfy their hunger not instinctively, but with a system of learned methods transmitted by culture and religion. Thus, eating always stands between the 'primitive need' (Georg Simmel) of the → body and the 'civilizing deed' of the choice of nourishment, its distribution, methods of preparation, and habits of consumption. The taking of nourishment figures among the 'routinized' undertakings of everyday life—which, however, far transcend the latter.

Commensality

Eating is a self-interested activity. "What a person eats, under no circumstances can eat someone else."[1] Just so, however, in the situation of the meal human beings know themselves to be social beings, since they eat in common and follow common rules in doing so. In the meal, social relations are presented and reinforced. Not the victuals, but the manner of their ingestion is a society-generating phenomenon, creating a unity of individual and community (commensality). This manner can be that of one's routine eating in the family, eating at the festive meals celebrated at particular moments of one's life or of the calendar year, eating at a funeral reception, at Christmas, or after Ramadan by the breaking of the fast, at the → Lord's Supper, or at the Passover or Easter meal. Eating begets and rejuvenates social units: nourishment, then, is not only a medium of social integration, but a sensible, visible presentation of social, cultural, and religious differences, as well. The foreign is determined by the most elementary means—eating; it is identified by its taste. Not only does eating develop symbolical meaning, as social activity, but the food functions as a vehicle of meaning and symbol. Exclusive foods serve as prestige and status products for the identification of social positions and differences.

Nourishment and Religion

2. The elementary act of eating is not, therefore, exhausted in the satisfaction of a need of nutrients, but possesses a symbolical surplus of meaning, by way of which, in every religion and every culture, mighty questions of human existence are addressed and models of social order conceived. Let nutrition be good not only when it comes to eating, says French cultural anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss, but when it comes to thinking, as well. Dreams of paradise and expectations of salvation are charged with fantasies of unregulated eating and sweet foods, or of festal gourmandism (→ Feasts and Celebrations; Agrarian Religion). Eating is not only the recollection of the lost and a foretaste of the future land of ease. It symbolizes—like biting the apple—the Fall and the expulsion from precisely this paradise. In eating, the relationships of the here and now instituted and maintained, but it also builds a bridge between human beings and relations of the hereafter. In the bloody → sacrifice as the central act of so many religions, an act through which human beings strengthen their faith, a living organism is destroyed in order to influence invisible powers, to enter into community with them, to honor them, or to ban harmful influences. Through the meal of sacrificial food, those who partake are joined with one another, or, when the sacrificial animal is believed to contain the divine principle (totemism), united with that principle.

Dietary Prohibitions

3. We are not only what we eat, but also what we do not eat. The fact that beef in Central or Northern Europe, or in the United States, assuages an essential part of the need for meat, while it is tabooed as a source of nourishment among the Hindus, in India, finds its foundation not in these per se edible animals themselves, but in supervening elements of society, culture, or religious testimonial. Every culture and many religions divide foods into clean and unclean, to be eaten or not to be eaten, enjoined or prohibited (Mary Douglas). Nutritional customs of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam have been essentially marked by dietary precepts found in the Hebrew Bible, which, it is true, have been abrogated or altered by Christianity and Islam. The most frequent instance is the prohibition of blood consumption, based on the notion that blood is the seat of the soul and vessel of life, and must be restored as such to God the Creator (Lev 17:10ff.; Deut 12:23). This acknowledgment of the fundamental order of being is the groundwork of the provision, that the blood be completely removed from the animal that has been killed in the rite of slaughter.

There are various explanations of dietary prohibitions. Functionalistic approaches emphasize the social-integration tasks of dietary taboos and the meaning of these tasks for the production of the collective identity. With the proscription of pork in Judaism, for example, it is pointed out that the division into clean and unclean meat underscores the Jews' cultural and national distinction from other peoples.

Cultural materialistic elucidations are based on economic cost-benefit logic, as well as on the 'theory of the optimal fodder quest' (Marvin Harris). Behind dietary taboos, utilitarian strategies are hypothesized, whose aim is to achieve a high nutritional profit from a small expenditure of energy. Pork was tabooed, first in Judaism and later in Islam, because environmental conditions in the Near East were unsuitable for pork farming, and the economic costs were therefore too high.

Structuralistic approaches take their point of departure in the notion that eating and animals are good for thinking. Their variety predestines them to a service as models of social order. Thus, such animals are prohibited that escape the criteria, and therefore the normality, of social ordering. Pork was therefore tabooed in Judaism on the basis of its anomalous character: in the Hebrew Bible's classification of dietary precepts, land animals were permitted to be eaten that were ruminant and had cloven hooves. But the hog has cloven hooves without being ruminant, and thus presents an anomaly where it comes to classification.

Dietary prohibitions usually refer to meat nourishment. They may be of limited duration, for example when associated with → feasts and celebrations, rites of initiation, or other biographical occurrences, such as pregnancy or death. In many religions, temporary proscriptions include the obligation of → fasting, as abstinence from food suspends current, profane time, in favor of a concentration on the meaning of human existence.

Dietary taboos are not restricted to worlds of religious conceptualization. By way of a scientific approach to daily thinking, discoveries of medical or nutritional science alter received nutritional relations. → Vegetarianism in modern societies—part of life-reform movements since the nineteenth century (→ Ascona/Monte Verità), with their criticism of civilization—is an example of the confluence of scientific thinking, culinary morality, and sometimes even spiritualistic attitudes. Thus, vegetarianism develops a dynamics by which the nutritional relationship is altered. Abstinence from meat here becomes an expression of a moral sensitivity that can be highly charged emotionally, and psychically anchored in antipathy and aversion.

Eating in the Modern Age

4. With the secularization processes of European modernity, eating has been gradually released from its religious associations. Fewer and fewer norms and rules are guided by religion, although there are nutritional practices—for example, fasting—that have maintained their religious tone as they are transformed into worldly eating practices, like slimming diets that have come to acquire a quasi-religious quality. Eating in a demystified world is characterized by medical ('healthy eating'), pedagogical ('conscious eating', civilizing—'eating politely'), or scientific attitudes. These perspectives foster rational approaches to eating and place the physical health of the body at the center of attention. To be sure, nutritional habits exemplify what little hope there may be that a rationality of purpose will become a basic cultural orientation or contribute to the disestablishment of received customs. Thus, many dietary precepts and prohibitions (e.g., insects and canine flesh in Europe) seem unreasonable or are observed even when their religious origin and meaning are no longer present.

1. Simmel 1957, 243.

Literature

Diner, Hasia R., Hungering for America: Italian, Irish, and Jewish Foodways in the Age of Migration, Cambridge 2001; Douglas, Mary, Purity and Danger: An Analysis of Concepts of Pollution and Taboo, London 1966; Elias, Norbert, The Civilizing Process: The Development of Manners. Changes in the Code of Conduct and Feeling in Early Modern Times, New York 1978 ([1]1939); Gay, Kathlyn/Gay, Martin K., Encyclopedia of North American Eating and Drinking: Traditions, Customs, and Rituals, Santa Barbara 1996; Harris, Marvin, Good to Eat: Riddles of Food and Culture, Prospect Heigths 1998; Lévi-Strauss, Claude, Introduction to the Science of Mythology, Harmondsworth etc. 1986 ([1]1964–1971); Mennell, Stephen, All Manners of Food: Eating and Taste in England and France from the Middle Ages to the Present, Oxford 1987; Simmel, Georg, "Soziologie der Mahlzeit," in: Idem, Brücke und Tür, Stuttgart 1957 ([1]1910), 243-250; Teuteberg, Hans J. (ed.), European Food History: A Research Review, Leicester 1992.

→ Agrarian Religion/Agrarian Magic, Animal, Asceticism, Body, Cannibalism, Drinking/Drink, Fasting, Feasts and Celebrations, Ramadan, Sacrifice, Vegetarianism

Friedemann Schmoll

Economy

Satisfying Needs by Exchange

1. Economic trade is an activity proper to human beings. Its premises are, for one, unlimited needs, and for another, limited means of satisfaction of those needs. What sort of needs these are is not important. In terms of economics, no need is 'obvious.' The intention of economic exchange is to achieve optimal possible satisfaction of needs by optimal mediate investment. While these abstract definitions are always valid, they generate no uniformity of economic exchange. The historical and intercultural variety of needs dictates a variety of means to their satisfaction. To boot, technological development determines economic configurations. Again, in every society, some needs are defined as being outside the purview of economics. For modern Western societies, religion, → eroticism, and → sexuality are largely de-economized, so that to 'buy' or 'sell' religion or love seems offensive. In the presence of a concept of economics broader than the process of exchange, however, it is altogether possible to speak of economic activity in their regard, especially in view of the fact that one of the intrinsically scanty means is time. The time that I spend in the satisfaction of religious needs can no longer be applied to the satisfaction of other needs.

In the abstract, all needs are equal. But, both individually and socially, there is an observable hierarchy of needs. While these needs are not necessarily inalterable, it is not completely false to speak of basic needs. In all ages, the need for nutrition and protection against the hardships of nature has stood at the focus of human action. Granted, it is empirically possible for a need other than these, in connection with religion particularly, to become so important that, for its satisfaction, voluntary starvation itself becomes a consideration.

Religious Goods

2. In an economic view, religion can be seen either as a means for the satisfaction of non-religious needs, or as a need in itself.

Means to an End

a) The first case refers to the human phenomenon that is empirically the most widespread, and presumably the oldest: religion. Religion as an independent need presupposes an advanced differentiation of religion. The introduction of religion for the satisfaction of non-religious needs can occur in manifold form: → magic (with hunting, and so forth), prayer for the success of an undertaking, vows, and the like. In such cases, it is irrelevant whether the means applied is 'objectively' promising or not. The old distinction between magic (as a designation for the activity just cited) and → religion (as a designation for religious actions that are not goal-directed) is polemical, and therefore frequently regarded as unusable. Economic activity whose upshot is particularly uncertain, as hunting, for example, or in earlier times, foreign trade, is very often prosecuted by religious means in addition to technological ones; while in everyday economic activity, religion is scarcely ever invoked. A familiar example would be the promise to sacrifice to the god a part of the profit (votive system) in case of success of the economic activity. This can be regarded as a kind of insurance policy, although, to be sure, the essential distinction here is that the 'insured' (in this case, the votary) pays a 'premium' only in case of the success of the risky undertaking, while the god risks losing devotees. It is consonant with the insurance hypothesis that the religious assurance of precarious economic actions has an important psychological function: that of at least partially delivering the subject of the uncertain economic action from the fear of not having done everything necessary for the success of the undertaking. Nor is this in any way a matter of 'primitive' ideas. All religions have integrated such acts somewhere in their system, although strictly monotheistic religions, with their idea of a radically transcending God, had intellectual difficulties to overcome. At least in the area of folk religion, these theologically dubious practices were usually tolerated.

Religion as a Good and a Service

b) Even when religion is introduced as a means to a nonreligious end, the religious means can be considered a good (or a service), in whose terms a need exists that makes it necessary once more to satisfy the introduction of means. This state of affairs is easiest to explain by representing situations in which matters at issue are committed to the competency of religious specialists, who are concerned to satisfy their own needs, and who therefore are dependent on means not at their disposal. It then comes to acts of exchange, such as are customary in a society with a division of labor. Here an intellectual difficulty arises. If we postulate an individual who acts rationally in matters of economics, as economic theory presupposes, then it is to be expected that, in the long term, the demand will diminish for religious goods and services as a means for the satisfaction of non-religious needs. After all, merely by 'trial and error' the consumer will have had the experience that the result is not dependent on the introduction of the religious means. This process ought to lead to a religious decline that would come into evidence at least beginning with the early high cultures. Empirical data do not verify this hypothesis. Instead, an increase is observable in the supply of religious goods and services over the last five thousand years. Of course, it is likely that the proportion of religious goods available as means for non-religious ends will have diminished across the market and the supply area as a whole. The material prerequisite for this development, offered by technological evolution, is the smaller outlay of means (e.g., labor power) for the satisfaction of primary needs. Religion in the broader sense could then be regarded as a good for which a direct need developed. The case is similar in the area of art.

Are Religious Goods Worth the Outlay?

Supply and Demand

c) From the standpoint of economics, religion is always dealt with in terms of goods and services. By definition, these must be things or capabilities that (1) are scarce, and thus not available everywhere and always, and (2) satisfy a need. Whether the second condition is met can only be ascertained empirically: an inquiry must be conducted.

Whether religious goods or religious services are scarce is a difficult question to answer, and depends extensively on the capacity of the religious system whose goods or services are being sought. In nearly all religions, there is a group or class of specialists whose members offer religious services, such as the performance of rites, and who expect a good requital for doing so. The 'scarcity' resides in the fact that the specialists can refuse the service. In a framework of the rational choice theory, the relationship between supplier and consumer is geared to the principle of profit even with religious commodities, so that, of course, an open and transparent market is presupposed. But this presupposition is not very frequently observed in the history of religions. Genuine competition with respect to price is not observed among suppliers of religious commodities. Furthermore, religious goods belong to the class of goods whose quality is evinced only with use—if, indeed, in a given case, a 'quality check' is empirically possible. When competing offers are at hand, price is normally determined by a decision as to which rite or which specialists enjoy the most prestige. To be sure, the exercise of consumers' rational choice is not entirely excluded: they still have the opportunity to decide in favor of a less prestigious good.

Market and Rational Choice

Monopoly

An altogether different situation obtains when the religious market is ruled monopolistically, or when it is so segmented that specialized monopolistic suppliers act for different religious goods respectively. The former case long prevailed in Christian and Islamic societies; the latter are to be observed extensively in Japan, where, for example, non-Buddhist specialists typically perform marriages, while funerals are committed to Buddhist specialists. Then the only alternative for the consumer consists in refusing the offer altogether, which is sometimes excluded on cultural, or even legal, grounds. Negotiation is then limited to the supplier's expense-derived asking price, or the refusal of the offer.

Prohibition of Selling Religious Goods

d) It is a special case in religious economics, then, when a religious system prohibits the sale of religious goods. This obtains in an especially radical way in Christianity, and has entered church law under the concept of the prohibition of simony (Acts 8:18-24). It refers first and foremost to the 'priceless' quality of the sacraments. In the case of a consistent analogical application, then, there could be no specialists living from religion. As we know, this development has not occurred. Instead, it was a matter, at first, of the formation of coalitions (communities), in which the members of the community authorized customary contributions for the consumption of religious goods. Later, when Christianity had become the established religion, compulsory membership and regulated contributions came into usage, in the form of the tithe. Besides, since the Middle Ages, the clergy must be paid 'stole fees' for official acts. (The term is from stola, Lat., 'stole,' the vestment that priests donned on the occasion of these acts.) To be sure, it was always regarded as essential that it be a matter of a fee, and not of a price, so that no purchase was being made. Despite all dogmatic difficulties, a religious market has developed even in the history of Christendom, for example, as trade in devotional objects on the occasion of a pilgrimage and in the system of indulgences. Of course, protest was never absent, and led to religious currents that often withdrew from the market system with great success.

'Extra-Economical' Rejection of the World

e) From a perspective of theoretical economics, the question of why religious needs are present is irrelevant. In the view of religious studies, however, it is a question of central importance, since the most successful religious systems (the 'world religions,' as they are called) submit offers that obviously not only do not harmonize with the goods of the endeavors usually striven for (long life, health, wealth), but, at times, stand in direct opposition to them. One may speak of the tendency to a 'rejection of the world' in the world religions, where the degree and proportion of the rejection differs: earthly prosperity is more easily legitimized in Judaism and in Islam than in Buddhism or Christianity. Nevertheless, in both first-named religions, the religious (non-worldly) need is to be preferred to the worldly need, in case of conflicting opportunities of need satisfaction. True, in all 'world religions' actions and ideas developed in 'folk religion' that brought earthly goals well into agreement with religion. Nevertheless, it remains incontrovertible that the primary commandments of these religions are extra-worldly. Release from the wheel of rebirths (Nirvana), beatitude in a world that will become reality only after death (in Christianity and Islam).

For the relationship between religion and the economy, the question arises of how such large numbers of human beings can actually have been convinced that it is sensible to invest in these goods—that is, to posit means to their attainment. The older (crassly) materialistic thesis, that it has been purely a matter of earthly compensation that the unattainable quality of earthly goods has led to an illusionary flight to other goods, can be regarded as refuted by the history of religions. As a rule, on the consumer side, the vessels of the new religions offering extra-worldly goods were not the most underprivileged groups in their respective societies. One comes a step closer to a solution when one considers that the goods offered were not distinguished from earthly goods radically or all at once, but have come into this distinction only gradually, and in a context of an extensively assured satisfaction of material needs. The wish for a long life and the wish for immortality are not an infinite distance apart. Even religious systems that proclaim the goal of a termination of individual existence, in practice present themselves as also sponsoring the immediate goal of a blissful rebirth. Support of pious foundations and generosity to mendicant begging monks are payments with which this need is to be satisfied.

Reciprocal Services

f) It is a complicated case, then, when the satisfaction of a religious need corresponds to no contribution in the form of material gifts, but only to commitment as the member of a group. Here one must closely ascertain the nature of the engagement—that is, what contributions are required of the group member. It is decisive whether any group members receive payments based on the engagement of other group members. The Apostle Paul (1 Cor 9:4-18) maintains a polemic in practice against those who support themselves by the proclamation of the Gospel, although he does not contest their right in principle to do so. This testifies that, very early in the Christian communities, before the development of a clergy, itinerant missionaries lived at the cost of the community members. The nature of the contribution made by or expected from these missionaries (apostles) is of no account. The only decisive thing is the fact that people were prepared to make counter-contributions for these contributions, thereby establishing a relationship of exchange. Only in a religious group in which there was no sort of distribution of labor could relations prevail that were not of an economic nature.

Religion as an Economic Factor

3. The connection between religion and economy prevails not only at the level of the organization of religion, but also at that of the role of religious activity on behalf of a community's economic life.

Key Marketplaces

a) Religion as an economic factor is especially evident at a regional level. Places of pilgrimage, central temples, and other important sacred places favor the appearance of establishments that have key economic importance for an area. The prerequisite for such a development is that consumers have an adequate surplus that can flow into the satisfaction of religious needs. On the supply side, a situation of competition often arises in which suppliers must 'vaunt' their contributions. The more successful the marketing, the more, in that case, an entire region, or at least a place and its environs, can live from religion. → Mecca, Lourdes, and → Santiago de Compostela in Spain are outstanding examples.

Interruption of the Cycle by Fortune Building

b) If direct religious donations are made that are not fully taken up by operations, then, over time, a temple treasury appears, to grow with appropriate use. This pattern held for Christian monasteries in the Middle Ages. If a prohibition of sale is imposed, the property of the 'invisible hand' grows to quantities that may exert a certain influence on the economic life of an entire society. To all appearances, this development will be independent of religious content. Buddhist monasteries in Asian countries, Christian monasteries in Europe, and the second Jewish Temple in Jerusalem, are examples of the economic power of religious institutions that lose all connection with the religious goals they represent. Especially when individual poverty to the point of a total lack of possessions is required of the religious specialists, the institution may host the rapid appearance of a treasure. This treasure arouses the greed of political entities, and of the elites linked to them, and these seek grounds to reconvert the amassed goods to another use. The history of religions is accompanied by a → secularization of religious goods.

Welfare Bodies

c) In modern capitalist societies, the landed property of religious institutions (churches) is often still considerable, this is true; but it no longer plays any decisive role. A factor of growing importance, on the other hand, is the co-determination of the market by welfare bodies associated with the churches (→ Charitable Organizations). Although they dispose of considerable property in dead capital and real estate, their resources nevertheless consist especially in the shares of the social budgets that flow to them for services rendered. However, because these budgets are in the administration of the state or of regional corporations, services must be extensively rendered in religious neutrality. This leads to an organizational, as well as ideological, independence of the charitable organizations from the churches, which frequently continue to be bound with one another only by way of rhetorical attachments. The public only rarely notices the independence of these bodies. Thus, the churches appear to be vehicles of social service work, and this occasions the urge to claim to be financing these activities with moneys from the collections, which actually are applied almost exclusively for a church's religious purposes.

Economic Ethics of the Religions

4. Considering the basic importance of concrete economics for people of all times, it is not surprising that religious systems issue declarations on the economies. The administrators of the respective religions are decisive for the direction of these declarations. With newly forming religions—as has occurred with Buddhism and Christianity—the first administrative classes did not belong to the economic elite, but were instead 'intellectuals.' One of the results of this state of affairs is an indifference to economic activity, together with a warning against too close an entanglement in worldly affairs, and against the dangers of wealth. Consequently, one notes a rather negative attitude, in these cases, toward economic innovations. Religions that can look back on a long history and appeal to sources that have come into existence in an early phase of that history, often develop the inclination to idealize the economic conditions of that time, without taking it into consideration that relationships actually never corresponded to the ideal. Such tendencies are recognizable even in the Hebrew Bible, in criticisms by some of the prophets (Amos) of an urbanization of economic patterns. Especially in situations of crisis, a religious argument returns to the supposedly good order of the past as a plausible solution for problems.

Generally, the 'world religions' regard a full merger with economic activity rather negatively. In a religion-based hierarchy of purposes, spiritual religious needs take precedence over purely material ones. But this does not prevent the mass of followers from placing economic interests in the foreground and aiming at religious purposes only toward the end of their lives. In Hinduism, an ideal life course is configured in four phases that a man ought to traverse. After the second phase, that of householder, which is devoted to the founding of a family and to economic activity, the last two phases belong to spiritual contemplation and withdrawal from active life. The high appraisal of the reflective (contemplative) life over the active life probably has no religious roots, but goes back to the early division between spiritual and corporal work.

Religion cannot actually become one of the drives toward an income-centered economic activity. In the few instances in which this nevertheless seems to be the case, it has happened along a rather indirect path. It was never a matter of direct encouragement to acquire riches, but of criticism of a lopsided higher appraisal of the contemplative life, with a simultaneous devaluation of the active life. The Reformers' religiously founded polemic against the monastic life, and the division of the clergy from the laity, led to a certain release of economic activity from the pressure of having to be justified. Relationships lie entirely differently when, either voluntarily (Jains) or under compulsion (Jews in Germany before Emancipation), members of a religion were confined to certain occupations, often in trade, and perfected a specific rationality for these trades. There is scarcely any evidence in the history of religions for economic success as a good to be pursued religiously. It steps forward rather as a concomitant phenomenon, for example in the expectation that, for one who leads a life pleasing to God, God will provide that all things emerge successfully in this world as well (→ Capitalism, Max → Weber). Only in the circles of new religions, for instance in Japan and in the United States (→ Scientology), worldly success can be regarded as part of a holistic concept intended to neutralize the dualistic tendency of the great religions that differentiate between true life and earthly existence.

Literature

Adams, Robert M., Finite and Infinite Goods: A Framework for Ethics, New York 1999; Brennan, H. Geoffrey/Waterman, A. M. C. (eds.), Economics and Religion: Are They Distinct?, Boston/Dordrecht 1994; Dean, James M./Waterman, A. M. C. (eds.), Religion and Economics: Normative Social Theory, Boston/Dordrecht 1999; Linders, Tullia/Alroth, Brita (eds.), Economics of Cult in the Ancient Greek World, Uppsala 1992; Little, Lester K., Religious Poverty and the Profit Economy in Medieval Europe, London 1978; Neusner, Jacob (ed.), Religious Belief and Economic Behaviour, Atlanta 1999; Oslington, Paul (ed.), Economics and Religion, Cheltenham etc. 2003; Stark, Rodney/Finke, Roger, Acts of Faith: Explaining the Human Side of Religion, Berkeley etc. 2000; Weber, Max, Gesammelte Aufsätze zur Religionssoziologie, 3 vols., Tübingen 1920–1921; Wilson, Rodney, Economics, Ethics and Religion: Jewish, Christian and Muslim Economic Thought, New York 1997.

→ Capitalism, Charitable Organizations, Everyday Life, Exchange/Gift, Interest, Secularization, Weber, Work

Günter Kehrer

Ecstasy

Unlike → enthusiasm, when God or the Spirit enters human beings, in ecstasy (Gk., ek-stasis, 'standing out of') human beings 'leave' themselves, so that they lose consciousness and self-control. The concept is variously differentiated. In the psychological sense, euphoria (→ Emotions/Feelings) can be included. The anthropology of religion has especially described the techniques of the release of the spirit or → soul from the body by dance, rhythm, or drugs. In a context of the history of religions, the application in Neo-Platonism is even more specific. Neo-Platonism labels the way of the soul from this world into the other, for example in mystical meditation, as the 'leaving.' (See the description of the related phenomena in terms of cultural studies, under 'Trance.')

→ Enthusiasm, Emotions/Feelings, Shamanism, Trance

Christoph Auffarth

Ecumenical Movement

'Oneness'

1. The Ecumenical Movement denotes the "movement of oneness and coming together of Christianity on earth" (R. V. Kienle). The goal of the Ecumenical Movement within Christianity is the re-gathering of splintered Christianity to the one, holy, apostolic, and universal church of Jesus Christ, in the common → Lord's Supper and the worldwide bond of love of all churches. Outside Christianity, the purpose of the movement is a worldwide understanding of cultures and races, regions and religions, ideologies and sciences, over humanity's common questions, needs, and tasks.

The Greek word oikouméne means first of all the inhabited earth, as contradistinguished from the wilderness. In Hellenistic culture, the geographical notion is connected with the religio-cultural and political concept of a "universally obligating community of human beings" (O. Michel). Later the idea of the community of peoples is transferred to the politico-legal configuration of the Imperium Romanum.

Primitive Christian Oikoumene

2. Jesus himself joined to his proclamation of the imminent Reign of God concepts whose point of departure was the eschatological mission of Israel to all peoples. Thus, the primitive Christian mission reached out beyond the Jewish communities into the → Diaspora, and to the very boundaries of the Empire. But the New Testament missionary command (Matt 28:19-20) burst the boundaries of Judaism. After Paul, the Gospel was addressed to all human beings. A network of communities sprang up all over the world: the oikoumene of the Christians.

Basic Problems of Christian Oikoumene

3. With its development into a universal religion, Christianity faced three special challenges: (1) The problem of its own identity: How can the original message be inculturated, in the most disparate cultures, without losing the connection with its origin? Even in New Testament times, church unity could be realized only as a broadly conceived 'synoptic' communality with the 'Jesus affair.' (2) The problem of exclusivity: Christianity understood itself as the eschatological, only true religion, to which the legacy—the promise to, and covenant with, the Jewish people—had finally been conveyed. In confrontation with non-Christian religions, at best only a polemical and defensive, apologetical self-presentation may be undertaken. (3) The problem of dogmatism: When Christianity was pronounced an authorized religion by Emperor Constantine, and, in 380, all citizens directed by Theodosius (by state law) to believe in it, Christianity was no unified, single movement. Schismatic by-churches and sects entwined the 'catholic' church. Only with the assistance of the first ecumenical councils (beginning with the Council of Nicaea, in 325) did the Emperors succeed in imposing a canon of right belief ('orthodoxy') and forming Christianity into a unified, single state religion. The ruler established by law what the correct faith was.

With this, the idea of a worldwide oikoumene was doubly abridged. It was restricted, first, to Christians, and then, to the membership of the Catholic (Orthodox) Church. But even with the means of the interdict, → Inquisition, and excommunication, the unity of the Church could not be compelled. In 1054, a schism occurred between the Greek and Latin Churches, and in 1518 the → Reformation began in Germany. Neither the Wars of Religion nor the Council of Trent (1545–1563)—despite mediators on both sides—succeeded in restoring unity. The Reformation churches gradually began to become → denominations. In the twentieth century, even the Roman Catholic Church began to show signs of dissolution, after it failed to react adequately to social change and the process of religious emancipation.

Oikoumene in the Twentieth Century

4. There had been repeated attempts to restore church unity. Only in the twentieth century, it is true, was there finally a comprehensive cultural globalization of Christianity, together with an assimilation of the insight that Christianity as a whole must leap the frontiers/borders of confessionalism. Since then, the concern of the ecumenical movement has been to bring the churches, confessions, and denominations together, into a world-encompassing, single church of all Christians. The ecumenical movement owes this breakthrough to two key events: (1) the 1948 founding of the World Council of Churches (WCC), with headquarters in Geneva, and (2) the Second Vatican Council of the Roman Catholic Church (1962–1965).

(1) In the WCC, four international ecumenical initiatives came together: the World Federation for Friendly Cooperation of the Churches, the International Missionary Council, and the World Conference of Practical Christianity combined in 1948 with the World Conference on Faith and the Constitution of the Churches. More than three hundred member churches in the WCC seek 'conciliar community' in practice and doctrine.

No world peace without peace among religions. The World Prayer Conference of October 27, 1986, marks an important step in this direction: at the invitation of Pope John Paul II, Buddhists, Hindus, Jains, Muslims, Shintoists, Sikhs, Parsees, Jews, Christians, and members of the so-called traditional religions gathered in Assisi for common prayer for peace.

Most Reformation churches of Western Europe have signed the (1972) Concord of Leuenberg and grant each other common and Eucharistic intercommunion.

(2) With its "Decree on Ecumenism," Vatican II gave the process of unification a decisive impetus. Dialogue commissions were erected among the churches that discussed all essential controversial questions (justification, sacraments, church, office). A consensus was found on most divisive questions, so that remaining differences need no longer be grounds for a separation of the churches. Actually, with regard to recognition of the offices and community of the Lord's Supper—unlike practical ecumenical cooperation 'on the spot'—the theological oikoumene has come to no significant consensus. The upshot is stagnation of the ecumenical movement. Dwindling membership is enticing the churches to seek a recovery of lost ground by 're-confessionalizing.'

Inter-religious Dialogue

5. The change to a multi-religious society alters the interest of ecumenism. The question of how people of different religio-cultural origins can build a common entity harmoniously is becoming more important than the ecumenical idea of the churches. Foundations for the dialogue are, on the Christian side, the declarations of Vatican II (1965) and the WCC (1981) on → freedom of religion and active tolerance. In 1993, meeting in Chicago, the Parliament of World Religions published its "Declaration on a World Ethos" as a contribution to the dialogue and a common basis of action. At present, a trend is appearing toward ecumenical movements in non-Christian religions as well, and the initiative for the inter-religious dialogue, which heretofore lay extensively with the Christian side, is being taken up by other religions.

Literature

Fitzgerald, Thomas E., The Ecumenical Movement: An Introductory History, Westport/London 2004; Gros, Jeffrey et al., Introduction to Ecumenism, New York 1998; Lossky, Nicholas et al. (eds.), Dictionary of the Ecumenical Movement, Geneva ²2002; Nurser, John, For All Peoples and All Nations: The Ecumenical Church and Human Rights, Washingon 2005; Rouse, Ruth et al. (eds.), A History of the Ecumenical Movement, Philadelphia 1967–1970.

→ Catholicism, Christianity, Church, Conflict/Violence, Peace, Protestantism

Urs Baumann

Egypt

Egypt in Western Memory

1. Egypt has been present in Europe's cultural memory from the beginning. European identity rests on the two broad religious and cultural bases of Greece and Israel (→ Palestine/Israel). Each culture, in confrontation with Egypt, developed contrasting images of its own that came to be of key meaning and importance, for both the Hellenistic and the Israelite self-concepts, respectively. The contradictory reception of Egypt has gained entry into European awareness of history, and its ambivalence has impregnated our view of Egypt to our very day. While Greeks and Romans stood in awe of its extended age and of the magnitude of its civilizing accomplishments, the Israelites wrote Egypt off, in the Second Book of Moses (Exodus), as a despotic, dictatorial state, caught in the religious errors of idolatry, magic, and worship of the dead.

2. The great age and cultural constancy of old Egypt is impressive. In around 3000 BCE, Egypt, with its 'imperial unification,' entered the world stage, and ended, after thirty dynasties, with the death of Cleopatra (VII) in 30 BCE. The violent unification of upper and lower Egypt into an empire used to be seen as the birth of the Egyptian state. Today it is known that this phenomenon was a long process rather than an event. Meanwhile, scholars posit a 'Zero Dynasty' of some 150 years for the time of transition from pre-history to history. The last hieroglyphic inscription to testify to ancient Egyptian religion is placed at 394 BCE, after which hieroglyphic writing sank into oblivion until Jean François Champollion began to decipher it once more (1822).

According to Herodotus, Egypt is a gift of the Nile. The geographical contrast between an upper-Egyptian valley in the South, and a flat lower-Egyptian Nile Delta in the North, between wilderness and fertile soil, extended to the ancient Egyptian image of the world, in which a whole basically consists of two parts. But what has stirred the most fascination from time immemorial, along with history and landscape, are Egypt's religious monuments: pyramids, temples, and subterranean grave installations, on which even the Greeks and Romans, like modern tourists, left their graffiti. The process of modern civilization has entailed the demystification of the world. Without a pole of transcendency to which to withdraw, human beings are delivered to the 'monstrous world' (Peter Sloterdijk). Nevertheless, they have a 'longing for meaning' (Peter Berger). In diametrical opposition stands the world of Egypt. Not democratic individualism, but a human god at the pinnacle of the power pyramid, stamps out the societal form. In Egypt, the secularization and demystification of modernity encounters a magical reverse image, in which everything is connected and reciprocally dependent, and in which a multiplicity of gods penetrate the world. The significance of Egypt refers to practically all objects, formations, and life forms, and, from an aesthetic perspective, generates a Gesamtkunstwerk ('total work of art'), and one reshaped in artistic productions of every sort to our very day. A mystery and a spell still seem to flow out of Egypt, to address, in exhibit and tourism, even a mass audience. The process of Egypt's → reception in the media, in which the difference to modernity and Christian piety is cunningly targeted, develops buzzwords like 'godlike rulers,' 'divinities in animal form,' and 'mysterious cult of the dead.'

Europe's Encounter with Egypt

3. In Europe's encounter with Egypt, two phases are to be distinguished: (a) antiquity, in which a confrontation with a still living culture took place, and (b) post-ancient Europe, in which Pharaonic Egypt has already perished.

Antiquity

a) In the astonished view of the Greeks, Egypt is the land of the sciences, of hidden knowledge (→ Atlantis; Esotericism), and art, but especially, that of recognition and reverence of the gods in mysterious cults (→ 'Mysteries'). Egypt's different appraisal of life and death, of the here below and the beyond, and—in close connection—the wish for immortality, struck the Greeks at once, as it has modern visitors. Antiquity's travelers in Egypt, Herodotus (in the fifth century BCE), Diodorus, and Strabo (both in the first century BCE) were fascinated by the animal cult alive at that time. The shock of the 'dog-headed gods' would long abide in Europe.

Middle Ages and Early Modern Times

b) In the Middle Ages, after acquaintance with Egyptian religion and culture had died and the pyramids were thought to have been Pharaoh's biblical granaries, knowledge about Egypt multiplied through the study of ancient authors by the humanists. This time, the interest of scholars and amateur archaeologists focused, on the one hand, on the investigation of the Pyramid of Cheops as the last wonder of the ancient world, and on the other, on the transmittal of Egypt's Hermetic tradition (→ Hermetism/Hermeticism; Esotericism). In the rediscovered, only conditionally Egyptian, writings of the Corpus Hermeticum, ascribed to Egyptian god Thot as Hermes Trismegistus, the humanists thought that they had found a key to Egypt's arcane teachings, mysteries, and alchemy. As a doctrine of the correspondence of macro- and microcosm and divine all-unity, Hermeticism was revived among the Rosicrucians of the seventeenth century and the Freemasons of the eighteenth and nineteenth (→ Freemasonry). The Freemasons, who saw Egypt as the cradle of the arcane sciences and the mysteries, likewise propagated the motif of the pyramids as locales of ordeal and initiation, as in the opera Zauberflöte (1791; Ger., "The Magic Flute"), of W. A. Mozart, well known to have been a member of a Freemasons' lodge. Confusing Islamic and Hermetic tradition, they supposed the Pyramid of Cheops to be undiscovered treasuries and records of all of the knowledge of the time. These notions and yearnings are still alive today, as mystics of the pyramids hold that secret data, even regarding atomic physics, are stored in the Pyramid of Cheops. Civilian travels, Napoleon's military expedition of 1798–1801—basic work, Description de l'Égypte (1804–1822; Fr., "Description of Egypt")—together with the deciphering of the hieroglyphics early in the nineteenth century, created the foundations of modern Egyptology. An 'Egyptomania' sprang up, drawing to Egypt not only droves of scientists, but plunderers and treasure seekers as well.

Ancient Egypt in the Twentieth Century

4. Modern Egyptology, partly by way of sensational excavations, such as the discovery in 1922 of the nearly intact tomb of Pharaoh Tutankhamen, but also through painstaking detail work on the sources in text and image, has been able to solve many of the riddles of Egyptian culture and religion, and revise earlier preconceptions. For example, Egyptians did not believe that their gods actually had the form of an animal, or—as in the typical composite form—a human body with the head of a beast. The composite form is to be read as an indicative sign ('ideogram'), whereby the head reflects the god's identifying attribute. The actual form of the gods was 'mysterious' and 'concealed.' The divine enjoys but transitory entry into images and sacred beasts, the intent of its sojourn being to keep the world in movement and operation. Only in the next world can human beings live in the presence of the gods. Besides the impressive funeral architecture of the pyramids and the cliff tombs, which at first was provided only for the Pharaoh as intermediary between gods and human beings, life after death presupposed the immortality of the body in the form of the mummy (→ Mummification). But the cult of the dead and existence in the hereafter were intelligible only in terms of the literature of the dead, such as the texts of pyramids and sarcophagi, along with the Book of the Dead and the books of the underworld. On the perilous trek of the dead in the beyond, maps and the Book of the Two Ways served as guides (→ Death and Dying).

Egypt's complex worlds of the beyond have been developed in novels, by authors like Franz Werfel (Jeremias: Höret die Stimme, 1937; Ger., "Jeremiah: Hear the Voice"), Gustav Meyrink (Das grüne Gesicht, 1916; Ger., "The Green Face"), or William Burroughs (Western Lands, 1987). The religious world of Egypt has offered a fascinating source of inspiration for literature, film, and cartoon strips even until today. Finally, as Roland Emmerich's → science-fiction film "Stargate" (1994) has shown, the images of Egypt are still transmitted, in their ambivalence of despotism and awe.

Literature

Assmann, Jan, The Mind of Egypt: History and Meaning in the Time of the Pharaohs, New York 2002 ([1]1996); Idem, Moses the Egyptian: The Memory of Egypt in Western Monotheism, Cambridge 1997; Daly, Martin W. (ed.), The Cambridge History of Egypt, Cambridge 1998; Hornung, Erik, History of Ancient Egypt, Edinburgh 1999 ([1]1978); Idem, The Secret Lore of Egypt: Its Impact on the West, Ithaca etc. 2001 ([1]1999); King, Joan Wucher, Historical Dictionary of Egypt, Metuchen 1984; Shaw, Ian (ed.), The Oxford History of Ancient Egypt, Oxford 2000; Trigger, Bruce Graham et al. (eds.), Ancient Egypt: A Social History, Cambridge 1983.

→ Antiquity, Death and Dying, Mummification, Reception

Edmund Hermsen

Egypt / Ancient Near East: Time Chart

Chronologies

1 a) Chronology of Egypt
(Following Jürgen von Beckerath: Chronologie des Pharaonischen Ägypten, Mainz 1997)

c. 6000 BCE	Badari cultures (A + B) in Egypt	Neolithic cultural groups; agriculture; ceramics; cemeteries with corpses on stools, and burial gifts.
c. 4000	Naqada cultures (I-III)	Continuation of burial cult; ceramics with images of animals; female idols, illustrations of ships; palace and ritual installations.
c. 3150	0 Dynasty (some 150 years)	Direct transition from the Naqada culture to the first pan-Egyptian rulers.
3032–2707	Ancient era: First and Second Dynasties	Discovery of hieroglyphic script and pottery shards; twelve-month calendar; central governmental administration; royal tombs.
2707–2170	Ancient Realm: Third to Eighth Dynasties	Pantheon of the gods; Sun God Re; erection of temples; complex notions of the hereafter; construction of the great pyramids.

c. 2604–2581	Cheops, Egyptian Chufu (Fourth Dynasty)	Builder of the largest pyramid (146 m), at Giza.
2367–2347	Unas (Fifth Dynasty)	Beginning with Unas, inscription of the pyramids with the “pyramid texts”; besides Re, Osiris, Ruler of the Dead, guarantees the continued existence of Pharaoh in the hereafter.
c. 2170–2020	First intermediate era (Ninth/Tenth Dynasties)	Collapse of the central administration; chaos.
2119–1794	Middle realm	Reorganization of the sacred royal realm; Amun Re as ‘King of the Gods’; Osiris cult in Abydos; era of classical literature.
1794–1550	Second intermediate era (Thirteenth–Seventeenth Dynasties)	Confusion of the throne; Hyksos rule; horse and chariot.
1550–1070	New Realm (Eighteenth–Twentieth Dynasties)	Egypt’s shining hour, and maximum extension; immense construction projects; underworld books, and Book of the Dead.
1504–1492	Thutmosis I (Eighteenth Dynasty)	Erection of the Temple of Amun in Karnak, and installation of royal burial places in the Valley of the Kings.
1351–1334	Amenophis IV (later Akhenaton)	Sole veneration of the Solar Disk (Aton); new residence in Tell el-Amarna; commemoration of Akhenaton in Egypt is completely extinguished after his death.

1279–1213	Ramses II (Nineteenth Dynasty)	Egypt's most celebrated pharaoh, ruled sixty-six years; the departure of the Israelites is said to have taken place under his rule.
1070–664	Third intermediate era (Twenty-First to Twenty-Fifth Dynasties)	Disintegration into two power centers, Tanis and Thebes; Lybian rule in Egypt.
664–332	Late Era (Twenty-Sixth to Thirty-First Dynasties)	In religion and art, an archaicizing return to more ancient eras; rule of the Persians.
332–30	Greek rule	Alexander the Great conquers Egypt; realm of the Ptolemies
30 BCE until 395 CE	Roman rule in Egypt	At first, temples continue to be built; but with the penetration of Christianity, the ancient Egyptian religion slowly dies out.
4^{th} cent. CE	Demise of the Egyptian religion	The year 394 CE is the date of the last hieroglyphic writing (in the Temple of Isis at Philae).
1 b) Chronology of the Ancient East (Mesopotamia, Persia)
c. 9000 BCE	Neolithic revolution	In the Middle East, especially in the mountains of Iran, transition to an agriculture of seasonal planting and harvests; wheat-planting, organized farming, domestication of animals. First settlements, with animal husbandry and orchards (Çatal Hüyük; Jericho).

c. 3000	Mesopotamia (Sumer and Akkad)	Invention of cuneiform writing; extensively independent city-states (temple cities); Eridu (founded 4000), Uruk, Kish, Ur, and Lagash; each city has its own god.
c. 2800	Gilgamesh, King of Uruk	The Epic of Gilgamesh, which takes its name from this ruler, addresses the question of death: first written copy c. 2000 BCE (Sumerian, later Akkadian).
2334–2279	Sargon, First Dynasty of Akkad	Sargon unites Babylonia; Akkadian language; pantheon of the gods: Anu, Enlil, Ea, as well as Sin, Shamash, and Ishtar (Akkadian, by adoption of Sumerian deities).
2112–2004	Third Dynasty of Ur ('Sumerian Renaissance')	Last Sumerian realm; subsequently, degeneration into rival city-states.
1792–1750 (1696–1654)	Hammurabi of Babylon; First Dynasty of Babylon	Renewed unification of the realm; important collections of laws; Codex Hammurabi; Marduk, city god of Babylon, becomes First God of the Pantheon (creation myth: Enuma Elish, 1100 BCE).

912–891	Adad Nerari II (New Assyrian Empire to about 625)	Beginning with this Assyrian ruler, Babylonia finds itself under Assyrian control; Assyria rises to the status of world ruler; god Assur now corresponds to god Marduk.
625–539	Late Babylonian Empire	Rule of the Aramaic Chaldeans; rebuilding and last flowering of Babylon.
604–562	Nebuchadnezzar II	Conquest of Jerusalem, 597 BCE; Babylonian Captivity of the Jews.
c. 700–330	Achaemenides rule in Persia	Beginning in the third millennium BCE, the Achaemenides join themselves to the Realm of Elam in Persia; development of Zoroastrianism; god: Ahura Mazda; priests are called 'magi'; literature of gatha ('songs').
539	Cyrus II conquers Babylon	After the Persian conquest, Babylonia diminishes in importance; Jews are released from their Babylonian Exile.
336–330	Darius III is defeated by Greek Alexander	Last ruler of the Persian Empire, which, with the help of satraps from the Balkans, extends through Kush to the Indus River.
321/312–264	Seleucids in Persia	Despite Hellenism, Iranian traditions are preserved.

c. 247 BCE–226 CE	Arsakid rule	Avesta, foundation stone of Zoroastrianism; dualistic image of the world; development of a Zoroastrian apocalypticism; cult of Mithras.
224–651 CE	Sassanid rule	Zoroastrianism as the state religion.
7th cent.	Islamization of Iran	Followers of Zoroastrianism flee to India (Parsism; → Zoroastrianism).

1 c) History of Reception of the Cultures and Religions of Egypt and the Ancient East

Era 1: The Travelers of Antiquity (Greeks and Romans), fifth cent. BCE to fourth cent. CE

Since the middle of the 5th cent. BCE	Greeks discover Egypt and the Ancient East for Europe	Reception of the Ancient East and Egypt begins with Herodotus (484–425), the Ionian Greek who writes the Histories, with reports on Persians and Egyptians; further chroniclers: Diodorus and Strabo.
c. 46–120 CE	Plutarch, priest of the Apollo Sanctuary in Delphi	Plutarch travels Egypt, and composes books on the ancient Egyptian religion. His book on Isis and Osiris is renowned.
391 CE	Closing of all temples, demise of the ancient Eastern religions	With Christianity now the state religion, a decree of Emperor Theodosius I proscribes the temple cult.

Era 2: Rediscovery of the Ancient East, Egypt, and Antiquity in Renaissance and Modernity, Fifteenth to Eighteenth centuries
since the 15th cent.	Flourishing of → Hermetism/Hermeticism, → Kabbalah, → astrology, → magic, and alchemy	In the Renaissance, the key figures of primordial wisdom are Iranian Zoroaster, Egyptian Greek Hermes Trismegistus (Corpus Hermeticum, first–second centuries CE), and Egyptian Thot.
16th/17th cent.	First scholarly travel-report on the Ancient East and Egypt	Pietro della Valle visits Babylon (1616); Jean de Thevenot (1633–1667) explores the Ancient East and Egypt; with the seventeenth century, a great wave of travel commences.
1791	Die Zauberflöte (Ger., “The Magic Flute”; W. A. Mozart) —Pyramids and Initiation	The opera develops ideas of Freemason Ignaz von Born (Über die Mysterien der Ägypter [Ger., “Mysteries of the Egyptians”; 1784]).
End of 18th cent.	Enthusiasm for Egypt (onset of ‘Egyptomania’)	Egypt attracts ever more visitors; Napoleon, in 1784, explores Egypt with military might and scholarly competency.
Era 3: Nineteenth and Twentieth Centuries: Decoding of the Languages, Excavations, Mass Tourism since 1810	Egypt is plundered, but systematic excavations also begin.	Adventurers, treasure-hunters, and plunderers establish, with their spoils, the Egyptian collections of European museums (Louvre/Paris, British Museum/London, Museo Egizio/Turin, Egyptian Museum/Berlin). Simultaneously, the excavations of ancient Egyptian memorials begin.

1809–1822	Description de l'Égypte (Fr.)	Nine volumes of text and eleven volumes of illustrations from Napoleon's expedition yield the beginnings of Egyptology.
1822	Deciphering of the hieroglyphics by Jean-François Champollion (1790–1832)	Champollion's achievement makes it possible to read Egyptian testimonials in the original for the first time since antiquity.
1847–1850	Finds of Nineveh and Nimrud	The Assyrian palaces become a sensation in Europe.
1851–1853	Deciphering of the cuneiform script	The accomplishments of Henry C. Rawlinson (1810–1895) and Edward Hincks (1792–1866) become the foundation of Assyriology.
Round 1900	Babylon is excavated	Pan-Babylonianism: All cultures are supposed to have come from Babylon; the Bible-Babel dispute calls the Christian Bible into question.
1922	Grave of Tutankhamun discovered	Howard Carter and his patron, Lord Carnarvon, excavate the first undisturbed burial site of a pharaoh. The opening of the tomb becomes a worldwide media event.

20th cent.	Myth of Egypt	Ancient Egypt is present in all media; excavations yield more and more discoveries; mass tourism in Egypt.

Edmund Hermsen

Festal Calendar of Ancient Egypt

1. Festal Typology

In Egypt, the following kinds of festivals were distinguished: (a) the Festivals of the Month ('Feasts of the Sky') and (b) the Festivals of the Year ('Feasts of the Course of Time'). There were, besides, (c) the Royal Festivals, and finally, (d) the daily Temple Ritual.

a) The 'Feasts of the Sky' (ḥbw nw pt) were festivals of the month, related to the lunar-stellar (sidereal) calendar (observation of the phases of the moon). The festivals of the month were purely temple festivals, and as a rule were observed for one day only. On the first day of the first month of Achet (July 19 in the Julian Calendar, the end of June in the Gregorian), the New Year's Feast 'Emergence of Sothis' (prt Spḏt) or 'Opening of the Year' (wpt-rnpt) was observed. Recurring lunar feasts were the 'New Moon Feast' (psḏntjw), which was observed on the day on which the waning moon was no longer visible, and the 'Full Moon Feast' (jʿḥ wr). There were still other lunar feasts, depending on region and era: under Thutmosis III, twenty-eight lunar feasts were celebrated in Karnak.
b) The 'Feasts of the Course of Time' (ḥbw tp trw) were Festivals of the Year that return in the cycle of the solar year, and were related to the 'ordinary year' (see Survey below). As a rule, Festivals of the Year were celebrated as processional festivals, and lasted several days. The typical time-span of a festival period comprised a decade, which combined an Egyptian workweek of ten days with a festival day.
c) The 'Royal Festivals' included the Feast of the Ascent the Throne, of the Coronation, and the Sed Feast. As a ritual of the renewal of the power of the King, the Sed Feast (ḥb-sd) regularly occured thirty years after the Enthronement, as a Festival of Jubilee, and if repeated, occured the second time three years after the first festival, for the Thirty-Third Jubilee.
d) The daily temple ritual represented the cultic center of the old Egyptian religion, and was performed every day in the temples of Egypt.

2. The Egyptian Calendar
The festival cycle referred to the Egyptian calendar, and rested on the vegetation cycle. It commenced with the beginning of the annual flooding of the Nile. Three seasons were distinguished, each with four months of thirty days apiece. In addition, five additional or 'switch' days (epagomenoi) occured, so that the Egyptian year comprised 365 days.

The seasons were called
- Achet (Flooding Season, July to October);
- Peret (Sowing Season, November to February);
- Shemu (Harvest Season, March to June).

The seasons were subdivided into the twelve months of the flexible ('moving') Year:
- The months of the Flooding Season were (1) Thot, (2) Paophi, (3) Athyr, and (4) Choiak.
- The months of the Sowing Season were called (5) Tybi, (6) Mechir, (7) Phamenoth, and (8) Pharmuthi.
- The Harvest Months were (9) Pachons, (10) Payni, (11) Epiphi, and (12) Mesore.

Many monthly names were formed from the respective festal designations.

The Egyptian calendar took no note of quarter-days, nor, then, did it have a leap year. As a result, in the course of time, the lunar calendar and the succession of years were less and less in agreement. The New Year festival drifted in the lunistellar calendar, being determined by the first rising of Sothis (Sirius), which announced the beginning of the Nile flooding. The succession of years, however, remained unaltered. Only after a 'Sothis period' of 1460 years did both New Year's days agree once more. This occurred in the 139th year CE, which was honored by the minting of a special coin. Egypt's chronology is determined by the Sothis period.

3. Course of the Festivals, and the Festal Liturgy
Feasts were bound up with sacrifices, and were celebrated as ritual. Every feast included a sacrificial round, at the conclusion of which offerings of foodstuffs were distributed to the population. A normal monthly festival meant 84 loaves of bread. At the Festival of Sokar, the number was some 4,000. Daily worship was completely enclosed in the Temple; thus, processional festivals were of extraordinary importance, observed as they were outside the Temple, in public. For the people, festivals constituted the sole opportunity for active participation in religious life. Thus, religious feasts tended to be popular festivals, with the crowds of people maintained gratis on both sides of the festival street, with presentations in the form of dancing, theater, and 'battles.' At processional feasts, the gods were taken from a temple in their barks. Major festivals gained even more importance and meaning in the personal appearance of the King. In addition, processional festivals provided believers with the opportunity to address with questions the sacred image of the god, which stood as an oracle in the midst of the celebration. The oracle responded only with 'yes' or 'no' decisions, in the bending of the shrine of the bark, which was carried by the priests, forward or backward. A motion to the fore meant yes, one to the rear meant no.

At numerous festivals, such as at the feasts of Sokar or Min, reference is made to a seasonal nature cycle. Plowing, sowing, and harvest were observed with their respective special festival days. The best-known processional feasts are the feasts Opet and Tal, in the Thebes of the New Kingdom, at whose midpoint stand the god Amun, as well as the King. The chief event of the Feast of Opet was the ritual emergence of the images of the gods from the Temple of Karnak to the Temple of Luxor, some three kilometers south (Festival of the Visit). Originally, the images of the gods were borne, in their barks, by pack animals, along a processional street, with the opportunity to question the oracles, to Luxor, and then back again to Karnak. Later, the sacred images executed their duty with boat trips on the Nile. The 'Sacred Wedding' was held, of Amun and the mother of the reigning pharaoh. At the Feast of the Valley (or Festival of the Desert Valley), the same sacred images journeyed to the royal Temple of the Dead, standing opposite the banks of the Nile. The Feast of the Valley was also the Theban Festival of the Dead, at which a nightly burial was performed, in the graves of the Necropolis in Western Thebes. The Festival of the Dead was a meeting between the living and the deceased.

Survey: The Most Important "Festivals of the Course of Time" (Annual Festivals)

Date of the Egyptian Calendar	Festal Type / Festal Deity	Festal Name	Festal Duration and Function
Festivals of the Time of Flooding (achet), July to October
Thot 1	New Year's Festival (wpt mpt)	Birthday of Re (-Harachte) (mswt R^{c}-Ḥrw-3ḫtj)	Festal duration 5 days in all
Thot 19/20	Festival of Thot (Ḏḥwtjt)	Festival of Inebriation (tḫj)	Festival of Gladness, 2 days
Paophi 15	Festival of Opet (p3 n jpt) in Thebes	Earlier "Festival of Ptah" Ptḥ rsj jnbw.t)	11 days and longer
Athyr 29	Festival of Hathor (ḥb Ḥwt-ḥrw)	Festival of the Lady of Dendera (ḥb ntb Jwnf) Manifestation of Hathor (ḫ^{c}jt njt Ḥwt-ḥrw)	In the Hathor Temple of Dendera the festival went on for a month

Date of the Egyptian Calendar	Festal Type / Festal Deity	Festal Name	Festal Duration and Function
Choiak 25/26	Festival of Sokar (ḥb Skr), in the late era superimposed by the Mysteries of Osiris	Consists of several individual festivals: esp. 4.22, Festival of Hoeing (ḥb ẖbs t3); 4.30, Erection of the Djed Column (sʿḥʿ ḏd)	The Sokar Festival can last, in all, Cholak 18-30; the Mysteries of Osiris were celebrated Cholak 12-30
Festivals of the Time of Harvest (schemu), March to June
Pachons 1	Festival of Renenutet (ḥb Rnnwtt)	Birthday of Corn God Nepri (mswt Nepr)	Old Harvest Thanksgiving Festival
Pachons 15	Festival of Min (ḥb Mnw)	Stair Festival of Min (prt Mnw r ẖt)	Harvest and Coronation Festival, several festal days
New moon of Payni	Festival of the Valley (p3-n-jnt)	The 'Lovely Festival of the Desert Valley' (ḥb nfr n p3jnt)	Festival of the Dead, of at least 2 days' duration
Intercolation or 'Connection' Days (Epagomenen; Egypt. ḥrjw-mpt) between end of year and new year	Birthdays of the Gods (mswt nṯrw)	1st Connection Day: Osiris (wswt Wsjr) 2nd Connection Day: Horus (mswt Ḥr) 3rd Connection Day: Seth (mswt Stẖ) 4th Connection Day: Isis (mswt 3st) 5th Connection Day: Nephthis (mswt Nbt-ḥwt)	The Rites of the Arraying and Anointing of the Images of the Gods, as well as the offering of sacrifice on the epagomens serve as the preparation of the New Year's Festival, on which the Supreme God of the respective temple 'makes an appearance.'

Survey: The Egyptian Cult of the Gods (alphabetically, by selection from the Festal Calendar

God/dess	Presentation/ Attribute	Principal Place of Cult or Worship	Festivals	Functions
Amun (Jmn)	Human form with tall crown of feathers	Thebes (W3st)	Opet Festival and Valley Festival in Thebes, festivals in Karnak and Medinet Habu	'All-God,' as the 'Hidden' God of the Wind
Hathor (Ḥwt-ḥrw)	Female form with cow horns and sun disk, or as a cow	Dendera (Jwnt)	Hathor Festival, temple festivals in Dendera	Mother Goddess, Goddess of the Sky, of Love, and of the Dead; 'All-Goddess'
Horus (Ḥr)	Human being with falcon-head, or falcon	Hieraconopolis (Gk., 'Falcon City,' Egypt. Nḫn), Edfu (Ḏb3)	Birth of Horus (Connection Day 2), temple festivals in Edfu	God of Sky and of King
Isis (3st)	Female-formed with throne-sign	Island of Philae, at Assuan	Birth of Isis (Connection Day 4), Mysteries of Isis	Throne Goddess, Mother Goddess, Mistress of Enchantment, the 'Many-Shaped'
Min (Mnw)	God with an erect phallus	Koptos (Gbtjw), Achmim (Jpw)	Festival of Min (Festival of Fertility)	'Lord of the Power of Generation'

God/dess	Presentation/ Attribute	Principal Place of Cult or Worship	Festivals	Functions
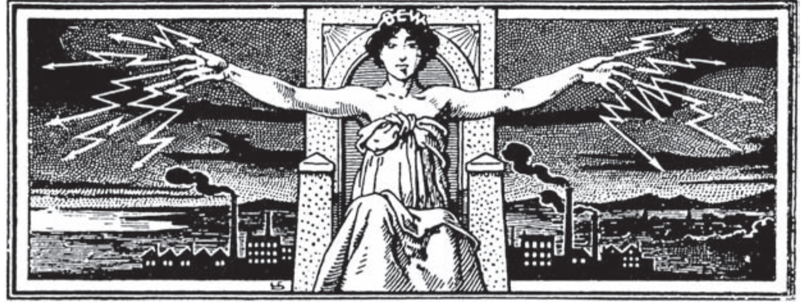
Osiris (Wsjr)	Human form with a crooked staff and a scourge	Abydos (3bḏw); later, the Nile island of Bigge (Abaton)	Celebration of Osiris in Abydos, Mysteries of Osiris in Choiak	God of the Dead, 'Lord of Eternity'
Ptah (Ptḥ)	Human form, disjointed, with cap or hood on head	Memphis (Mn-nfr)	Festival of Ptah, temple festivals in Memphis	God of Artisans, God the Creator
Re (*R*ᶜ)	Human form with sun disk	Heliopolis/ On (Jwnw)	Birth of the Sun (Festival of the New Year)	Sun God, Preserver of the World
Renenutet (Rnnwtt)	Cobra, or woman with cobra's head	Medinet Madi (Ḏ3)	Festival of Renenutet (Festival of the Harvest)	Goddess of Fertility and the Harvest, Protective Goddess of Pharaoh
Sokar (Skr)	Falcon, or human form with falcon head	Memphis (Mn-nfr)	Festival of Sokar	God of the Necropolises and the Dead
Thot (Ḏḥwtj)	Human form with head of Ibis, Ibis, or Pavian	Hermepolis (Ḫmnw)	Festival of Thot	God of the Moon, God of the Art of Writing and of Wisdom

Edmund Hermsen

Electricity

1. With the discovery of electricity and magnetism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the → European history of religion changed, too, with the new bands of attachment between the sciences on the one side and religious patterns on the other. Attraction or repulsion, energy working at a distance (or arriving via other objects), and, finally, even experimental little bolts of lightning could now be generated, and they supplied fundamentally new 'plausibility schemata' for areas until now fixedly



Around 1900, the image of electricity as the energy of life was captured in the gigantic halo of a leaping spark: Attractio electrica and life-dispensing rays unite the fingertips of the pair lying facing each other, as if in an act of creation. The larger-than-life insulators represent the controllability of the event.

occupied by religion. The thunderbolt as divine weapon and arm of punishment was the important object of an 'atomistic explanation' as early as the first century BCE, at the hands of Lucretius.[1] Fine atoms of fire squeeze out of the clouds, and this is merely a phenomenon of nature. The lightning bolt is neither a punishment, nor a sign, nor indeed an instrument of the might of the gods. Action at a distance, as theoretical groundwork of magical practice, is called in question in atomistics just as basically: Lucretius, like Epicurus, tenaciously held the 'immediate contact' as the groundwork of any and every effect.

From Antiquity to Romanticism

2. In classical antiquity, certain observations as to the power of attraction of lodestone (magnetic stone) and crushed amber (in Gk., électron) are set forth as argument for the ensoulment of these stones. According to Aristotle, in his On the Soul, chap. 12, Ionian philosopher of nature Thales of Miletus (c. 625–547 BCE) ascribed a → soul to lodestone, "because it moves iron." In early modernity, William Gilbert (De Magnete, London, 1600) coined the new name, vis electrica (Lat., 'amber force'), for the electric and magnetic phenomena that he had observed and had evaluated as an 'independent natural force,' reverting to the ancients for his designations. The (often public) experiments of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries—especially in a framework of physico-theology, as it was called—with electrical phenomena of all sorts then delivered schemata of meaning for the most varied claims and effects. Now the action and presence of God in the world were no longer developed on the ancient symbolism of light and its metaphysics, but could receive an entirely different system of relations. The systems of symbols thus designed differ from traditional light symbolism on one point, basically: they no longer appeal to everyday experiences and their plausibility, but—working with current science only—were present at the laboratory tables of gigantic scholars. Theological outsiders like Athanasius Kircher, Divisch, or Friedrich Christoph Oetinger, extensively invoked electrical phenomena of the laboratory table for the interpretation of the Bible: "The great 'electrician' Divisch reached out for the works of God, took sacred scripture as his norm, and discovered what excels all metaphysics," Oetinger notes,[2] inaugurating something like a 'theology of electricity.' Permeating the whole was a demonstrative dealing with electricity, one that bound together 'fear and method': Johann Konrad Gütle sent lightning bolts to strike little model houses, which then actually burned. But when they had a lightning rod installed, an astonished audience could witness lightning generation and lightning shield all at once.[3]

A Diva Electrica, enthroned, with the initials of the power plant as her divine crown and the mantle of the gods on her knees, slings thunderbolts of benediction over an industrial landscape. The result is not punishment and annihilation, but smoking chimneys and sparkling cities. For this is the might of the gods, controlled.

Physico-theologian Gütle played a typical double role in dealings with electricity: the subjection and demystification of nature were presented complementarily. Ernst Benz had shown, for this field of scientific and religious development, "how the discovery of electricity in the course of the eighteenth century [. . .] brought with it an extremely important reversal of the structure of the concept of God, of the contemplation of God in the world, and consequent upon this new idea of God, also a fully new understanding of the relationship of soul and corporality, spirit and matter, life and substance."[4]

In a framework of Romantic science the association of nature, life, and electricity were interpreted anew and inducted into the speculative conglomerate of galvanism, mesmerism, and magnetism. With the collapse of Romanticism as a scientific movement, this field of a direct encounter between scientific concepts and 'religion' came to an end.

3. The rapprochement of religion and 'electricity,' which had been sought for a short term in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, comes to a fairly abrupt halt with the nineteenth century. The orientation patterns and interpretation schemata changed and broadened: energy, fields, and waves were understood to deliver the new, frankly more complex phenomena of relations, interpretable by religion. Even a "modernization of magic" (H. Knoblauch) overreaches a 'theology of electricity': energy fields of all kinds successively surpass the 'magic of the material.' Around the turn of the century, with the invention of the 'electric light,' with light bulbs and street lights, one last 'thrust to mythologization' is observed, climaxing about the time of the 1900 World's Fair in Paris, and returning to images created by the ancients (see pictures). In the interpretational schema of dynamism (→ Power), the paradigm of 'electricity' in religious studies retained up to the middle of the twentieth century a certain currency for the interpretation of foreign and ancient religions.

1. Lucretius, De Rerum Natura (Lat., "The Nature of Reality"), book 6, nos. 96-422.
2. Cf. Benz 1970, 86.
3. A. Rüger, "Populäre Naturwissenschaft in Nürnberg am Ende des 18. Jahrhunderts," in: Berichte zur Wissenschaftsgeschichte 5 (1982), 173-191.
4. Benz 1970, 6.

Literature

Primary Source: Priestley, Joseph, The History and Present State of Electricity: With Original Experiments, London 1767.

Secondary Literature: Asendorf, Christoph, Batterien der Lebenskraft. Zur Geschichte der Dinge und ihrer Wahrnehmung im 19. Jahrhundert, Gießen 1984; Idem, Ströme und Strahlen. Das langsame Verschwinden der Materie um 1900, Gießen 1989; Benz, Ernst, Theologie der Elektrizität. Zur Begegnung und Auseinandersetzung von Theologie und Naturwissenschaft im 17. und 18. Jahrhundert, Abh. Akademie Mainz, geistes- und sozialwiss. Kl. 1970, 12 (Engl. as The Theology of Electricity: On the Encounter and Explanation of Theology and Science in the 17th and 18th Centuries, Allison Park 1989); Gladigow, Burkhard, "Naturwissenschaftliche Modellvorstellungen in der Religionswissenschaft zwischen den beiden Weltkriegen," in: Kippenberg, Hans G./Luchesi, Brigitte (eds.), Religionswissenschaft und Kulturkritik, Marburg 1991, 177-192; Goodrick-Clarke, Nicholas, "The Esoteric Uses of Electricity: Theologies of Electricity from Swabian Pietism to Ariosophy," in: Aries. Journal for the Study of Western Esotericism 4,1 (2004), 69-90.

→ Light/Enlightenment, Power, Science

Burkhard Gladigow

Eliade, Mircea

Between Academy and Fiction

Born in Bucharest, Romania, in 1907 Mircea Eliade began to write imaginative fiction at the age of 12. In 1925 he enrolled in the department of philosophy of the University of Bucharest and his thesis of 1928 examined 'Contributions to Renaissance Philosophy' including Marsilio Ficino, Pico della Mirandola, and Giordano Bruno. With a licentiate degree and a grant from the Maharaja of Kassimbazar to study in India, Eliade left Romania in 1928 with the hope of 'universalizing' 'provincial' Western philosophy. He studied Sanskrit and Indian philosophy at the University of Calcutta under Surendranath Dasgupta. He traveled around India, visiting sites of religious interest, participating in the Kumbh-Mela festival at Allahabad, staying at the Svarga Ashram at Rishikesh under swami Shivananda, and returning to Bucharest in 1932. He submitted his analysis of Yoga as his doctoral thesis at the Philosophy department in 1933. Published in French as Yoga: Essai sur les origines de la mystique Indienne (1936) this text was revised and became one of his major works, Yoga, Immortality, and Freedom.

Shortly after returning to Bucharest the publication of his novel, Maitreyi (1933) assured Eliade's stature as a best-selling novelist in Romania. He continued to write fiction in Romanian after moving to the United States; however, he did not advertise his literary accomplishments to his Anglophone readership and his fiction remains largely unpublished in English, although there are significant exceptions, including the novel he regarded as his chef d'oeuvre, The Forbidden Forest. Eliade's fiction utilizes a dialectic of realism and fantasy, comparable to 'magic realism.' His most common technique is to write in a realistic manner but gradually to introduce fantastic elements until the world of the commonplace is transformed into some mythic realm. However, some of his work is entirely fantastic while other novels are apparently realistic, as is his Forbidden Forest.

Politics

Eliade lectured at the University of Bucharest from 1934 to 1938 and became involved in politics. Between 1936–1938 he wrote journalistic articles in support of the Legion of the Archangel Michael, an ultra-rightist group, founded by C. Z. Codreanu in 1927. Eliade was imprisoned as a result of this support, but was released without charges after four months. After 1938 he no longer gave any public support to the Legion. Claims have been made that Eliade ran for public office with the legionary party, and his legionary connections have led to accusations of fascism and anti-Semitism, but conclusive evidence is lacking. During the war he was appointed to the Romanian Legations in London and Lisbon and after 1945 he stayed in Paris, teaching part-time at the Sorbonne and composing some of his most influential work including Patterns in Comparative Religion (1949), a synchronous, morphological compilation of religious motifs; The Myth of the Eternal Return (1949), which he considered subtitling "An Introduction to the Philosophy of History," develops his argument that homo religiosus experiences time as heterogeneous; Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy (1951) popularized shamanism as a universal form of religious behavior; and The Sacred and the Profane (1957) is a response to Rudolf Otto's The Idea of the Holy (1917; → Holy), in which Eliade claims that the sacred is not only the opposite of the profane but is constituted by a dialectic in which the sacred is both concealed in and reveal by the profane.

History of Religions

In 1956, at the prompting of Joachim Wach, Eliade was invited to lecture on "Patterns of Initiation" at the University of Chicago, and on Wach's death in 1958 Eliade assumed the chair of the History of Religions department there. Here he founded the journals History of Religions and The Journal of Religion, and was editor-in-chief of Macmillan's sixteen volume Encyclopedia of Religion. He also published A History of Religious Ideas (1978–1985), a three-volume chronology of religious ideas, complementary to Patterns in Comparative Religion. Through these activities, other publications, and his tuition of a generation of successful scholars, he was, from the early 1960s through the 1970s, the most influential single figure in the History of Religions in the United States. He died in Chicago in 1986.

Eliade argued that myth and ritual allow an eternal return to a realm of renewable sacred time (illud tempus) and thus protect religious humanity against the 'terror of history,' an existential anxiety in the face of the absolute 'givenness' of historical time. He undermined the religious/non-religious distinction, however, by insisting that non-religious humanity in any pure sense is non-existent. Myth and illud tempus exist concealed in the world of 'non-religious' humanity. Eliade set himself against historicism (→ History), insisting that the → time of human experience is irreducible to 'historical' time. He defined → religion in terms of a relation to the 'sacred,' and the precise nature of this concept has been a subject of contention. Some see it as corresponding to a conventional concept of deity, like Otto's ganz Andere. Others see a closer resemblance to Durkheim's social sacred. Eliade identifies the sacred and the real, yet states that "the sacred is a structure of human consciousness." Thus the sacred is simultaneously a structure of consciousness and the source of significance, and its manifestations are seen as appearances of the holy, of power, or of Being (hierophanies, cratophanies, or ontophanies).

The Sacred

Eliade never systematized his position and there has been wide disagreement over its value, from a crucial contribution to our understanding to an obscurantist proposal of unacceptable normative assumptions. However, his identification of the sacred with the real places individual human apprehensions of the sacred on an initially equal level with respect to the real, rather than assuming any particular apprehension to have a privileged access to the real. Insofar as mythical entities and events have a real effect on the existential situation of believers, they are regarded as real/sacred entities and events. Believers are prepared by their lived experience and religious background to apprehend the real/sacred in the historical/profane. It is indispensable to Eliade's analysis that any historical entity could be apprehended as such a hierophany and that all hierophany must be mediated through historical realities. His conclusion is that all beings reveal, but at the same time conceal, the nature of Being. He attempted to recover particular meanings of hierophanies for those who apprehend them by applying concepts from the German hermeneutical tradition going back to Schleiermacher and Dilthey and continued by Wach and Gerardus van der Leeuw. Eliade agrees that religious data are intelligible because, as human expressions, they are coherent with our own → experience. Although he is often identified as a phenomenologist he frequently insisted that he was a phenomenologist only insofar as he sought to discover these meanings. In considering Eliade's sources and influences it should be borne in mind that his openness to Asian philosophy and his origins in the Eastern Orthodox Christian tradition clearly influence his understanding. It may well be his greatest contribution to the understanding of religions that he combines all of these influences in a pluralistic philosophy of religion that takes all cultural traditions seriously as authentic expressions of genuine existential situations.

Homo Religiosus

Writing on the subject of religion in this way it is perhaps no surprise that Eliade himself was seen as a religious figure. He argued that "to be—or to become—a man is to be religious" (Quest, preface), that is, he insisted upon the ubiquity of homo religiosus and the final impossibility of the entirely 'secular,' 'modern,' supposedly non-religious, human. Thus it is entirely consistent that he is himself religious in some way, and yet his early writings reveal a modernist, scientific bent. Although he was convinced of the importance of both traditional religions and folk traditions, he was unable to accept mysteries or dogmas surpassing rational explanation. In an interview with Chicago magazine shortly before his death (1986) Eliade said that "like everybody else of my generation, at 16 or 17 I lost my faith. I considered my own tradition depassé." Eliade's writings describe events that could possibly be seen as traditional religious experiences, particularly a mysterious room that gave access to "a fragment of incomparable time—devoid of duration" (Autobiography I, 6f.). Fictionalized references to other 'religious' experiences during and after his stay in Rishikesh can be found in Two Strange Tales (1970), but to what extent any of these are records of actual religious experiences, versus attempts to communicate Eliade's understanding of religious experience, is questionable.

The determination of Eliade's religious status must finally be dependent upon the definition of the term. If, by religious, one means an institutional affiliation or recognizable traditional practice, Eliade was not religious. If, however, one means the recognition and acceptance of independent forces in reality beyond the known laws of physics, or if one means the acceptance of certain narratives inconsistent with a naturalist worldview as nonetheless communicative of the real, then he was religious. From late interviews it is clear that he accepted the reality of 'destiny' and other "thing[s] that cannot be explained," and from early Romanian publications it is clear that these included clairvoyance, levitation, dematerialization, and the existence of a 'post-mortem condition.' He insisted that such expressions have an experiential basis. His constant motif of 'accepting religions on their own terms' reveals an openness to non-naturalistic views that appears religious, although it should be noted that "it is not a matter here of 'believing' blindly in all popular legends and superstitions, but of not rejecting them en bloc as delusions." This openness to the world of the other suggests Eliade to be a 'secular mystic' in the sense that, just as the mystic remains open to the experience of some invisible world or order, the secular mystic remains open to the veridicality of the worlds of alternate traditions. Although the mystic must return to the mundane world of physical actualities and Eliade could only return to his own world (Autobiography I, 199), they have in common this transient openness to alternate worlds. Eliade's openness to the reality of the supernatural is homologous to his openness to the veridicality of alternative religious worldviews, as it is to his openness to the 'nocturnal' world of the imagination and the possibility shown in his fiction of the mystical in the everyday.

It is, perhaps, Eliade's reception by the reading public that can most clearly be seen as religious. As The New York Times put it: "Professor Eliade is known for introducing an appreciation of the similarities of thought and practice in vastly different cultures . . . [and] . . . has become something of a cult figure to many students and readers" (Sunday, February 4, 1979, 44).

'Prophet of the Age'

Despite the fact that he did not practice any religious tradition and despite the complexity of argument needed to describe him as religious, Eliade was often apprehended as profoundly religious; in fact, several critics saw him as a theologian in Historian of Religions clothing. He seems to have been received by many as a prophet of the age, promising a hope of reconciling rational understanding with traditional revelation and thus holding open both the possibility of religious revelation to modern minds otherwise closed by estrangement from their local traditions and the possibility of dialogue between those committed to a particular tradition but determined to maintain the value of religion in general. Certainly, the academic controversy that has surrounded Eliade since his death has often taken the tone of religious polemic.

Literature

Major works by Mircea Eliade: La mythe de l'éternel retour, Paris 1949; Cosmos and History: The Myth of the Eternal Return, trans. by Willard Trask, Princeton 1954; Traité d'histoire des religions, Paris 1949; Patterns in Comparative Religion, trans. by Rosemary Sheed, London 1958; Le chamanisme et les techniques archaïques de l'extase, Paris 1951; Shamanism: Archaic Techniques of Ecstasy, trans. by Willard Trask, London 1964; Yoga, immortalité et liberté, Paris 1954; Yoga, Immortality and Freedom, trans. by Willard Trask, London 1958; Das Heilige und das Profane, Hamburg 1957, trans. from the French by Eva Moldenhauer; Le sacré et le profane, Paris 1965; The Sacred and the Profane: The Nature of Religion, trans. by Willard Trask, London 1959; The Quest: History and Meaning in Religion, Chicago 1969; Histoire des croyances et des idées religieuses, volumes I-II, Paris 1976–1978; A History of Religious Ideas, volumes I-II, trans. by Willard Trask, Chicago 1978–1982; volume III, Paris 1983, trans. by Alfred Hiltebeitel and Diane Apostolos-Cappadona, Chicago 1985; Encyclopedia of Religion, editor-in-chief, New York 1987.

Autobiography: Fragments d'un Journal, Paris 1973, trans. from the Romanian by Mac Linscott Ricketts as Journal I, 1945–1955, Chicago 1989 and by Fred H. Johnson, Jr. as No Souvenirs: Journal, 1957–1969, New York, 1977, also published as Journal II, 1957–1969, Chicago 1989; Fragments d'un Journal II, Paris 1981, trans. from the French by Teresa Lavender Fagan as Journal III, 1970–1978, Chicago 1989; Journal IV, 1979–1985, trans. from the Romanian by Mac Linscott Ricketts, Chicago 1989; Autobiography, vol. I. Journey East, Journey West, 1907–1938, San Francisco 1981, trans. from the Romanian by Mac Linscott Ricketts; Autobiography, vol. II. Exile's Odyssey, 1938–1969, Chicago 1988, trans. from the Romanian by Mac Linscott Ricketts.

Fiction: Maitreyi, Bucharest 1933, trans. by Catherine Spencer as Bengal Nights, Chicago 1994; Noaptea de Sânziene, Paris 1971, trans. by A. Guillermou as Forêt interdite, Paris 1955; trans. by M. L. Ricketts and M. P. Stevenson as The Forbidden Forest, Notre Dame 1978; Pe Strada Mântuleasa, Paris 1968, trans. by Mary Park Stevenson as The Old Man and the Bureaucrats, Notre Dame/London 1979; Youth without Youth: Three Fantastic Novellas, Columbus 1988.

Correspondence: with Raffaele Pettazzoni: L'histoire des religions a-t-elle un sens?: Correspondance 1926–1959, ed. N. Spineto, Paris 1994; with Stig Wikander: "The Unpublished Correspondence between Mircea Eliade and Stig Wikander (1948–1977): Parts I-IV," eds. Mihaela Timuș and Eugen Ciurtin, in : Archaeus: Études d'histoire des religions IV:3 (2000): 157-185; IV:4 (2000): 179-211; V:3-4 (2001): 75-119; and VI: 3-4 (325-362).

Further reading: Allen, Douglas, Myth and Religion in Mircea Eliade, New York 1988; Dudley, Guilford, III, Religion on Trial: Mircea Eliade and his Critics, Philadelphia 1977; Handoca, Mircea, Mircea Eliade: Biobibliografie, Bucharest 1997; Rennie, Bryan, Reconstructing Eliade: Making Sense of Religion, Albany 1996; Ricketts, Mac Linscott, Mircea Eliade: The Romanian Roots, 2 vols., New York 1988.

→ Academic Study of Religion, Epiphany, Holy, Religion, Theology

Bryan Rennie

Emblem

Etymologically, 'emblem' means 'that which has been set in' (Gk., émblema): the mosaic or intarsia work. As a genre in history of art and literature, 'emblem' denotes a particular combination of word and image, defined by three constituents: a motto, a pictorial image (Lat., pictura, 'picture'), and a text (Lat., subscriptio, 'under-writing') expounding the picture in its relation to the motto. In this specific form, the emblem developed in the Renaissance and the baroque period into a phenomenon of mode and style. The point of departure and model of all later emblematics is the book of emblems of Andreas Alciatus (Emblematum Libellus, 1531). The formal roots of emblematics lie in the analysis and interpretation, charged with fantasy, of Egyptian picture writing ('Renaissance Hieroglyphics'), of the typological (biblical) exegesis of the Middle Ages ('physiologus'), and in the Greek art of the epigram. Both the picture and the textual element of the emblem are important for their transmission of ancient tradition. The emblem was applied in multiple areas: book bindings, medals and medallions, objects of everyday use, architecture, religious image programs, gift ointments. Through the tension between the image and the motto or expository subscriptio, a meditative excess or surplus arises, partly for betrayal of the motif, especially for the springtime of emblematics—in which the use of emblems was a medium of communication cultivated by humanists—but also for the introduction of emblems into occult movements and esoteric circles (→ Esotericism). The → Jesuits, especially, have used emblems in the interests of religion and theology. While in the symbol sign and signified coincide, the emblem has need of the text that reveals the meaning. This combination of word and image, constitutive of the image, is lost in today's religious (crescent, cross, Star of David) or political emblems (hammer and sickle), or commercial corporate emblems (star of Mercedes-Benz).

Literature

Henkel, Arthur/Schöne, Albrecht (eds.), Emblemata: Handbuch zur Sinnbildkunst des XVI. und XVII. Jahrhunderts, Stuttgart 1996 ([1]1967); Manning, John, The Emblem, London 2002.

→ Art/Aesthetics, Esotericism, Hermetism/Hermeticism, Secrecy, Symbol/Sign/Gesture

Barbara von Reibnitz

Emotions / Feelings

Conception and Foundation

1. Although feelings are once more in vogue, and psychologists currently even speak of an 'emotional turn' (Euler/Mandl 1983), scientific research into feelings and emotions is still in its infancy. This state of affairs can be seen in the fact that the concept of emotions is accompanied by considerable imprecision. And so the word 'feeling' in psychological parlance is best understood in an enumeration of particular sensations. Feelings are experiences such as joy, hatred, grief, anger, compassion, dislike, and so on. They betoken the individual's personal positions with respect to the content of her experience, usually emphasizing inclination or aversion, without, however, being characteristic of all feelings.

The terms 'feeling' and 'emotion' (Lat., emovere, 'move out,' 'shake,' 'deeply move') are frequently used synonymously. In English terminology, 'emotion' more often means the affect. By 'affect' (from Lat., affectus, 'mood,' 'passion') is understood an intensive, transitory feeling. Affects are often accompanied by strong expressions, and are tied to organic experiences. 'Mood,' on the other hand, means a vague feeling expressing a person's comprehensive sensitivity, and extending over a long period. Moods present the background against which experiences stand out like figures, and thus form a long-lasting tone.

Religious Feelings (General)

2. Since Schleiermacher (1768–1834), but actually since the late Enlightenment (the 'age of sensitivity') and the pre-Romantic era, and pietism, feeling belongs among the determining elements of religion. Feelings, then, form one of the principal objects of the psychology of religion. Wilhelm Wundt (1832–1920) held that religion is the feeling that our world participates in a wider, supernatural world, in which the highest goals of human striving would be realized. In his foundational work in the philosophy of religion, Das Heilige: Über das Irrationale in der Idee des Göttlichen und sein Verhältnis zum Rationalen (1917; Ger., "The Holy: The Irrational in the Idea of the Divine and its Relation to the Rational"), Evangelical theologian Rudolf Otto (1869–1937) has developed the Kreaturgefühl (Ger., 'feeling of being creature'), defining it as a sensation of impotence in the human being vis-à-vis a 'divine,' that has been experienced as revelation. The experience of the 'numinous' happens to persons, impinges on their being, above all in a sensation of the mysterium tremendum and fascinosum (Lat.), the mystery that sets them atremble, 'fascinates' and 'rivets' them, yet at the same time fills them with a feeling of love, hope, and happiness. A third element of the numinous, according to Otto, is its energy, power, and dynamism that bursts all human categories. Thus, any experience of Otto's numinous would also have the nature of a personal relation between God and the human being.

There must, then, be specific religious feelings. Helmut Bennesch, for example, ranges religious feelings under the 'cognitive' emotions, those determined by consciousness. Here he understands spiritual experiences of different characters, in terms of one's religious center and personal relationship. For those persons who believe in a personal God, prayer, for example, is an emotional reference of experience, a sensation of 'bondedness'—a Bindungsgefühl—that can reach from childlike surrender to a bonding with an absolute conceptualized as absolute. These experiences of 'bondedness' have found rich formation and expression. Basically, all feelings existing in the area of the profane are also known in the area of the religious, but through their religious reference are specially tinted and enriched: as presentations of heavenly gladness, fear of the torments of hell, hope of a redemption in the beyond, expectancy of a justice in the life to come that there seems not to be on earth, and banishment of the terrors of death. All religious actions, as well, such as pilgrimages, festivals, rites, prayers, sacrifices, are to some extent bound up with more or less developed feelings, so that one can speak of special feelings connected to religion. But at the same time, special religious feelings among believers are conveyed and promoted through environmental factors, such as religious architecture (Gothic or baroque churches, Buddhist temples, a synagogue, mosque, prehistoric caves), psychotropic materials (incense, alcohol), or fine arts, music, and dance. Many deities, likewise, incorporate particular feelings, such as Aphrodite does for love and beauty, and so can be interpreted, in terms of depth psychology, as collective projections of feelings (→ Projection).

In terms of a cultural comparison of religious feelings, questions arise that are difficult to solve, such as that of their cultural peculiarity—thus their *in*comparability—when it comes to the various religions, or, conversely, that of their universality. Is there a 'world of emotions' proper to each religion, that would then have to be addressed? Here, viewpoints must be researched both peculiar to each respective culture ('emic') and spanning the cultures ('etic'). There is the additional difficulty that, in many cultures, no linguistic elements are present that would correspond to particular feelings; and many complex religious feelings are not translatable into other languages, but require a detailed commentary, such as the Melanesian mana, a feeling of a kind of personal → power and psychic energy. Further, particular emotions in the various religions seem to prevail over others, such as fear and guilt in Christianity, or the ecstasy of → trance in Afro-Brazilian Candomblé, so that the structure of feelings in the various religions comes out very differently, and are consequently difficult to compare.

3. Out of the inexhaustible plenitude of religious feelings, the following somewhat arbitrary selection of particular religious feelings will disregard feelings as they arise in combination.

Aggression, Hate, Power, and Anger

a) Aggression, like power, belongs to the concepts of the social sciences that elude a strict definition. Aggressions do injury: they can harm persons or objects, or even destroy them, as well as cause pain, disturb, provoke irritation, or offend and insult. An aggression can be open (bodily, verbal) or concealed (fantasized), positive (culturally approved) or negative (socially 'outlawed'). Feelings of hatred frequently possess an eminent importance here. Under hate is understood a strong, goal directed ('intentional') feeling of antipathy and hostility. An escalation is possible, all the way to annihilation ('mortal hatred'). Hate is the polar opposite of love. However, there are amalgamations, like a love-hate relationship. In the condition of rage or fury, finally, someone's 'blood boils,' the face becomes hot, and the muscles contract. Anger is often connected to a problem of power. In the framework of a belief in God, which ascribes human peculiarities to the divine (→ God/Gods/The Sacred), the 'wrath of God,' as found in the Bible, or in the krodha-murti, the wrath of the Indian gods, is often one of the prominent dispositions and an expression of the divine passion.

On the other hand, the concept of → violence stands for threatened or actual bodily aggression, and accompanies power. With a view to the Christian churches, it can be asked whether they ought not to reflect on the effect of the aggressive models in their texts, in their history, and in their world of art. Many medieval Christian altar paintings present bloody scenes of violence. Belligerent confrontations and pogroms between the various religious communities and sects steep the history of human religions for as long as we have had written documents. We need only recall the recent brutal outbreaks of violence between Hindus and Muslims in India, emerging from the destruction of the mosque in Ayodhya in 1992. Christian → mission, as well, was repeatedly accompanied by aggression and violence. As for missionary activity among Latin American Indians, for example, critics today refer to a 'colonization of souls.'[1] The colonial trauma of feelings is symbolically presented in Latin America, for instance, in sacred drama, where the acts and positions of the colonized are acted out and reworked in religious terms.[2]

Fear and Dread

b) → Fear is a feeling accompanied by a sense of constriction, an unsettling excitation, hesitancy. Fears do away, more or less, with the voluntary and comprehending guiding of one's own personality. From a biological perspective, fear denotes an affect grounded in the instinct of self-defense. Like flight and aggression, fear and hate can be released in the same affective package. Fear, then, is both product and occasion of a reaction of flight; as a permanent burden, it can lead to permanent psychosomatic injury. In his Begrebet Angest (Dan., "The Concept of Anxiety"; 1844), Danish Christian philosopher Søren Kierkegaard (1813–1855) analyzes the feeling of fear in close connection with the problem of (original) sin, emphasizing its character of guilt. In this sense, fear can be called a 'Western disease.'[3] 'Dread,' by contrast, is always object related, interior. The notion, "Dread have the gods created" (Lucretius, 97–55 BCE),[4] is partially justified, as prayer forms and many sacrifices, funeral and grieving usages, attest. But dread is only one side of the Sacred, and emerges, from the ambivalence of feelings—more as reverence and awe than as dread—as the proper essence of many religions.

Guilt Feelings

c) Guilt feelings accompany or ensue upon a plurality of apprehensions, often one of having somehow been (found) wanting, of having sinned against one's responsibility, or of having committed a misdeed. A fundamental constellation of inner elements is required for the feeling of guilt. On the one hand, a feeling of responsibility must be constructed. On the other, this polarity calls for a self-criticism, which can be expressed as remorse, a sense of liability, and the feeling of a duty of restitution. For the discharge of guilt feelings, innate, acquired, and consciously elicited motives are discussed. In the religious sense of Christianity, this means the burden of the consciousness of → 'sin,' from which to seek deliverance by means of → prayers or → penance. In Christian theology, God is not only legislator and author of the call of → conscience, of the inner voice that knows good and evil, but also the judge, both now, and in the judgment to be pronounced over the world at the 'end of days.'[5] It may be because of this Christian background that self-incrimination is nowhere so frequent as in Euro-American space. But guilt feelings are not the sole preserve of the Judeo-Christian tradition. They are found in other religions, such as Hinduism, Confucianism, and Islam.

In his psychoanalytic composition on religion, Zwangshandlungen und Religionsübungen (Ger., "Compulsive Activity and Religious Practice"; 1907), Sigmund → Freud compared certain individual and collective ceremonial religious actions ('rituals') with what are called 'compulsive acts' or 'ceremonial.' The ritual action that he finds in the compulsion neurosis, as in the sacred acts of the religious rite, he sees as arising from an inner force, a 'compulsion.' The latter is accompanied by fear of the disaster or punishment, Freud says, incurred by one's omission or incorrect practice of the rite. Both sorts of behavior are then founded on a strong feeling of guilt. Whether this interpretation is applicable outside of the Christian/Jewish religious context, however, would have to be established by comparative investigations.

Joy

d) The feeling of joy or gladness renders us free, broad, and bright within, and bestows warmth. Joy contributes to the lightening of life, and can scarcely be overprized in its personal, social, and religious efficacy. In terms of various degrees of intensity in its experience, joy can be addressed as cheerfulness, contentment, entertainment/enjoyment ('fun'), happiness, or ecstasy (see below). In many religions, then, a dramaturgy of feelings is practiced, as in Christianity, in the 'feeling-cycle' of joy and sorrow, renunciation and joy, somewhat in the order of: → Carnival to Ash Wednesday, Holy Week to Easter. On Easter Night, joy descends on the scene in a rite of lights and a call of jubilation.

Ecstasy

e) As a feeling, ecstasy (Gr., 'outside- [of-self-] standing,' 'being beside one-self') denotes an extreme corporeal sensation of joy (→ Shamanism). The Neo-Platonic philosopher Plotinus (204–270 CE) originally understood it as emergence from the margins of individuality and mystical amalgamation with the transcendent One. Similar notions were developed by Hegel, and especially by Friedrich → Nietzsche, who introduced the ancient Greek mythic figure of Dionysus into the 'feeling symbolism' of modernity. In modern psychological denotation, ecstasy is an exceptional, enhanced psychic condition, with a sensation of rapture, happiness, abduction from reality, and the highest enthusiasm and passion. At times it is a matter of a condition of inebriation in which hallucinations are seen and voices heard, and there can be connections with psychotropic materials (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens), → trance, → fasting, → asceticism, → music, → dance, and psychopathological conditions (schizophrenia, epilepsy). Frequently there is speech in foreign or unintelligible languages (speaking in tongues—'glossolalia'). The similarity of ecstasy to the emotional condition during orgasm is especially strong. In both conditions, individuation disappears. The history of religions is replete with the orgiastic (phallic cults, the cult of Shiva, → Tantra, → Osho Movement, the black mass; → Sexuality, → Eroticism) down to our own day.

In many authors, ecstasy and the religious experience are identical (F. Goodman), while others observe, in trance and ecstasy, basically different conditions (Rouget). In ethnic religions, and with the mystics of all times and cultures, ecstasy plays an eminent role. Ecstasy in → shamanism, frequently introduced by artificially induced, trancelike conditions, serves the attainment of contact with the supra-sensory world. → Enthusiasm, in the original sense of the Dionysian mysticism of Greek antiquity, is a condition in which the god seizes a person through → possession. Arabic mystics like al-Ghazzali distinguish between wajd (trance), tarab (musical emotion as profane ecstasy), and samâ (religious 'audition'). A modern Christian example is found in the Pentecostal movement. Since the Second World War, especially in Latin America and South Korea, but also in Africa (e.g., in Mozambique), it is among the most rapidly growing of church movements. Pentecostalists, whose divine service is characterized by exuberance and outbursts of joy, also claim gifts of the Spirit other than glossolalia, including prophecy, spiritual healing, and exorcism (→ Charismatic Movement).

Love

f) → Love is one of the richest and most differentiated of feelings. Love of God, love of neighbor, sexual love, love of nature, love of mother, have little in common with one another. Love can be defined as a refined feeling of connection. In many religions, such as Christianity, Manichaeism, Sufism, or Hinduism, commandments of love of God constitute a demand on the faithful. A frequently prescribed social love is the exemplary duty of children to remain close to and to care for their elders ('piety'; Lat., pietas). In Christianity, agape stands for the devoted, self-giving, sacrificial love even for the neighbor who does not deserve it, and this raised to the very paradox of 'love of enemy' (Matt 5:44). In the Western Middle Ages, love is connected with the erotic and mystical ideal of the minnesinger, the German poet and singer of the twelfth to the fourteenth centuries, and today it underlies both the concept of charitable service, and the middle-class and individual notion of love of the modern age.

Feeling and Institution

4. In many religious communities, churches, and sects, a climate of fear and repression prevails, which, in terms of social psychology, can be analyzed from the standpoint of the 'total institution' (Goffman). This term denotes religious organizations that subject their members to a single authority, cut them off more or less completely from a larger social environment, manage all of the acts of their life and need-fulfillment under a comprehensive plan, and make a claim on their entire person, thus also on their emotions. An example of the control and forming of feelings by religious groups is to be found in Christian generation of hatred in the persecution of so-called heathen and heretics, as in the thirteenth-century campaigns against the Cathari.

Feeling Disorders

5. Whether the alien-seeming emotional states and personalities, met in many religions—often perceived as 'alien' only due to an ethnocentric perspective—can be studied from viewpoints of religious pathology is a question that would have to be solved by a 'transcultural psychology' of the future. It may be instead that they ought to be considered as a particular emotion-group of personality type. As for pathologically oriented life histories ('pathographies') of important religious founders, one must agree with Karl Jaspers: "Pathographical work with missing material (as in the cases of Jesus, Mohammed) is ridiculous."[6]

Out of a plethora of feeling disorders, special attention can be called, by way of example, to the following forms, which we shall consider according to their emotional sensitivity, duration, and degree of seriousness. With pararhythmic (abnormal) emotional disorders, deviant expressions of feeling are observed in two directions: as exaggerated ('erethic'), and as feeling-paralyzed and inexpressible ('torpid'). During religious initiations, 'erethic' conditions of fear and rage, for instance, can arise (Eliade 1965).

In various psychoanalytic writings on religion, Sigmund Freud and his disciples have repeatedly brought religious behavior and experience into connection with, and compared them to, emotional disorders or neuroses (parag. 3c). By an ecclesiogenic neurosis in the Christian area, is understood a neurosis that stands in connection with religious education and environment, especially with respect to their hostile moral norms when it comes to the body, to feelings, and to sexuality, or that springs from a specially composed, exaggerated, or perverted faith or belief. Whether forms of neurosis acquired by religious → socialization are present in other religions as well, and how these are then acquired is a question for research in trans-cultural psychiatry and clinical ethno-psychiatry.

Finally, sociopathic disorders are personality disorders comporting a contempt for social responsibilities, a deficiency in feelings for others, and violent activity or heartless disengagement. They often appear under the cloak of religious → fanaticism and → fundamentalism. The 'fanatic' was originally someone whom the deity had plunged into wild enthusiasm. The fanaticism of converts is often interpreted, in terms of depth psychology, as compensation for repressed inferiority feelings or complexes.

In a wide variety of ways, depressions are responsible for blocked feelings, and resultant problems in the area of religious belief, to the point of loss of faith. Many depressives have the experience of a wall between themselves and God, feel damned by God, or can no longer pray. In the other direction, so to speak, dogmatic obligations of faith, and the sanctioning apparatus of religious groups, can co-condition or reinforce depressive attitudes and behavior.

Religious Feelings Today

6. From the viewpoint of social psychology, it can be established that, with its commandment of rationality, expressed in a predilection for technological thinking, the modern age has neglected or ostracized worlds of human feeling. This phenomenon is accompanied by a growing precipitate of feelings, both individual and collective, that is generating a widespread latent yearning for feeling itself—a longing that can explode in spontaneous excesses of celebration or grief (as at the funeral of Lady Diana Spencer, 1997). At the same time, this tendency to a disarming of the feelings corresponds to the mounting 'psychoboom,' to the spread of religious yearnings and sects (→ New Age), and thus to a 'psych industry' that can now flourish in a capitalistic materialistic society.

1. Mires, E., Die Kolonisierung der Seelen: Mission und Konquista in Spanisch-Amerika, Fribourg 1991; cf. Taussig 1987.
2. Wachtel, Nathan, Les visions des vaincus, Paris 1971.
3. Künzli, Arnold, Die Angst als abendländische Krankheit, Zurich 1948.
4. Lucretius, De Rerum Natura, 5, 1161ff.
5. Pagels 1989.
6. Jaspers, Karl, Allgemeine Psychopathologie, Heidelberg, 1973 (1st ed., 1913), 610.

Literature

Bennesch, Hellmuth: dtv-Atlas Psychologie, 2 vols., Munich 1994; Ekman, P./Davidson, J. (eds.), The Nature of Emotions: Fundamental Questions, New York 1994; Eliade, Mircea, Rites and Symbols of Initiation: The Mysteries of Birth and Rebirth, New York 1965; Euler, H. A./Mandl, H. (eds.), Emotionspsychologie, Munich 1983; Izard, C. E., The Face of Emotion, New York 1971; James, William, "What is an Emotion?," in: Mind 19 (1884), 188-205; Keating, C. F., "World Without Words: Messages from Face to Body," in: Lonner, W. J./Malpass, R. (eds.), Psychology and Culture, Boston 1994, 175-182; Kiev, Ari, Transcultural Psychiatry, New York 1972; LeDoux, J. E., The Emotional Brain: The Mysterious Underpinnings of Emotional Life, New York 1996; Mires, F., La colonización de las almas: mission y conquista en Hispanoamérica, San José 1987; Pagels, E., Adam, Eve, and the Serpent, New York 1989; Plutchik, R., Emotion: A Psychoevolutionary Synthesis, New York 1980; Rouget, G., Music and Trance: A Theory of Relations between Music and Possessions, Chicago 1985; Taussig, Michael, Shamanism, Colonialism, and the Wild Man: A Study in Terror and Healing, Chicago/London 1987; Tseng, W.-S., Handbook of Cultural Psychiatry, New York 2001; Wulff, D. M., Psychology of Religion: Classic and Contemporary Views, New York 1991.

→ Fear/Dread, Love, Luck/Happiness, Mourning, Psyche, Psychopathology, Trance

Hannes Stubbe

End / Eschaton

Actions for an End in the Biological Order

1. The expectation and experience of 'end' and 'eschaton' can ultimately be associated with evolutionary biology—as a consideration of the successful development of goal-directed appetites for goods necessary to survival, as individual living organisms have developed this thrust. If the quests for nourishment and territory, mating and child rearing, reach their possible fulfillment, they attain to their goals through 'actions for an end': the quest for nourishment in taking nourishment, for search for a habitat in marking off the hunting area, and so on. Another such end is the exclusion of disturbance by a competitor. The life of one is the—possible—death of another. Actions for an end relax and satiate ('endorphin as prize of desire'), until the next necessary return of regenerative movements of quest, whose ultimate success ensures further life in the biological spiral cycle of cause and effect, and which postpones the death of the individual organism.

Actions for an End in the Socio-Religious Cause-Effect Cycle

2. Over against this, we find 'religiously successful' activity in ritual and cultic presentations. These bind individual teleological actions socially and submit them to the posited control of a higher power over life and death ('ancestors,' 'spirits,' 'God,' 'fate'). Actions for an end can thereby be monopolized in the hands of those regarded as the religious representatives, presenters/exhibiters, and interpreters of the higher instance (shamans, patriarchs, prophets). The 'doubling' of the individual, as vessel of a terrestrial, body-bound soul and of a second, shadow soul, dream soul, or ancestor or spirit soul, in earlier societies, led to conceptualizations of rebirth and of life continued beyond the world of the merely earthly and individual. Accounts of a 'bad' and a 'good' end relate, and religious teaching determines, whether the deceased is to be reckoned as ancestor, as restless, wandering spirit, as one of the special elect, as eternally blessed or forever damned. Practices of intervention in the beyond on the part of those living here—from magical revitalizing rituals of slain beasts in hunting societies to the Catholic absolution structure of early modernity—complement the elaboration of a world after the physical death of the individual. This manner of successful socio-religious rotation subjects the individual's compelling pursuit of the return of pleasure, victory, and satisfaction to a variously lengthy postponement of impulse, whether through nutritional, matrimonial, and murder taboos sanctioned by religion, or through rites of initiation and rules of socio-religious placement by age, gender, and rank.

Cyclical Cosmological Rotation of Cause and Effect

3. Conceptions of an eschatological time arose only in the centralized urban societies of Mesopotamia, Egypt, China, India, and Central America, with the broad array of their integrated inhabitants and marginal peoples. To serve the rapidly waxing governmental need for synchronization, astronomical/astrological calendars were developed (→ Astrology; Calendar). The various planetary orbits and constellations made it possible to construct cosmological beginnings and ends, within perfectly reasoned and mathematically calculable astronomical revolutions. If the presentation of cyclical planetary end-phases, objectively repeating, corresponded to an individual fear of an bad end or evil death, then the elite of interpreters either developed prophetical techniques and sign-systems of 'favorable' or 'unfavorable' stellar constellations (Mesopotamia, China, Rome), or fashioned rites, liturgies, and sacrificial dramas intended to forestall the virtual end of the world at the close of a cosmic cycle, and actively summon its new beginning (Egypt, Assyrian New Year's festival, Central America). Owing to its objective calculability, this sort of cosmological cycle provided the interpretive elite with the occasion for an extension of their demand for attention, unlimited in principle.

Eschatological End Time

4. Cyclical cosmological concepts no longer take hold of people for whom the present promises no opportunities for self-assertion.

- This constraint, under the pressure of the deadly military machinery of Assyrian expansion (eighth to seventh centuries BCE), in Zoroastrianism and the ancient Israelite belief in God and a coming Messiah, prophetically molded salvation history's novel expectation of a hero to come. This mighty avenger would end the current mortal, calamitous time and annihilate the enemy, thereby ushering a final end-time of personal salvation.
- In organic succession, a Deuteronomical theology and ethics conceived a response to the destruction (or contested reconstruction) of Jerusalem temple worship (538–c. 400 BCE): it reduced all previous narrative traditions to an ethical-typological, individual-ethical, cycle of end and eventual new departure, all proclaimed in canonical texts.
- One of the consequences of the religious split of the 'people of Israel' into antagonistic groups between 400 BCE and 400 CE, was the frequently widespread and anonymous circulation of the apocalyptical texts (Ethiopan Book of Enoch, Daniel, 4 Ezra, Johannine Revelation, Sibylline oracle). These writings paired Israel's own theocratic wishes for everlasting eschatological rule, with the promise of future immortality for the heroes of the faith, a notion taken from their Hellenistic neighbors.
- In this battle of the texts, the New Testament and Patristic writers shaped an eschatology that replaced the eschatological rebuilding of the Jerusalem temple with faith in the already begun end-time and in the Coming of Christ on the 'last day,' and promised personal resurrection to all who believed in this. Now, with the thousand-year reign of Christ and his Saints (chiliasm or → millenarianism), a final, purifying final battle, and the world judgment at the 'end of the ages,' this world, too, would altogether perish. The 'evil' would then be annihilated or finally damned to everlasting hell, and the 'good' would dwell in a new 'Kingdom' of the glory of God, which, in the faith of the Church, is already present, always and everywhere (→ Dualism).
- A similar eschatological concept of the → hereafter—without an imminent eschatological expectation, however—is also found in Sunnite Islam. In this case too, the martyr for the faith dies with the promise of a sure Paradise in the hereafter (blend of individual and collective eschatology), and in both religions God, against all might and powers of this world, has the last word ('eschatological reserve').

5. The present religious situation in Western societies is marked by the progressive dismantling of monotheistic, other-worldly end-time conceptions, and the weakening of the hierarchical interpreting elite: in Judaism through the founding of the State of Israel, in Christianity through the substitution of this-worldly configurations since the Renaissance and the Enlightenment (nationalism, Hegelianism, socialism, Darwinism, capitalist recurrence concepts, life reform movements and ecological movements). Nowadays we walk in an open market of tales about the end-time, the anarchic play of end-time surfers on the Internet, and the time-to-time terrorism of militant eschatological sects (Sun Temple, Aum Shinrikyo).

Literature

Amanat, Abbas/Bernhardson, Magnus T. (eds.), Imagining the End: Visions of Apocalypse from the Ancient Middle East to Modern America, London/New York

2002; Stierle, Karlheinz/Warning, Rainer (eds.), Das Ende. Figuren einer Denkform, Munich 1996; Müller, Klaus E./Rüsen, Jörn (eds.), Historische Sinnbildung. Problemstellungen, Zeitkonzepte, Wahrnehmungshorizonte, Darstellungsstrategien, Reinbek 1997; Löwith, Karl, Meaning in History, Chicago 1970 ([1]1949); Idem, Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen. Die theologischen Voraussetzungen der Geschichtsphilosophie, Stuttgart [8]1990.

→ Apocalypse, Prophecy, Rebirth, Regeneration/Fertility, Time

Hemma Boneberg

Endowment / Foundation

Definition

1. An endowment or foundation produces income through certain property or assets, provided by the founder, with which a long-term purpose, stipulated by the founder, is to be financed. Unlike a donation, then, an endowment is not a simple act, but a continuously repeated gift, bestowed without a time limit.

Antiquity

2. a) From ancient times to the present, comparable institutions are found in the most varying cultural milieus, as in ancient Egypt, Greco-Roman antiquity, Judaism, Islam, and Hinduism. With ancient foundations, the founder's original motive was to secure her or his memorial cult, and thus they outlast the life of the founder. Besides the simple, private, burial foundation, there were manifold opportunities to recommend oneself to the public as a 'benefactor' (in Gk., euergétes), whereby the memory of the founder would be preserved by the mention of his or her name at regularly scheduled contributions or celebrations, financed by the foundation.

Middle Ages

b) In Christian times, the nature of the Western endowment changed, as the new motive of love of neighbor (caritas) supervened. Thus, especially beginning in the fourth century, there appeared lodges for strangers (xenodochia), poorhouses, and other charitable institutions maintained by endowments, also known, on the basis of the pious intentions underlying them, as piae causae (Lat., 'pious causes'). After the early Middle Ages, when endowments were rare, from the twelfth century onward the endowment system enjoyed a strong upward swing, and, through the commitment of the rapidly growing middle class, developed into a typical urban establishment. Hospitals were especially founded, at the representation of brotherhoods—guilds, for instance—with the care of their members in mind. The foundation of universities by landlords was for the purpose of education in their respective lands. Beside these foundations, which served the public, there were a multiplicity of foundations for worship, whose purpose was the financing of regular masses for the departed; churches, houses of formation, treasuries, and great works of art, rested on this system of financing. Fundamentally, however, all medieval endowments can be regarded as subsisting for the salvation of souls, while also responsible for the memoria in toto. A further function of medieval endowments consisted in the financing of an association of people by whose help the founder remained in social life beyond her or his death. On the basis of this amalgamation of social, economic, political, and religious elements,

M. Borgolte calls the medieval endowment the 'total social phenomenon' that marked medieval society.

Early Modernity

c) Only with the Age of Enlightenment did the older endowment system fall into decline. Thus this system lost its religious, metaphysical basis, and its attention to the general welfare has been the task of the state ever since.

Foundation Law Today

2. The formation of today's endowment laws followed. The foundation is now regarded as an independent juridical person. After the loss of the sacred connection it had enjoyed in a framework of the public endowment, ever more secular purposes came into the foreground, resting on a sense of social responsibility, such as the promotion of education, and research or art. But unmistakably, the wish to have one's own name 'live on' became a motive for the erection of an endowment. Especially in the United States at the end of the nineteenth century, massive fortunes acquired in the course of industrialization made it possible to found wealthy endowments (e.g., Rockefeller Foundation). Here we note that the alleviation of ills and grievances no longer serves as the motive of this type of large endowment. Its mission, determined by the founder, is rather directed to preventive measures, and consists altogether generally in the improvement of life circumstances, or the like, and thus can react to new social developments. Considering the state's growing fiscal difficulties in fulfilling its social duties, the endowment has acquired increased meaning as a flexible instrument of private initiative. The endowment tradition of the Anglo-American space—developed especially in the United States—which rests on the idea of philanthropy, is exemplary.

Islam

3. An example of a comparable institution from another cultural circle is represented by the Islamic foundation (waqf). Generally regarded as a good deed or action, the religious use of the Islamic foundation consists in the promotion of the salvation of the soul, to which in many cases the preservation of the endower's memoria contributes, through the establishment of a permanent prayer memorial. Traditional Islamic societies were served especially by the endowment open to the public, and might consist in the foundation of a law school, a soup kitchen, or any other end not contradicting Islam, for the advancement of the social status of the endowers and their families, as well as the cohesion and endurance of various social groups (such as craft guilds and communities with ethnic or religious orientations). The family endowment, by contrast, presented a widespread means of the circumvention of Islamic inheritance laws, as it made it possible to leave an entire family fortune to a single heir. By means of the Islamic foundation, goals of public welfare, like purely private ones, can be realized within a religious framework, and indeed in a unique way. The secularizations of the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, partly at the hands of the Islamic rulers, and partly imposed by the colonial powers, were intended to withdraw control of the foundation from the economic cycle. Until then, the foundation had been largely supported by endowments. Now its support would be freely accessible, and submitted to the support of a social and educational system under state control.

In more recent times, especially from the Islamic side, the foundation is propagated as an alternative to the welfare state. In many Islamic countries, the population explosion, together with increasing urbanization, has rendered the welfare state all but helpless in the face of the social problems emerging from these phenomena (e.g., in Egypt). Here, endowments and organizations like the Muslim Brotherhood again take over duties of the state. In the United States, a comparable role is attributed to 'faith-based organizations.'

Literature

Baer, Gabriel, "The waqf as Prop for the Social System," in: Islamic Law and Society 4 (1997), 264-297; Barnes, John R., An Introduction to the Religious Foundations in the Ottoman Empire, Leiden [2]1987; Borgolte, Michael, "Totale Geschichte" des Mittelalters? Das Beispiel der Stiftungen, Berlin 1993; Reiter, Yitzhak, Islamic Endowments in Jerusalem under British Mandate, London 1996; Solomon, Lewis D., In God We Trust? Faith-Based Organizations and the Quest to Solve America's Social Ills, Lanham 2003; Thomas, John Philip, Private Religious Foundations in the Byzantine Empire, Washington 1987.

→ Charitable Organizations, Death and Dying, Economy, Exchange/Gift, Money, Order/Brotherhoods

Johannes Pahlitzsch

Energy

The concept enérgeia (Gk., 'efficacy,' 'activity') becomes important for religion—especially for the European history of religion of the outgoing nineteenth century and the opening of the twentieth—by way of the Weltanschauung of W. Ostwald (1853–1932), against a background of the momentous successes of science. In the doctrine of the Monistenbund ("Monist League"), which Ostwald co-founded, energy is the essence of all things. This idea is a departure, of course, from the hitherto controlling schema of interpretation of a mechanistically connoted matter. In Einstein's celebrated equation, $e = mc^2$, the relation of identity between energy and matter is reduced to a mathematical formula. The 'esoteric tradition,' which has been taken up once more—indeed, reinforced—since the 1980s, in → New Age thought, takes its point of departure in a 'cosmic energy' or in 'fields of energy,' whose disturbed harmony (such as the illness of an individual) can be reconstituted through spiritual healing.

→ Electricity, Esotericism, Light/Enlightenment, New Age, Power

Georg Hartmann

Enlightenment (Age of)

Concept of the Age

1. In an affirmation now become famous, Kant describes the Enlightenment as "the emergence of man from self-accusatory sheepishness." This definition of 'Enlightenment' means a change in the human being's self-knowledge and place in the universe, and has led to the conception of a new change of the ages of the world. Kant is putting all of his emphasis here on 'self-accusatory' (in Ger., selbstverschuldet). Every person, Kant holds, is outfitted with reason, and therefore has the duty to act 'reasonably,' or 'according to reason' (vernunftgemäß). Here Kant means the free and open, public use of one's own opinion and conviction.

As the concept of an age, 'Enlightenment' is the English expression for the French siècle des lumières ('Century of the Lights'; → Light/Enlightenment), and embraces the cultural achievements of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, especially in France and England. Here a change takes place that is fundamental for → modernity. Both the ethics of the present and modern democratic societies emerge from this change. Not least of all, the Enlightenment's → criticism of religion has had a share in the basic alteration of religious life. With the foundation (1459) of a Platonic 'Academy' in Florence, a revival of Greek and Roman antiquity had taken place, especially of Neoplatonism (→ Platonism). A new interpretation of the individual human being's role and capacities became central, as shown especially in liberty and freedom (Pico della Mirandola, De Hominis Dignitate, "On the Dignity of Man," 1486). Luther's → Reformation, as well, appealed to the Liberty of a Christian Human Being (1520) as the immediacy of the human being to God, where he sees a broader aspect of the new understanding of a human being's freedom in the singularity of this faith relationship. In this 'innovation,' the upwardly mobile middle class found the appropriate Weltanschauung for its understanding of the individual and society. The image of the auto-located human being, personally responsible ('autonomous') for his and her action and faith, permitted a concentration on the individual, and on the salvation of that individual.

Facets of the Enlightenment

2. a) Philosophically, the Enlightenment was essentially promoted by the → rationalism of René Descartes and his school. Rationalism turned from faith to a → reason newly defined by freedom. With this superior evaluation of reason vis-à-vis faith, there also developed a new understanding of tolerance. Deism, especially, and its conception of a 'natural religion,' began to work its effects (David Hume, The Natural History of Religion, 1757; Dialogues concerning Natural Religion, 1779). In deism, all religions go back to a 'premoridal revelation.' Jean Bodin (1530–1596) and Herbert von Cherbury (1583–1648) therefore sought to show that any differences in faith propositions are secondary. Bodin's "Sevenfold Circle" (Colloquium Heptaplomeres, 1593)—in which representatives of the various religions propose their standpoints—discovers, with the help of human reason, a kinship among the religions; it then attempts to reduce them to a natural religion lying at the basis of all. Cherbury's treatise, "On Truth" (1624; De Veritate), which posits the basic principles of a common religiosity, undertakes the same. In this reduction, one practices → tolerance as a principle of a religion of reason.

We find this once more in G. E. Lessing's drama, "Nathan der Weise" (1779; Ger., "Nathan the Wise").

Ethical Renewal

b) The Enlightenment thus became an era of complete ethical renewal. This feature was exemplified in the sketches of a new manner of religion at the hands of John Locke (1632–1714) and Montesquieu (1689–1755), in which autonomy, as the 'auto-legislation' of the individual, is given an ever more powerful denotation. Religion, too, is subordinated to the idea of the autonomy of the individual. In society, state, and religion, this orientation to reason signifies an upward revaluation of the person. This leads in turn to an ever more profound interiorization of ethics, all the way to Kant's founding of ethical action in the 'categorical imperative': "Act in such a way that the maxim of your will could at the same time be the principle of a general legislation."

Aesthetics

c) This waxing interiorization is also shown in the growing meaning of aesthetics. Shaftesbury (1671–1713) and Baumgarten (1714–1762) are the pioneers of a fully new understanding of the beautiful. In the spirit of Shaftesbury, who returns to Platonic and Neoplatonic concepts, for the German Enlightenment and classical period (Herder, Goethe, Schiller, and Lessing) the beautiful becomes a sign and index of the divine. Thus, aesthetics receives an elemental religious meaning: the aesthetic replaces the Holy. A doctrine of sensory perception, aesthetics is at the same time a doctrine of the revelation of the divine in the visible (→ Art Religion). The Enlightenment's predilection for pantheism and materialism is also founded in this profanization of the sacred.

Together with the further development and systematization of the humanistic and Reformation understanding of freedom, the profanization of the idea of salvation is the second peculiarity of the Enlightenment. This profanization results in a total emancipation of the system of values from its religious backgrounds. Here the step is taken to the self-responsibility of the human being of the modern age (→ Modernity/Modern Age), founded entirely upon that human being. Individuals no longer owe an account of their actions to any higher being.

Enlightenment after Enlightenment?

3. This rigorism led to the end of the Enlightenment, toward the close of the eighteenth century. Not only the abusive excrescences of the religion of reason in the French → Revolution, but also the discovery of → nature by → Romanticism, effected an enfeeblement of reason, complete with its negation in irrationalism. Beginning with Jean-Jacques Rousseau (1712–1778) and his call "Back to Nature," the essence of human beings was sought in their 'naturalness,' and therefore in their conformability to nature. Representing this idea are F. W. J. Schelling (1775–1854) and his philosophy of nature (to be taken up by Franz von Baader, Carl Gustav Carus, or Lorenz Oken). In the philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer, likewise oriented to the concept of nature—a concept that will be essential for the cultural life of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries—the independence of the reasonable subject, produced by the Enlightenment, is already fully surrendered. In their Dialektik der Aufklärung (1947; Ger.,"Dialectic of the Enlightenment"), Theodor W. Adorno and Max Horkheimer, under the impress of National Socialism and Auschwitz, posit the process of enlightenment no longer as a linear emancipation from human sheepishness, as Kant had had it, but as a process that includes a reversion to sheepishness. This reversion is to be expected when the destruction of the human being and nature by the human being has not come to an end. The Enlightenment is justified through retention, in consciousness, of the enlightenment achievements of the past. The same approach is adopted by → postmodernity, in that the latter is directed against totalitarian conceptions in society, science, and art. With respect to Kant's Beantwortung der Frage: Was ist Aufklärung (Ger., "Response to the Question, What is Enlightenment?"), Jean-François Lyotard composed his manifesto of postmodernity, Réponse à la question: qu'est-ce que le postmoderne? ("Response to the Question, What is Postmodern?"; see Lyotard 1984). In this summons, independence and openness of → discourse reappear as fundamental traits of enlightened thought.

Literature

Barnett, S. J., The Enlightenment and Religion: The Myths of Modernity, Manchester etc. 2003; Dupré, Louis, The Enlightenment and the Intellectual Foundations of Modern Culture, New Haven 2004; Fitzpatrick, Martin et al. (eds.), The Enlightenment World, London 2004; Garrard, Graeme, The Counter-Enlightenment from Rousseau to Rorty, London 2004; Harrison, Peter, 'Religion' and the Religions in the English Enlightenment, Cambridge 1990; Hazard, Paul, The European Mind, 1680–1715, Harmondsworth 1973; Horkheimer, Max/Adorno, Theodor W., Dialectic of Enlightenment, New York 1972; Hyland, Paul et al. (eds.), The Enlightenment: A Sourcebook and Reader, London 2003; Lyotard, Jean-François, The Postmodern Condition: A Report on Knowledge, Minneapolis 1984; MacMahon, Darrin M., Enemies of the Enlightenment: The French Counter-Enlightenment and the Making of Modernity, Oxford 2001; van Horn Melton, James , The Rise of the Public in Enlightenment Europe, Cambridge 2001; Wilson, Ellen Judy/Reill, Peter Hanns (eds.), Encyclopedia of the Enlightenment, New York 2004.

→ Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Light/Enlightenment, Postmodernity, Rationalism, Reason, Science

Stephan Grätzel

Enthusiasm

Even more than the 'enthusiasm,' as the word is used loosely, that 'arises' when a 'spirit' takes hold of an assembly or gathering, the Greek word enthousiasmos (en-, 'in,' + theos, 'god') describes the moment at which a god 'comes into a person.' This phenomenon can be attributed to a 'medium,' as for instance in ancient prophecy; of a poet, who senses the Muse at work within; or of the God received as wine, who alters consciousness. It does not actually refer to → possession by a demon. (→ 'Ecstasy,' for its part, indicates people's abandonment of their usual manner, so that, stirred by music, dance, and rhythm, their spirit 'emerges.') To boot, in the condition of enthusiasm, one may be capable of saying something that is not from oneself, but that emerges as God's word through a prophetess or is spilled forth in the 'speech of the angels,' glossolalia (Lat., 'speaking in tongues'). In terms of cultural studies, all of these phenomena can be described under the heading of 'trance.'

→ Charisma, Channeling, Emotions/Feelings, Possession, Prophecy, Shamanism, Trance

Christoph Auffarth

Environmentalism

Environmentalism and Religion

In the United States, political conservatives who work in Washington DC sometimes complain that in the federal Environmental Protection Agency, officials approach their work with religious zeal. Christian religious conservatives sometimes object, in a similar way, to the 'paganism' and earth-reverence that they perceive to underlie environmentalism (→ Paganism/Neopaganism; Nature Piety), considering such religion blasphemous. The question such reactions pose is whether there is anything religious about environmentalism.

Environmentalism and religion are often intertwined. Some religious actors, for example, draw on their traditions as resources for promoting environmentally friendly attitudes and behaviors. Some of these actors think that their religions are naturally 'green.' By 'green' they mean that properly understood, their religion promotes environmentally sustainable lifeways. Others think their traditions may not be historically or intrinsically green, but because contemporary environmental problems are severe and urgent, their traditions and → ethics must be revised. Many laypeople, scholars, and religious leaders have been involved in such efforts. Books and anthologies have been published, sometimes by religious practitioners, and there has been a proliferation of popular and scholarly journals, as well as websites, exploring the connections between spirituality and the environment.

Scholars and Environmental Ethics

One of the most noteworthy scholarly efforts exploring the relationships between religion and ecology has been a series of conferences held at Harvard University in the United States, which led to a nine-volume book series entitled "Religions of the World and Ecology." Published by Harvard University Press between 1997 and 2004, it included what the editors considered to be the world's major religions, Indigenous Traditions, Judaism, Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Jainism, Buddhism, Confucianism and Daoism (as of 2005 a tenth, envisioned volume, on Shintô, had not appeared). Based on the assumption that the environmental crisis is grounded upon a defective religious perception in which people "no longer see the earth as sacred," the editors implied that earlier humans had a different and superior religious sensibility toward → nature. They set out to recover the grounds "within scripture, ritual, myth, symbol, cosmology, sacrament, and so on" to build the needed, life-revering environmental ethics. Many if not most of the scholars writing for the Harvard Series shared the objective of its editors, laboring to uncover and revitalize the environmental ethics they believed were embedded in the religions they were analyzing, or at least, that they hoped to help construct for them.

Changing Attitudes of Religious Institutions

The ferment over religion and environmental responsibility has begun to affect religious institutions, which on a number of occasions have issued official statements of environmental concern, and have been expressing increasing urgency. In this they seem to be following the lead of environmental scientists who collectively and individually have been expressing alarm about the degradation of the earth's ecosystems. Religious environmentalists have also increasingly collaborated with environmental scientists and secular "engos" (environmental, non-governmental organizations), pressuring nation states and international institutions to implement dramatic environmental reforms.

The Earth Charter

The most significant religion-inspired initiative along these lines is the Earth Charter, which expresses the conviction that all forms of life have intrinsic value and that protecting them should be considered a "sacred trust." (See www.earthcharter.org.) Developed through nearly a decade of discussion among environmentally concerned religious individuals and groups, proponents presented the Charter at the United Nations "World Summit on Sustainable Development" in Johannesburg, South Africa, in 2002. They hope the nations will ratify the charter and that it would, like the United Nations Declaration on → Human Rights, intensify pressure on national and international institutions to transform economic and political systems in ways that would guarantee environmental sustainability and social justice.

It is clear, then, that some environmentalists are inspired by religious sensibilities and do approach their work with religious idealism and passion. Many of these root their environmental ethics in the world's most prevalent religions, most of which are, slowly but surely, following the lead of the societies in which they are situated, growing increasingly concerned about environmental degradation, and beginning to respond both personally and politically. This is a far cry, however, from an environmentalism that is equivalent to paganism, earth-worship, and blasphemy, as some critics charge.

Pagan Environmentalism

There are, however, at least two additional ways in which environmentalism and religion are intertwined, and these types can indeed be labeled 'pagan environmentalism.' Both forms articulate metaphysics of interconnection, a kinship ethics (which understand all life forms as related and believe that moral agents have ethical obligations to their living kin), and rely on metaphors of the sacred to express a conviction that life on earth is miraculous and sacred. Both forms consider the destruction of ecosystems to be desecrating acts. And neither insists that the sacredness of the earth depends on a divine creator or on the belief that human beings are uniquely connected to a creator or life-creative force.

Members of the first of the two groups consider themselves to be pagan, and indeed, generally reject the world's predominant religions, criticizing them for promoting religious beliefs that they believe directly produce attitudes that are either indifferent to environmental destruction or directly supportive of it. Offering instead a diverse assortment of beliefs which are usually based on pantheistic, animistic, and polytheistic perceptions (→ Animism; Pantheism; Polytheism)—and sometimes drawing on the atmospheric scientist James Lovelock's "gaia theory" or other "systems theories"

(→ Wholeness/Holism; Chaos)—contemporary pagans believe the earth and its living systems are sacred and holy.

Radical Environmental Paganism

Throughout late twentieth century and intensifying during its last few decades and into the present period, there has been a great deal of religious innovation by, as well as growth in numbers among, those who call themselves pagans (→ Paganism/Neopaganism). This includes practitioners of Wicca, Druidry (→ Druids), and many other groups. Some of these groups have not been explicitly environmentalist in character, although increasingly, they have become to embrace environmentalism. A significant proportion is, moreover, avowedly radical, viewing the world's dominant institutions (both religious and secular) as bent on destroying the earth. Such 'radical environmental' individuals and groups, including the now infamous "Earth First!" and the "Earth Liberation Front" ("ELF"), have engaged in diverse forms of resistance, including civil disobedience and dangerous sabotage, opposing the desecrating inertia unleashed from the mainstream society. Such groups represent a significant proportion of the most militant of those activists resisting 'globalization,' namely, the ongoing extension around the world of what they consider to be an innately destructive, capitalist market society. They view this process as one destructive not only of ecosystems, but also of the earth's few remaining indigenous peoples, whom they consider to be more in tune with the earth's sacred life rhythms (→ North America [Traditional Religions]).

Earth-Based Spirituality

The second type of 'pagan environmentalism' involves people who are less likely to apply the label 'pagan' to themselves or their → spirituality and environmental ethics. But they nevertheless consider the earth to be sacred, and in unguarded times will acknowledge that they are 'spiritual,' and that they have experienced a sense of peace, wholeness, and well-being, and sometimes also transformative or healing power, while immersed directly in wild nature. They, like many of the previously discussed religious environmentalists, commonly speak of "belonging" or being "connected to" nature, and conversely, trace our environmental predicaments to "alienation" from "her."

Those I am calling "pagan environmentalists" tend to speak of nature using the female pronoun, or on other occasions, use the trope "mother nature" or "mother earth." In this way they spotlight symbolically the earth's life-giving, nurturing character. In these and many other ways pagan environmentalists express a 'metaphysics of interdependence' and a corresponding, evolutionary 'kinship ethics,' in which humans have an ethical obligation to help secure the well being of all other life forms with whom they share the evolutionary pilgrimage on earth.

"Non-Supernaturalistic Nature Religion"

Some scientists who can be considered environmental pagans call themselves "religious naturalists," forthrightly describing how their sense of the sacredness of nature arose through scientific study. From this they deduce ethical obligations to nature. Some who may have never thought of themselves as 'pagan' can nevertheless be so understood through the comparative practice of religious studies. They can also be understood as practitioners of what I have elsewhere labeled "non-supernaturalistic nature religion" (Taylor 2001a, 2001b). By this I mean that in their writings and daily lives they articulate and express spiritualities of belonging and connection to the earth's living systems, which can be considered religious, even though these people may not believe in otherworldly divinities. The roots of the term → religion has to do to with being bound to and connected to that which provides meaning and transformative power. It also has to do with whatever people hold sacred (→ Holy). With such an understanding of religion, much environmentalism, even that which might not at first glance appear to be religious, can be seen to represent a powerful new form of religion.

Origins in Nineteenth-Century Romanticism

Such non-supernaturalistic nature spirituality, tethered to environmental concern, may be relatively new in the history of religion. But it can be traced at least to the mid-nineteenth century in Europe. The German zoologist and evolutionary theorist (and contemporary of Charles Darwin) Ernst Haeckel (1834–1919) is probably best known for being the first to publish the claim that human beings descended from apes (Darwin himself avoided this conclusion in The Origin of the Species; → Theory of Evolution; Evolutionism), and for coining the term "ecology." But Haeckel also articulated a science-based, non-supernaturalistic nature spirituality, blending nineteenth-century → romanticism toward nature with evolutionary theory, and promoting a pantheistic, philosophical monism (→ Natural Science). In his writings, people and nature were one, and neither could be harmed without harming the other. His many, influential books—particularly in The Riddle of the Universe (Ger. [1]1899)—inspired nature worship and provided a basis for environmentalism, for if all life is metaphysically interconnected and, in an evolutionary sense, of one kind, namely, an organism who evolves in the same way as all other earthly organisms, then a corresponding kinship ethics logically follows.

In such sentiment Haeckel has not been alone. Many of the most prominent naturalists and ecological scientists in the twentieth century have also been engaged in non-supernaturalistic nature religion. In some cases they became outright nature mystics, who felt a deep, affective connection to nature, and sometimes (often in candid moments only with their most trusted friends and colleagues) would speak philosophically, religiously, and even lovingly about the energetic and bio-physical interconnections in the universe (→ Nature Piety).

Non-Supernaturalistic Nature Religion in the Twentieth Century

Two of the greatest and most influential mid-twentieth century ecologists, for example, Aldo Leopold (1887–1947) and Rachel Carson (1907–1964), eschewed theism for worldviews in which nature itself proved adequate for evoking, awe, wonder, reverence, and an environmental ethics that considered the natural world intrinsically valuable.

In the latter decades of the twentieth century Edward O. Wilson, who was originally trained as an entomologist but became one of the twentieth century's most influential and wide-ranging ecological thinkers, fused religion, natural science, and environmental ethics. Following Darwin he developed his theories of "biophilia" and "sociobiology," which understand our love of nature and our ethical sensibilities toward other humans and other life forms to be a direct result of the evolutionary process. Humanity's love of nature and ethics are both ecological adaptations that favor survival long term, according to Wilson. As such, they should be honored and developed. In concert with our own growing scientific understandings, including with regard to the negative impact some human activities have on earthly life, these ethical sensibilities can, should, and indeed must lead to a robust environmentalism which respects the diversity of life on earth.

Outlook

Environmentalism and religion are intertwined in complex and sometimes contested ways, this brief introduction suggests. Some people are interpreting or developing their religious traditions in ways that enjoin environmental concern and lend support to environmentalism. Others within these traditions consider such concern a distraction from the proper religious focus of these traditions. Participants in both supernaturalistic and non-supernaturalistic forms of nature religion, which despite significant differences consider nature to be sacred in some way, consider environmentalism as an important, if not the most important aspect, of the ethical obligations that are a direct implication of their religious or spiritual beliefs. The trend for nature, and environmentalism, to become increasingly intertwined with religion, sometimes in ways that are contested and controversial, is likely to continue. Indeed, such trends are likely to intensify as environmental degradation and the suffering it precipitates becomes more pronounced, as the weight of scientific data indicates is a near certainty.

Literature

Primary Sources: Callicott, J. Baird, Earth's Insights: A Survey of Ecological Ethics from the Mediterranean Basin to the Australian Outback, Berkeley 1994; Campolo, Anthony, How to Rescue the Earth without Worshipping Nature, Nashville 1992; Capra, Fritjof/ Steindl-Rast, David, Belonging to the Universe: Explorations on the Frontiers of Science and Spirituality, San Francisco 1991; Carson, Rachel, The Sea Around Us, New York 1950; Idem, Silent Spring, New York 1962; Corrington, Robert S., Nature's Religion, Lanham 1997; Goodenough, Ursula, The Sacred Depths of Nature, New York/Oxford 1998; Haeckel, Ernest, God-Nature, London 1906; Idem, Monism as Connecting Religion and Science: The Confession of Faith of a Man of Science, London/Edinburgh 1984; Idem, The Riddle of the Universe, London 1900; Idem, The Wonders of Life, London 1905; Harvey, Graham, Contemporary Paganism: Listening People, Speaking Earth, New York 1997; Kellert, Stephen R./Wilson, Edward O. (eds.), The Biophilia Hypothesis, Washington 1993; Leopold, Aldo, The Sand County Almanac with Essays From Round River, Oxford 1949 (repr. New York 1971); Lovelock, James, Gaia: A New Look At Life on Earth. Revised ed. Oxford 1979; Oelschlaeger, Max, Caring for Creation: An Ecumenical Approach to the Environmental Crisis, New Haven 1994; Smith, Samantha, Goddess Earth: Exposing the Pagan Agenda of the Environmental Movement, Lafayette 1994; Starhawk (Miriam Simos), The Spiral Dance: A Rebirth of the Ancient Religion of the Great Goddess, San Francisco 1979; Tucker, Mary Evelyn/Grim, John (series eds.), Religions of the World and Ecology, 9 vols. Cambridge 1997–2004; Wilson, Edward Osborne, Biophilia: The Human Bond with Other Species, Cambridge 1984; Idem, Consilience: The Unity of Knowledge, New York 1998.

Secondary Literature: Adler, Margo, Drawing Down the Moon: Witches, Druids, Goddess-Worshipers, and Other Pagans in America Today, rev. ed. Boston 1979; Bramwell, Anna, Ecology in the 20th Century: A History, New Haven 1989; Benavides, Gustavo, "Ecology and Religion," in: Taylor, Bron (ed.), Encyclopedia of Religion and Nature, London/New York 2005, 548-554; Dunlap, Thomas R., Faith in Nature: Environmentalism as Religious Quest, Washington 2004; Fox, Stephen, The American Conservation Movement: John Muir and His Legacy, Madison 1981; Pike, Sarah, New Age and Neopagan Religions in America, New York 2004; Takacs, David, The Idea of Biodiversity:

Philosophies of Paradise, Baltimore 1996; Taylor, Bron, "Resacralizing Earth: Pagan Environmentalism and the Restoration of Turtle Island," in: Chidester, David/Linenthal, Edward T. (eds.), American Sacred Space, Bloomington 1995, 97-151; Idem, "Earth and Nature-Based Spirituality (Part I): From Deep Ecology to Radical Environmentalism," in: Religion 31,2 (2001a), 175-193; Idem, "Earth and Nature-Based Spirituality (Part II): From Deep Ecology to Scientific Paganism," in: Religion 31,3 (2001b), 225-245; Idem, "A Green Future for Religion?," in: Futures Journal 36,9 (2004), 991-1008; Idem, "Nature Religion and Ecology" in the "Ecology and Religion" section, and "Earth First!"; in: Jones, Lindsay (ed. in chief), The Encyclopedia of Religion, second ed., Detroit etc. 2005, vol. 4, 2661-2668 and 2561-2566; Idem (ed.), Ecological Resistance Movements: The Global Emergence of Radical and Popular Environmentalism, Albany 1995; Idem (ed.), Encyclopedia of Religion and Nature, 2 vols., London/New York 2005 (see especially the entries entitled "Darwin, Charles," by Lisle Dalton; "United Nations' 'Earth Summits,'" by Bron Taylor, Ian Maclean, and Heather Eaton; "Leopold, Aldo," by Curt Meine; "Natural History As Natural Religion," by J. Baird Callicott; "Gaian Pilgrimage," by James Lovelock; "Earth Charter," by Steven C. Rockefeller; "Haeckel, Ernst," by Richard Noll; "Religious Studies and Environmental Concern," by Bron Taylor; "Religious Naturalism," by Ursula Goodenough; "Conservation Biology," by Bron Taylor; "Carson, Rachel," by Mary A. McCay; "Radical Environmentalism," and "Earth First! and the Earth Liberation Front," by Bron Taylor; for further information, see www.religionandnature.com); York, Michael, Pagan Theology: Paganism As a World Religion, New York 2004.

→ Bioethics, Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Ethics/Morals, Garden/Paradise, Genetic Engineering, Landscape, Natural Science, Nature, Nature Piety, New Age, Place (Sacred), Romanticism, Spirituality

Bron Taylor

Epiphany

The word 'epiphany,' closely related to 'advent,' is used to designate the strange and unusual (if at times regular) 'appearance' (in Gk., epiphéneia) or 'advent' (in Lat., adventum, 'arrival') of a human or divine person who has been (thought to be previously) absent. It is followed by a temporally limited 'presence' (Gk., parousía, Lat., praesentia), which ends with the departure (in Lat., profectio, 'setting forth') or disappearance (in Gk., aphanismós) of the person in question. Both 'epiphany' and 'advent' can be used to describe topical conceptualizations and ritualized acts.

Gods Appear

1. a) In worship and sacred actions, manifestations or epiphanies are systematically prepared and introduced. Bell ringing or hand clapping call attention to the deity. Its name, and either a simple "Come!" or else artistic songs of summons and prayers of invitation, implore it to come; and believers await its arrival with uplifted hands. The manifestation of the divinity can be expressed in visual or auditory signs, in unexpected noise, in lightning and thunder, or, for instance, in a breeze, any of which must be interpreted and understood. Those present react with silence, gladness, astonishment, or fear, and turn away or cover their eyes. But in ancient Greece, the theophany ('manifestation of a god') could also be introduced in another way—by the ritual adornment of a pillar or sacred pole, with masks, raiment, and jewelry, with balm, with weapons: "The act of the composition of the image in some manner ritually guarantees the epiphany, is the epiphany" (B. Gladigow). In order to explain why a temple has been rebuilt, a cult introduced, or games scheduled, it is recounted that God himself has appeared, and has commanded it. The datum is entered in the calendar of festivals, and publicized in inscriptions; its transmittal "in the temples guarantees the conformity of the accounts of the manifestation" (H. Cancik).

b) In Greek literature, epiphanies are not conceived abstractly, as are other forms of divine revelation, but are perceptible by all of the senses: gods appear clearly and visibly, speak with human beings, and fill their surroundings with fragrance. But since the gods appear in human form, they cannot be distinguished from human beings at first. Repeatedly, then, there are accounts of gods who are not recognized, or who do not wish to be recognized, by human persons. Humans may be unsure whether they have a deity before them, whether they are seeing their fellow as a god and offering worship, or whether they are dealing with persons who style themselves epiphanic gods in order to deceive their enemies. Even wily Odysseus complains to Athena: "Hard it is to know thee, Goddess, for a mortal who encounters thee, however astute he be!"

2. a) In the cities of the Eastern Mediterranean region in Hellenistic times, a ritual of welcome, with ancient Eastern roots, had developed for the visits of rulers, its form suggesting connections with manifestations of gods. Within a few hundred years, it had been tranmitted to broad regions of Europe, including areas that still had little to do with a city's welcome of its rulers. In its basic structure, this ritual of the accompaniment of rulers consisted of three elements: (1) the 'arrival' of the ruler and his retinue (in Gk., epipháneia; in Lat., adventus), (2) the hurried assemblage of the population of the city before the city gates (in Gk., apántesis, hypántesis; in Lat., occursio), and (3) the 'attendance' of the ruler at his or her 'advance' upon the city (in Gk., propompé; in Lat., introductio). With this basic apparatus, numerous other components were joined that could vary with place and time. The same holds true for the dismissal (in Gk., apopompé; in Lat., profectio). Two further components of the ritual were occasionally also named: a preparation for the advent of the ruler with longing and expectation, and the blissful events and feelings supervening at the appearance of the anticipated one. The latter are reported exclusively in panegyric texts, however, which seek to evince the greatness of the ruler after the event.

b) Religious interpretation in the Hellenistic age: In Greek space, such rulers were welcomed with a solemn fetching or accompaniment, especially those who had placed the city in their debt in some special way, and upon whom the title 'Benefactor' (in Gr., euergétes) or 'Savior' (in Gk., sotér) had been bestowed. On these occasions, not only were these potentates compared with the gods, but were directly designated as a god, or, indeed, as the one God. Athenaios, then (VI, 253), describes the welcome of Demetrios Polioketes in Athens with the words: "Those joining in the procession . . . sang and danced, and repeated ever and again that he was the one true God, that the others lay in sleep, were elsewhere, or did not exist, but that he was the scion of Poseidon and Aphrodite, outstanding in beauty, and genial in his friendship toward all." A few lines later, the Athenian citizens reveal the grounds for their astonishing selection: "The other gods are distant, or have no ear, or concern themselves with us not in the least. But thee we see here present."

The angel from the → machine: epiphanic apparatus of Florentine engineer Filippo Brunelleschi (1377–1446) for the proclamation scene of a sacred drama (in Ital., sacra rappresentazione) at Santo Felice in 1422. The angel of the Annunciation descended to the floor with the assistance of a copper 'mandorla,' which was secured to a cupola-like wheel-construction that could be turned. Eight

The ritual of the fetching of the ruler has been transferred by the evangelists to the Savior of Christians, and this in twofold respect: (a) While Jesus at his last entry into Jerusalem sat only astride an ass, still he was received as a king. As he approached the city, accompanied by his disciples, a large crowd met him before the gates with palm branches, celebrating him with the words, "Praised be he who comes a king, in the name of the Lord! Peace be in heaven, and glory in the heights!" and accompanying him into the city (Matt 21:1-11, Mark 11:1-10, Luke 19:28-38, John 12:12-19). (b) In one locus, Jesus's return at the end of time, as well, is presented as a fetching of the Lord. While at his entry into Jerusalem, the epiphany of Christ is stressed as that of a king, with his last return it is the involvement of all Christians at his welcome that stands in the foreground, the participation of the living as well as of those who by then will have died. At the blast of a trumpet, Christ will descend from heaven, and human beings will hasten to meet him in the clouds, to a particular layer of air over the earth, greet him there, and then accompany him to earth, where he will establish his eschatological Reign (1 Thess 4:13-17).

Is the King Equivalent to Christ?

c) Christian interpretation of the advent of the ruler: Ever since the work of E. Kantorowicz (1957), the opinion has been repeatedly held that the medieval ritual of the welcome of Christian rulers was constructed in imitation of the entry of Christ into Jerusalem, so that the king being received was assimilated to Christ, and the city receiving him was regarded as a new Jerusalem. This thesis, however, cannot be maintained. Granted, the welcome of the ruler in the Middle Ages acquires strong Christian traits. But the king is greeted at the city gate by the bishop and clergy with hymns and canticles, and led in liturgical procession to the main church. This is not an imitation of Christ's reception into Jerusalem: the only elements that distinguish Jesus's entry into Jerusalem from contemporary receptions—the ass as his mount, and the acclamation, "Praised be the one who comes"—at most play an incidental role in the Christian reception of rulers; and even in panegyric texts, the entering king is compared with Christ only in exceptional instances. The imitation of the entry into Jerusalem was settled in an altogether different area, that of the annual Palm Sunday liturgy.

Stage Presentation of the King

3. In courtly ritual as well, the epiphany of the ruler could be presented on stage, so to speak. The sudden appearance of the Byzantine Emperor at the Prokypsis repeatedly stirred contemporary poets to comparisons with the rising of the sun. Besides plays on the ancient veneration of the sun, as, for example, Constantine the Great had promoted it, the Sun Emperor was especially placed alongside Christ. He had carried the divine light at Epiphanias, Byzantine Christmas, into the sacred cave at Bethlehem, and had radiated over the whole world as the 'sun of justice.' His 'appearance' in the shimmering light wrought the elevation of the Emperor into the light and to the heights above, and the ascent of the symbolism of light and sun, otherwise expressed only in word, was thus rendered a lived reality.

Literature

Cancik, Hubert, "Epiphanie/Advent," in: Handbuch religionswissenschaftlicher Grundbegriffe 2 (1990), 290-296; Dufraigne, Pierre, Adventus Augusti, Adventus Christi: Recherche sur l'exploitation idéologique et littéraire d'un ceremonial dans l'antiquité tardive, Paris 1994; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Präsenz der Bilder—Präsenz der Götter. Kultbilder und Bilder der Götter in der griechischen Religion," in: Visible Religion 4/5 (1985/86), 114-133; Idem, "Epiphanie, Statuette, Kultbild. Griechische Gottesvorstellungen im Wechsel von Kontext und Medium," in: Visible Religion 7 (1989), 98-121; Hack, Achim, Das Empfangszeremoniell bei mittelalterlichen Papst-Kaiser-Treffen, Cologne 1998; Kantorowicz, Ernst H., The King's Two Bodies: A Study in Mediaeval Political Theology, Princeton 1957; McCormick, Michael, Eternal Victory: Triumphal Rulership in Late Antiquity, Byzantium, and Early Medieval West, Cambridge 1986.

→ God/Gods/The Sacred, Government/Rule/Politics/State, Myth/Mythology

Achim Hack

boys, dressed as angels, hung on iron rings on this mandorla, and, at the moment when, reaching the floor, the angel stepped out of the mandorla and approached Mary, flaps were opened on it by means of a strap, and burning candles were seen in the background. The picture shows a reconstruction by Cesare Lisi. (Hubert Mohr)

Eroticism

Origins of the Concept

1. 'Erotic' is derived from the Greek Eros, the god of heterosexual love, homosexual persons, and pedophiles, as also of the longing of love, and is frequently applied as a concept fluctuating between 'Platonic' → love and → sexuality. Plato's Symposium during a merry 'drinking bout' among men, presents, in seven 'poetic philosophical' discourses, and in rich facets, the image of eroticism as a motor of life. It includes the physical desire of the senses, and even the witty-and-ugly—here, that of Socrates—just as much as it does joy in human existence with all of the qualities of spirit and soul, and the inter-personal human sympatheiai, attaching to that emotion. Here we must understand by eroticism a love that includes sensible (bodily) attraction and lust, such as has found manifold expression, e.g. in art and literature as a mirror of life and thought, including wishful thought.

Ancient Usages

2. The polytheistic religions of the Ancient East and Antiquity knew goddesses of love: Babylonian Ishtar, Assyrian Astarte, ancient Egyptian Isis, ancient Iranian Anahita, Greek Aphrodite—mother of Eros—and Roman Venus, in whose temples sometimes sacred → prostitution was practiced, as a fertility and life ritual. Animal-human Enkidu, in the Gilgamesh epic, becomes a human being only through a nameless temple-girl of the goddess Ishtar. The erotic sculptures on Indian temples are an expression of the joy of heavenly and earthly love alike, along with magical fertility wishes.

3. The Song of Songs, which for centuries has been interpreted allegorically, is the earliest and most sensuous testimonial of Jewish worldly erotic poetry. Other mythologically interpreted, 'subversive,' erotic material from the Hebrew Bible, such as that of Adam and Eve, of Lot and his daughters, of Bathsheba, secretly observed by King David at her bath, of Tamar, the 'roadside whore' who seduces her father-in-law, afforded themes of ostensibly sacred origin for European painting from the Renaissance onward, and in abundance. Veneration of → Mary and the saints led to a voluptuous, eroticizing iconography of female saints in Catholicism. However, also beginning with the Renaissance, ancient material and images of the divine such as Ganymede, Bacchus, Leda with the swan, the judgment of Paris, or the escapades of Zeus, offered subjects for erotic art. Allegorical eroticism appears in the shell architecture of the rococo period, just as, for instance, in the pillars of Mary. The 'cherubs' of Catholic sacred art are modeled on ancient erotic figures.

4. In Judaism and Islam, the prohibition of images has prevented a figurative sacred art. One might see erotic symbols in the minarets of mosques, as well as in much of the geometrical and floral decoration in Islamic architecture and book illumination, including manuscripts and decorative print of the Qur'an. Islamic miniatures radiate eroticism, through their joy of coloration as well as in their thematics, for example with the illumination of love scenes in Persian epics. Islam does not know the concept of 'original sin,' although the topos of the Fall, not so formulated in the Qur'an, was adapted from the Christian asceticism from the eighth century on, and increasingly served as justification for the determinations of the religious law of Islam, which disadvantaged women. The Qur'an commands the unity of sexuality and love in marriage (suras 2:223; 2:187; 30:21), but forbids sexuality and

The portrait of Dante's great love, Beatrice, completed by English painter Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1828–1882) between 1862 and 1870, is both the moving image of a memory, and a vision of eroticism and religion. Rossetti, who figures as one of the Pre-Raphaelites, has built his 'vision' on the drug suicide of his wife Lizzie (in 1862), and yet, at the same time, has sketched his own, spontaneous mysticism of Eros, death, and ecstatic union (in Lat., unio mystica) beyond death. Lizzie-Beatrice sits in 'deep trance,' on a Florentine balcony before Arno and Ponte Vecchio, and receives the poppy blossom, flower of death and opium ecstasy—from the bill of the dove that is the Holy Spirit. The death-longing of Black Romanticism (Novalis, Hymns to the Night, 1800), the erotic charge of Swedenborg's piety, and personal attempts at a contact with his beloved by way of spiritism, are tied here to a very unorthodox image of longing—the figure of a Madonna, caught up in heavenly and earthly love. (Hubert Mohr) visual eroticism outside marriage (sura 24:30-31) with commandments of chastity to both sexes and women's covering their hair and bosom. Sensual male fantasies play in the Qur'an in its concepts of Paradise, and were further developed later. The phenomenon of the occasioning of a visual, and auditory, form of eroticism, typical of Islam with its sexual segregation and the veiling of women, likewise is evident in stories from A Thousand and One Nights as well as the literary topos of 'falling in love with a picture.' A further instance would be the 'fashion for the veiled' propagated by some Egyptian fashion houses and stores today for young women. Beginning in the ninth century, a rich literature in Arabic, concerned with profane love, made its appearance. Influenced by Neoplatonism, it presents worldly love as a phenomenon that ennobled the individual man. Religious literature on married love, especially the "Book of Matrimony," from al-Gazali's (d. 1111) Revival of the Religious Sciences, places a man under obligation to afford his wife sexual fulfillment for the safeguarding of his marriage, and imparts psychological and physiological advice to be assigned to the area of eroticism. The delights of marriage (which is in Arabic synonymous to coitus) are here defined as foreshadowing the joys of Paradise (→ Marriage/Divorce). The voluminous formative and instructive Arabic Adab literature, and much from the classic poetry, betrays the hedonism of courtly society in its glory days until 1258 and later. Religious and sexual references are often amalgamated here in a libertine approach. Libertinism speaks from stories of the A Thousand and One Nights, as well. European translations, especially that of Richard Burton (1821–1890) and German ones which are based on it, sometimes overdraw this aspect to the point of the pornographic. That in Islam—as in Orthodox Judaism—the 'homosociality' of sexual segregation has promoted the homosexuality of both sexes, is clear from the literature, and is affirmed by Arab critical social historians as relevant to this day. In Persian love poetry, often allegorized, it is only rarely recognizable whether the love object being sung in its corporality, too, is masculine or feminine, owing to its lingual character and an androgynous ideal of beauty (→ Homosexuality/Homoeroticism).

5. → Mysticism in the monotheistic religions applies erotic imagery in its presentations of a suffering by longing for God, as also in its portraying the healing by mystical union. In the union of woman and man, the → Kabbalah saw the union of the masculine and feminine aspects of God, and the acquisition of mystical knowledge.

6. The demonization of eroticism and sexuality was already known to classical antiquity ('beautiful Helen'). Taken to rich depths, it is known in the works of, for instance, C. de Laclos, and de Sade, in the seventeenth century, and later in the Decadence, and is seen in the arts in a preference for biblical material and figures like 'Judith and Holophernes' and 'Salome,' as well as their reception in operas and literature.

7. Psychology since Sigmund → Freud analyzes the consequences of the repression of eroticism and sexuality, along with unraveling the code of expressions of their sublimation, in both the individual and socio-cultural areas (→ Psychoanalysis). It has strongly influenced, for example, the modern literatures of Near Eastern countries. Liberal representatives of Judaism and Christianity, surely partly on socio-didactic grounds, today emphasize the erotic openness of their religion, while the political systems of the Islamic Middle East, probably still influenced by Victorian moral norms propagated by colonialism, are inclined to repress presentations of eroticism and sexuality.

8. In Eros and Civilization (1955), with Freud as his point of departure, Herbert Marcuse formulated theses of a harmonization of reason and Eros through economic and social progress, as well as of the vitalization of Eros, and thereby of culture, art, and human happiness, through liberation from repressive toil. These theses seem rather utopian, in view of the economic and social developments of today.

Literature

Allen, R. et al. (eds.), Love and Sexuality in Modern Arabic Literature, London 1995; Ariès, Philippe/Béjin, André (eds.), Western Sexuality: Practice and Precept in Past and Present Times, Oxford 1985; Biale, David, Eros and the Jews, New York 1992; Calame, C., The Poetics of Eros in Ancient Greece, Princeton 1999; Claussen, Dane S.

(ed.), Sex, Religion, Media, Lanham 2002; Cole, William Graham, Sex and Love in the Bible, London 1960; Daniélu, A., The Hindu Temple Deification of Eroticism, Rochester 2000; Garrison, Daniel H., Sexual Culture in Ancient Greece, Norman 2000; Giddens, Anthony, The Transformation of Intimacy: Sexuality, Love and Eroticism in Modern Societies, Stanford 1992; Gledhill, T., The Message of the Song of the Songs, Leicester 1994; Hart, Clive/Stevenson, Kay Killiland, Heaven and the Flesh: Imagery of Desire from the Renaissance to the Rococo, Cambridge 1995; Parker, Richard Guy/Aggleton, Peter (eds.), Culture, Society and Sexuality: A Reader, London 1999; Parrinder, Geoffrey, Sex in the World's Religions, London 1980; Srivasta, K. S., Love and Eroticism in Indian Art, Varanasi 1998; Talvacchia, Bette, Taking Positions: On the Erotic in Renaissance Culture, Princeton 1999; Turner, Denys, Eros and Allegory: Medieval Exegesis of the Song of Songs, Kalamazoo 1995; Walther, Wiebke, Women in Islam, Princeton 1993 (rev. German ed. 1997); Westheimer, Ruth K./Mark, Jonathan, Heavenly Sex: Sexuality in Jewish Culture, New York 1995.

→ Body, Gender Stereotypes, Homosexuality/Homoeroticism, Love, Mysticism, Sexuality, Tantra I and II

Wiebke Walther

Esalen Institute

The Place

The Esalen Institute is located in Big Sur, California. Geographically speaking, it is an ocean cliff adorned with a lodge and meeting rooms, gardens, an assorted collection of dwellings, a swimming pool and a bath house, the latter built around the land's hot sulfur springs.

Amerindians, including the Esselen (after which the Institute was eventually named), lived along this mountain coast for thousands of years before the Spanish colonists and settlers arrived in significant numbers in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Thomas Benton Slate homesteaded the grounds in 1882, hence the local designation of the place until the early 1960's: Slate's Hot Springs. In 1910, Dr. Henry Murphy, a medical doctor from Salinas, bought the property with hopes of founding a European spa there, a dream that could not be realized until 1937, when the Carmel-San Simeon highway was finally opened. The Murphy grounds and Big Sur itself then morphed in and out of various incarnations, attracting the counter-cultural spirits of such local literary legends as the banned eroticist Henry Miller, the Beat poet Jack Kerouac and a young and still unnoticed Hunter Thompson.

The Human Potential Movement

In the early 1960s, Richard Price (1930–1985) and Michael Murphy (b. 1930), the grandson of Dr. Henry Murphy, decided to start their own little institute dedicated to what Aldous Huxley had called "the human potentialities." Using mailing lists Alan Watts provided them, the two men sent out their first brochure in the fall of 1962, announcing both Huxley's human potentialities and their own triple interests in "psychology, psychical research and work with the 'mind-opening drugs.'" A heavy Asian accent could also be detected, as both Murphy and Price had been deeply influenced by the Indian mystic Sri Aurobindo and Buddhism, respectively. This step was the effective beginning of what would soon become the Esalen Institute, which would in turn become the epicenter of the human potential movement (the latter phrase was coined by George Leonard, another major Esalen figure, and Murphy in 1965).

History and Development

The 1960's were very much defined by the American counter culture, which flowed down to Esalen from the San Francisco Bay area, by the Gestalt psychology of Fritz Perls, by the encounter group movement, and by the presence of Ida Rolf and a whole host of body workers and healers. The 1970's saw a growing emphasis on Gestalt work, now focused around Richard Price, Claudio Naranjo, and Julian Silverman. Other major influences included the LSD research of Stanislav Grof and the science of mysticism popularized by such figures as Fritjof Capra and Gary Zukav (whose The Dancing Wu Li Masters actually begins on the grounds of Esalen). The 1980's saw an increasing emphasis on Soviet-American relations, which culminated in 1990, when Esalen sponsored Boris Yeltsin's trip to the U.S. With Price's tragic death in 1985 (he was killed by a falling boulder), the Institute experienced something of a visionary crisis. Still, the 1990's saw a period of expansion followed by another crisis, this one catalyzed by a literal storm: the waves, water and winds of El Nino eventually collapsed a cliff onto the baths and sent the Institute into something of a financial tailspin. A period of reorganization and revisioning followed. Today, approximately 10,000 people go through Esalen each year, many of them taking one of the over 400 seminars or invitational conferences that are offered on the grounds as part of Esalen's continued mission to identify, nurture, and realize the human potential.

Literature

Anderson, Walter Truett, The Upstart Spring: Esalen and the Human Potential Movement: The First Twenty Years, Lincoln 2004; Kripal, Jeffrey J., The Enlightenment of the Body: A Nonordinary History of Esalen, Chicago (forthcoming); Kripal, Jeffrey J./ Shuck, Glenn W. (eds.), On the Edge of the Future: Esalen and the Evolution of American Culture, Bloomington 2005; Murphy, Michael, The Future of the Body: Explorations into the Further Evolution of Human Nature, New York 1992.

→ California, Esotericism, Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens, Mysticism, New Age, North America, Psychoanalysis

Jeffrey J. Kripal

Esotericism

The Concept 'Western Esotericism'

1. a) 'Esotericism' has become a highly popular term during the last three decades. Like → 'New Age,' it is a catchword for a lot of quite disparate religious or cultural phenomena, and its usage in a wider public differs considerably from that in academic contexts. Since its first appearance in the nineteenth century, a definition of 'esotericism' often refers to the meaning of the Greek esôteros ('inwardly,' 'secretly,' 'restricted to an inner circle') and lays the main emphasis on → secrecy and concealment of religious, spiritual, and philosophical truths. This characterization turned out to be not very helpful, given the fact that a lot of 'esoteric' knowledge has been published and openly discussed—especially (but not only!) in the twentieth century. Therefore, new approaches were suggested to what is today usually referred to as 'Western Esotericism,' because the phenomena studied under this rubric stem from European and North American history of culture.

While the adjective 'esoteric' is a common term from antiquity onwards, the notion of 'esotericism' has a relatively short history.[1] In its French form l'ésotérisme it is first attested in 1828, in a time when in the wake of → Enlightenment and religious critique alternative religious currents began to break away from Christianity. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries the idea that esotericism is something different from Christianity gained wide currency. Scholars described the esoteric as some sort of subculture, as lines of tradition that had formulated alternatives to the Christian mainstream religion from the Renaissance onwards. Like 'Gnosis' (→ Gnosticism) and → 'mysticism'—in fact often synonyms for esotericism in earlier scholarship—esoteric currents were regarded as having been suppressed by orthodox Christianity.[2] Until the 1950s, the study of these phenomena was dominated by scholars specializing in mysticism and Gnosis who regarded their fields of research as powerful alternatives to the institutionalized scriptural religions of Europe. Many of these scholars—Gershom Scholem, Henry Corbin, Mircea → Eliade, but also Martin Buber and Carl Gustav Jung—were themselves part of a counter-movement against the → 'disenchantment of the world' (on the "Eranos" circle → Ascona/Monte Verità).

The 'Hermetic Tradition'

b) It was the Warburg Institute scholar Frances A. Yates who in the 1960s decisively stimulated research into what would nowadays be referred to as Western esotericism. To be sure, scholars such as Paul Kristeller, Ernst Cassirer, and Eugenio Garin had already earlier noted that the Hermeticism of the Renaissance played a largely underestimated role in the formation of modern science and culture (→ Hermetism/Hermeticism); hence, the common notion that this 'superstition' or 'irrationalism' should not be taken seriously, for them was utterly wrong. But it took Yates's spectacular Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition (1964) to set scholarship on an entirely different track. In this book and in an influential subsequent article, Yates turned the tables and argued that modern science was the direct descendent of Renaissance Hermeticism. For many people this was a revelation. Suddenly, a forgotten tradition seemed to become visible, a tradition that had been suppressed by theologians but in fact was a driving force behind the scientific revolution—the 'Hermetic tradition.'[3] Although her controversial thesis was hotly debated, the impact of Frances A. Yates's works on the emergence of the study of Western esotericism as an accepted branch of religious studies can hardly be overestimated.

Antoine Faivre: Esotericism as a 'Form of Thought'

2. The most influential concept of esotericism was elaborated by Antoine Faivre who claimed that the common denominator or the air de famille of those currents that usually are referred to as esoteric traditions should be described as a specific form of thought (French forme de pensée). Faivre developed his characteristics from a certain set of early modern sources that comprises the 'occult sciences' astrology, alchemy, and magic, the Neoplatonic and hermetic thinking as it was shaped in the Renaissance, Christian Kabbalah, (mainly Protestant) theosophy, and the notion of a prisca theologia ('First Theology') or philosophia perennis ('Eternal Philosophy'), i.e. the search for an eternal truth that was handed down through the ages by certain extraordinary teachers and philosophers (Zoroaster, Hermes Trismegistus, Orpheus, Pythagoras, among others).

In 1992, Faivre put forward his heuristic thesis that the esoteric 'form of thought' consists of four 'intrinsic,' i.e. indispensable, characteristics, accompanied by two 'relative' characteristics which are not essential but which occur very often.[4] (1) The idea of correspondences is a crucial characteristic, because it refers to the famous hermetic notion of 'what is below is like what is above.' In the wake of the micro-macrocosm idea of ancient philosophy and religion esotericists view the entire cosmos as a 'theater of mirrors,' an ensemble of hieroglyphs to be deciphered by the adepts. It is apparent that astrology, but also magic and spiritual alchemy partake in this kind of interpretation. (2) The concept of living nature views the whole of nature as a living being, permeated by an interior light or hidden fire that circulates through it. → Nature can be read like a book and interacted with through active participation, for instance in magical acts (magia naturalis in Renaissance parlance). (3) Imagination and mediations are complementary notions, referring on the one hand to imagination as an 'organ of the soul' and the importance of concentration and focusing in magical work, and to the contact with intermediary entities that serve as informants and messengers to the absolute truth, on the other. The important role of → angels, masters, or divine figures in the process of revelation can also be described as mediation. (4) The experience of transmutation represents the idea that adepts of esoteric tradition undergo a profound process of transformation and rebirth. Faivre alludes to the alchemical doctrine of death-and-rebirth to illuminate the spiritual processes within the adept. The two 'relative' characteristics are (5) the praxis of concordance, i.e. the search for reference systems that show the common denominator of all spiritual traditions (similar to the idea of philosophia perennis), and (6) the notion of transmission that favors the initiation of an adept by a teacher or a group. While Faivre admits that these characteristics may not be limited to Europe or to a certain period, he insists that only those currents are correctly labeled 'esotericism' that show all four intrinsic characteristics, even if in different combinations. This insistence provoked criticism of his typology, because—in terms of periods—antiquity, the Middle Ages, and modernity are somehow marginalized, and because—in terms of traditions—Jewish, Muslim, and 'pagan' esotericism indeed played a much greater role in the formation of esoteric currents than Faivre acknowledges.

Esotericism as an Element in Western 'Fields of Discourse'

3. a) With reference to new approaches to → European history of religion, an alternative conceptualization of esotericism is under construction. In this interpretational framework, Western culture is described as pluralistic. Three assumptions in particular are essential for this approach: (a) religious pluralism and the existence of alternatives are the normal case, rather than the exception, in Western history of culture; (b) Western culture has always been characterized by a critical reflection on religious truth claims and the interaction between different cultural systems (such as religion, science, art, literature, politics, law, economics, etc.); (c) competition among ways of attaining knowledge of the world is a key to understanding the role of esotericism in Western → discourse.[5] Hence, esotericism is not a → tradition of its own, the history of which could easily be told, but an element in a 'field of discourse.'

Claims of Higher Knowledge

b) On the most general level of analysis, we can describe esotericism as the claim of absolute knowledge. From a discursive point of view, it is not so much the content of these systems but the very fact that people claim a wisdom that is superior to other interpretations of cosmos and history. What is claimed is a totalizing vision of truth that cannot be subject to falsification, a master-key for answering all disclosed questions of humankind. Not surprisingly, the idea of absolute knowledge is closely linked to a discourse of → secrecy, albeit not because esoteric truths are restricted to an 'inner circle' of specialists or initiates, but because the dialectic of concealment and revelation is a structural element of secretive discourses. Esoteric knowledge is not per se exclusive, but hidden. In principle, the revelation of esoteric truths is accessible to everyone, if he or she but follows the prescribed ways and strategies that lead to this 'land of truth.'

Totalizing claims of knowledge can be found in religious debates—from the 'Gnostic' search for self-redemption (→ Gnosticism) to Suhrawardī's school of illumination to Abraham Abulafia's Kabbalistic fusion with the divine (→ Kabbalah) to Jacob Böhme's notion of Zentralschau (Ger., 'Central Vision') and Emanuel Swedenborg's conversing with the angels—but also in philosophical contexts, as the late antique Middle Platonists or the Renaissance Neoplatonists clearly reveal. Even Hegel has been described as a player on esoteric fields of discourse because he presents his doctrine as the 'end of philosophy.'[6] If we look for esoteric elements in scientific discourses, we will detect them in the work of scientists who do not restrict themselves to heuristic models or to curiosity about how natural phenomena are to be explained but who want to unveil the master-key to the world. Such an 'esoteric spin' is present, for example, in John Dee who experimented with angels in order to learn about the end of the world; in the attempt of seventeenth-century natural philosophers at the court of Sulzbach to combine Kabbalah, alchemy, and experimental science;[7] and even in totalizing claims of contemporary scientists who announce a 'grand unified theory.'[8]

Although we sometimes encounter esoteric claims of knowledge in established and well-accepted cultural contexts, they can attempt to challenge the truth-claims of institutionalized religious traditions. Hence, on the discursive level of analysis the categories of alterity or deviance play a certain role. As soon as a majority is established, various deviant minorities enter the stage, both through strategies of exclusion by the majority and the conscious decision of minorities for alternative systems of meaning. The claims of the latter to provide an individual way to 'true knowledge' further fuel the underlying conflicts. Many esoteric phenomena belong to the field of deviant religious options, for instance certain Christian 'heresies' (→ Heresy), the reception and reconstruction of Hermetic philosophy, some techniques of ritual power (Theurgy, → Magic, Goeteia), or polytheistic and pantheistic theologies that define themselves in contrast to the hegemony of scriptural religions.

Modes of Accessing the Truth

c) The next step in addressing the esoteric components of Western history of religions is to ask for the specific modes of gaining access to higher knowledge. Judging from the bulk of esoteric primary sources, there are two ways in particular that are repeatedly referred to—mediation and experience. Here, mediation is understood in the same sense as Antoine Faivre introduced it into academic language, albeit not as a typological characteristic of esotericism but as a strategy to substantiate the claim for secret or higher wisdom that is revealed to humankind. The mediators can be of quite different natures: Gods and goddesses, → angels, intermediate beings, or superior entities are often described as the source of esoteric knowledge. Examples are Hermes, Poimandres (in the Corpus Hermeticum), Enoch, Solomon, the 'Great White Brotherhood' and 'Mahatmas' of the → Theosophical Society, or the guardian angel 'Aiwass' who revealed higher wisdom to Aleister Crowley in Liber AL vel Legis in 1904. From this perspective, it is apparent that the large field of → Channeling—a term coined in the context of the so-called → New Age movement—is a typical phenomenon of esoteric discourse, no matter if the channeled source is 'Seth' (Jane Roberts), 'Ramtha' (J. Z. Knight), or 'Jesus Christ' (Helen Schucman, A Course in Miracles).

In addition to—and sometimes in combination with—mediation we can identify the claim of individual → experience as an important mode of gaining access to secret or higher knowledge.[9] Again, this feature is prominent in the Corpus Hermeticum and subsequent literature, where a vision indicates the process of revelation.[10] The complex genre of ascension to higher dimensions of reality—in the Hekhalot literature, 'Gnostic' traditions, and also in various mystical contexts, through → meditation, → trance, or drug-induced altered states of consciousness (→ Intoxication/Drugs/Hallucinogens)—belongs to the category of experience, as well. Repeatedly, the claim of individual experience of ultimate truth was a threat to institutionalized forms of religion, as the reaction of the Christian churches to these claims clearly reveal. Furthermore, the mode of experience explains (among other reasons) why in early modern times esoteric currents were more openly embraced by Protestant denominations, especially in the spiritualistic and pietistic milieus that focused on the formation of an 'inner church' through personal experience (→ Pietism), than in Roman Catholic circles. Neopagan groups with their insistence on personal experience and their refutation of 'mere belief' in scriptures and authorities are also participating in an esoteric discourse (→ Paganism/Neopaganism).

Interpretational Frameworks and Topics

d) On a third level of analysis, it is possible to identify major themes and topics that frequently are taken up in esoteric discourse. Although these themes are by no means essential to call something esoteric, they constitute a history of ideas that lends itself quite naturally to esoteric truth-claims. Certain philosophical ideas and cosmologies are more likely to foster esoteric interpretations than others. Especially Neoplatonic cosmologies have played a significant role in supporting esoteric claims from antiquity through today (→ Platonism), with their notions of emanation, the transcendent realm of ideas, the mythical home of the immortal → soul, etc. In general, one could say that most motifs of esoteric discourse are derived from a monistic interpretation of the world, i.e. from models that constitute a unity of material and non-material realms of reality and ask for their mutual relationship (→ Wholeness/Holism). This unity is a necessary precondition for doctrines of correspondences as well as for magical rituals or ideas about living nature (or natura naturans in philosophical parlance; → Nature). Although monistic, pantheistic (→ Pantheism), or animistic (→ Animism) lines of thought are not per se esoteric—because they do not inevitably lead to a totalizing truth-claim—they can be seen as a natural backbone and explanation for esoteric modes of accessing the 'truth.'

Besides this general philosophical framework, in which the modes of attaining higher knowledge are located, esoteric discourse brought forth a number of recurring themes and motifs. Often, these are related to a claim of → tradition that is held superior to institutionalized religion. The whole issue of prisca theologia and philosophia perennis with its chain of distinguished teachers of mankind—including Zoroaster (→ Zoroastrianism; Zarathustra), Pythagoras, Plato, and others—served as a powerful tool in constructing identities beyond the revelations of 'mainstream' Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. Finally, among the concrete motifs of esoteric tradition are the secondary receptions of Hermetic texts, most prominently the Corpus Hermeticum, and other literary sources such as the Chaldaean Oracles (→ Reception) or—from the nineteenth century onward—texts related to Eastern traditions (→ Orientalism/Exotism).

1. See the overview in Hanegraaff, s.v. "Esotericism," in: Hanegraaff 2005, 336-340.
2. See van den Broek/Hanegraaff 1998; van den Broek/van Heertum 2000.
3. On the 'Yates-thesis' and the 'Yates-paradigm' see Hanegraaff 2001.
4. Faivre/Needleman 1992, xi-xxx; Faivre 1994, 1-19.
5. See von Stuckrad 2005.
6. Magee 2001.
7. See Coudert 2001.
8. Cf. also the religious—or, rather, esoteric—language underlying the decipherment of the human genome (→ Genetic Engineering). The vocabulary implied here alludes both to a divine potential of creation ("genesis," "genes," "generation," etc.) and to the esoteric theme of finding the ultimate language of the cosmos (the Ursprache, see Coudert 1999; Kilcher 1998).
9. Olav Hammer (2001, 331-453) correctly describes the 'narratives of experience' as powerful means to 'claim knowledge' in modern esotericism. This observation can easily be extended to earlier periods.
10. For the subsequent Jewish tradition see Wolfson 1994, esp. pp. 326-392; Idel 2002. On the Corpus Hermeticum see Copenhaver 1992.

Literature

Copenhaver, Brian P., Hermetica: The Greek Corpus Hermeticum and the Latin Asclepius in a New English Translation with Notes and Introduction, Cambridge 1992; Coudert, Allison P., "Seventeenth-Century Natural Philosophy and Esotericism at the Court of Sulzbach," in: Caron, Richard et al. (eds.), Ésotérisme, Gnoses & Imaginaire Symbolique: Mélange offerts à Antoine Faivre, Leuven 2001, 27-46; Coudert, Allison P. (ed.), The Language of Adam/Die Sprache Adams. Wiesbaden 1999; Faivre, Antoine, Access to Western Esotericism, Albany 1994; Faivre, Antoine/Hanegraaff, Wouter J. (eds.), Western Esotericism and the Science of Religion, Leuven 1998; Faivre, Antoine/Needleman, Jacob (eds.), Modern Esoteric Spirituality, New York 1992; Hammer, Olav, Claiming Knowledge: Strategies of Epistemology from Theosophy to the New Age, Leiden etc. 2001; Hanegraaff, Wouter J., "Beyond the Yates Paradigm: The Study of Western Esotericism between Counterculture and New Complexity," in: Aries. Journal for the Study of Western Esotericism 1 (2001), 5-37; Hanegraaff, Wouter J. et al. (eds.), Dictionary of Gnosis and Western Esotericism, Leiden etc. 2005; Idel, Moshe, Absorbing Perfections: Kabbalah and Interpretation; New Haven/London 2002; Kilcher, Andreas B., Die Sprachtheorie der Kabbala als ästhetisches Paradigma: Die Konstruktion einer ästhetischen Kabbala seit der Frühen Neuzeit, Stuttgart/Weimar 1998; Magee, Glenn Alexander, Hegel and the Hermetic Tradition, Ithaca/London 2001; Neugebauer-Wölk, Monika (ed.), Aufklärung und Esoterik, Hamburg 1999; van den Broek, Roelof/van Heertum, Cis (eds.), From Poimandres to Jacob Böhme: Gnosis, Hermetism and the Christian Tradition, Amsterdam 2000; van den Broek, Roelof /Hanegraaff, Wouter J. (eds.), Gnosis and Hermeticism from Antiquity to Modern Times, Albany 1998; von Stuckrad, Kocku, Western Esotericism: A Brief History of Secret Knowledge, London 2005; Walbridge, John, The Wisdom of the Mystic East: Suhrawardî and Platonic Orientalism, Albany 2001; Wolfson, Elliot R., Through a Speculum That Shines: Vision and Imagination in Medieval Jewish Mysticism, Princeton 1994; Wolfson, Elliot R. (ed.), Rending the Veil: Concealment and Secrecy in the History of Religion, New York 1999; Yates, Frances A., Giordano Bruno and the Hermetic Tradition, London/New York 2002 ([1]1964).

→ Astrology, Channeling, European History of Religion, Freemasonry, Gnosticism, Hermetism/Hermeticism, Kabbalah, Magic, Mysticism, Nature, New Age, Occultism, Paganism/Neopaganism, Platonism, Reception, Revelation, Sufism, Theosophical/Anthroposophical Society, Tradition, Visions/Auditory Experience

Kocku von Stuckrad

Esotericism, Astrology, Gnosticism, Hermeticism: Time Chart

Era 1: Early Premises of Ancient Esotericism (c. 2500–300 BCE)

from c. 2500 BCE	First astronomical systematizations in Mesopotamia	Under Hammurabi of Babylon (1728–1689 BCE), a calendar reform occasions the collection of astronomical knowledge.
c. 1500–300	Astrological compendia in Mesopotamia; astronomical diaries; development of Zodiacal schemata; first horoscopes	Calendrical and astronomical tables are further developed, and the competency of calculation is improved. From c. 1350, the first astrolabe is on the scene. Important compendia, then, are Enuma Anu Enlil (omen astrology under Assurbanipal [668–1626]) and mul. apin (astronomical series with the orbit time of the planets, etc., with the oldest extant copy from around 700). The astronomical diaries of the Babylonian Royal Houses (extant from the sixth to the fourth century BCE) served later astrologists for the extension of their theories (Ptolemy). The oldest horoscopes date from the fifth century BCE.

c. 1000–300	Appearance of micro-macrocosm models	This explanatory schema, basic for esoteric thought, appeared in parallel in Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Greece, where philosophy (Pythagoras, Empedocles, etc.) supplied it with a theoretical explanation.
Era 2: The Development of principal esoteric currents (c. 300 BCE–300 CE)
c. 300 BCE–100 CE	First Hermetic compositions in Egypt	There occurs a first development and formation of what was later designated 'Hermetism/Hermeticism,' namely, a piety centered on the divine revealer Hermes-Thot. Here is a confluence of Egypt's ancient sacerdotal tradition and Hellenistic piety and Platonism.
c. 100 BCE–400 CE	Astrology crests in the Roman Empire	The Roman imperial era leads to an enormous flourishing of astrology. As a scientific discipline (ars mathematica), astrology presents the universal model for the interpretation of reality.

2nd cent. CE	Ptolemy	In Claudius Ptolemy (c. 100–178 CE), ancient astrology comes to a temporary conclusion. Until the seventeenth century, his works Syntaxis Mathematica (presumably finished in 148 CE) and Tetrabiblos (Gk., “Quadruple Book”) are the most important manuals of astrology and astronomy.
c. 100–400	‘Gnosticism’	During this time, in the Christian and Jewish environment, new communities propagate an interior, and exterior, path to salvation in a Neo-Platonic and theurgical context.
c. 200–300	Corpus Hermeticum (Lat., “Hermetic Corpus”)	Composition of the Hermetic corpus, consisting of Christian, Neo-Platonic, and Gnostic elements.
c. 100–400	Nag Hammadi Codex	Compilation of the collection of Christian-Gnostic-Hermetic tractates, consisting of thirteen codices, with fifty-one works—one of the most important sources for early Christianity—in upper Egyptian Nag Hammadi.
205–270	Plotinus	The central thinker of Neo-Platonism, whose philosophy stamps the history of esotericism even today.

c. 300	Zosimos	This scholar, who comes out of a Jewish-Pagan environment, is regarded as the first systematic alchemist. His instructor was Mary the Jew. His comprehensive work was widely received.
Phase 3: Late antiquity, early Islamic time, and Middle Ages (4th–12th centuries CE) from the 3rd cent.	Mani (c. 215–275) and Manichaeism	Important conveyor of esoteric teachings, with great influence from Africa to China. Manichaeism became a serious competitor with national (state) Christianity, then in the process of formation.
c. 800	Jabir ibn Chayyam	One of the most important alchemists of the Islamic world (d. c. 815). More than 3,000 works are attributed to him.
980–1037	Avicenna (Ibn Sina)	Islamic physician and philosopher, who, with his Neo-Platonic/Aristotelian metaphysics, influenced the philosophy of nature, alchemy, and astrology in West and East alike.

'Gnostic' groups of the Middle Ages
c. 780–1400	Paulicians	Strongly dualistic grouping, spreading from Armenia to the Balkans.
10th–12th cent.	Bogomils	'Gnostic' community in Macedonia and Bosnia, then in Italy and France as well.
c. 1100–1229	Cathari and Albigenses	Two of the most important groups, emerging, e.g., from a Bogomilian context, in Southern France and upper Italy, bitterly persecuted by Pope Innocent III, and generally extinguished in the Albigensian Wars.
Appearance of the Kabbalah
7th–8th cent.	Sefer Yetzirah (Heb., "Book of Creation/ Formation")	Early Jewish mystical composition, with the first mention of the 'Sefirot.'
c. 1180	Sefer ha-Bahir ("Bright Shining Book")	First basic work of the early Kabbalah.
c. 1300	Sefer ha-Zohar ("Book of Splendor")	The Zohar is the canonical writing of the Kabbalists, redacted by Moses ben Shemtov de León (d. 1305) and his circle, and spread beginning in 1275. Other important authors of the time were Abraham Joseph Gikatilla (1248–c. 1325) and Abraham Abulafia (1240–after 1291).

Phase 4: From the Renaissance until after the turn of the nineteenth century

15th cent.	Marsilio Ficino (1433–1499) and the Florentine 'Academy'	The rediscovery of the Corpus Hermeticum and its translation into Latin by Ficino can be regarded as the hour of the birth of modern esotericism.
15th–16th cent.	Cresting of the magia naturalis	At this time, a series of key works of the esoteric world-interpretation appears, scoring the development of science, alchemy, astrology, magic, and theosophy—for example, the De occulta philosophia (Lat.) of Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim (1486–1535).
1492–1666	Development of the Lurianic Kabbalah	The expulsion of the Jews from Spain (1492) occasions the foundation of a Kabbalistic school in Safed (Palestine), under the decisive influence of Moses Cordovero (1522–1570) and Isaac Luria (1534–1572). This phase extends to 1666, when Kabbalistic 'Messiah' Shabbatai Zvi converts to Islam.
1550–1800	Christian adaptation of the Kabbalah	The Zohar and the Lurianic Kabbalah gains influence on Christian esotericism. Pico della Mirandola (1463–1494), Knorr von Rosenroth

		(1639–1689), and others, provided Latin translations that marked the thought of so many alchemists, astrologers, literati, and philosophers, from Reuchlin to Schelling.
16th–18th cent.	Protestant theosophy	Esoteric thought and Kabbalah have come into the systems of celebrated theosophists, first of all with Paracelsus (1493–1541), Jacob Böhme, Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772), and Friedrich Christoph Oetinger (1702–1782).
Secret societies as institutionalized esotericism
14th–15th cent.	Earliest traces of Freemasonic activity	First precursors are the artisanship legends, e.g. the Regius poem (c. 1390), the Cooke manuscript (1430–1440), and the first constitution manuscripts (from mid-fifteenth century).
1605–1620	Spread of the Rosicrucian manifestoes	Founding of the Rosicrucian myth, through the manifestoes Fama Fraternitatis (1614) and Confessio (1615/16). The normative (co-) author is Johann Valentin Andreae. Subsequently, the Rosicrucians' actual group formations arise. The aim is the 'general reformation' of state and Church.

1717	Founding of the first Grand Masonic Lodge of London (later, of England)	Legislation of statutes that are taken over by other lodges as well.
1776	Founding of the Order of the Illuminati by Adam Weishaupt (1748–1830) in Ingolstadt	Like the other societies of the eighteenth century, the Order of the Illuminati documents the close connection between the enlightened middle class and esotericism. The Order was proscribed in 1785.
1787	Founding of the New Church	The society adopts the teachings of Emanuel Swedenborg, which are to be ranged among the most influential esoteric concepts of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. The New Church, is still active today, especially in the United States.
1868	Founding of the Fraternity of the Rose Cross	Oldest group of Rosicrucians in North America, founded by Pascal Beverly Randolph (1825–1875).
Phase 5: Modern age
1875	Founding of the Theosophical Society	The Theosophical Society is the most important propeller of esotericism in the twentieth century. Founded by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky (1831–1891), Henry Steel Olcott (1832–1907), and William Q. Judge (1851–1896), it seeks to bring knowledge of religious history into harmony with mystical and esoteric 'original truths.' From 1902–1913, Rudolf Steiner is Secretary General of the German Division of the Theosophical Society.

c. 1888	Hermetic Order of the Golden Dawn	Initiatory Order with a relationship to Rosicrucians, Freemasons, and the Theosophical Society. It influenced the esotericism of the twentieth century (McGregor Mathers, Aleister Crowley, William Butler Yeats, etc.).
1896	Re-founding of the Order of the Illuminati	As 'refounded' by Theodor Reuss (between 1894 and 1896), the Order now has but a nominal connection with Weishaupt's Order. In actual fact, it is a matter of a texture of theosophical, magical, and occultist currents of the time. The Order has an involved history. After difficulties, in 1925–1928 there was another reactivation, and the founding of a 'World Union of Illuminati,' which, however, existed practically only on paper.

1901	Ordo Templi Orientis (Lat., 'Order of the Temple of the East')	The Order (founded by Karl Kellner) is an important collection of the esoteric minds of the time, such as Theodor Reuss, Rudolf Steiner, and Aleister Crowley (1875–1947).
1913	Anthroposophical Society	Created by Rudolf Steiner after his break with the Theosophical Society, a very influential movement particularly in Germany.
after 1960	New Age Movement	This is a mixture of extremely heterogeneous currents of the—especially North American, at first—counterculture of the 1960s, with theosophical, Asian, Buddhist, and esoteric traditions (preponderantly of the nineteenth century). Today this amalgam is often simplistically dubbed 'esotericism.' A kind of common denominator prevails in the premise that earth and humankind are in a process of transformation, seen as leading to a holistic view of reality, the development of humanity's spiritual powers, and to an incorporation of that being into nature. This has effects on religion, psychology, medicine, science, politics, art, etc.

1962	Founding of the → Esalen Institute	This center (near Big Sur, California) was begun by Michael Murphy and Richard Price. It is part of the Human Potential Movement, and connects seminar work with research in meditation, ecology, new forms of therapy, etc. It is of enormous influence in the New Age Movement.
1962	Founding of the Findhorn Community	Alternative spiritual project in residence and ecology, created by Eileen and Peter Caddy with friends in Northern Scotland. Not least of all through the work of David Spangler, Findhorn became an important point of crystallization for the New Age scene. Even today, Findhorn is of great importance for geomancy and spiritual conceptions of nature.

Kocku von Stuckrad

Eternity

As a concept of the contemporary field of signification, eternity can be conceptually apprehended through various definitions: (a) infinity from a temporal/chronological viewpoint; infinitely long duration of time; without beginning and end in time; (b) time as a whole, the sum of all time; (c) condition beyond the category of time; (d) non-fleeting, non-transitory; (e) the very long, but not infinite, period of time of a world age (Gk., aion). From a philosophical standpoint, the question of eternity is systematically dependent on the underlying conception of time. Eternity, infinitude in time (as well as in space) is often used as an attribute of 'the noble,' 'the lofty': for Plato, the Ideas—as the highest form of being—were eternal, since they have no need of becoming in time. In the theologies of the scriptural religions, eternity, along with corresponding attributes such as omnipotence, omniscience, and ubiquity, is an essential trait of God.

In Christian interpretation, time is to be apprehended as a work of God, since it was produced in creation: God stands eternally as creator, beyond (or above) the category of time. In the religious models of reward and punishment in the → hereafter, the conditions of salvation or damnation are likewise thought of as eternal, as these conditions—setting aside the Christian exception of purgatory—essentially involve an existence beyond time. Aspects of a timeless existence are also found in the 'dream time' of the Australian → Aborigines, as a form of mystically parallel space-time(s).

Symbols of eternity are 'A and Ω,' the circle, and the 'Ouroboros,' a serpent that bites itself in the tail, thereby returning to its beginning. The mathematical sign for 'infinity' is basically formed of an overlapped circle: ∞.

Literature

Horváth, Tibor, Eternity and Eternal Life: Speculative Theology and Science in Discourse, Waterloo 1993.

→ Hereafter, Time

Stefan Hartmann

Ethics / Morals

1. Ethics and moral philosophy are frequently employed as synonyms, to denote, systematically, the rules of ideal human behavior. Where the two terms are differentiated, the concept of ethics, derived from the Greek éthos ('habit,' 'custom'), denotes the systematic discussion and isolation of the good or commanded, in opposition to the evil or forbidden and reprehensible; while the concept moral, derived from the Latin mores ('customs'), denotes the ideal type of ways of behavior—the right 'doing' in concrete situations. Each area can be closely connected with religion, but need not be.

Examples from Recent Times

2. a) As the sheep called Dolly was cloned in Great Britain in February 1997, British researchers prided themselves on a scientific breakthrough. Their delight rapidly dimmed, however, as a worldwide wave of protest and rejection disapproved of this kind of research, and urged laws against such experiments (→ Genetic Engineering). In particular the representatives of the great world religions, among them the Pope, explained that in this case the demarcation between the technological feasible and the ethically permissible had plainly been overstepped. There was a correspondingly sharp reaction of disapproval toward the announcement by an American research team, in January 1998, of its attempt to clone human beings. In each case, it was explained that such research was ethically reprehensible, even though, for its defense and legitimization, the investigators had indicated its potential value for combating diseases like Parkinson's or Alzheimer's.

A signboard of proverbs at a park in Katmandu, in Nepal, reminds passers-by of Hindu expressions for the basis of living. Signboards erected by the Office of Press and Publication are in three languages: Nepali, Sanskrit, and English. The maxims inscribed on them are from the Tattiriya Upanishad, one of India's oldest philosophical writings. (Benita von Behr)

It was interesting that the representatives of religion always based their rejection ethically, and subsequently came forward as advocates of ethical principles, but cited no specifically religious arguments.

b) The Pope expressed moral considerations in January 1998, in a letter to the German bishops declaring that the practice, prescribed in Germany in parag. 219, of issuing pregnant women a counseling voucher entitling them to a legal → abortion, was also being carried out by church counseling offices. From the Pope's standpoint, ecclesiastical institutions were thereby participating in the morally irresponsible killing of unborn life. Notwithstanding all of the arguments of the bishops, the Pope insisted in this question that fundamental moral principles unambiguously deduced from the teaching of the Church be uncompromisingly upheld.

Both examples indicate a close connection between religion and ethics/morals. But they also underscore the independence of the area of ethics/morals: the arguments themselves are presented with strong ethical/moral grounding, and the relationship to religious stipulations is underplayed as far as at all possible.

Ethics: Deduction of the Good and the Commanded

3. a) Central to the philosophical concept of ethics is the thought that the content of the good can be specified in such a way as to constitute an adequate premise of the ideal type of the behavior of the good human being. Thus, ethics becomes a norm, for human behavior that is clearly defined and unambiguously specified vis-à-vis evil or the prohibited. This norm is intended to provide orientation with respect to newly appearing problems, and to offer reasonable solutions. Here it is presupposed that the human being is good in principle, and can be restrained from doing evil through the corresponding orientation (positive philosophical anthropology). Plato, appealing to Socrates, indicates the principles of the true, the good, and the beautiful as the foundation of such a philosophical ethics. Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics supports the same content.

Human Worth and the Concept of the Natural/Unnatural

b) The world as a whole, like the world of the human being, can produce an order of conclusions, with the help of reason, on the basis of its inner lawfulness. This world ought to be laid out systematically, in such a way that all concretely existing problems of human behavior can be inserted into this systematic order and thereby solved. The fundamental principle in such an arrangement is that the whole always takes precedence over its parts. This premise is valid for nature just as for society and for individual people. With regard to society, it generates the concept of the bonum commune (Lat., 'common good'), to which individuals must subordinate their private interests and their opportunities for self-determination. For the individual, this means that the good of the whole human being is to take precedence over measures serving a particular individual good. More recent discussion shows that, when the nature of the human being is understood purely biologically, the application of contraceptive measures is an unacceptable intervention in the nature of the human being, while the application of the natural phases of infertility (Knaus-Ogino method) is acceptable. A second approach maintains a broader concept of nature—one that implies that medical intervention from without is not necessarily defined as unnatural or against nature, provided that it serves human personhood, in which case means of contraception are acceptable. Two key criteria, then, can be held: the concept of human worth, and the concept of natural/unnatural. Here, 'casuistry'—theoretical case solving—is a legitimate and useful tool. In ethics, it is a matter either—as in the case of hedonism (→ Luck/Happiness)—of the establishment of universal principles of the good, or—as with the case of cloning—of a general kind and manner of how to address and solve newly arising problems.

Self Determination and Responsibility

c) Here every ethics proceeds from the premise that human beings may themselves determine their action. The 'Silver Rule' ("Do not do unto others as you would not have them do unto you"), the simplest kind of ethical imperative, has only this sense and meaning; and the case with Immanuel Kant's 'categorical imperative' is no different—"Act in such a manner that you could at any time impose the principle of your action as a universally valid law."[1] The nonobservance of an ethical imperative, then, may be requited with punishment, whether by human society, or by a metaphysical agent. On the other hand, were the human being to be altogether determined, there would then be no responsibility, and no guilt: punishment and repentance/expiation would have no meaning or sense (→ Determinism; Fatalism). Accordingly, the free → will of the human being is a necessary premise for the possibility of ethics. The extent to which this freedom of activity is concretely at hand is disputed. Lack of insight, powerful compulsion or psychic drive can all contribute to a limitation of personal responsibility, and therefore of the capacity to incur guilt. Modern → psychoanalysis, as it happens, has gained important knowledge and understanding of these features. Punitive processes increasingly take this circumstance into account. In the history of religions, a combination of determinism and ethics has occasionally been sought—as, for example, in Calvinism, whose premise is that, while human beings are indeed predetermined in their action (predestination), still they do not know what God has determined, so that the possibility of an ethics remains.

Validity of Norms and Values

d) All classical orders of value have their point of departure in the notion that values and norms have objective validity, for society as for the individual. Ethical conflicts therefore arise only when distinct ethical principles (e.g., saving the life of a pregnant woman who is critically ill, or the life of her unborn child) lead to a dilemma requiring a choice in behalf of the one or the other. Ethical discussion in such societies is therefore often casuistically decided. The universal validity of the values and norms themselves is not in question. It is otherwise in societies of a pluralistic Weltanschauung. Here the autonomy of the person functions as a criterion in matters of ethics and morality. In this case, there is a question of positing the norms, and grounding them oneself, in order to apply them as a matter of obligation. The per se evidence, the non-negotiability, of the order can therefore no longer be invoked in its favor. Concretely, this means that the decision is reached by votes cast in parliaments or supreme courts, in all questions of ethics and morality on permissibility and impunity (which are not the same!). A return to metaphysical principles for the validation of norms is not an option. For a practical norm, or law, the question arises whether means and ways can be discovered—and whether the validity of such a law may or even must be established—in order for its applications to be permissible and possible in a global and cross-cultural context. This feasibility must be established even against the individual interests of such powers and states that call into question or reject the per se evidence of the validity of the universal norm (→ Human Rights).

Morality: Right Doing

4. Human beings' right activity is a question of ideal behavior in all of life's situations and conditions. All cultures and religions have directives for action prepared for the implementation of this principle. For all the difference in their doctrinal content and systematic foundations, these directives are very extensively comparable to what the Judeo-Christian tradition conveys and transmits in the second Mosaic table: "Honor your father and your mother. [. . .] You shall not murder. You shall not commit adultery," and so on (Exod 20:2-17). However, the manner in which father and mother are to be honored can materialize very differently from culture to culture. By the Commandment, "You shall not murder," the Bible forbids, for instance, the unjust killing of human beings. But the same Bible also knows legitimate forms of killing:—capital punishment, or the killing of soldiers in military actions. From the very beginning, Christian tradition (Matt 5:21-22, 5:27,28) placed value on right behavior not only as a practice to grasp, but as the right attitude to demand, as well. In this way, Christianity powerfully contributes to the internalization of norms and values, and helps to develop—conscience as the inner instance: conscience is not thus integrated in the religiosity of all cultures as it is in the Judeo-Christian tradition. The reference to conscience is not without problems with respect to the universal validity of norms. Conflicts can arise between the demands of one's own conscience and officially valid norms. Christian tradition knows this series of problems very well. It became matter for discussion in terminology that included 'invincibly erroneous conscience' and 'situational ethics.' But a comprehensive answer was never given to the question of whether a person sins or not, when declining to follow his or her conscience in order to abide by the will of God. The classic example is the story of Abraham, who intends to sacrifice his son Isaac at God's command, even though to do so would violate his conscience (Gen 22). Opposed stands Jesus's appeal to the conscience of those who were about to stone the adulteress ("Let anyone among you who is without sin be the first to throw a stone at her"; John 8:7). In the theory of → drama, from antiquity onward, the conflict between conscience and law, or inclination and duty, presents the most important example of tragic conflict (for instance, Sophocles's "Antigone," or J. W. von Goethe's "Iphigenia in Tauris": in order to fulfill her duty as priestess, Iphigenia would be obliged to sacrifice her own brother). Here we have an expression of the relation between morality and religion, just as we have had, above, with ethics and religion.

Ethics, Morality, and Religion

5. a) For many centuries, Western ethics has been the special domain of philosophers, of whom most were also theologians. Thus, these thinkers conducted their ethical reflections in close connection with → theology. An exemplary case is the theology of Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), who understands the ethical philosophy of Aristotle as coinciding with that of Christian faith, since Thomas interprets God as the Good simpliciter, the Summum Bonum. In this fashion, he integrates Aristotle's ethics into Christianity (→ Scholasticism). Accordingly, Thomas's ethics and theology has God bestow the Ten Commandments because, content-wise, they correspond in principle to the Idea of the Good. Applied to newly arisen problems, then, Thomas holds, it is possible to deduce God's will and direction from a systematic unfolding of the Idea of the Good. Such a possibility and opportunity fail, however, when, as did the Christian Nominalists of the late Middle Ages, one so expounds God's freedom that the divine decree could have been different from, indeed the opposite of, what it has actually commanded. Here, other patterns of explanation must supervene. This discussion, arising out of the conflict over 'universals,' can be readily seen in connection with the corresponding one maintained, in Islamic theology, between the two dominant schools of Sunnite Islam. According to al-As'ari (d. 935)—founder of the school that bears his name, the As'ariyya—instead of "You shall not lie," God could have issued the instruction, "You shall lie." No one can prescribe God the divine commands and prohibitions. However, God's freedom does not mean that good and evil have no intrinsic qualities, and are arbitrary instructions handed down by the divine free will. Rather, it means that the ultimate truth of good and evil is known only to God. The underlying thought is that, being omniscient, God needs no directions from anyone as to what to think. Al-As'ari would find anything else blasphemous. Applied to the human being, this means that this theology is dependent upon the divine word as ultimate authority. The second great Sunnite school, the Maturidiyya (after the founding figure, Al-Maturidi) takes a different position on this question. Here, the human being understands with reason whether something is good or evil. But the foundation of why good is to be done and evil to be shunned is received from revelation.

Social Ethics and Government Morals

b) Another form of disconnection between ethics/moral philosophy and religion emerges from a basic premise maintained by certain religions. Thus, as religions of redemption, → Buddhism and → Christianity focus primarily on the redemption of the human being, and offer appropriate orientation. Whether, as in the Pauline letters in the New Testament, this orientation is granted exclusively by God's gracious condescension, or whether, as in many forms of Mahayana Buddhism, it is founded in the love of the Bodhisattva for human beings and concern to save them, in either case human beings' concrete activity in behalf of redemption plays a subordinate role. The history of both religions shows that this distance from ethical principles and concrete moral instructions could not be long maintained. As soon as these religions became state religions, whose formative effects must operate in all areas, they were propelled into the realism of all of the concrete functions of a social ethics and government morality. To this purpose, Christianity, once it became the establishment religion, very quickly borrowed its basic tenets and practical instructions from → Judaism and the Stoic-Cynic philosophy. Theravada Buddhism, in those lands in which it was the only establishment religion (for example in Sri-Lanka and Thailand), adopted basic ethical principles and moral instructions from → Hinduism and local traditions. Of course, where Buddhism was not responsible for government morality (e.g., in China, Korea, and Japan), it concentrated exclusively on redemption and left the ethics and moral philosophy to other institutions (e.g., Confucianism and Shintoism). The concrete result is that, in Japan still today, Shintoism or the secular state prescribe the governmental regulations for abortions, while Buddhism grants a generous forgiveness to women who have secured an abortion, and through the loving concern and mediation of Bodhisattva Jizu, assures for the fetuses who have been killed in this way the prospect of a blissful rebirth, as soon as these mothers have turned, in complete trust, to that bodhisattva. Grace and salvation at the hands of the bodhisattva become so visible in their format of purity, that, in this kind of Mahayana-Buddhist religion of grace, any aftertaste of guilt and atonement is circumvented. Religion and the promise of salvation are thus completely divorced from ethics and morals. This separation does not mean that human deeds are entirely irrelevant. They still attest to good or bad karma, but they do not rigidly cling to its effect, since the bodhisattva, who is familiar with the illusory character of karma, interrupts the karmic chain of reality with work and effect.

c) The relationship between religion and ethics or morality, then, can surely present great variety within a single religion. The history of religions affords abundant further evidence, from different traditions and cultures, of what is here presented by way of example. Seen typologically, the models are even more diverse than these variants. For example, there are societies that sanction the rules of human association with an appeal to God or a sacred order, and thereby withdraw the element of human partiality—religions whose operation is entirely and exclusively moral, as is often the case with 'tribal' religions.

All of these models have one thing in common. They begin with the solidly ordained framework of a valid order that, as such, neither stands available, nor underlies changes of principle. Everything that is or can be, is settled in this framework—never beyond it. Hence all of these models have a static element.

Ethics and Morality in the Age of Globalization

6. The more recent debate over ethics/morals and religion moves in a field of tension between (1) a relativization of values through modernization, and (2) the accompanying globalization, with its call for a global consensus on universally valid values. The proclamation of human rights in the French Revolution (August 26, 1789), which stands in an → Enlightenment frame of reference, may be seen as a first expression of this consensus. Of similar significance, however, is the "United Nations General Declaration on Human Rights" (December 10, 1948). In nineteenth-century historism, with its faith in progress, as also in the biologistic debate on the 'cultural evolution' of humanity, the relativization of a value system is shown to be the product of a historical development, in outlines like → Nietzsche's Genealogy of Morality. In recent times, the biologistic approach is discussed in connection with questions of → bioethics. Attempts at a global consensus on basic values, one beyond cultural relativism, find their expression in, for instance, German theologian Hans Küng's "Project World Ethos." Küng believes that the "Declaration on Human Rights" represents progress in the sense of human beings' cultural development. The "Declaration on a World Ethos" seeks to take this into account, and to note progress in humanity's ethical consciousness—progress that the religions can positively support and help to convey. The fact that representatives of all of the great religions—however varying their number—have signed the "Declaration on a World Ethos" shows that, while setting new standards, the principles therein formulated have definitively surpassed none of the norms of the great traditions.

The relativization of the values transmitted by the classical religions, in the wake of the modern development of industrialization, globalization, and so on, brings these religions themselves more and more frequently into conflict with that development, as has become clear from the discussion on → genetic engineering, → abortion, and so on. Accordingly, the suitability of the norms and values held so high by the religions is called into question down to its very principles. Now its further suitability is anything but secured. In the future, ethics and morality will possibly have altogether different content from that so far known through the history of religions and cultures, as well as through the secular world. The quest for orientation has restarted. What satisfactory standards it will find is unknown.

1. Kant, Immanuel, Grundlegung zur Metaphysik der Sitten, 1785. In: Idem, Werke, ed. W. Weischedel, 4:51.

Literature

Antes, Peter (ed.), Ethik in nichtchristlichen Kulturen, Stuttgart 1984; Callahan, Daniel et al. (eds.), The Roots of Ethics: Science, Religion, and Values, New York 1981; Gadamer, Hans-Georg, Hermeneutics, Religion, and Ethics, New Haven 1999; Küng, Hans (ed.), Yes to a Global Ethic, New York 1996; Popkin, Richard H./Stroll, Avrum, Philosophy and Contemporary Problems: A Reader, New York 1984; Schweiker, William (ed.), The Blackwell Companion to Religious Ethics, Malden 2005; Wilson, Bryan R./Ikeda, Daisaku, Human Values in a Changing World: A Dialogue on the Social Role of Religion, London 1984.

→ Abortion/Contraception, Bioethics, Christianity, Conscience, Evil, Genetic Engineering, Guilt, Hinduism, Islam, Judaism, Luck/Happiness, Psychoanalysis, Sin, Values, Will (free)

Peter Antes

Ethnicity

Ethnicity as a Pattern of Explanation

1. a) Since the 1970s, 'ethnicity,' with all of the catchwords it comports—awareness, group, conflict, cleansing, religion—has served as an explanatory variable for descriptions of relations between groups in multi-ethnic national states. It also functions in the attempt to meet the set of problems attaching to the formation of a state and/or nation, or to processes of globalization. In these cases, ethnicity offers a theory that seeks to explain the conditions and factors of the informal and formal development of groups. Consequently, ethnicity is concerned with interior and exterior 'line-drawing' processes among groups, processes that are based on the mechanism of various ascriptions to self and to others, and thus based on the contrariety of 'we' and 'they.' The members of an 'ethnic' group (usually) believe in a common origin, inhabit the same territory, and present themselves with flexible and 'coincidental' characteristics ('ethnic markers'), such as language, religion, clothing, nutrition, rituals, symbols, and a particular set of everyday practices. The mechanism of ascription leads, of course, to the formation of stereotypes of images of self and those of strangers (→ Prejudices/Stereotypes). One's own group is outfitted with 'good' characteristics, and the others with 'bad,' if not downright inferior, ones (→ Collective Representations). Additionally, processes of group formation can arise through struggles over social resources, such as education and training, a political voice, work, or natural resources, as well as arising in the independence movements of regions within a nation. Thus, ethnicity can be understood as a symbolical order pertaining to groups, which offers not only a behavioral orientation, but also special, interiorized categories of thought and perception, as well as a field of possibilities of (self-) identification. The essential thing is that ethnicity is in no way a universal or nature-given principle of the organization of groups; rather it is a construct that attempts to explain or justify the formation of groups.

Theoretical Positions

b) The theorizing of the central concepts 'ethnic identity' and 'group' divides in two directions. The primordialists, or objectivists, take their point of departure in the notion that (1) cultural techniques and images of the world (language and religion) received in infancy, and (2) the culture as bound to its origin, connect the members to one another in feelings and cognition. The situationalists, or subjectivists, reject the former approach as being deterministic and static. They claim instead that group identity is dependent on situation, and that it therefore emerges from the process of demarcation vis-à-vis other groups, a process determined by the moment at hand. Consequently, groups can be formed of members of differing cultures, languages, and even religions, and need not, as it might seem at first glance they must, be homogeneous. This approach includes even small associations or groups with other interests, such as profession or sport. The two positions connect loosely with each other in the discussion on 'ethnic' phenomena.

Ethnicity and Nation

2. a) The 'United House of Europe,' under the symbol of the blue star flag, has a few faults in its architecture. Nations like France, through 'internal' homogenizing efforts, and both the propagation and the exclusive use of the state language, French, are attempting to assimilate non-French cultures, lest it find itself awash in foreigners. The steering from above by government apparatus, along with re-conceptualized so-called 'commonalities' such as language, are dubbed nation, as contradistinguished from ethnic group. The nation is seen as a substantial social organization, and one that claims, for the (homogenized) group, a supra-temporal, if not indeed static, character. The French language is presupposed as a given, French history 'builds' a community bound to the apparatus of state. Further, the 'united' nation is seen as a bulwark facing 'outward,' against other nations. However, this perspective does not solve the problems of a multicultural community (→ minorities, → diaspora, → exile, worker → migration), or of the interplay of European nations. This shortcoming is shown by the Muslim satellite cities (ghettos) around Paris, in which mosques provide the only retreat and refuge for the 'others,' in this case Arab-African cultures. Religion, as an 'ethnic marker' in advanced industrial nations, is an essential conflictive factor. Stereotypical opinions of the scarf or veil, the opposition of Christians to the erection of mosques, and the wholesale assumption that every politically active Muslim is a fundamentalist, are examples of a fear of being overwhelmed by foreign religion, culture, and society. The process of a demarcation between 'Islam' and 'Christianity' unifies both the practicing members of the faith community and the non-religious, formal members thereof. Religion is then regarded as a symbolic order, and political unit, against the 'others.'

Ethnicity and Regional Movements

b) The belligerent confrontation between Northern Irish Catholics and Protestants is an example of regional independence struggles. Annually, the traditional procession of the Protestant Order of the Orange through a Catholic area provides new fuel for conflict. In the name of the Catholic confession, Sinn-Fein members not only battle with bombs for their other demands, but require that the Irish flag be hoisted next to the Union Jack on the parliament building, and that Gaelic be recognized alongside the commercial language, English. These demands are intended to clarify Catholics' regional awareness under British rule, not only symbolically, but actually. Such a use of religion serves to legitimize political demands on the part of an 'ethnic minority' (→ Northern Ireland).

Ethnicity and Tribalism

c) European explanations of conflicts and wars in Africa are mostly devoted to indictment of so-called 'tribal culture' ('tribalism'). The colonial invention of 'tribes,' as the basis of a unified, readily governable administration, consisted in a multiplicity of newly created units whose members frequently were brought together from altogether different cultures and language groups (→ Colonialism II). In order to facilitate administration, the colonized were organized (and Christianized) in pueblos. It is fallaciously argued in many places that it was precisely 'tribal conduct' that prevented their incorporation into states, along with generating bases of hostility among tribes for the 'wars' developing out of conflict over land. There are concepts of tribalism, or indeed of a 'racial' membership in 'ethnic groups' or 'ethnic religions' (a substitute for the older notion of 'nature religions'), that are idealized. The currency of these idealizations in no way alters the fact that human beings organize in marital and age classes, trade and professional groups, groups determined by proximity of residence, and groups formed along lines of extended family relationship (lineages and clans). These come first, before the group called the 'tribe.' Here the concept of 'ethnicity' emerges as an element of explanation and can just as well be replaced by an alternative, such as 'collective identity' (→ Collective Representations), which then must be defined exactly, and not introduced slogan-wise in journalistic jargon for political ends and group interests.

Literature

Banks, Marcus, Ethnicity: Anthropological Constructions, London 1996; Barth, Fredrik (ed.), Ethnic Groups and Boundaries, Bergen 1969; Baumann, Gerd, The Multicultural Riddle: Rethinking National, Ethnic, and Religious Identities, New York 1999; Baumann, Gerd/Gingrich, Andre (eds.), Grammars of Identity/Alterity: A Structural Approach, New York 2004; Brown, Melissa J., Is Taiwan Chinese? The Impact of Culture, Power, and Migration on Changing Identities, Berkeley 2004; Brubaker, Rogers, Ethnicity Without Groups, Cambridge 2004; Christiansen, Flemming/Hedetoft, Ulf (eds.), The Politics of Multiple Belonging: Ethnicity and Nationalism in Europe and East Asia, Aldershot 2004; Fowkes, Ben, Ethnicity and Ethnic Conflict in the Post-Communist World, New York 2002; Mackerras, Colin (ed.), Ethnicity in Asia, London 2003; Meinhof, Ulrike H. (ed.), Living (With) Borders: Identity Discourses on East-West Borders in Europe, Aldershot 2002; Mitchell, Stephen/Greatrex, Geoffrey (eds.), Ethnicity and Culture in Late Antiquity, London etc. 2000.

→ Apartheid, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Collective Representations, Colonialism II, Conflict/Violence, Diaspora, Ghetto/Ghettoization, Group, Minorities, Prejudices/Stereotypes, Race/Racism

Annemarie Gronover

Eugenics

The Concept

1. The concept 'eugenics' was introduced in 1883 by F. Galton, who borrowed it from the Greek eugenes to designate the science of "all influences that tend in however remote a degree to give to the more suitable races or strains of blood a better chance of prevailing speedily over the less suitable than they otherwise would have had."[1] Galton had developed his fundamental ideas on this notion as early as 1865 in reference to the theory formulated by his cousin Charles Darwin, according to which the evolution of all features of animals and human beings including talents and character traits is dictated by the laws of heredity, variation and natural selection. Galton explains the notion of original sin in biological terms as an adjustment problem which posed itself in the course of mankind's rapid rise from a low level of development.[2] In the interest of his own nation and the well-being of future generations, he advocates selective promotion of an intellectual elite to be achieved by using scientific insights to control reproduction and by regulating marriage (through intervention of the state, internalization of norms, etc.). What Galton envisaged was that eugenics should be "introduced into the national conscience, like a new religion."[3] As the traits he specified are in Galton's view hereditary, he, like many of his contemporaries, called for intensified research on the laws of heredity.

A distinction is made between 'positive eugenics,' in the form of programs aimed to improve the human genetic material, and 'negative eugenics,' which focuses on preventing undesirable genetic material from being passed on. The boundaries between the two are difficult to demarcate, however.

'Racial Hygiene'

2. In Germany the favored term was 'Rassenhygiene,' which had been coined by A. Ploetz. To be sure, Ploetz distances himself from the concept of race in strictly anthropological or, for that matter, national terms and uses it in the sense of 'the human race' in general,[4] but at the same time the Arian race constitutes for him "the cultural race par excellence." "Promoting it means promoting humankind in general," he writes.[5] In the case of a conflict between racial and individual 'hygiene' the former was to have priority, for as he posits, it serves to perfect humanity. Ploetz rejects the idea of annihilating or ostracizing the diseased, however, as in his view practices of this kind result in a weakening of social virtues which are necessary for the preservation of society. Instead he recommends shifting the process of selection from the level of the individual to that of the germ cell before sexual union.[6] Many proponents of 'racial hygiene' saw civilized communities threatened by devolution or degeneration, identifying their social institutions, laws, and health care systems as the source of such a threat since they helped weak individuals to survive who would have otherwise become the victims of natural selection. The common feature of eugenic approaches was the subordination of the individual under the common good and the view that it was imperative to take the good of future generations into consideration. In several countries, societies for eugenics or 'racial hygiene' were founded which published journals to argue their cause. Among renowned biologists critical voices were heard, however. O. Hertwig raised various objections to the eugenic utopias that envisioned societies based on controlled breeding.

In Germany and other countries there was vehement controversy over the question as to whether 'racial hygiene' should benefit humankind as a whole or whether there were preferred races whose improvement should be preferentially promoted. Thus the National Socialist form of 'racial hygiene,' as it was anchored in the "Law for the Prevention of Hereditarily Diseased Progeny" of July 14, 1933 and expressed by the Nazis' annihilation policies cannot be equated with eugenics in general. Moreover, favorable views of eugenics were held by many different political parties and ideological communities.

Evolution and Progress

3. One reason for the appeal eugenics has had since its emergence is that it would seem to fulfill a desire for moral reorientation by virtue of the fact that it is associated with the notion of scientifically founded control of human evolution in the service of progress. This desire has manifested itself in various attempts to formulate an evolutionary ethics, the founding of societies aimed to promote ethical culture, and the emergence of the German Monists League (Monistenbund) (1906). Such developments came about parallel to, and often in close connection with, efforts to promote eugenics and were an international phenomenon. Universal conceptions of humankind, society, and nature based on evolutionary theory often tended to replace religion and can be seen as a reaction to the dwindling of the authority previously enjoyed by the church and political institutions. Proponents often overlooked the fact that the goals ascribed to human evolution were derived from extra-biological values (world views, political, ethical and aesthetic value judgments, and the like).

The Ethical Dimension Today

4. The eugenic notion that human evolution should be controlled continued to be popular after World War II, as the famous Ciba Symposium in 1962 showed.[7] Today the controversy over eugenics has been re-ignited by progress in human genetics and the ability to diagnose embryos and fetuses in vivo (prenatal diagnosis) and embryos in vitro (preimplantation genetic diagnosis). When there is an indication that an embryo or fetus has a disability, a woman can decide in favor of abortion or, as is the case with preimplantation genetic diagnosis of embryos in vitro, opt for embryonic selection, which entails transferring one or more selected embryos to the uterus. After the cloned sheep Dolly was born, the potential for human cloning became a conceivable future reality. In light of the increasing capacity to manipulate human reproduction, some fear that we are on the way towards establishing a new, albeit 'liberal' form of eugenics—unlike the kind practiced in the past.[8] It is necessary to examine this argument closely, and in doing so, aspects of health care policy-making should be taken into consideration. In general one should bear in mind that classic eugenics was always oriented towards the improvement of the gene pool or the common good, not to that of the individual, as is the case today. Genetic counseling and diagnosis for individual couples is carried out in the interests of the mother or the family and the child, not with an aim toward improving the gene pool or the human race. One must ask what the long-term eugenic implications might be if genetic testing for those with a predisposition for untreatable diseases is introduced and reproductive decisions are made on the basis of certain tests which are dictated by cost-benefit considerations. The question as to whether abortion (→ Abortion/Contraception) is justified in the case of birth defects requires a weighing of values which must take into account the socio-ethical question as to the status of disabled persons in our society. It is difficult to draw the line between disabilities that are to be viewed as diseases, and those that are deviations from the goals set by families and societies, which put not so much a physical as an emotional strain on these groups of persons.

1. Galton 1883, 24f.
2. Galton, in: MacMillan's Magazine 12 (1865), 327.
3. Galton, in: Sociological Papers I (1905), 50 and II (1906), 52-53.
4. Ploetz 1895a, 2.
5. Ploetz 1895a, 5.
6. Ploetz 1895a, 231 and Idem, in: Vierteljahrsschrift für wissenschaftliche Philosophie 19 (1895b), 375.
7. Wolstenholme 1963.
8. Habermas 2003.

Literature

Adams, Mark B. (ed.), The Wellborn Science: Eugenics in Germany, France, Brazil, and Russia, New York, Oxford 1990; Galton, F., "Hereditary Talent and Character," in: MacMillan's Magazine 12 (1865), 157-166, 318-327; Idem, Hereditary Genius: An Inquiry into its Laws and Consequences, London 1869; Idem, Inquiries into Human Faculty and its Development, London 1883; Idem, "Eugenics, its Definition, Scope and Aims," in: Sociological Papers I (1905), 45-50; Idem, "Eugenics," in: Sociological Papers II (1906), 3-53; Habermas, J., The Future of Human Nature, Cambridge 2003; Kitcher, Ph., The Lives to Come: The Genetic Revolution and Human Possibilities, London 1996; Nationaler Ethikrat (German National Ethics Council), Genetic Diagnosis Before and During Pregnancy: Opinion, Berlin 2003; Ploetz, A., Die Tüchtigkeit unsrer Rasse und der Schutz der Schwachen. Ein Versuch über Rassenhygiene und ihr Verhältniss zu den humanen Idealen, besonders zum Socialismus, Berlin 1895a; Idem, "Ableitung einer Rassenhygiene und ihrer Beziehungen zur Ethik," in: Vierteljahrsschrift für wissenschaftliche Philosophie 19 (1895b), 368-377; Weindling, P., Health, Race and German Politics Between National Unification and Nazism, 1870–1945, Cambridge 1989; Weiss, Sh. F., Race Hygiene and National Efficiency: The Eugenics of Wilhelm Schallmayer, Berkeley/Los Angeles, London 1987; Wolstenholme, G. (ed.), Man and His Future, London 1963.

I would like to thank Dr. Susan Nurmi-Schomers for the translation from German into English.

→ Abortion/Contraception, Bioethics, Ethics/Morals, Genetic Engineering, Nature, Race/Racism, Science

Eve-Marie Engels

Europe I: Western and Northern Europe

1. For the vast majority of persons in Europe, religion scarcely plays an important role in everyday life any longer. In many places, thin little bands of mostly older people show up on Sundays in greatly oversized old churches. → Christmas and Easter are still the most important feast days of the year, but at the focus of these festivals stand the obligatory exchange of gifts and the sumptuous meal in the family circle, no longer the religious celebration of a community. Scholarship usually explains the dechurching of Europe with the → secularization thesis: with the dissolution of the traditional village communities, and the advancement of modern conditions, religion has gradually come to die out, at least religion in its 'churchly' form. A glance beyond the borders of Europe into the Islamic world, or Anglo- or Latin America, as well as a discerning consideration of the religious situation in Europe, nevertheless, show that modernity and piety in no way need be incompatible. A country's current religious situation evidently depends not only on the degree of its modernization, but also on the peculiarity of its current religious communities and on the tenacity of their rooting in society.

Confessional Organization

2. The part of Europe called Western Europe, in lands impregnated with its culture, embraces essentially the areas of the one-time Celtic and Romanic, as well as the Teutonic, cultural circle. At the same time, this region forms the historical heart of the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches. Despite multiple redundancies and overlapping, there remain clear areas of agreement between the old colonial spaces of an ethnic culture—today's national regions—and the confessional religious articulation of the lands of the Romance languages. Since its arrival and spread in the first centuries CE, the dominant religion here was Catholicism. The population of the Scandinavian lands, as well as of the northern and eastern German regions, converted all but completely to Lutheran Protestantism. The southern and northwestern Teutonic/Germanic areas form a transitional zone, an area of mixture between the Catholic and the Protestant spheres of influence. Generally speaking, for sketching borderlines between Catholicism and

F.D.2005
CONFESSIONAL MEMBERSHIP AND CHURCH ATTENDANCE
IN THE COUNTRIES OF WESTERN EUROPE
Confessional Membership
Catholic Church
Protestant Church
Other Christian Faith Communities
Other Religions and without Confession
5.5 mm. stripe width = 100%
Frequency of Church Attendance
Sundays
Monthly
On Feasts (Almost) Never 360° = 100%
NORWAY
SWEDEN
NORTHERN IRELAND
GREAT BRITAIN
DENMARK
IRELAND
THE NETHERLANDS
GERMANY
BELGIUM
FRANCE
AUSTRIA
SWITZERLAND
ITALY
SPAIN
PORTUGAL

F.D.2005
Trondheim
Coronation Church, Tomb of Saint Olaf
FINLAND
NORWAY
SWEDEN
Archbishopric
Turku
Uppsala
Archbishopric and Theological Faculty
Edinburgh
Seat of the Scottish Presbyterian Churches
Saint Patrick
Lough Derg
IRELAND
GREAT BRITAIN
DENMARK
Jelling
Roskilde
Lund
Jelling Runestone ('Baptismal Stone of Denmark') Birmingham
Coventry
Grave of Lady Diana Althorp
Westminster Abbey
London
Stonehenge
Canterbury
Saint Thomas à Becket
THE NETHERLANDS
Amsterdam
Blocksburg
Brocken
Berlin
Brandenburg Gate
Catholic University
Louvain
Externsteine
Wittenberg
BELGIUM
GERMANY
Cologne
Leipzig
Battle of the Peoples
Herrnhut
Ancestral Seat of the Herrnhut Brethren
Episcopal See of the Old Catholic Church
Bonn
Wartburg
Pantheon
Paris
Trier
Pilgrimage to the Holy Rock
Bayreuth
Wagner Festival
Carnac
Chartres Cathedral
Birthplace of Joan of Arc
Domrémy-la-Pucelle
Valhalla
Munich
Goetheanum, Anthroposophy Center
Zwingli's Reformation
Altötting
Marian Pilgrimage
Tibetan Buddhist Temple
La Boulaye
Dornach
Zürich
Oberammergau Passion Play
Alesia
Rikon
Maria Einsiedeln
Marian Pilgrimage
Taizé
Genf
SWITZERLAND
Alpbach
Calvin's Reformation
Val Camonica
Santiago de Compostela
Pilgrimage to Saint James Aostatal
Waldenses
Ascona/Monte Venta
FRANCE
Padua
Saint Anthony
Marian Pilgrimage
Lourdes
Marranos
PORTUGAL
SPAIN
Sainte Maries-de-la-Mer
Montségur
Castle of the Cathari
ITALY
Loreto
Marian Pilgrimage
Fátima
Marian Pilgrimage
El Escorial
Pilgrimage of the Sinti and Roma Montserrat
Assisi
Saint Francis
Monastery and Tomb of the Spanish Kings
Pilgrimage to the Black Madonna
Rome
Vatican
Montecassino
Benedictine Abbey
Córdoba
Former Mosque (now cathedral)
Lanzarote
SACRED TOPOGRAPHY AND CENTERS OF RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES IN WESTERN EUROPE Catholic
Lutheran Reformed Anglican
Christian (other)
Jewish Islamic Buddhist Hindu
Sikh
National Memorials
Alternative Culture, Art, Popular Culture
Prehistoric Places of Worship
0 250
500 km

Protestantism in Europe, one can observe, that, on the one hand, even after the time of the Reformation, Catholicism remained the stronger power where Christianity had spread very early, and in a gradual process of diffusion. These are the birthright states of the Roman Empire, as well as the regions that included a significant proportion of Celtic population (→ Celts) at the time of Christianization: Ireland, the Flemish area, and the south-German, Bavarian, and Austrian regions. On the other hand, in the purely Germanic colonial territories, which had been incorporated into the regions of the power of the Roman Catholic Church only relatively late, and partly under military compulsion, the Protestant 'riddance of Rome' movement prevailed. Whereas in most European areas of political rule, confessional unity remained extensively intact into the twentieth century, in England and the Netherlands a confessional pluralism formed as an immediate result of the Reformation: in the Netherlands, the Reformed Church of the Calvinists, in England the Anglican Church (Church of England), became the most important religious communities. Considerable parts of the population remained Catholic or professed in one of the numerous smaller Protestant faith communities. Germany and Switzerland were divided into Protestant and Catholic 'lands' or 'cantons.' Only in the twentieth century did a mix of the two confessions appear within the individual regions.

3. The close attachment that had prevailed between political and ecclesiastical rule in Europe since the times of Christianization remained in place after the Reformation. It was the sovereigns of the various regions who decided whether their subjects would remain with Catholicism or profess Lutheranism. The secular lords acquired influence over the occupancy of episcopal sees and other positions of church leadership. The church, for its part, supported political power structures, and itself pursued the politics of power and the economy on the highest level. On the basis of this constellation of political power, the two most significant social movements of European modernity, the → Enlightenment, and the socialist movement of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries (→ Marxism), declared war on religious and secular rule alike. Not only the negative image of the church prevailing in broad circles of the population since that time, but also a current sense that what religion has to offer, and its moral demands, fail to correspond to the needs and moral conceptions of these movements. These antagonisms have contributed to the distance taken from the church by more and more persons in the wake of the dissolution of traditional milieus of life. On the other hand, on the basis of the long historical tradition of unity of state and church, a combination of membership in the social community system and formal membership in the church, to the very present, has frequently been felt to be something that goes without saying. The overwhelming majority of people in Scandinavia, West Germany, or Austria remain members of the church, 'because that's the way it's supposed to be,' although a large minority have all but broken off any contact with the church community. How brittle loyalty to the church can be in countries formerly under state churches, is shown with particular clarity in the example of East Germany. As the churches became an object of hostility under the socialist regime, and church membership no longer entailed social advantages, as it had in the past, but now brought disadvantages, the churches were abandoned in quick waves.[1] Today, only some one-third of East Germans belong to a church.

Enlightenment and Socialism

Scandinavia and England

The Evangelical Churches of Norway and Sweden, and the Church of England, have always retained the official status of state churches. This means that they are financed by state funds, that the organs of state government have legal access to intra-ecclesial decisions, and conversely, that the most highly placed hierarchs have influence on state policy. The bishops of the Church of England are named by the English Royal House, at the proposal of the Prime Minister; and in the other direction, the Anglican bishops occupy a fixed number of seats in the upper house of the English parliament.

In the other countries of Europe, meanwhile, state policy and the affairs of church are much more strictly divided from each other. Many traditions and institutional policies, however, such as the system of cooperation between the state financial administration and the church, in the levy of the church tax in Germany and Austria for example, point to the enduring legacy of a state church.

France

In France, the interlacing of absolute royal government and church rule had been especially significant in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Since the French → Revolution, however, both state 'ecclesiality,' and the Church's positions in society, have been gradually sapped of their strength. Of the Catholic countries of Europe, it is in France and Belgium, today, that → secularization has advanced the furthest. On the Iberian peninsula, Christians, Islamic Moors, and Jews lived in peaceful coexistence for centuries. But this state of affairs prevailed only until strong ties were established between Royal Crown and Catholic Church, after the annihilation of Moorish rule in the late Middle Ages and the formation of a centralist realm. The church and the backward, patrimonial feudal system in Spain and Portugal, were able to maintain their position of social power, in reciprocal support, well into the twentieth century. Only with the end of the military dictatorship in the 1970s was politics opened up, along with a massive questioning of church moral teaching, and the place of the church in society. Attendance at divine service fell off sharply, while the number of those leaving the church has thus far remained within fairly modest bounds. Italy, with its church state, the Vatican, forms the center of 'Roman' Catholicism. Hence, Italians, more than persons in other countries, may look on the Church as 'their' Church. Thanks to its geographical proximity to the power center of Catholicism, Italy is the country of a particularly visible and palpable exercise, in its positive as well as its negative aspects, of political power on the part of the church. Italians are more finely tuned to the Vatican's dealings and machinations. On the other side, Italians know the church as an institution that represents the interests of the people—in earlier times as counter-power to worldly princes and foreign rule, today as counter-power to the state. Accordingly, Italians have an ambivalent attitude toward it. The film series, Don Camillo and Peppone, (after Giovanni Guareschi's novel, 1948) brought this to expression in characteristic fashion: Communist Peppone and pastor Don Camillo strive doughtily with each other, but ultimately recognize each other's finer qualities.

Spain and Portugal

Italy

Ireland

The religious situation in Ireland is basically different from that of other Western European countries. Here, secular rule and church were always divided spheres, and the clergy never adopted the status of a feudal ruling class. Instead, in an exemplary manner, it sought to realize the Christian ideal, and thus—since the Middle Ages—the Church has enjoyed special credibility, and a special bond with the people. The population's positive attitude toward the Church intensified even further, when, after the establishment of English rule in Ireland, the Irish Catholic clergy fought on the side of the people for the preservation of national identity and for political liberation (→ Northern Ireland). For this reason, the popularity of the Catholic Church has remained high.[2]

Catholic and Protestant Piety

4. The great Christian churches claim to be a religion for everyone. Nonetheless, both Catholicism and Protestantism specially tailor themselves to the life situations and religious needs of certain social milieus. This does not only hold true for the present: it was already the case in earlier times. Traditional Catholic popular piety is impregnated with the mise-en-scène of land and farm, in village communities. In such societies, religion fulfilled the function of ensuring the cohesion of the community through common rituals and universally binding norms. Religious ritual gave to the daily round, the cyclical course of nature, everyday life, or out-of-the-ordinary occurrences in the course of life, a socially transmitted meaning, thereby constituting a central aspect of the regulation of community life. In view of the manifold lethal threats to which people were exposed in earlier times, an important purpose of magical usages in popular religion also lay in averting distressing strokes of fate, or rendering them more endurable. The veneration of protective patron saints, especially Mary, is still a key component of Catholic popular piety[3] (→ Veneration of Saints; Mary). The piety of Protestantism, by contrast, in the time of its appearance and early development, was directed in particular to the life situation and religious needs of the upwardly mobile middle class. The latter is no longer dependent on the benignity of nature to the same extent as the land and farm population. What is decisive for the social success of the individual here is his or her particular achievement, and, increasingly, formal education. In this social class, piety gradually takes on a completely new form: the cult of sacraments, and magical healing, is rejected. Habitual, regular community rituals are not dismantled, it is true, but they lose meaning for individual belief. At divine service, the presentation of religious doctrine and morals in simple graphic or scenic forms accessible to all is replaced by a sophisticated theological discourse whose medium is the → sermon. An internationally equalizing 'study' emerges, whose result is that the proportion of the population attending Sunday services, even as early as the beginning of the twentieth century, was only some thirty percent, while the overwhelming majority of Catholics regularly attended divine service. This difference is partly reducible to the fact that, among Catholics, attendance at divine service is regarded as a religious obligation, while in Protestantism this is not the case. In fact, it can be observed that, owing to the respective peculiarities of Catholic and Protestant piety, different social groups are involved, and these have different attitudes when it comes to proximity to or distance from the Church. Even today, Catholicism has remained most vital in rural regions, especially among the agricultural population. The active members of Protestant parishes, on the other hand, are recruited disproportionately from the educated middle class, and the number of those who attend divine services is extremely small among farmers and working families.[4] Among the traditionally state confessions, most of the members maintain their membership in the church, even though they no longer personally identify to any extent with the church. At the same time, the piety of smaller Christian confessions, as for instance the Methodists, Presbyterians, or → Baptists, as well as the Calvinist Reformed Churches in The Netherlands, is more strongly marked by confessional traits. Members of these faith communities do attend divine services and gear their lifestyles to the moral ideals of religion; those who no longer identify with the goals of these churches withdraw from the community altogether. In The Netherlands, where a religious pluralism has been in place for centuries (despite the power of the Reformed Churches), a confessing community with a religious Weltanschauung is particularly well-rooted. Today, the secular sphere has taken over from the religious. Until mid-twentieth century, church participation was very high; since then, large numbers among the younger generation have made a radical break with the churches, to turn to the new emancipation and liberation ideologies of the student, youth, and peace movements.[5]

New Religious Movements in Europe

5. Since piety in the great popular churches is oriented to the religious needs of an average member, there are, and have been, church renewal movements, which repeatedly attempt to realize certain religious ideals better than this is possible in 'mass piety.' In recent decades, there have arisen, especially, two types of intra-church renewal: (1) 'basic Christian communities,' signalized by emphasis on social and political engagement, and (2) charismatic renewal groups, which stress an intensification of spiritual experience, along with 'fundamentalist' adherence to and observance of the religious moral precepts. These two types of church renewal movements attract only a small number of church members; nevertheless, owing to their religious activism, they have significant influence on the church. An important segment of the religious landscape of Western Europe today is formed by the religions of foreign workers and immigrants from former colonial countries (→ Migration; Diaspora; Ethnicity). We may name, here, as larger groups: North African and Turkish Muslims in France, Italy, and Germany; Hindus, Sikhs, and Buddhists, from India and surrounding countries, in England and The Netherlands. The maintenance of their religious traditions is an important means by which immigrants keep their identity in a foreign cultural space. Since, as a rule, these religious communities understand themselves as ethnic communities, and since they continue religious traditions that—as, for instance, the veiling of women (→ Veil)—are difficult for modern Europeans to appreciate, they are perceived by many natives as foreign bodies, rather than as an enrichment of Europe's cultural and religious multiplicity. In recent decades, a number of new religious movements, either 'imported' from other parts of the world, or arising in Europe itself, have come in competition with the established churches. New religious communities have thus far found only a small membership, their proportion in most countries being less than one percent of the population. This is due not least of all to the fact that Europe—unlike, for example, the United States—offers small faith communities scant social acceptance, decrying them as → 'sects' or 'destructive cults' (→ Anti-Cult Movements). In comparison with these groups, the lectures and courses of the → New Age scene involve a larger number with manifold self-experience and auto-therapeutic methods. Various studies have estimated the proportion of New Age activists at some four to five percent of the population of Western societies.[6] The number of those who occasionally read relevant bestsellers or try esoteric salvation experiences or meditation techniques, may be essentially higher. Although the New Age movement cannot be designated as one of religion in the strict sense, still, esoteric practices (→ Esotericism) and the cultic milieu in which they appear do fulfil functions somewhat similar to those of religion and church.

1. Pollack, Detlev, "Von der Volkskirche zur Minderheitenkirche: Zur Entwicklung von Religiosität und Kirchlichkeit in der DDR," in: Kaelble, Hartmut/Kocka, Jürgen/Zwahr, Hartmut (eds.), Sozialgeschichte der DDR, Stuttgart 1994, 271-294.
2. Connolly, Sean J., Priests and People in Pre-Famine Ireland, 1780–1845, Dublin 1982, 264ff.
3. See the contributions on Catholicism in Germany, Austria, France, Spain, and Portugal in Ebertz/Schultheiss 1986.
4. Höllinger 1996, 110, 265.
5. Frijhoff, Willem, Embodied Belief: Ten Essays on Religious Culture in Dutch History, Hilversum 2002; van Vugt, J. P. A./van Son, B. M. L. M. (ed.), Nog eens: godsdienst en kerk in Nederland, 1945–1986: Een geannoteerde bibliografie van sociaal-wetenschappelijke en historische literatuur, Hilversum 1988; Zahn, Ernest, Das unbekannte Holland, Munich, 1993, 297ff.
6. Mörth, Ingo, "New Age—neue Religion? Theoretische Überlegungen und empirische Hinweise zur sozialen Bedeutung des Wendezeit-Syndroms," in Haller, Hans et al. (eds.), Kultur und Gesellschaft, Frankfurt/M. 1989, 297-320; here, p. 307.

Literature

Davie, Grace, Religion in Modern Europe: A Memory Mutates, Oxford 2000; Ebertz, Michael N./Schultheiss, Franz (eds.), Volksfrömmigkeit in Europa. Beiträge zur Soziologie popularer Religiosität aus 14 Ländern, Munich 1986; Halman, Lock/Riis, Ole, Religion in a Secularising Society: The Europeans' Religion at the End of the 20th Century, Leiden/Boston 2002; Hollinger, Franz, Volksreligion und Hersschaftskirche, Opladen 1996; Kaufmann, Franz-Xaver, Religion und Modernität. Sozialwissenschaftliche Perspektiven, Tübingen 1989; Martin, David, A General Theory of Secularization, Oxford 1978; McLeod, Hugh, Religion and the People of Western Europe, 1789–1989, Oxford/New York [2]1997; Mol, Hans (ed.), Western Religion: A Country by Country Sociological Inquiry, Den Haag 1972; Perkins, Mary Anne, Christendom and European Identity: The Legacy of a Grand Narrative since 1789, Berlin/New York 2004; Russello, Gerald J. (ed.), Christianity and European Culture: Selections from the Work of Christopher Dawson, Washington 1998.

→ Catholicism, Europe II, European History of Religion, Popular Culture, Protestantism

Franz Höllinger

Europe II: Central Europe, Eastern Europe, and Balkans

1. With Greece as an exception, Central Europe, Eastern Europe, and the Balkans comprise the countries under Communist rule until 1989–1991. The 'category' indicates not only their geographical situation, but also and especially their common post-Communist quality, one not attaching to the countries of Western Europe. Since 1989–1991, after decades of Communist oppression, the three great religions of these countries' history—Christianity, Islam, and Judaism—are experiencing a process of transformation, in an era of freedom, democracy, and unrestricted capitalism.

At the ceremony of the re-consecration of a church in the vicinity of Kiev, in Ukraine, people press among the beams of construction scaffolding. During Socialism, many churches were used for secular ends—for instance, as a museum or a swimming pool—and then were repossessed as houses of God. (Benita von Behr)

2. In the countries of Central/Eastern Europe and the Balkans, except for Albania, the Christian churches form the largest religious communities among the faithful of the population. Historically, Christianity developed in the form of (1) the Orthodox national churches, (2) the Roman Catholic Church, and (3) the Protestant churches.

a) Common predications: The Communist era was one of antireligious propaganda, and the repression and persecution of the Christian churches. Many of the faithful and their leaders had to suffer constraints, disadvantages, and harassment, often even martyrdom. At the same time, there was also collaboration with the state on the part of church leaders, so that the churches themselves became a part of government repression. For instance, priests who were doing successful youth work, upon the state's being informed of this by their superiors, were liable to punishment. On April 29, 1988, as part of the implementation of his policy of glasnost ('openness'), perestroika ('reconstruction'), and democratization, First Secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union Mikhail Gorbachev made an overture to Russian Orthodox Patriarch Pimen, proposing a new Russian religious policy: he called on the churches to collaborate in perestroika. New religious laws in the countries of Eastern Europe and the Balkans gave the churches a new legal base, granting them religious freedom, and attempting to regulate church-state relations. In countries like Poland, Lithuania, Latvia, Czechoslovakia, and Rumania, together with Ukraine, church groups committed to human worth and freedom played an important role in the democratic revolution that led to the collapse of the Communist governments.

After forty, or even seventy, years of state repression, the churches now confront a new beginning, as they see the renovation of chapels,

The map indicates the religion, or Christian confession, that has the most members in the respective countries. Absolute numbers must be interpreted cautiously. For example, people who list themselves as 'Orthodox' in Russia do not necessarily mean that they are practicing Orthodox Christians. They may mean that they see the concept 'Orthodox' as a name for their national identification as Russian. Catholicism can have the same function for a Pole, or Islam for a member of an ethnic group that is traditionally Muslim.

churches, and monasteries. Thus, despite Moscow's financial straits, the Church of the Mother of God Our Lady of Kazan at the corner of Red Square, and not far away the Chapel of the Iberian Mother of God, and on the banks of the Moscow River the Cathedral of Christ the Redeemer, have all been splendidly rebuilt. In Vilnius, the capital of Lithuania, the Atheism Museum has been rededicated as the Church of Saint Casmir, Patron of Lithuania. Many church advocates set great hopes on state reparation and the restitution of church property. But many buildings have for years been used for other purposes, and a speedy restoration is often difficult. The enormous growth rate in the number of new members originally reported by church offices has presently stagnated. Initial sympathy for the churches as the persecuted institutions that once dared to resist Communism is once more declining. Nonetheless, in many places, new parishes are coming into being on the basis of new membership, and living an active community life. There are other ways in which the churches are once more becoming familiar. State television networks run religious presentations, church publishers print newspapers and books offered for sale in secular and Christian bookstores alike. In Russia, the priest is once again summoned to bless a new shop or restaurant. In Romania, religion classes are guaranteed under the auspices of the state in public schools. Various national governments foster the establishment of special pastoral ministries (prisons, etc.). In Russia and Poland, military chaplaincies are already in place.

Restoration or Reform?

But the new freedom places the churches before a new question: restoration or reform? More is at issue here than merely the manner of transmittal of the faith to new believers. The question concerns especially the very understanding of the institution of the Church and its position in society. The restorative forces in the churches simply wish to recoup what was lost in the anti-religious time of Communism. In Russia, these elements simply call for the restoration of the Church of pre-Communist, Czarist times, with its intimate alliance of throne and altar, Church and nation. With its doctrines, religious forms, and traditional involvement in national policy, the Church ought to be restored to its old brilliance and power. Included among the goals of the restorative forces are the revival of hierarchical authority, pure doctrine, old cultic usages, and old instruction. Inner uniformity, inflexibility, partition from secular powers and other denominations, popular mysticism, politico-religious ideologies like pan-Slavism and anti-Semitism, and, to an extent, even state support for its own privileges, are demanded as the Church's right. This restorative outlook can arouse powerful new hopes, in many churchgoers and new believers alike; in others, however, it arouses anticlerical feelings and reactions. The reformative forces see the churches' new departure in the post-Communist era not simply in a restored Church, but in a Church reformed in head and members, with the opportunity and capacity to make its teaching and spirituality available. They therefore seek new pathways, in community building, in catechesis, and in a vernacular liturgy. They look for enlarged democratic structures, equality of woman in the churches, ecumenical cooperation, openness to a pluralistic society and secular culture, more sensitivity for society's social problems, and the development of concepts for the future of humanity. Reformative circles are to be found mostly among youth and the educated, and mostly in cities.

National Orthodox Churches

b) Confessional differentiation: The Balkan countries, Russia, Ukraine, and Byelorussia have jurisdictionally independent ('autocephalous') national Orthodox churches. This structure underscores the unity of nation (ethnic group) and church. Thereby, of course, the various churches are divided from one another; at the same time, through their unity in liturgy, spirituality, and theology, the individual churches experience a sense of oneness in the common Orthodox Church family. But the collapse of the Communist states has led to special problems. The Patriarchate of Moscow must accept the fact that the creation of independence in the republics of Ukraine, Byelorussia, Estonia, and Latvia has yielded autonomous Orthodox churches in these countries. Since the 'Russian Orthodox Church Abroad,' like the 'catacomb church' on Russian soil, has founded its own communities, priests and monks in these areas offer persons the opportunity to detach themselves from the Patriarchate. In the Serbian Orthodox Church, after 1991, in the conflict over the separation from the former Yugoslavia, the tight bond of ethnic group and church promoted the sharpening of that confrontation. In 1992, in the Bulgarian Orthodox Church, and in 1997, in the Georgian Orthodox Church, allegations of collaborationism lodged against their respective patriarchs, Maxim and Ilia, produced divisions in these churches.

Catholics

In Poland, Lithuania, Slovenia, and Croatia, Catholics constitute the large majority of the believing population, with Poland especially counting as the Catholic country in Central and Eastern Europe. After the Second World War, many Poles came to see the Roman Catholic Church as the symbol of national feeling, and of opposition to Russia. It enjoyed a high moral authority in society, and even, to an extent, with the Communist government. The bishops were often not only representatives of the Church, but genuine advocates of the people. The election of Pole Karol Woityla as Pope John Paul II in 1978 likewise strengthened the Polish church. The labor movement Solidárnosc (Pol., 'Solidarity'), appearing in 1980 under its chairperson Lech Walesa, was strongly supported by church forces and had its martyr in Chaplain Jerzy Popieluszko, murdered by the Secret Police in 1984 and now venerated throughout Poland. Even since the political shift, Polish Catholicism has been impressive in its large number of priests and seminarians, its well-attended Sunday liturgies, and the traditional collective usages of piety. Pilgrimages from all parts of Poland to the 'image of grace' of Our Lady of Czenstochowa, as well as to other regional places of pilgrimage, are demonstrations of Catholicism's awareness of its power.

Still, in a free and democratic Poland, Catholicism as a whole is losing the unity of a sealed phenomenon, and is beginning to differentiate. There are Catholics who wish for a Catholic political state, but the majority support the liberal democratic system. For many church representatives, the Church is thought of as a political force that ought to intervene in politics directly. Others insist that the Church's work of formation enables Catholics to live Christian values as their own, personal responsibility, in an open, pluralistic society.

Protestant Churches

In the Czech Republic, Slovakia, and Hungary, in which the Reformation succeeded, various Protestant churches are of significance. Debrez, in Hungary, is called the 'Calvinist Rome.' When the Baltic provinces separated from the Russian Empire in 1917–1918, and formed their own states, the 'Evangelical Lutheran Church in Estonia' and the 'Evangelical Lutheran Church in Latvia' appeared. These churches played a demonstrable part in the national rebirth of their countries at the close of the 1980s. They still represent a strongly national standpoint, as is shown by their emphatic participation in the dedication of national monuments and buildings. In all of the other countries of Central and Eastern Europe, Protestant churches are minority churches, small or miniscule.

Islam

3. During Communism, Islam was exposed to atheistic propaganda, and, in part, strongly repressed. Albania, the only state in Europe with a Muslim majority, declared itself in 1967 the 'first atheistic state in the world.' All of the mosques were closed, and all religious activity prohibited. In Bulgaria, Muslims had to give up their Islamic names for Christian ones. Here, state pressure led to several waves of emigration.

After the political turning point of 1989, all of the states in Eastern Europe passed laws granting Islam freedom of belief. Albania has entered the Islamic Council and reached out to the Arab countries. In Bulgaria, Muslims have succeeded in having the legal fiction of their Christian names revoked, have had their property restored, and have created an Islamic identity there. In Romania, Islam is a minority religion struggling for survival. In Hungary, there is a little community of diplomats and students only in Budapest. In Greece, Muslims of Turkish extraction live in western Thrace, and Pomakish Muslims are to be found on certain islands, as well as in the regions bordering on Bulgaria. In the states of the former Yugoslavia, there are Muslim majorities in → Bosnia-Herzegovina and Kosovo. Muslims are at times exposed to great propagandistic pressure. The majority of Muslims do not seek a separate Muslim state, but a peaceful coexistence with other religions in democratic, free states. With all of the importance that they ascribe to the preservation of their religious identity as Muslims, they nevertheless wish to maintain their connection with Western culture. Some examples of this openness are their attitudes in favor of the unveiling of women, free converse of woman in society, Western European dress, and so on. Theirs is a 'European' Islam, freer (e.g., in the area of the prohibition of alcohol and pork, or times for prayer), and partly syncretistic (veneration of Mary, prayer alcoves with icons, Christmas tree). But a continuation of belligerent conditions could once more restore Islam's severity and intolerance, as strict Islamic governments like those of Iran or Saudi Arabia attach supplies of food and weapons to the maintenance of religious usages. In Russia, after the Russian Orthodox Church, Islam is the largest faith community. Moscow has one of the largest Islamic communities in Europe. Along with Kazan, Moscow is now an important center for Muslims of European Russia. Islam in Russia has different faces. There is the conservative Islam of Dagestan and the northern Caucasus. An important role in the social and spiritual life of various Muslim peoples is played by a number of Sufi brotherhoods (→ Sufism). As early as the nineteenth century, the Tatars along the Volga, in Crimea, and other parts of Russia produced an important Islamic reform movement, the Dshadid (Arab., 'new,' 'modern') movement. It had elements of enlightenment, attention to formation and education, and even nationalism. For generations, the Muslims along the Volga have been solidly rooted in European Russia. They, like many Muslims of the metropolises as well, see themselves as 'Russian Muslims,' in a multi-religious, post-Soviet Russia. Other Muslims, on the contrary, such as those in the Czech Republic, manifest from religious motives autonomist and separatist tendencies, but scarcely fundamentalist ones. The Muslim republics have constitutions geared to the secular national state, neutral in matters of religion. The majority of the population does not seek a state, social, economic, or cultural system resting solely on Islamic foundations, although they cultivate Islamic popular customs like circumcision, matrimonial and funeral rites, pilgrimages to local sanctuaries, and veneration of the saints.

Judaism

4. For centuries, scattered over a broad geographic space, Judaism was a living religion in Europe. In countries under German occupation, the genocide (→ Shoah) mounted by → National Socialism destroyed religious Judaism, along with a great proportion of its specific customs and usages. Under Communist rule, local persecutions and anti-Semitic and economic pressures led to the emigration of many Jews. The political shift of 1989 brought the right of free practice, but a once state-sponsored → anti-Semitism still exists in many places, in private and popular form. Nationalist circles especially, like the Russian Pamyat' movements, bend anti-Semitism to their own ends, recirculating fantasies of infiltration, theories of international conspiracy, religion-rooted stereotypes, even the myth of ritual murder. As a result, the emigration of the Jews is not yet finished; indeed, since 1990 it has received new impulse. In many places, Jewish communities are dying of old age. Their activities are often promoted only from without, out of folkloric interest, or in a German attempt to 'make up' for the Shoah. In many countries of Central and Eastern Europe, then, Judaism is on the verge of extinction.

However, despite all discrimination and persecution, a vigorous Jewish life continues in Hungary and Russia. Indeed, Hungarian Judaism is 100,000 strong. Most communities there are Ashkenazi and of a conservative orientation. The splendid Dohány temple in Budapest was restored in 1990. The library and archives of the Budapest Rabbinical Seminary are of inestimable value for Judaic studies. The Jewish religious community in Russia is the third largest in the world, after those of the United States and Israel alone. The Jewish community there is estimated at 1.5 million, although many Jews are non-religious. Despite secularization, however, there is a Jewish renaissance. Numerous Jewish culture centers and museums have been opened, synagogues and Hebrew schools are under construction, religious literature is being printed once more. There are Talmudic schools in Moscow and St. Petersburg.

Buddhism

5. The Kalmuks first brought Buddhism to Russia in the sixteenth century. Still today, Elista, capital of the Kalmuk Republic, north of the Caspian Sea, is the center of Tibetan Buddhism in European Russia. In 1991, it received its first visit by the Dalai Lama.

New Religious Movements

6. In the former Communist countries, decades of atheistic education have produced an extensive de-Christianization, as well as a general absence of institutionalized religion. As early as the 1970s, an increased interest in religious, mystical, and esoteric literature can be observed. The political shift of 1989 at first built up interest in religion, but this profited institutionalized religions only partially, and rather sparked the many new religious movements and groups (→ New Religions). These, with the help of extensive financial means from America and East Asia, pursue intensive advertising, in newspapers, with placards, and in some radio and television broadcasts. The → Hare Krishna Movement (ISKCON) under Brahma Kumaris, Moon's → Unification Church, Transcendental Meditation, and the Church of → Scientology, deserve mention. In Ukraine and Byelorussia, there are groups practicing Neopaganism, as well, part of whose support comes from nationalistic parties. Given the fact that Lithuania was Christianized as late as 1385, non-Christian identities are particularly strong in this country (as is → shamanism in Hungary), being easily combined with national identities.

Coexistence and Competition

7. The aim of the new religious laws of Central/Eastern Europe and the Balkans is to create a religious pluralism, and to foster a peaceful coexistence of religions. In Czechoslovakia and Hungary, where a variety of Christian churches have been present since the Reformation, a pluralism of confessions is relatively unproblematic. The collaboration of the churches, with one another and with ecumenical entities of Europe, is institutionalized. The situation is more problem-fraught where a majority church is established, and the identity of the ethnic group or nation is impregnated with its own Christian tradition. The Russian Orthodox Church feels threatened by the missionary work of other confessions 'in its canonical territory'—in the region for which general Orthodox church law has made it responsible for centuries. Thus, it speaks of 'proselytism' (→ Proselytes), and even calls for a precedence to be accorded it and acknowledged by the state, with state restrictions on new religious groups. The Ecumenical Council of Churches and the Conference of European Churches therefore seek to establish a binding code of conduct, with correlative goals: on the one hand, a recognition of freedom of religion as a fundamental right, and on the other, an ecumenical sensitivity that, through an offer of cooperation, might dismantle Orthodoxy's fears of proselytism. Local conflicts inhere in the relation of the Orthodox churches to the Roman Catholic Church on account of the united or 'Uniate' churches (originally a pejorative Russian expression, still often felt as offensive)—the churches that, while retaining their ecclesiastical structures and Slavonic rites, have come into a union with Rome. Despite all local tensions, however, the Vatican and the highest church leadership of the Orthodox indicate a readiness for further dialogue.

Literature

Bociurkiw, Bodhan R. (ed.), Religion and Atheism in the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe, Toronto 1975; Borowik, Irena/Babinski, Grzegorz (eds.), New Religious Phenomena in Central and Eastern Europe, Krakow 1997; Craciu, Maria (ed.), Technicity and Religion in Central and Eastern Europe, Cluj 1995; DeGeorge, Richard T. (ed.), Marxism and Religion in Eastern Europe, Dordrech 1976; Dunn, Dennis J. (ed.), Religion and Nationalism in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, Boulder etc. 1987; Esposito, John L./Burgat, François (eds.), Modernizing Islam: Religion in the Public Sphere in the Middle East and Europe, London 2003; Ferrari, Silvio et al. (eds.), Law and Religion in Post-Communist Europe, Leuven 2003; Merdjanova, Ina, Religion, Nationalism, and Civil Society in Eastern Europe—the Postcommunist Palimpsest, Lewiston 2002; Michel, Patrick, Politics and Religion in Eastern Europe: Catholicism in Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia, Oxford 1991; Michel, Patrick (ed.), Les religions à l'Est, Paris 1992; Ramet, Pedro, Nihil Obstat: Religion, Politics, and Social Change in East-Central Europe and Russia, Durham 1998; Sajó, András/Avineri, Shlomo (eds.), The Law of Religious Identity: Models for Post-Communism, The Hague 1999; Sugar, Peter F., East European Nationalism, Politics and Religion, Aldershot 1999; Swatos, William H., Jr. (ed.), Politics and Religion in Central and Eastern Europe: Traditions and Transitions, London etc. 1994.

Academic Journals: Religion, State & Society; Religion in Eastern Europe; Osteuropa: Zeitschrift für Gegenwartsfragen des Ostens; Südosteuropa: Zeitschrift für Gegenwartsforschung.

→ Bosnia-Herzegovina, Europe I, European History of Religion, Orthodox Churches

Franz Schnider

European History of Religion

The Project

1. a) The project of a European history of religion is new. It is to be distinguished from two other perspectives on the same object. On the one hand, there is church history that finds religion, by definition, in the Church, with extra-ecclesial religion taken for heresy, paganism, and secularization. In such a view, any 'religion' is an illegitimacy. The counter-thesis presents Christianity as a late and foreign, Eastern, religion, which has suppressed "Europe's own religion" (Sigrid Hunke)—the Celtic, Teutonic or Germanic, Slavic religion. Attempts to 'Teutonize Christianity' in the early half of the twentieth century, for instance, sought to construct a new 'faith' under the traditional name.

Foreign Stereotype

b) First of all, however, it is important to notice how these self-concepts arise. They are generated by their antitypical image—by the negative, foreign stereotype, as found in → anti-Semitism and → Orientalism. The typically European is that whose absence is pilloried in 'the others': these are said to lack Enlightenment, an effort at active domination of the world, a middle class democracy, or the will to peace.

European Religion, Not Christianity in Europe

c) Thus, one is confronted with the task of perceiving the peculiarity of religious impress, and the effect of religion, on the developments emerging in Europe as 'European history of religion.' It is not limited to the geographical space, 'Europe.' In the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, the United States has become one of its essential repositories. This fact has shifted the accents. To boot, 'the religion' of Eastern Europe (Orthodoxy) has long since developed very differently.

European history of religion arises in confrontation with other cultures. Consequently, it is not limited to Christianity. Judaism and Islam share essentially in European history of religion. Indeed, since the destruction of Jerusalem (70 CE), Judaism has been almost exclusively a European religion.

2. a) In 1989, the clear division of the Western world into two political blocs collapsed. Nevertheless, no single world of democracies and a free market economy has emerged. Rather, it has become evident that the power blocs had only covered over cultural differences. Each culture has its own tradition, and its own respective history in contact with other cultures. In the process of creating and avouching its own identity, religion has once more engaged in a key role. Here it is not China, or 'Islam,' imagined as a unity, assaulting the peaceful West.[1] Rather it is the reverse. The West has erected its sovereign place, stamped by religion and history (the compulsion system of the 'world economy'), and is constantly reinforcing it. Raw materials are purchased for a pittance, resold as expensive technology. Coca-Cola, Adidas, and the Kalashnikov are overcoming the world, and with them, if often merely formally, the spirit and mentality of the Western world. But the process is not proceeding as expected, to the final Europeanization of the world.

Europeanization

b) After the Second World War, the founding of a world parliament, the 'United Nations,' and the proclamation of → human rights (1948), generated the expectation that the achievements of European enlightenment were the goal of progress for humanity as such. Even the U.S. engagement (1917) in the First World War had been founded as a 'Crusade for Democracy.' "Project World Ethos" (Hans Küng; → Ethics/Morals) does take in elements of other cultures and religions, but it binds them into a religion of humanity originally defined by the European Enlightenment.

c) The 'sense of mission,' with which imperialism grounded its violent world-colonization, belongs to the legacy of European development. One would like to remove them from this history as spurious usurpers. It is true that missionaries long raised their voices against imperialism.[2] The actual result of this protest was that colonial rulers called special attention to their task of education and upbringing, sought to justify force and violence as a way to progress, and integrated the missioners into the project. From the viewpoint of Christianity, force is 'unchristian.' But this is only an ideal norm. In practice, representatives of Christianity have always been able to justify war, and not only as the lesser evil, but as a rescue of God's religion that 'He' has required—indeed as an act of love.[3] With their patented sense of mission—as progress, youth, (arms) technology, hygiene, fertility through artificial fertilizer and poison, liberation from fear through religion—Europeans have attempted to justify their nationalism and imperialism. Accordingly, the task of scholarship and understanding will not be to describe the religious norm, but to follow the growth of the religion of Europe.

Western Rationalism and Enlightenment

3. a) The European self-concept posits rationalism as the central peculiarity of its culture. Unlike other cultures—we are given to understand—that of the West has overcome the irrationalism of the religious image of the world. Thanks to the progress of scientific research, the world has, at least in principle, become transparent through and through.[4] Now the world can be planned, nature can be dominated, rule can be controlled. In the secularized world, religion, too, understands itself in secular terms, and claims to be able to offer a rationally comprehensible, 'demythologized,' portrait of God, without hell, miracle, and devil. After all, authentic religion must compete with propositions of meaning that precisely reintroduce what has been expelled. 'Barefoot prophets' not only live in and on this European modernity, but renounce its demystification, and, out of archaic, exotic, and religious elements, 'tinker up' an image of the world for exclusive, private application.

b) Max → Weber has attempted to sketch a clarification of the 'how' of Western economic superiority and special development. His point of departure is the question of the appearance of → capitalism. Unlike Marx, Weber does not understand this economic form as the highest stage of development, for all cultures to attain. Weber's observation that capitalism is to be found only in Christian nations, that it is specifically Western, and that, even more specifically, it is Protestant, leads him to the conclusion that the religions are the deciding factors in economics and, beyond that, in culture. In other cultures, religion has been constraining, holds Weber, whereas, in European and Europeanized cultures, it became the mainspring of the eventual generation of capitalism. The Reformation, especially through the Calvinists, instilled the everyday attitude that produced a religious motivation for modern factory work. Religion, then, Weber explains, is no longer the festival that interrupts work, the hiatus that renders work tolerable. Rather, it is in labor that religion sees the attitude pleasing to God. Profit from an economic activity is neither spent in order to celebrate festivals, nor squandered in the attempt to better one's social position. It is reinvested in labor. Here, in Weber's view, is the origin of the amassing of capital. Another element is the 'lifestyle' of a calling (the trade or profession to which God 'calls' a person), which finally leads to the modern specialist. Weber sees both as already prefigured in the medieval monastic culture. The asceticism of the monks leads to renunciation of consumption on religious grounds. The regular plan of work in alternation with prayer times complements the rationalization of work. Rationalization, then, means two things: (1) division and computation, in both work in the area of economics, and in the availability and practicality of processes of planning in the area of the fiscal economy; (2) dominion over the world by way of the understanding. Thus, Weber links materialistic motivations with idealistic ones, and sees this as basic for a description in terms of cultural science.

In Crisis

c) European history of religion is no longer validly assessed as a 'progress' that would justify a claim of superiority over other cultures. Philosopher of apocalypse Marx's prophecy of the collapse of the Old World, and the coming of a New, outlines a counter-world bereft of continuity with the Europe of today. Weber's desperate fear of being imprisoned in the 'steel-hard shell' of the modern age, understands the modern age as a consequence, but not the goal, of a specific European religious development. Protestantism is only the primordial 'spirit,' not the implacable reality, of today's capitalism. One here recognizes Weber's interest in defending Protestantism after the collapse of the faith and belief in progress.

Nationalism and Imperialism

d) The comparative method aims first of all at an appraisal—at the superiority of Europe, and at the dynamics of Protestant nations. This method sprang up in connection with the justification of European domination in the form of nationalism and imperialism. As early as the beginning of the 1900s, Europeans knew of the wealth and the great achievement of other cultures. Turkish loot, Chinese porcelain, American potatoes and tobacco, offered testimonials of superiority to which the structures of the 'Goths,' the gothic, were barbaric by comparison. It was altogether comprehensible, for this thinking, that—since Christianity arose only later—the oldest religion, and therefore the most original and nearest to the truth, the 'light from the East,' would be that of → Egypt (→ Esotericism), Persia (→ Zoroastrianism), or India. Franz Bopp had demonstrated that India was the original source for language, and his pupil F. M. Müller sought, with the publication of Sacred Books of the East (in 50 volumes, 1879–1894) to establish the same for religion. Even here, however, the new spirit can be felt: the oldest writings did not contain the most primitive religion—they, not to mention the East Indians of today, had already misunderstood it. Only the European scholar could reconstruct the most primitive religion: an immediate veneration of nature—a (naïve) religion of the sun. As Europeans ply the unexampled reduction of other cultures to the status of colonies, right to the last cranny of the world, so they also dispossess those colonies of their heritage. Europeans plunder their precious riches and drag them to museums. The ancient and reverend cultures of the East are branded 'decadent' and 'senile.' The racial doctrine underpins Eurocentrism.

Christianization

4. a) Christianization, Christianity's monopoly, and the alternatives: Not only is Christianity Europe's dominant religion; it long held the rank of an actual monopoly. Europe as the 'Christian West,' and the Middle Ages as the 'age of faith,' however, are the historical projection of nineteenth century Catholicism, which rebuked the Reformation for having destroyed this unity. But did Europe become Christian only with the reforms of Luther and Loyola,[5] so that, up until then, pagan religions lived on, under a Christian veneer? Both theses rest on the premise that religion in the Europe of the sixteenth century be regarded as the normal instance. The confrontation of confessions in the Reformation and the Catholic reform is a special case, which has nevertheless molded European history of religion ever since: it creates a permanent challenge, subjecting each person's life to constant and enduring control. Judgment in the beyond shifts to judgment here below; the personal God, who promises grace, vanishes. Into God's place—immutably, implacably—steps a cold universe, with its natural laws. Life is lived under the ongoing threat of an imploding castigation, to be meted out by merciless judges: conscience, the 'inward judgment' that nothing escapes, especially unconscious sins, with their boundless potential; social control through a community that observes itself mistrustfully; an Inquisition that launches investigations on mere suspicion, until it has created the condition of a 'guilt' from scratch.

Religion as a Norm

b) Religion as confirmation of identity stands over against religion as a norm impossible to observe. The forms of everyday religion, available to any individual in other religions, for the defeat of fear, insecurity, misfortune and disease, are deprecated in Europe as → magic, and come under religious censure. What in the present has been scornfully referred to a 'supermarket of religious items' or earlier, with Max Weber, a 'department store of Weltanschauungen,' is emancipation from a religion sheerly of norms to follow—a religion determined by a stranger, and yet one that must become the religion of the individual's own identity. The function of religion that comes to a head as a norm, identified with the institution of the churches, sees its meaning dwindling; in its place steps the normal case of a hodgepodge of official religion: religious, magical, esoteric, or medical means against crises. Owing to its earlier function, official religion comes to wield only limited influence.

c) At its pinnacle, in the sixteenth century, religion received an entirely different function. It is no longer a self-evident part of the world in which one lives, into which the child is born. One must prove oneself for it, by dogged determination and 'belief.' The annoying obligation of sacramental confession renders Catholics dependent on the benevolence of the priest; Protestants are answerable to their conscience. Neither dare be sure of themselves, neither dare know for a surety that they live 'aright.' 'Certitude of salvation' is the earmark of a sect.

Fear as the Religion of Europe

d) One might ask whether, especially in the time of the persecution of witches (→ Inquisition; Witch/Persecution of Witches), and in the nineteenth century, the essential attribute of religion is not fear (Kierkegaard, Dostoevsky).[6] By way of reaction, on the one hand anticlerical movements were formed that sought to undo religious harnesses; on the other, through a self-conscious middle-class, concepts emerged that refused to submit to the arbitrary intent of a God of grace and reprobation. Lightning was no longer a chastisement from God, disease no longer the deed of the devil and his tools the witches. In place of the expectancy of Christ's return as Judge, the open, salvific concept of the 'future' came, and flung the religious model wide open.

Education, Knowledge, Rule

5. The normative model rests in good part as well on the institutionalization of the church, which confronts the community through the professional priest (→ Priest/Priestess). He is placed over the community from without, he receives his authority through his formation. Since the Reformation, the priest has been legitimated through the education he receives at a central ecclesiastical place of training: he is an academician, a stranger in the local community. The alternatives to the monopoly of the Christian churches materialize with the same authorization: through formal schooling. That schooling rests on the (non-Christian) wisdom of antiquity.

Writing

a) Education in Europe is something special. Alphabetical writing renders its command possible in a relatively brief time. Knowledge and education become accessible to the many. Writing offers a publication beyond the here and now. As the audiences of ancient urban culture collapsed and scattered, the archive of their writing abided, cared for in monasteries by clerics. But this archive is not available (as it is especially in Judaism) to the general public, to be used for the religious life of the individual. It is in the care of the monopoly of interpretation of the professional priest. With the new medieval urban culture of the twelfth century, the wide field of communication became public once more, religion was discussed with the aids of the 'logic' of antiquity and contemporary Islam; by contrast, the laical appropriations of the Cathari, Hussites, and poverty movement were rejected, and subjected to 'theological' censure. Thus, religion could not develop in correspondence with societal change. Its development was submitted to a twofold limitation. (1) It was limited by a closed sacred text, transmitting a historically past condition of society that might be expounded for the present only by specialists, who protected the text. (Domestication in the area of religion was rendered difficult for the laity, on the level of knowledge and faith alike, through the prohibition of exposition and explanation.) (2) On the level of ritual, it was limited by the sacred, exclusive language (Latin), together with an aversion from ritual on the part of academically formed theologians (the Protestant 'God's word' over mechanical ritualism, and magical conceptualizations of the operation of the sacraments).

'Heathen' Wisdom

b) On the other hand, education transmitted a polytheistic alternative, in the form of the wisdom of antiquity (→ Esotericism). That which, in the Christian world of conceptualizations could not 'be,' could be discussed by using the images of ancient mythology. The knowledge and wisdom of polytheistic antiquity was a binding canon for anyone with a voice in society, even—and this as early as the Middle Ages—for theologians. Beginning in the nineteenth century, it was broadly disseminated through the academic formation of the humanistic secondary schools, and in translations in the new mass media as well (published collections). This propagation rarely produced a concrete religious community, as, for example when, in the workers' movement, academicians Marx or Feuerbach harnessed the ancient critique of religion in order to found another sense than that of established bourgeois religion, and to proclaim the God in nature, who does not threaten as Judge (→ Pantheism).[7] 'Paganism,' the 'heathenism' of the modern age, cannot hark back to a continuing, constantly flourishing religion, however much it may pretend to do so (→ Paganism/Neopaganism). Besides the historical argumentation ('the older religion'), the authority of the sciences increasingly enters the scene, which set the eternal laws of nature over against a historically developing religion. Paganism and → atheism seem rather a complement to official European religion (defined in Christian terms), and to the forms of social reality that emerge from it. They are not subject to the control of the theologians, but can be understood as self-determined appropriations of religion.

Knowledge and Power

c) A generally accessible education or training also means its separation from power. In other cultures, the sage, and the writer as counselor, lives in the presence of the ruler. In Europe, instead, the ruler's (the ruling) knowledge is separated from the general education. In particular, law is accessible only to specialists. It is of no use, even today, to communicate, for example, Anglo-Saxon law between two contenders or opponents. Rather, by way of the adoption of Roman imperial law and the Latin language in the twelfth and sixteenth centuries, church and state have cancelled the possibility of a communal self-determination in the settlement of a dispute, committing that determination to jurists (as functionaries of the ruler). Similarly, the pastor becomes the functionary of the ruler, instead of being responsible to the community.[8] But neither the jurist nor the pastor disposes of the ruler's (the ruling) knowledge and wisdom, for this is so splintered that even bureaucrats no longer see, beyond their special purview, the functioning of power.

Complexity

d) European modernity is so complex, society is divided into so many zones, each of which sets its own goals, that comprehensive models of interpretation quickly bump into walls—collide with boundaries. These limits hold true even for religious interpretations. Fundamentalism, for example, attempts dualistically to dam up the complexity of the outside world, experienced as so anarchical, through a univocal ordering of the private world. But people have no need whatever of a uniform, homogeneous, non-contradictory motivation. Thus, in their diverse social roles, and for life crises and perspectives, they can represent diverse religious conceptualizations as well; it has been researched in the example of Christians who believe in reincarnation. We see, then, that self-determined religion, with all of its ambiguity and contradiction, is much closer to the normal case among religions than is a strict conformation to a normativity controlled from without, as such conformation was lived by the confessional Christianities of the sixteenth century.

1. Thus, Huntington, Samuel, The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order, New York 1996.
2. Jenkyns, Paul, Kurze Geschichte der Basler Mission, Basel 1989; Gründer 1992, 317.
3. Riley-Smith, Jonathan, "Crusading as an Act of Love," in History, vol. 65 (1980), 177-192; Cancik-Lindemaier, Hildegard, "Opferphantasien," in: Der Altsprachliche Unterricht 30 (1987), 90-104.
4. Weber 2001.
5. Delumeau, Jean, Entre Luther et Montesquieu, Paris 1976.
6. Idem, La peur en Occident: Une cité assiégée, Paris 1978.
7. Löwith 1983, 38-54; Hölscher, Lucian, Weltgericht oder Revolution, Stuttgart 1989.
8. Blickle, Peter, Die Revolution von 1525, Munich 1975 (3rd ed., 1989); Berman, Harold, Law and Revolution, Cambridge 1983.

Literature

Auffarth, Christoph, Geradewegs in den Himmel? Mittelalterliche Eschatologie, Göttingen 1999; Gladigow, Burkhard, "Europäische Religionsgeschichte," in: Kippenberg, Hans G./Luchesi, Brigitte (eds.), Lokale Religionsgeschichte, Marburg 1995, 21-42; Gollwitzer, Heinz, Geschichte des weltpolitischen Denkens, 2 vols., Göttingen 1972–1982; Gründer, Horst, Welteroberung und Christentum. Ein Handbuch zur Geschichte der Neuzeit, Gütersloh 1992; Huff, Toby E., The Rise of Early Modern Science: Islam, China, and the West, Cambridge 1993; Kittsteiner, Heinz, Die Entstehung des modernen Gewissens, Frankfurt/M. 1991; Lehmann, Hartmut (ed.), Säkularisierung, Dechristianisierung, Rechristianisierung im neuzeitlichen Europa, Göttingen 1997; Löwith, Karl, Weltgeschichte und Heilsgeschehen, Stuttgart 1983 ([1]1949); Sachau, Rüdiger, Westliche Reinkarnationsvorstellungen, Gütersloh [2]1997; Schieder, Wolfgang (ed.), Sozialgeschichte der Religion, Göttingen 1978; Schluchter, Wolfgang, The Rise of Western Rationalism: Max Weber's Developmental History, Berkeley 1981; Stausberg, Michael, Faszination Zarathushtra. Zoroaster und die Europäische Religionsgeschichte der Frühen Neuzeit, Berlin/New York 1998; Thomas, Keith, Religion and the Decline of Magic, Harmondsworth 1968; Weber, Max, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, London 2001 ([1]1904/1920); Zika, Charles, Exorcising Our Demons: Magic, Witchcraft and Visual Culture in Early Modern Europe, Leiden etc. 2003.

→ Christianity, Colonialism, Disenchantment/Reenchantment, Dualism, Enlightenment, Esotericism, Europe I and II, Human Rights, Rationalism/Irrationalism, Reason, Reception, Religion, Science, Tradition

Christoph Auffarth

European History of Religion: Time Chart

In terms of the indication of the entry above, European history of religion is bound up with an urban public character. Its orientation is to ancient discussions and methodical approaches of the logic of a quasi-Aristotelian method of 'theo-logy,' and the logic of the majority of religions. This situation was reached with the twelfth-century 'Renaissance.' In contrast, the antiquity of the Eastern Mediterranean extends to the demise of urban culture with the capture of Constantinople ('Byzantium') in 1453 (→ "Antiquity," Time Chart).

Era 1: Europe appropriates the culture of Islam and Antiquity. Twelfth–Thirteenth Centuries.

1095 until 15th cent.	Crusader Movement	After brief successes, armed pilgrimages and solidly established colonies, along the route to Jerusalem fail, but create multicultural situations. The peaceful symbioses in Spain and Southern Italy are destroyed.
1098	Cistercian Order	Robert of Molesme founds the Benedictine reformed monastery of Cîtaux in Burgundy. Bernard of Clairvaux forms (from 1115) a dynamic ascetical, puristic, reform movement that seizes all of Europe. Important agricultural schievements (fish-cultivation, fish-farming). Appeal for crusades and the persecution of heretics.
12th cent.	Medicine, Law, Economics are professionalized	The Italian city-states create schools of higher education for the new educational elite, these schools being mostly the legatees of Muslim and Jewish science and scholarship.

1215	Fourth Council of the Lateran	The multiplicity of the churches is centralized around the Pope in Rome. Inner unity rests on the exclusion and battling of 'heretics,' especially of the Cathari of Southern France. With a view to an effective juridical pursuit, from 1231 onward, the investigations of the Inquisition render the latter a special legal instance (1252, Bull Ad exstirpanda of Pope Innocent IV).
1216	Mendicant orders	Franciscans and Dominicans radically oppose the wealth and exploitative behavior of the churches and monasteries.
1276	Censure of Paris theology	The new science of 'theo-logic,' based on the logic of ancient philosophy (Aristotle, conveyed by Islam), is harshly reined in. All professors must recant propositions.
Era 2: The apocalyptic age. Fourteenth–sixteenth centuries
1347/54	The Black Plague	Every third person in Europe dies of the epidemic. Epidemics of 'St. Vitus Dance,' and other religious crisis cults, such as flagellants, spread.

1430–c. 1680	The 'great fear': heretics, lepers, Jews, witches fall victim to a collective craze of persecution	The cities and villages of Europe manifest a growing social aggression, and this not only (although especially) against marginal groups, who are qualified as 'agents of the Devil.' The Office of the Inquisition, summoned to the task, further develops their procedures for trying heretics. Once erected, the Inquisition becomes self-propelled, culminating in the seventeenth century.
1453	The Turks conquer Europe	In 1453, Constantinople falls, followed in 1526 by the near capture of Vienna, which barely escapes once more in 1683. The defenses mounted generate Christian Europe's 'hostile image of Islam.'
1492	Reconquista—Conquista: Europe conquers the New World	In Spain, the crusade movement has wiped out or expelled the Jews and Muslims. Spain and Portugal plunder America (→ Central America; South America).
1517 (31 October)	The Ninety-Five Theses of Theology Professor Martin Luther against the sale of indulgences	The criticism of 'haggling over the goods of salvation' quickly becomes a fundamentalist criticism of 'real Christianity'—Christianity as it actually exists. The critique covers rituals, dogmas, and institutions, and seeks to 'go back' to the 'word of God' as contained in the Bible.

1525	Revolution of the underprivileged, and Reformation	In a continent-wide revolution against the nobility, cities and legislatures succeed in their combat for their rights. In the German 'Peasants' War,' however, theologians leave their base in the lurch, and 'provisionally' leave political control to the secular governments of the country.
1520s	Wave of apocalyptic fear: 'Great Flood' over Europe	The unexampled media event of Halley's Comet, and the expectation of a Great Flood, has Europe holding its breath.
1530	Reformed Churches: the Confessio Augustana	The 'Protestants' of 1529 receive the opportunity to formulate ther arguments. Almost in agreement with the old believers, two distinct confessions take shape nevertheless: the Catholic and the Evangelical churches. Then, from the latter, emerge the Lutheran churches as national churches, and the Reformed and the Baptist as independent communities.
1545–1563	Council of Trent	The Catholic Church reforms itself, in contradistinction from the Evangelical churches. The religious culture of the Baroque appears, marked on the Catholic side by the Marian cult and the Jesuits, on the Protestant side by orthodoxy and the 'citizens' religion' in the cities and courtly centers (culture of music: Heinrich Schütz, Pachelbel, the Bachs, and others).

1571	Battle of Lepanto	In the long run, Islam (Turkish Ottomans) is able to conquer the Balkans, but not Vienna and Central Europe. The boundary remains stable until the Balkan Wars (1912/13).
Era 3: Religious wars and religious peace: 17th–18th centuries
1618–1648	Thirty Years War	The confrontations in the area of religious politics in the wake of the Reformation reach their climax: all Europe is embroiled in a confessional war, waged preponderantly in German countries.
1648/49	Peace of Westphalia	The Peace Congress lays down rules that facilitate the coexistence of the confessions without constant danger of violent confrontation. The ruler determines a region's religious confession, as has already been established in 1555 (Cuius regio, eius religio Lat., '[He/she] whose region, his/her religion'). Over the long term, a 'taming' and de-politicizing of the Christian churches, just as of religious practice in (Central) Europe generally. State control and power.

1685	Edict of Nantes revoked	In France, at first the Evangelicals (Huguenots) had been ruthlessly persecuted (1572, St. Bartholomew's Massacre); then, by the Edict of Nantes (1598), they had been tolerated. Finally, Louis XIV revoked the tolerance. A wave of Protestant refugees enters Holland and Brandenburg/Prussia.
1689/90	Pietism	The Leipzig clash over Pietism; the Evangelical piety movement (Halle, Herrnhut, Swabia) enables the laity to live a biblicist (community) life, works of charity, and, especially, schools.
1780/90	Religious freedom in enlightened absolutism	Many royalty of the time of the Enlightenment, such as Frederick the Great in Prussia and Maria Teresa and Joseph II in Austria, grant religious freedom: citizenship is no longer conditioned by membership in the religion of the majority. In return, the state reserves a right of supervision over religious institutions.

1815	Emancipation of the Jews as full citizens	After the progress of the Haskalah (Enlightenment) in Berlin, and the religious freedoms laid down in various catalogues of 'basic rights,' Jews acquire full citizenship in most countries.
Era 4: State monopoly, and free room for the churches of the 19th cent.
1776	American independence	America is the asylum for all who are out of step with the institutional churches. The 'pursuit of happiness' is guaranteed by the American constitution; church and state are separated.
1797–1805	Awakening movement in the United States	The 'Second Great Awakening,' with its positive anticipation of the Reign of God ('pre-millenarianism'), marks American religion.
1789–1794	French Revolution	At first promoted by the clergy as well, the French Revolution now includes traditional religion among its targets. A new calendar replaces the Anno Domini calculation. Feasts in honor of the 'Supreme Being' replace the old religion, and the place of the Church is expropriated by the state. 'De-Christianization' of the state.

1803/06	Secularization	In the German Empire, that principle of the French Revolution is realized that, except in the case of freedom of religion, the absolute authority of the state brooks no exceptions.
1815	Holy Alliance	Catholicism marks the Restoration against the French Revolution and Napoleon. In the cultural area, Romanticism redevelops Christianity—and especially its 'irrational,' emotion-fraught, 'mystical' side—as the subject of art (Nazarener), literature (Novalis), and philosopy (Görres, Chateaubriand).
1840/42	Opium War	Great Britain compels China to open its markets. Against the wishes of the Beijing government, Britain introduces the opium trade on a massive scale. Resistance is violently crushed by way of superior weaponry: the beneficiary is 'free trade,' and therewith the economy of Europe and America. Imperialism.
1848	Interior mission	Through a policy of social action (Wichern, Bodelschwingh), the Evangelical churches, along with the exterior mission to the 'pagans,' set themselves the goal of winning over laborers uprooted by industrialization. Anti-capitalist self-help through a neighborhood movement (as in Raiffeisen).

1858	India incorporated into the British Empire	Insurrections erupt against the economic imperialism of the East India Company: the British government intervenes with military force and makes India a crown colony.
1870	First Council of the Vatican	The 'infallibility' of the Pope is proclaimed. The 'Ultramontanists' compel the Catholics of Europe to launch fundamental opposition against the modern age (democracy, anti-capitalism).
1871–1887	Kulturkampf ('Cultural Struggle') in the German Empire	The Protestant Prussian majority persecutes the Catholic clergy. As a countermove, Catholicism forms a Party of the Center.
1878	Social state and prohibition of Socialism	Simultaneously, the German government proscribes political socialism, and introduces health and income insurance for situations of need.

1883	Congress of Berlin	Climax of imperialism: in order to preclude future conflicts of interest, the European nations divide up the world.
1893	World Parliament of Religions	In a framework of the Chicago World's Fair, the first to be held outside of Europe, American Christians invite the other religions to present themselves.
1910	Mission Conference of Edinburgh	The multiplicity of mission societies organizes for world mission. The 'young churches of Asia' receive a voice for the first time.
Era 5: Authoritarian nationalism combats religion (1917–1945)
1917	October Revolution in Russia	At the end of the First World War, the revolutionaries destroy the monarchy and the Orthodox Church, which has been loyal to the state. A programmatically atheistic state emerges, but its anti-Semitism is as foundational as that of the former Tsarist Russia.
1925/27	Ecumenical Movement	In view of the weakness of the union of the peoples, the Evangelical churches seize the initiative, and seek to found understanding and diplomatic cooperation among the nations.

1933	Catholicism: Reichskonkordat (Ger., “Imperial [Church] Concordat [a solemn agreement] with the [German] Reich”)	The Catholic Church, represented by Eugenio Pacelli (later Pope Pius XII), procures itself a solid recognition of its position in the authoritarian state vis-à-vis the duty of political activity, and thereby opens the way for the National Socialists.
	Protestantism: Imperial Church or church autonomy	The Evangelical Churches split into a central Reichskirche, marked by conformity to the state (‘German Christians’), and the ‘confessing churches’ organized by territorial Synods in Barmen and Dahlem (1934).
1936	Nuremberg Laws	‘Racial division’ cannot be suspended even by religious conversion and citizenship. Anti-Semitism is the foundation of a nationalistic völkisch (state) religion.
1936–1939	Spanish Civil War	The Catholic Church extensively sponsors the reactionary, authoritarian Franco regime. Anti-clerical excesses on the part of the Republicans (desecration of sacred places; murder of clerics) become the order of the day.
1943–1945	Auschwitz	Annihilation of six million (East) European Jews in the shadow of the Second World War.

Era 6: Globalization. 1945 through today

1945	Atomic bomb over Hiroshima	The apocalypse receives a new name. It seems that human beings themselves can destroy the world. From now on, resistance to a military as well as a 'peaceful' use of nuclear energy more and more unites church, Communist, and environmentalist groups.
1946	Americanization of Europe, and the 'Christian West'	With the new purposes in mind, Germany is no longer seen as conquered and to be destroyed, but to be bound together and built up in the Cold War against the Soviet Union. Americans gain a certain influence over Europe. Anticommunism characterizes the Federal Republic of Germany even in the area of the religious. The crisis of meaning that marks the postwar era leads to the temporary revival of a Christian orientation of values and policies, under the banner of a 'Christian West.'
	Church meetings	The great Protestant lay movement becomes an independent avant-garde vis-à-vis the established territorial churches. From 1961, the 'Jewish-Christian dialogue' moves in the fundamental reorientation of a 'theology after Auschwitz.'

1961	Independence of Tanzania: Third World and Third Way	The colonial powers abandon the direct rule of their colonies, but retain economic power. Nyerere of Tanzania seeks a third way, using a 'partnership' model. Search for an African religion. Revitalization of traditional cults.
1962–1965	Second Council of the Vatican	The Catholic Church bids farewell to antimodernism and opens to democracy, the laity, economic renewal, and the religions. But far-reaching changes are soon withdrawn.
1968	May Revolution in Paris and throughout Europe	Sharp politicization, under the flag of a utopian Socialism (Anti-Americanism, uprising against the still authoritarian-minded elite of the war generation). An insurrection against the 'establishment' adopts the goal of maintaining churches through Marxism, and sponsors religious criticism even of the traditional churches.
1973ff.	'Return of Religion'	Scored by the shock of the limited resources of the earth (oil crisis), the ecological movement forms, partly by way of a (Christian and extra-Christian) sacralization of nature. The limited success of politicization leads others to a new interiority. A new, individually oriented spirituality forms under the idea of a → 'New Age,' denoting a new and better world era (in the astrological calendar, the Age of Aquarius).

1989 1991	Rushdie affair; second Gulf War against Iraq	The → fatwa of leader and spiritual head of the Iranian Revolution Ayatollah → Khomeini against Indo-English author Salman Rushdie (The Satanic Verses, 1988), and the 'crusader disposition' of the warring parties on either side, ring political Islam and the diaspora community of Muslim economic migrants to the consciousness of a European 'publicity'—a visibility and public image. In the 1990s, a hostile image of Islam replaces the fear of Communism.
1989/1990	Peaceful revolutions in Eastern Europe; German unity	The collapse of the Communist national parties, on the one hand opens Eastern Europe to Western culture, but on the other leads it to a 'reconsideration of traditional values.' This reconsideration extends to the area of religious values, as well as, for example, in the strengthening of a political and societal role of the Orthodox Churches.

1991–1994	Balkan Wars	The consequent dissolution of the Yugoslavian Federal State takes the form of bloody 'ethnic cleansings,' as religious traditions (of Orthodox Serbs, Catholic Croatians, Muslim Bosnians) become the instruments of power politics. A heretofore multicultural and multi-religious society is destroyed.
2000	Christian churches on the defensive: Individual meaning and private religion; new fundamentalisms	Institutionalized Christianity has lost its special moral, social, and political meaning in many of the states of Europe. Individual meaning, on the one side, and charismatic or rigoristic minority groups, on the other, seem, in a way, to accede to their legacy, if indeed not altogether adopt total secularization of lifestyle and life content.
September 11, 2001	Attack on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington	With their suicide attacks, Islamic terrorists batter the Western World's sense of security and superiority—its tokens of military and economic invincibility.

Christoph Auffarth

Euthanasia / Assisted Suicide

Social Context

1. Concrete, conscious dealing with dying raises social, ethical, and political questions. Institutions like clinics, nursing homes, or special establishments for dying (such as hospices) are interpreted in the public debate over assisted dying/euthanasia as proof of a social ousting, as well as a tabooing of death (→ Death and Dying). The marginalization of the aged and infirm here includes social death. The key question where the individual is concerned is whether she or he has a title to, or can be seized of, a right to self-determination in the process of dying, as to the point in time, the place, and the kind and manner. Physicians, jurists, and theologians are all called upon to generate ethically responsible, activity-oriented concepts calculated to guarantee a death worthy of human dignity, and to ensure the protection of the individual from abuse.

From 'Good Death' to 'Bad Genes'

2. a) The word 'euthanasia' (Gk., 'good, beautiful death') has an ambivalent history. It has had the denotation, for one, of an easy death (without antecedent chronic illness and pain), a swift death at the hand of an enemy, or a noble death in battle; for another, it has meant the dignified death, corresponding to the ideal of the Stoics, where the Stoa vindicated every person's right to suicide as a central theme of their ethic, which was geared to the freedom of the individual. In the sixteenth century, the concept of the euthanasia medica ('medical euthanasia') was coined by Francis Bacon, who designated the palliation of suffering in dying as a medical obligation. As for the philosophical and cultural thinking of the Enlightenment, of utilitarianism, and of social Darwinism, the opening of the twentieth century saw the appearance in the United States and England of the 'euthanasia societies,' which sought in vain the legalization of 'mercy killing' for persons suffering from incurable diseases. The discussion was later appropriated by the National Socialists in their disguise and cloak of 'the elimination of unworthy life,' of life not worth living, with the concept of 'euthanasia' (→ Eugenics). Today as well, in Germany and elsewhere the entire discussion stands in the ghostly shadow of the National Socialist euthanasia program ('Action T4') and systematic murder in special 'killing installations' (→ Handicapped). For the current discussion of death with human dignity and a 'good death,' the expression 'assisted dying' is available as a neutral alternative to 'euthanasia.'

Forms of Assisted Dying

b) For a designation of the boundaries between legitimate and punishable activity in connection with assisted dying, the following facts of the case are normative. They offer an only seemingly settled boundary, however, since their demarcations overlap:

- Assisted dying as support in dying means 'good dying' in the sense of protecting the subject from dying forgotten and alone, but without offering any intervention in the process of dying.
- Easing of death means the application of means to palliate or eliminate pain, with a possible curtailing of life only as a side effect.
- A renunciation of technologically possible prolongations of life, as often practiced today by turning off the breathing apparatus or the like, is designated passive euthanasia, while active euthanasia means an easing of dying through the undertaking of intentional, direct means (e.g., by providing the subject with a poison). This can be either at the wish of the patient ('killing on demand') or without his or her consent ('killing aforethought').

Positions of the Scriptural Religions

3. On the problematic of assisted dying, there is no consensus in any religion, let alone any concurrence of religions. A principal function of a religion is the incorporation of death (→ Death and Dying) as a dimension of life, and a preparation of the death (→ Ars Moriendi). The respective religious anthropologies, as well as the conceptualization of → suffering, are normative for the discussion on assisted dying. Thus, the traditional position of the scriptural religions (Judaism, Christianity, Islam) is that human life is willed by God and therefore may be ended only by the divine disposition. However, today these religions come into the social field of tension between the individual's wish for a good death and the pressure of new medical technology, which might comport the feasibility of a prolongation of life and of a determination of the moment of death. Ethical determinations usually lag behind practice.

All religions prohibit a compelled euthanasia, which is only ostensibly a manner of 'assisted dying.' Permitted and ethically justified—by Christian theologians—is assisted dying, without the shortening of life, by the introduction of palliative and anesthetizing means, as well as a 'passive assistance at dying.' The permissibility of an active assistance at dying, on the patient's demand, also called 'mercy killing,' is disputed, since it may enter into conflict with the divine decision over life and death.

In Judaism, the traditional conduct with regard to life and death, geared to the biblical text, is undergoing a new exposition. In Israelite law, 'active assistance at dying' is prohibited and strictly rejected. It has not been clarified, however, whether forms of 'passive assistance at dying' are likewise forbidden to physicians. The Halakha (basic principles of Jewish law) defines active assistance at death as murder. An Orthodox minority is in favor of a prolongation of life at any price, owing, not least of all, to the perpetrations of the Third Reich in this domain. The majority of Jewish ethicists, however, in consideration of the fact that human life is not unbounded, are opposed to procedures that prolong life artificially.

In Islam, as well, several schools of thought (traditionalists, fundamentalists, reformists, secularists) make an effort to abide by acknowledged sources in the Qur'an, and at the same time to do justice to social circumstances. The Qur'an prescribes a basic respect for life: "And kill not one another" (sura 4:29). God alone ranks as Lord of life and death, so that no one else has the right to the disposition of the life and death of others. The Islamic prohibition of killing by suicide, abortion, or euthanasia, is indeed normative, but in some cases (when occasioned by a judicial decision, a military operation, or war) such acts are declared justifiable (sura 6:151).

Today's Discussions

4. The developments and possibilities of modern intensive medicine have sharpened and broadened the question of euthanasia in past years. With late euthanasia, the problem in the foreground is that of having or not having the right to die (e.g. with comatose patients). Particularly in the Netherlands, where active euthanasia is legally permissible—after close consultation between physician, patient, and relatives—the issues involved are debated controversially. With pre-natal euthanasia (on the hypothesis that the prenatal life is that of an actual person), the problem in the foreground is having or not having the right to live. Prenatal diagnostics, therefore, has brought medicine to the point that a probably handicapped child can be aborted at any time before birth, without legal penalty, if the mother so desires ('medical indication'; → Abortion/Contraception; Bioethics; Eugenics).

Peter Singer's Practical Ethics (1979; ²1993) has further sharpened the discussion. It is alarming that, for Singer, it is eugenics that stands at the center of the argumentation, and that, for him, the biological species of the conceptus plays no role. Ultimately this means that a healthy dachshund is to be preferred to an extremely → handicapped baby (e.g., profoundly retarded). Singer pleads for a utilitarian preference: in the balance between life and death, the decisive criterion in the case of a foreseeably handicapped child is the expected quality of life, which he generally denies profoundly handicapped persons. Therefore it is not reprehensible to kill a child with Down Syndrome, if there is subsequently a chance of conceiving and bearing a healthy child.

Even with late euthanasia, Singer pleads for an active form when the person concerned wishes it. Nevertheless, precisely this demand for the self-determination of one's death repeatedly becomes a disputed case. Research has indicated that persons in the process of dying only very rarely wish an active shortening of their life. Here a new understanding of dying comes to bear, which regards death as a process that usually begins before the onset of a serious disease and ends only with cellular decay. In these terms, the concept of brain death, as articulated by physicians, is only an intermediate stage in the process of dying, and is a more or less technical concept devised to expand the opportunities for organ transplantation.

The person who experiences her or his death as alienation, and determined from without, should learn another view of death—death regarded as belonging to life. This learning is the aspiration of the hospice movement, now broadly established for the purpose of assistance (Lat., 'standing at')—standing at the (side of the) dying person or the death.

Literature

Bailey, Don V., The Challenge of Euthanasia: An Annotated Bibliography on Euthanasia and Related Subjects, Lanham 1990; Brockopp, Jonathan E. (ed.), Islamic Ethics of Life: Abortion, War, and Euthanasia, Columbia 2003; Gill, Robin (ed.), Euthanasia and the Churches, London 1998; Hendin, Herbert, Seduced by Death: Doctors, Patients, and the Dutch Cure, New York 1997; Kaplan, Kalman J. (ed.), Jewish Approaches to Suicide, Martyrdom, and Euthanasia, Northvale 1998; Keown, John, Euthanasia, Ethics and Public Policy: An Argument against Legalisation, Cambridge 2002; Pool, Robert, Negotiating a Good Death: Euthanasia in the Netherlands, New York 2000; Rosenfeld, Barry, Assisted Suicide and the Right to Die: The Interface of Social Science, Public Policy, and Medical Ethics, Washington 2004; Singer, Peter, Practical Ethics, Cambridge ²1993.

→ Abortion/Contraception, Ars Moriendi, Bioethics, Death and Dying, Ethics/Morals, Eugenics, Race/Racism

Werner Gest-Gronover and Annemarie Gronover

Everyday Life

Research into the Everyday

Everyday life, or 'the everyday,' as it might be called, usually refers to daily life and living. As the subject of research, however, 'everyday/daily life,' or 'the everyday' does not present itself as an evident fact; rather, it is the object of quite varied research interests. Developed by Marxist sociologists in recent decades for the dynamization of political praxis, the concept of the 'everyday' has had a powerful influence on the humanities. Originally, the 'everyday' was simply the opposite of 'great events,' and an argument for a polemicizing partiality for the 'objects of history' (Lefebvre). It was then taken up by other disciplines (anthropology/historiography), so that its area of validity was expanded from that of the current societies of the industrial states to other societies of past and present (Borst; Kuczynski). As a key concept, the 'everyday,' despite its imprecision, wrought a fertile exchange of the results of investigation and methodological approaches (C. Geertz). Subsequently, there emerged a new self-understanding in the range of cultural studies, and research took new directions. Examples of the subjects of these new directions would be the history of the social, the everyday, and mentality in historical science, or in anthropology of Europe and empirical research in folklore. This development shifted the target from a political change in 'capitalistic' (Lefebvre) and 'patriarchal' society (feminist research), to an acknowledgment of the everyday as relevant to → history. An original concentration on labor and its conditions was then broadened to include the totality of life relationships of all social groups. With the explanation of → society as a result of constructions, the everyday was also seen as the result of processes of the bestowing of → meaning. Despite the extensive research that has been done, connections between the everyday and religion have not yet been adequately analyzed. These connections should be compiled, and a definition for the concepts 'everyday' and → 'religion' given that includes empirical religions and societies. (1) With a point of departure in a mutual relationship between the everyday and religion, various levels of religion and the everyday are demonstrated: religion as a system of the ordering of the everyday that responds to the basic questions of the respective societies and deduces behavioral norms and ethical values, as well as legitimates → government; (2) piety as religious practice, with rituals and ceremonies that, along with other instances (such as → law), regulate a common life in society, and render collective bestowal of meaning possible; (3) religious proposals of activities and interactions, by which particular persons can undertake individual meaning-formation, and repeatedly produce → security through integration; (4) religious → experience—that is, not the everyday 'extraordinary' that cannot be reduced to the religious 'virtuous' (Weber), but rather, in polar tension, is to be regarded as contouring and constituting the ordinary vis-à-vis of the everyday. (5) In all of these areas, the everyday is exalted by religion, and religion, contrariwise, is concretized by the everyday.

The Everyday and Religion

1. a) Research: While remaining rather marginal for theology (Fahlbusch), religion, along with relations of political power, was acknowledged by the social sciences as determinative of the everyday (K. Schreiner). Parts of the old folklores, as well as of social and everyday history, took religious practice

An everyday Italian scene in Milan: Archangel Michael on a transparency on the window of a pickup truck. Ever since the Book of Daniel (10:13) and the battle with the dragon in Revelation (12:7-12), Michael has been seen as the quintessential champion of good against evil. In his mythical function as Commander of the Heavenly Host, he repels all attacks on God and the faithful. From this role proceeds his everyday task, in the Christian tradition, especially in the Mediterranean region: Michael's image functions as a magic shield, against the threats of daily life, against diseases, and even against the 'dirty tricks' of today's traffic. (Hubert Mohr) in pre-modern societies as 'folk piety,' as the religiosity of the 'little folk' (R. Narr; M. Scharfe; R. Schieder; R. v. Dülmen; N. Schindler). In this narrow notion of the everyday, festal times were set over against repeated activities (labor), which ascribes to the feast day numerous fields of religiously grounded activities. Anthropology (I.-M. Greverus; W. Kaschuba), along with religious folklore (W. Brückner), nevertheless broadened everyday history (Münch; Lüdtke), sexual history (L. Roper), history of mentalities (H. Medick), and, again along with, recently, history of everyday culture (R. Dinges), the concept of the everyday itself, inasmuch as they saw everyday and festal times, experiences, and ways of life as complementary and interrelated. Sociologists of religion turned their concentration away from the 'disappearance' of the magical in the world of work (M. Weber) to the once more workable pattern of pre-modern societies (P. Berger; T. Luckmann; N. Luhmann; H. Tyrrell). Thus they transformed concepts of → Enlightenment and → secularization as a segment of history. In the conditions of the order of the everyday, the not-everyday experience of the 'extraordinary' was included (H. Adriaanse; I. Mörth; A Schütz; B. Waldenfels). This multiplicity, with which 'everyday,' or 'daily,' has always been conceptually filled, evinces the concept, as a researcher's view, that can not only be reduced to partial areas, but that is programmatically directed toward human life in common across the board.

Definition

b) 'Everyday' or 'daily' comprehends all activity directed to the safeguarding of the survival of individual persons and groups (e.g. protection of nourishment/peace), to produce and stabilize individual and collective identities (e.g. tribe or occupation), to effect, fasten and maintain social relationships (e.g. family, or societies), as well as to introduce personal or collective interests in the general process of the pursuit of interests (politics). This definition is very comprehensive and transcends individual current or historical societies; a concretization of action and activities that belong to the everyday can be conveyed only for respective empirical societies, or for their partial systems. The same holds for the denomination demanded by Norbert Elias of the 'not everyday.'[1] Religion, as an umbrella concept for the formation of meaning in societies, refers to all conceptualizations and expectations of gods, God, a supposed or experienced Absolute, vis-à-vis or in relationship to an inclusive ethical consensus of general certitude.[2]

Religion as a Salvation System

2. Religion as a salvation system corresponds with the structure of the everyday; concepts of meaning (images of God) and political constellations (systems of government) are interrelated. This is shown by alterations in societies' everyday life after a change of religion/confession/concept of meaning (→ Reformation; Revolution), or when one religious culture is destroyed by another from without, as by conquest, colonialism, or mission.

Pre-Modern Societies

a) In pre-modern societies, the order/ing of the everyday, the 'typifying of the relevant' (Adriaanse) emerges on the basis of religious meaning-connections (T. Luckmann), which legitimize → government internally, as well as develop, in correspondence with the increasing differentiation of the society at hand, institutions for the exercise of government/rule (god-king/queen, priest/ess, church). Sacred and profane spheres are separated.

The sacred order includes the administration (church) of salvation, as well as its transmission (blessing) and denial (interdict), and the formulation of clerical regulations. The profane order (e.g., laws), grounded on religion, structures the central areas of everyday life, such as space, → time, sexual relations, as well as the disposition of property and work. The transposition of orders into the acts or actions of individuals and groups ensues through functional elites (e.g., pastors or officials; → Specialists). Everyday government—thus, the representation of government by its 'officers' in the broadest sense (e.g., ruler, magistrate)—and the 'ceremonial' (e.g., enthronement, presentation, installment of legislators, administration of oaths of office), rest on religious traditions (E. Kantorowicz). In corresponding fashion, the governed too base their everyday—their actions of acceptance or resistance—on religion: for instance the laity's demand for participation in the formulation of normative stipulations (e.g, in the Peasants' Uprising, 1524/25). When subjects (e.g., Baptists) select a different religion from that of the general consensus (→ Heresy), the result is that the government itself is called into question, just as their recalcitrance in the observance of everyday traditions may indicate that the government has dissolved (e.g., → relics, → exorcism, or → pilgrimages, in → Protestantism).

Modern/Postmodern Age

b) The transitions from pre-modern society to modern, and finally to postmodern, are fluid (→ Modernity/Modern Age; Postmodernity). In modernity, the increasing mix of religious systems into one and the same political space (tolerance) was followed by constitutionally guaranteed religious → freedom. The latter was connected with the severance of the churches from normative competency (→ Secularization), and from ethics, as the basis of political and social activity (Forndran). It is true that this measure deprived religion in the modern age of its formerly obvious status for the structuring of the everyday. However, its canon continued to have an effect in the general ethical consensus (e.g., in the switch from a religious to a political public festal culture, or from a religious to a scientific explanation of the world). It is also the basis of the regulatory function of positive law for society that by now has become exclusive. Nevertheless, the meaning and importance of religion diminished for the personal and corporative formation of meaning ('ideologizing,' politicizing). In the postmodern age, an ethical consensus that would be normative is increasingly rare (P. Berger). Neither is an ordering of life any longer at hand that would be founded in religion and possesses uniform validity for all persons of the same political unit.

Piety: Religious Practice

3. "Society is not simply given. It exists only when it is conceptualized, and this concept made binding and reinforced in collective rites."[3] Everyday activity is thereby always testimony. This principle holds in the same fashion for the logic of activity of societal groups, milieus, and institutions. Prevailing interpretational patterns and meaning connections are, on the one hand, transmitted socially and historically, and at the same time are differentiated by group interests (hierarchies of meaning). This tension requires a systematic distinction among the societal constitution of meaning and the "mental representation of this meaning structure in the awareness of the acting subjects."[4]

Pre-Modern Societies

a) In pre-modern societies, the prevailing religion, in rite, habitus, and gesture, provides a collective framework of activity for the formation and demarcation of → identity. Appropriation of the respective 'right manner' occurs by way of presence at → rituals, and the listening to instructive texts. Archaic religions, for example, practice the visiting of fields, ritual dancing, and the narration of myths; the Christian churches perform divine services, and teach in sermons and edifying literature. The distinct societal positionings, respectively, are thus conveyed, endorsed, and established through everyday activity. Status (→ Prestige), rank, and family and group honor are represented in rite and ceremonial, and transmitted to the next generation (e.g., social life, acceptance, confirmation or departure). At festive occasions and religious presentations, social 'positioning' is formed or inherited, for example by way of possession of ecclesiastical chairs, position in processions, or the outlining of corpse-visitation.

Modern/Postmodern Age

b) In modern societies as well, the stability of the social system is guaranteed by the evening-out of interests among social groups and coalitions. A 'secularization of piety' emerges, while rituals continue nevertheless to be transmitted on the basis of ethical → values generated from religions. Once the regions of 'life' and → 'work' are increasingly differentiated from the traditional ensemble of existence-guaranteeing acts and activities, social alliances, too, are ordered to these two areas of being: familial everyday and club membership on the one hand, trade unions and factories on the other. The distinction of pre-modern society into sacred and profane spheres is now re-inscribed as 'private' and 'public.' In postmodern society, granted, external pressures are disappearing, in private and public spheres alike. However, it is more and more incumbent on the individual to preserve association and draw boundaries vis-à-vis others, and to guard unity as a subject with regard to the most widely differing 'roles' in the partial social areas. Correspondingly, one can observe a 'sacralization of the subject': 'being present' as experience becomes a virtual 'having-been-present' as imagination (Soeffner; Albrecht), such as in the → television society (news, soap operas).

Offers of Action and Interaction

4. Feelings of self-worth and subjective consciousness arise largely in socially determined frameworks of activity (status, gender, family status, stage of life). A place corresponds to them in the course of daily life. In religiously structured societies, individual persons take their orientations in their respective subjective evaluations of religion. Their integration into the social environment or their separation (spiritual or confessional minority) likewise emerges from religious convictions. The planes of daily life and religion flow together in → 'rites of passage' (van Gennep), connected with passages (physical transformation: birth, maturity/adolescence, motherhood, and death). Social processes of transformation correspond to them "in the function of ordering one's life history":[6] baptism/birth certificate, initiation, pairing, parenthood, and divorce/widowing. By way of the ritual accompaniment of these transformations, the individual person is bound to social groups, where their execution bases their social and legal positioning (maturity). Furthermore, daily life calls for socio-psychological 'transformations' as well. The general order, disturbed by individual transgression (→ Sin), is reestablished by temporary exclusion, contrition, → penance, and ritual pardon. This process holds as well for rehabilitation after economic 'sins,' such as competition. Government, even in self-styled secular societies and states, organizes and regulates its control over individuals through these rites of → initiation (registration, right to inheritance). In all of these processes of transformation, the existence of individual persons and thereby also the endurance of their social group are endangered. Thus, one assures oneself of help from higher authorities. The same is valid for conditions that require healing (→ Illness/Health; Conflict/Violence).

Pre-Modern Societies

a) In pre-modern societies, historical and present alike, 'religion for the individual' has 'the quality of security.'[7] The everyday is structured through religion, which is understood as representative of the all-embracing divine/cosmic order, and a 'vessel of unassailable and obvious stores of knowledge.'[8] It embraces the activity of members of 'elite' groups and classes, as well as that of the 'little people.' Daily life, happiness and misfortune, or uncertainties, are not the same for all persons, however. In their various stages of life, men and women run their respective risks, and are confronted by their respective needs (H. Wenzel; P. Dinzelbacher; → Security). The need to be rescued is essentially determined by their economic needs (nutritional security); governors or farmers, merchants or scholars, have different risks to secure against, and this is reflected in the action and interaction spectrum of the everyday (R. van Dülmen; N. Schindler). The activities of common → eating and → drinking are obligatory, even in our own day: the Lord's Supper for church communities, fertility festivals for agricultural society; drinking bouts for the guilds and brotherhoods in cities, social gatherings for college students. In terms of the securing of existence (nourishment) and reconciliation (salvation), there is the need to span several generations, as well as to include the departed through memorial rites (→ Monument/Memorial Places). Independently of class, education, and gender, persons need not only what the religion of common consent can provide, such as prayers, pilgrimages, institutes. In order to reach security, they turn outside the prevailing religion, as well, to magical practices (conjuring, → amulets). The strategies of individuals for managing the problems of everyday life overlap their position in the social and political systems, through which the division into a religion of the elite and a popular piety is called into question (K. Schreiner; W. Brückner). → Magic, as a help to avoid misfortune and means of defense in times of uncertainty, is therefore by no means contradictory of religion, but is an accepted practice of daily life, even within religious institutions.

Modernity/Postmodernity

b) In modern societies, it is the task of all individuals, in reflection upon their → biographies, to produce their own achievements of integration—that is, to discover a pattern of interpretation for their own lives, one that could integrate the most varying experiences.[9] The subject can select from a multiplicity of value concepts for her/his definition, but his or her activity is tied to prevailing norms. The individual's freedom from religious pressure, then, consists not in one's activity itself, but in the choice of frameworks of values.

Religious Experience

5. Everyday → experiences reveal tensions between normative prescriptions (commandments and laws) and social reality, and generate irritations that call for adjustment. As creative event, experiences of the 'extraordinary' characterize a different area of reality from the empirics of the everyday. To be 'beside oneself,' outside oneself, as it were, and to 'come back into order,' as an experience of 'seizure,' calls the reality-status of the normal world into question, and leads to altered outlooks on daily life. It can be 'summoned up' from without (→ Mysticism; Trance), or be assimilated within, but, either way, it is inevitably pre-formed through received images and texts, and is interpreted and communicated in the same. Such 'boundary crossings' or transcendence of the usual are introduced as a rite of collective experience: for the interpretation of daily life, for the adaptation of stores of knowledge to altering relationships (I.-M. Greverus), and for the settlement of conflicts, for example in → shamanism. Personal religious experience, then, presents itself as a subjectivized form of religion that of course is not equally possible for all persons. It is connected to the perception of divergences, to readiness for uncertainty (avant-garde), and to formation of meaning by the extraordinary. Activity emerging from the personal process or from conscious inactivity (quietism, pacifism) works back once more into daily life. This achievement of integration can materialize in any of several manners: as adaptation of one's perception of social reality to norms, or 'flight to another world' (repression); as alteration of social reality (social engagement or commitment); as drafting and realizing counter models to adaptation to the norms (real utopia, counter-worlds). By calling into question previously 'obvious' realities of the everyday, an alteration makes possible the experience of the 'extraordinary' in two directions: for the individual as reintegration, for the totality as adaptation of order and social reality (vivacity, liveliness). The transfer of the extraordinary into everyday life is difficult in all societies. Granted, in pre-modern societies the religious order does include the 'extraordinary' in the cosmos; nevertheless, it is excluded from normative competence in an orthodox manner. In modern societies, with their particular orders, the delicate equilibrium (R. Waldenfels) is disturbed by the 'extraordinary'; there follows an exclusion, and, being regarded as 'private,' the extraordinary is thrust out to the fringes as 'not real.' In postmodern society, the possibility of an experience of the 'extraordinary' erodes, in the measure that a discussion about and a conversation on these experiences no longer takes place. Thus, piety does remain possible as an experience, but is no longer to be expressed in the religious 'images' of one's own culture. Or at least it is to be expressed in alienation through religions of other cultures or in the forms of secular meaning concepts (fashion).

Disenchantment of the Daily

With the everyday of the capitalistic economy in view, Max → Weber characterized the consequences of a monopolization of magic by religion as a '→ disenchantment of the world.'[10] A study of the correlation between religion and the everyday makes Weber's 'disappearance of magic' look to have been replaced by an ongoing process of a transformation of the religious.

1. Elias, in: Hammerich/Klein 1978, 22.
2. Berger, Peter L., Der Zwang zur Häresie, Freiburg 1992, 41 (see Berger 1979).
3. Durkheim 1975, 99.
4. Schöll, Albrecht, Zwischen Revolte und frommer Anpassung. Die Rolle der Religion in der Adoleszenzkrise, Münster 1992, 305.
5. Luckmann, in: Gabriel 1996, 27.
6. Wohlrab-Sahr 1995, 9.

7. Berger 1992 (see note 2), 39.
8. Gestrich, Andreas, "Alltag im pietistischen Dorf. Bürgerliche Religiosität in ländlicher Lebenswelt," in: Die alte Stadt 1 (1993), 47-59, p. 48.
9. See Wohlrab-Sahr 1995, 16.
10. Tyrell, Hartmann, "Potenz und Depotenzierung der Religion—Religion und Rationalisierung bei Max Weber," in: Saeculum 44 (1993), 300-347, p. 306.

Literature

Adriaanse, Hendrik J., "Vorzeichnung der religiösen Erfahrung in der Alltagserfahrung: Auszeichnung der Alltagserfahrung in der religiösen Erfahrung," in: Casper, Bernhard/Sparn, Walter (eds.), Alltag und Transzendenz. Studien zur religiösen Erfahrung in der gegenwärtigen Gesellschaft, Munich 1992, 51-66; Berger, Peter L., The Heretical Imperative: Contemporary Possibilities of Religious Affirmation, Garden City 1979; Brückner, Wolfgang, "Zum Wandel der religiösen Kultur im 18. Jahrhundert. Einkreisungsversuche des 'Barockfrommen' zwischen Mittelalter und Massenmissionierung," in: Hinrichs, Ernst (ed.), Sozialer und kultureller Wandel in der ländlichen Welt des 18. Jahrhunderts, Wolfenbüttel 1982, 65-83; Durkheim, Emile, Textes 2: Religion, morale, anomie, Paris 1975; Gabriel, Karl (ed.), Religiöse Individualisierung oder Säkularisierung. Biographie und Gruppe als Bezugspunkte moderner Religiosität, Gütersloh 1996; Hammerich, Kurt/Klein, Michael (eds.), Materialien zur Soziologie des Alltags. Kölner Zeitschrift für Soziologie und Sozialpsychologie, Sonderheft 20 (1978); Hunt, Stephen, Religion and Everyday Life, London 2005; Jenkins, Timothy, Religion in English Everyday Life: An Ethnographic Approach, New York 1999; Laeyendecker, L. et al. (eds.), Experiences and Explanations: Historical and Sociological Essays on Religion in Everyday Life, Leeuwarden 1990; Luther, Henning, Religion und Alltag. Bausteine zu einer praktischen Theologie des Subjekts, Stuttgart 1992; Schreiner, Klaus (ed.), Laienfrömmigkeit im späten Mittelalter. Formen, Funktionen, politisch-soziale Zusammenhänge, Munich 1992; Soeffner, Hans-Georg (ed.), Kultur und Alltag, Göttingen 1988; Stark, Rodney, Exploring the Religious Life, Baltimore 2004; Stearns, Peter N. (ed.), Encyclopedia of European Social History from 1350 to 2000, vol. 5: Culture, Leisure, Religion, Education, Everyday Life, Detroit 2001; Wenzel, Horst, Hören und sehen, Schrift und Bild. Kultur und Gedächtnis im Mittelalter, Munich 1995; Wohlrab-Sahr, Monika (ed.), Biographie und Religion. Zwischen Ritual und Selbstsuche, Frankfurt/M. 1995.

→ Biography/Autobiography, Civil Religion, Confession, Crisis, Family/Kinship/Genealogy, Friendship, Funeral/Burial, Death and Dying, Economics, Illness/Health, Initiation, Life Cycle, Materiality, Perception, Popular Culture, Publicity, Sexuality, Rites of Passage, Ritual, Tradition, Work

Barbara Hoffmann

Evil / Evil One

Evil

1. The linguistic use of the word 'evil' spans a spectrum of meaning, extending from an undifferentiated everyday meaning (unhealthy, threatening, or dangerous), to a religious classification (anti-salvific), to a metaphysical explanation of the world in terms of a good and bad principle (evil). It is always elucidated in antithetical correspondence with a counter-concept of good, and always stands in connection with a general explanation of the world. Altogether generally, what is called 'bad' or 'evil' is that which factually harms. In a more specific sense, an 'evil' person or thing is one that may only seek to harm, so that evil becomes the drama of freedom

(Safranski). In philosophical connections, including those of a worldview, the viewpoint of salvation irrevocably lost often comes into play. In the conduct of practical living, of course, it is necessary to practice a culture of the conquest of frustration, sickness, and death. The religions offer pathways of understanding and practices of living, in which evil is taken up and manipulated or processed. Of course, productive behavior with evil always means playing with fire.

Decision in Favor of the Good God

2. a) European and North American culture stands in the tradition of a monotheistic, homogeneous view of reality. This view generates what is called the 'problem of evil': if God is good, whence comes evil? Is it caused by the 'fallen' human being, does it lie anchored in the essence of the human being (selfishness, pridefulness, disobedience), or does it attach to the responsibility of the free human being? Can evil be overcome in a messianic future? In the Christian conviction, Jesus's death (→ Cross/Crucifixion) has overcome evil by salvific suffering and vicarious expiation. The classic conception of the Western Church remains the one defined by → Augustine. Evil is the 'deprivation of good,' and therefore ontologically empty. At the same time, a key role falls to a person's guilt before God, and the course of the history of the world is explained as a struggle between two 'world empires' (→ Dualism), a battle to be decided only in the apocalyptic terror of the end time. The binding bracket of these elements is the doctrine of original sin. On the basis of the sin of Adam, all persons stand in debt before God. The ultimate question of the depths of God, along with the question of the right to protest against God (from Job to a 'theology after Auschwitz'), remains unanswered. Doubts of faith in a God of goodness have never stilled, as the world that God created knows evil.

The 'Devil'

3. Confrontations with evil have failed to overcome irrational elements appearing in dealing with evil. Thus, belief in 'evil become a person' has always existed (called 'the → Devil,' 'Satan,' or 'Beelzebub'). Belief in the devil is certainly not based on the Bible, and yet has flourished in every era of Christianity. Belief in → possession and in the personification of the Devil (from Hitler to Stalin to Saddam Hussain) is still alive: projections describe resistance as useless, and excuse collaboration. Of course, if it is a matter of the devil speaking, this must be recognized as metaphorical. The same is to be said of magical practices expected to serve for the defeat of evil in unholy places.

The history of evil in European culture is two-faced. On the one side, strong humanizing tendencies operate in that history (human worth and value). On the other side, these tendencies have led to contradictory outcomes (devaluation of persons, extermination of groups of persons, misogyny, production of new evil and cruelty). The concept of condemnation lay in the illusion that evil could be definitively overcome in the name of God.

Religious Cultures

3. Evil is variously experienced in different religions. It can be limited to the experience of natural catastrophes, illness, or death, it can be concretized in certain traits of gods, and it can become the object of magical practices (cf. the religions of India). It is sought in the balance of reality (Chinese religions). Buddhism unmasks suffering as a sphere of the seeming: evil is overcome by a surrender of the self, by emergence from the eternal cycle, by a return into Nirvana. In the monotheistic religions, this world-fleeing solution is the most important 'opposite pole.'

Progress

4. In twentieth-century Europe, religion has lost its monopoly on the interpretation of evil. First of all, this change has led to enormous progress in, for example, the formation of theories that include those of psychology, the behavioral sciences, and sociology. At the same time, experiments have outstripped all hitherto known norms. The most varied theories have taken them in earnest (critical theory, Hannah Arendt, Erich Fromm, quests for a 'post-Auschwitz' thinking). Evil is intensively the burden of literature and other arts, not least of all the medium of → film. We have had "Bloodfeast" (H. G. Lewis, 1963), "Night of the Living Dead" (G. A. Romero, 1968), "The Exorcist" (W. Friedkin, 1967), "Dawn of the Dead" (Romero, 1979), "Apocalypse Now" (Coppola, Conrad; 1979), "The Silence of the Lambs" (J. Demme, 1991). Small religious groups take evil as their theme, and succumb to its fascination: in inversion of value systems (→ Satanism), in apocalyptical suicide (People's Temple in 1978 in Guyana, Sun Temple in 1994–1995 in Switzerland and Canada), or in mass murder (Aum sect in Tokyo, March 1995). It belongs to the therapeutic task of religion to process the experience of evil. Religion must overcome the fascination of evil, while at the same time experiencing it intensely. As the "culture of behavior with the unmanageable" (Kambertel), then, authentic religion "demands of the human being the avowal of helplessness, finitude, fallibility, and duty" (Safransky). Cultures can resist only what they do not ignore, but accept as their own problem.

New Fascination

Literature

Auffarth, Christoph/Stuckenbruck, Loren T. (eds.), The Fall of the Angels, Leiden etc. 2004; Baudrillard, Jean, The Transparency of Evil: Essays on Extreme Phenomena, London 1993; Ehrenreich, Barbara, Blood Rites: Origins and History of the Passions of War, New York 1997; Goldberg, Carl, Speaking with the Devil: A Dialogue with Evil, New York 1996; Grand, Sue, The Reproduction of Evil: A Clinical and Cultural Perspective, Hillsdale 2000; Mathews, Charles T., Evil and the Augustinian Tradition, Cambridge 2001; Miller, Arthur G. (ed.), The Social Psychology of Good and Evil, New York 2004; Reventlow, Henning Graf/Hoffman, Yair, The Problem of Evil and Its Symbols in Jewish and Christian Tradition, Edinburgh 2004; Russell, Jeffrey Burton, The Prince of Darkness: Radical Evil and the Power of Good in History, Ithaca 1988; Safranski, Rüdiger, Das Böse oder das Drama der Freiheit, Munich 1997; Staub, Ervin, The Psychology of Good and Evil: Why Children, Adults, and Groups Help and Harm Others, Cambridge 2003.

→ Collective Representations, Conflict/Violence, Demon/Demonology, Devil, Dualism, Ethics/Morals, Magic, Sacrifice, Shoah, Sin, Taboo, Terrorism, Violence, War/Armed Forces, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Hermann Häring

Evil Eye

General

1. The expression 'Evil Eye' (Ital., malocchio, jettatura; Span., mal de ojo) denotes the belief that human beings, as well as many animals, can by their glance or gaze exercise a harmful influence on animate and inanimate objects. The notion was widespread in antiquity itself: the power of the Evil Eye was ascribed especially to the gods who, through the insalubrious power of their jealous eye, were thought to be in a position to bring whole realms down in ruin. This concept is found ever since, in nearly all cultures. It is most widespread in Indo-European space, as well as in Islamic countries, and the areas that they have influenced or colonized. The only change through the centuries has been in the evaluation of the Evil Eye: in antiquity, it was still seen as an unquestionable phenomenon of nature, while at the beginning of the Enlightenment of modern times, it was increasingly the property of popular belief.

The Eye as a Window to the Soul

2. This faith conceptualization is based on the notion that the eye is a window to the soul of the living being, through which true feelings and intentions come to light. We still acknowledge this today, so that, for example, people are seen to be really laughing only when their eyes laugh too. What is perceived through the eye can generate negative feelings, such as jealousy, in the person doing the perceiving. The object of the evil wishes provoked by this feeling, to the point of actual cursing, then becomes the subject of their dire results. If the jealous person disposes of the power of the Evil Eye, it is believed that he or she can use it to cause evils like illness, injury, misfortune, and even death.

Unlike other harmful spells (→ Magic; Prayer/Curse), this ability is thought to attach to certain individuals as a personal peculiarity, either as a stable capacity or as a spontaneous time-to-time phenomenon. It can be inborn or acquired. It can be learned. One can also have it without being aware of it: here the phenomenon exhibits many parallels to European belief in the → witch. There are usually personal particularities that render individuals suspect of disposing of the power of the Evil Eye. Among them are anomalies of the eyes, such as cross-eyes, double pupils, eyes of different colors, or an unusual eye color: in southerly lands blue-eyed persons, in northerly lands brown-eyed, come under suspicion. Extraordinary beauty, too, or the contrary, or strength, or size, arouse the supposition that the one possessing them may stand in contact with dark powers. In particular, dwarves were feared—known to generations of children through the fairy-tale "Rumpelstiltskin"—especially if they were also hunchback. In all times, women were and are much more frequently charged with having the Evil Eye than are men, with the accusation of witchcraft frequently thrown in. Many animals, as well, are ascribed the faculty of the Evil Eye, especially such as gaze out through staring or prominent eyes, as snakes, foxes, owls, grasshoppers, hares, or peacocks. Fear of these can actually dissuade one from the pronunciation of their names, lest one draw down calamity upon oneself.

The weak, especially children, are in the most danger, and women need protection more than men do. Domestic animals are seriously endangered. There are still farmers in Europe today who blame the Evil Eye when their cattle are afflicted with illnesses, or when the cows give no more milk.

3. Inseparably attached to belief in the Evil Eye is the correlative conception that certain objects, expressions, or gestures can protect one from the Evil Eye. This idea occurs most frequently in the case of → amulets. These are thought to prevent their wearers from meeting a direct gaze, in case it is the empowered person's first glance, the most dangerous one. Amulets often depict or represent an eye.

Islam

In Islamic countries, for example, it is customary to attach a blue glass eye to the clothing of infants. Amulets with religious content, such as brief citations of the Qur'an, or magic squares, figure among the very favorite talismans of children and adults alike. In many cultural circles, mothers permit their children to leave the house only with soiled faces and old clothing, in the hope of heading off appreciating glances that could provoke feelings of jealousy, which is one of the principal motives for an ill-willed individual's projection of the Evil Eye. There are countless other techniques as well, for neutralization of the impact of the Evil Eye. Berber women in North Africa wear head kerchiefs studded with glimmering little disks, so that the Evil Eye may be drawn to these rather than upon the person of the wearer. From India to Algeria, women may wear makeup on their eyelids not mainly out of aesthetic considerations, but because they are convinced that they are thereby protecting themselves from the unwholesome regard. Not only → clothing and the human → body, but buildings, as well, are marked or adorned in order to repel the Evil Eye. The walls of buildings are decorated with a variety of designs and geometric patterns. Doors and window frames, too, are marked or designed with blue, the color to which a magical virtue is attributed where protection is desired. Vestiges of these customs are still

Typical outer wall painting on the house of a Muslim family, on the island of Djeerba in Tunisia. In this case, the inhabitants have availed themselves of a number of painted blue symbols for protection against the Evil Eye. The image of the Hand of Fatima, very widespread in Islamic lands, here frames the door on all three sides. The fishes, a security charm, have been taken over from Judaism, and stand for fertility. Their symbolical application is intended to protect the people of the house from infertility caused by the Evil Eye. The pair of horns, right and left at the door, extant in European countries of the Mediterranean basin (→ Mediterranean Region). The Turkish cultural milieu is home to the widely used mashallah, a stylized blue eye, sometimes provided with five attachments to symbolize the Hand of Fatima. The design of Fatima's hand, even standing alone, is generally ascribed a special power of resistance to the Evil Eye. The mashallah is to be found as decorative attachment or supplement, as wall decoration or as amulet, the latter even hung in automobiles.

are a variant of the mano cornuto, a widespread symbol especially in Italy. Additionally, the color blue, applied at all of the openings of the house, prevents the penetration of an evil glance.

Judaism

In Judaism, belief in the Evil Eye, attested in the Talmud itself, was reinforced on the occasion of the Jews' expulsion from Spain after the Reconquista (1492). Accompanying them on their way across North Africa was, in particular, the belief, widespread among Muslims there, in the protective power of the Hand of Fatima. Even today, there are Sephardic Jews in Israel, descendants of the old Spanish Jews, who make and distribute these amulets.

Europe

In Europe, belief in the Evil Eye is mainly rooted in southern Italy. The most frequent protective measures are sexual gestures in all of their variations, such as the mano cornuto or the mano fica (manual gestures symbolizing two horns or a fig). There are healing rituals, besides, that are thought to cure, especially, headaches, psychic disturbances, and a sense of weakness, such rites being performed almost exclusively at the hands of women. At the beginning of the twentieth century, Seligman could still report innumerable examples of belief in, and defenses against, the Evil Eye in Germany. In more northerly European lands, unlike the Mediterranean basin, belief in the Evil Eye has almost vanished with the pre-modern agricultural society and the village community.

Literature

Dundes, Alan (ed.), The Evil Eye: A Folkore Casebook, New York/London 1981; Hauschild, Thomas, Der böse Blick: Ideengeschichtliche und sozialpsychologische Untersuchungen, Berlin [2]1982; Maloney, Clarence (ed.), The Evil Eye, New York 1976; Migliore, Sam, Mal'uocchiu: Ambiguity, Evil Eye, and the Language of Distress, Toronto 1997; Sachs, Lisbeth, Evil Eye or Bacteria: Turkish Migrant Women and Swedish Health Care, Stockholm 1983; Seligmann, Siegfried, Die Zauberkraft des Auges und das Berufen, Hamburg Ndr. 1922.

→ Amulet, Magic, Witch/Persecution of Witches

Silvia Kuske

Evolutionism

Stage Model of Cultural History

1. In the shadow of the biological → theory of evolution, persistent attempts have been made to accommodate this basic notion of development to the cultural and social sciences. The prevailing paradigm of scientific biology seemed suited to serve as a universal model of explanation of historical, social, spiritual, political, ethical, and theological questions. Beginning in mid-nineteenth century, a veritable inflation occurred in 'step models': models of cultural history, in the wake of biological Darwinism, all of them calculated to illustrate the progressive ascent of human development. (a) In his influential The Ancient Society (1887), Lewis Henry

Morgan postulated a three-step progression of social history, from a primal state, to barbarism, to civilization. (b) Johann Jakob Bachofen, in Das Mutterrecht (Ger., "Maternal Law"; 1861), sought to pursue an ascendant development from an early stage of promiscuity, to the matriarchy, to the patriarchy (→ Matriarchy/Patriarchy). (c) Friedrich Engels, in his Ursprung der Familie (Ger., "Origin of the Family"; 1884) defined a five-stage model of societal development, from the primitive society, to slavery, to feudalism, to capitalism, to a (projected) communism. (d) Herbert Spencer, one of the champions of social Darwinism, propagated the theory of a succession of societies from primitive, to military, to industrial (Principles of Sociology, 1876–1898). For religious studies, (e) Edward B. Tylor (Primitive Culture, 1871) was important, with his division, animism, polytheism, and monotheism, as was (f) James G. Frazer (The Golden Bough, 1890), with his stages, magic, religion, science, as influenced by Auguste Comte (1798–1857).

The general pattern of step theories such as these—aside from the ideological elements of content—was that of a unitary, uninterrupted process of the development of humanity, submitted in all times and cultures to the same mono-etiological rules. The concept of rigorously valid laws of science was methodically, and rigorously, transferred to the cultural and social sciences. Progress in the development of societies was seen as universal, and the superiority of, precisely, European civilization was seen as legitimated in terms of the latter's having traversed the route of 'cultural evolution' further than the others. Except in Engels's model, the state of the European industrial nations was always posited as the apex of cultural history.

2. This European optimism with regard to progress now demonstrated its power of penetration in an intensive amalgamation of technological progress (industrial revolution), politics (→ Colonialism), and the conceptual models that legitimated ideological stances (social Darwinism, stage-models of a step-by-step development of culture, theology of a mission to the heathen). In particular, it was only a short distance to a legitimization of societally-oriented interpretations of Darwinism. Social Darwinism (or better, social Spencerism) served as locus of intersection between nature and society, biology and social theory: Darwin's biological thesis of the survival of the fittest, interpreted in its extreme conceptualization as a 'pitiless battle for being, in which the stronger, and thereby the better, prevails,' was transferred to societal systems. American economic liberalism, like Manchester capitalism, communism, and European colonialism (and later, the racial ideology of German National Socialism), sought its basis in a quasi-'natural' conditioning. Conceptualizations of value and culture on the part of the colonializing, imperialistic industrial societies of the end of the nineteenth century saw the empirical justification of their political and social purposes in a Darwinistic notion of natural history. In the form of an ideological justificatory conclusion, the European, the German, the Aryan 'assertiveness' could be regarded as the premise of the higher cultural, national, and ethical value of the more successful. There is a series of peoples who ascribe to themselves the status of a special election by God (as the Massai, the Jews). Here, however, an additional premise functions: the scientific foundation of the election of the whites and their natural right to spatial expansion and the subjugation of inferior races and religions.

Social Darwinism

'Primitive' = Children

3. The evolutionists interpreted the chronological contiguity of various cultures, religions, and societal forms as a historical and systematic sequence. In terms of the stage-models, it was argued that contemporary 'primitive' society could be identified with historically surpassed forms of one's own society. By analogy, primitive cultures correspond to a 'childhood stage of humanity,' naturally subordinate to a right to their upbringing on the part of the 'mature, adult culture.' A rectilinear course of development in humanity's cultural evolution must necessarily entail upon the further developed element the incumbency of a 'duty of upbringing.' In the area of religion, there follows the responsibility of missionizing not only technologically and socially, but also religiously and morally 'retarded cultures.' Monotheistic Christianity defines the optimal religious stage of development, as it were, while other forms of religion are to be overcome as primitive precursors. Just as the will of naughty, recalcitrant children, who refuse to submit to good and right upbringing, must be broken, so also regional opposition on other continents to cultural and social progress must be forced (→ Mission; Colonialism).

4. Although an elaboration of the theoretical foundation of evolutionism dates from the nineteenth century, broad areas of the politics of the twentieth century, especially that of → National Socialism, but also that of the 'Cold War,' evince the spirit of this thinking. The better social and economic system has triumphed, we hear, and its dominance has been revealed in every area—in science, in technology (space travel), art, even in the sporting area of the → Olympic Games. Accordingly, evolutionism can also be presented intellectually as a reproach, for instance in a context of the concept of the global validity of Western norms of development (e.g., in efforts toward the universal acceptance of → human rights. In 1988, after the massacre in Peking's Tiananmen Square of Heavenly Peace, the leadership of the Chinese Communist Party rejected the West's censures and 'gentle' admonition that human rights be observed, averring that the latter were foreign to Chinese tradition, and that they failed to correspond to the cultural interests of the Chinese people. These were Western values, ran the apologia, that might not be forced, imperialistically and evolutionalistically, upon other cultural milieus.

Literature

Boyer, Pascal, Religion Explained: The Evolutionary Origins of Religious Thought, New York 2001; Crook, Paul, Darwinism, War and History: The Debate Over the Biology of War from the "Origin of Species" to the First World War, Cambridge 1994; Embski, William A./Ruse, Michael (eds.), Debating Design: From Darwin to DNA, Cambridge 2000; Hawkins, Mike, Social Darwinism in European and American Thought, 1860–1945: Nature as Model and Nature as Threat, Cambridge 1997; Larson, Edward, J., Evolution: The Remarkable History of a Scientific Theory; Nordgren, Anders, Evolutionary Thinking: An Analysis of Rationality, Morality and Religion from an Evolutionary Perspective, Uppsala 1994; Numbers, Ronald L./Stenhouse, John (eds.), Disseminating Darwinism: The Role of Place, Race, Religion, and Gender, Cambridge 1999; Wilson, David Sloan, Darwin's Cathedral: Evolution, Religion, and the Nature of Society, Chicago 2002.

→ Colonialism, Eugenics, Mission, Progress, Race/Racism, Science, Theory of Evolution

Stefan Hartmann

Exchange / Gift

Exchange of Gifts

1. In societies that do not employ governmental institutions and the medium of money in the establishment of interpersonal relationships, an exchange of gifts has a greater burden of meaning than that of a mere transaction in goods. By contrast with forms of exchange, usually profane, determined directly by economic requirements, an exchange of gifts is a social process and follows ritual rules, which frequently appear in the form of ritual laws, sacred ceremonies, and magic. The structure of the exchange of gifts is marked by four socializing obligations: giving, receiving, requiting, and giving once more. These four duties ground the status of the individual in pre-governmental societies that stand as the group 'I.' The size of the gift (or of a punishment) is measured by the degree of social regard the giver and the recipient possess in the group. The gifts that chiefs and overseers receive need not be directly requited. (There is no direct reciprocity.) But the givers of the gifts expect that overseers or chiefs will make use of their social positions in critical circumstances, for example by asking the judge for some consideration in the matter of a legal finding, or by connecting the gift-giver with a host family in the city for a term of education. A wealthy person is informally obliged, as 'benefactor' (Gk., euergétes), to bestow gifts on the generality of persons.

b) This generalized reciprocity is also the model for religious gifts to the gods. The fact that the gods do not make direct requital for these gifts is not the violation of a duty on the part of the gods, but corresponds to their social position: in time of need, these gods will assist all the more generously. Worshippers seek to cultivate this friendship through regular and generous gifts that at first seem unilateral—those of the → sacrifice.

c) The modern form of gift in capitalistic society is the present. Here the socializing obligation of requital is absent. Unlike the gift, the present need not be requited as a matter of social or moral obligation. Instead, it is limited to being the expression of a personal and private relationship between the giver and the recipient. The socializing competency previously invested in the community is compressed in modern society in the individual.

2. The epochal concept of gift (1925) expressed by French social scientist Marcel Mauss as a 'total social fact,' in which all kinds of institutions—religious, juridical, moral, economic, and so on—come to expression at once, has indelibly marked the social sciences to our own day. One of the most important systems of gift exchange by which Mauss demonstrates this social process is kula, the ring exchange, among the various island groups of Papua New Guinea. At periodic intervals (from one to two years), the Trobrianders and their neighbors, represented by tribal chieftains, village heads, and their male kin, undertake ocean expeditions, carefully prepared for by means both magical and nautical. The course of the phenomenon is determined primarily by the circulation of two valuable objects—red necklaces of chama mussels in a northerly direction, and white bracelets of the conus species in a southerly direction. The exchange of these gifts, which is framed in manifold processes of gift exchange, occurs with delay, as the first gift must first be compensated by a return visit and a return gift. Each gift effects two more: a reciprocal gift and a further gift, between/among at least two transaction partners. The Departure for kula, the ring exchange in the Trobriand Islands of the Pacific. The canoe being launched will bear highly valued ornamental pieces, prepared from mussels, to the neighboring group of islands, to be exchanged with the inhabitants there, thus guaranteeing mutual obligations.

cyclical paths of the gifts condition an exchange structure underlying the ritualized rhythm of giving, receiving, requiting, and giving again. The goal of prestigious possession of the gifts is temporary, but it leads to enduring gift partnerships, which entail the reciprocal obligation of offering one another protection, hospitality, and support, as well as of carrying on trade with one another. Kula is the prerequisite for gimwali, subsequent commerce in useful goods as determined by economic requirements.

The meaning of the obligation striven for lies less in the gift or the giving in itself, than in the duration and political, economic, and emotional quality of the relations thereby engendered. Objects of value that have already long circulated embody most intensively the social time, and are most important in terms of magical ritual. The obligation that exists vicariously through the tribal chiefs for the entire group is sacralized and sanctioned through ceremonies. Social control is manifested in belief in the efficacy of → magic. The later plays an important role during the transactions: magical rituals are regarded as positively influencing the gift relationship. Generosity has a higher moral value than strategies of self-interest, as it evokes the desired reciprocal obligation.

Since the earliest research into kula, carried out in 1922 by British anthropologist Bronislaw Malinowski, many changes have entered the scene. Today women, too, are included as exchange partners, money as exchange gifts, and modern means of transportation are used. Institutions similar to kula are very widespread in Melanesia and Polynesia. The festivals of the distribution of gifts, the Potlach Festivals, of the Indian societies of northwestern America, are another well-known example of the gift-exchange. In these events, participants have often bestowed gifts to the point of their economic ruin.

Other Kinds of Gift Exchange

3. The exchange of gifts fuses persons and gifts. With the development of the market economy, however, a split occurred between gift and person. The ideology of the gift disconnected from interests of exchange arose in parallel with the pure exchange-economy, free of personal interests (Parry). Pure gift is the counter-image of a market economy, and the gift is articulated above all in systems of religious belief. In all of the great world religions, a 'profit' is promised from gifts ideally given privately, and without the intention of obliging a reciprocal deed in the present life. The receipt of gifts is not understood as a social obligation, but as a 'grace,' something gratis, imparted to the receiver.

Alms and Donations

In Christianity an elaborate system of giving has developed, calculated to maintain the institutions of church, cloister, and religious community. In the footsteps of the development of the state and → money, money came to be established as an object of which a gift could be made. A 'donation' is voluntary 'payment' without reciprocation.

Money

The ritual principle of the reciprocity of the gift-exchange is still to be found today, in the form of the gift given on the occasion of religious feasts, for example at Christmas.

Literature

Godelier, Maurice, The Enigma of the Gift, Chicago 1999; Leach, Jerry W./Leach, Edmund (eds.), The Kula: New Perspectives on Massim Exchange, Cambridge 1983; Malinowski, Bronislaw, Argonauts of the Western Pacific: An Account of Native Enterprise and Adventure in the Archipelagoes of Melanesian New Guinea, London 1922; Mauss, Marcel, The Gift: Forms and Functions of Exchange in Archaic Societies, London 1954 ([1]1925); Osteen, Mark (ed.), The Question of the Gift: Essays across Disciplines, London 2002; Parry, Jonathan, "The Gift, the Indian Gift and the 'Indian Gift,'" in: Man 21 (1921), 453-473; Rupp, Katherine, Gift-Giving in Japan: Cash, Connections, Cosmologies, Stanford 2003; Weiner, Annette B., Women of Value, Men of Renown: New Perspectives in Trobriand Exchange, Austin/London 1976.

→ Christmas, Economy, Money, Prestige, Sacrifice

Karin Kathöfer

Exegesis

Exegesis (Gk., 'explanation'; etym., 'out-leading,' 'ex-position') denotes the interpretation or explanation of a text or a passage of a text, especially one from the Bible, and especially at the hands of an expert. In Greek sanctuaries, exegetes stood ready to 'translate' oracles of the god into human speech, or to explain to strangers the meaning of the chunks of boulder, or the tree, in the sanctuary, having to find an answer for everything. In theology, professionals concern themselves with the translation of the old, sacred texts into the world and life of the audience. They stand in a long tradition of 'exposition,' but are always confronted with new questions. Here they are always astraddle what they hope is the meaning of the text (pejoratively called 'eisegesis,' i.e. 'in-leading,' 'in-putting' of alien meanings of their own or others), and the historical text, which often contradicts their interpretation. The method of historical criticism has trenchantly elucidated the contrast between source texts and products of exigesis.

→ Bible, Book, Hermeneutics, Specialists (Religious), Text/Textual Criticism, Theology, Translation, Writing

Christoph Auffarth

Existentialism

1. Existentialism is the colloquial designation of a philosophical current of the twentieth century. The common element of the philosophies in question is the methodological reduction of their content to the existence of the individual person. Existentialism presents a generalizing, alien designation for otherwise quite different philosophical outlines of the world. As a specific designation, the concept is found solely with Jean-Paul Sartre. A synonym antedating Sartre's application is philosophy of existence, which was current as early as 1929, and in German-speaking space became a pejorative designation. Existentialism must be understood in terms of the history of religions, and this vis-à-vis the background of the collapse of comprehensive collective meaning-systems in the early half of the twentieth century. It entailed → nihilism and the loss of the plausibility of the Christian confessions. As an answer to a question of meaning, now felt to have become more trenchant—especially in the wake of the two World Wars—new philosophical positions were constructed. These positions took their point of departure, and enunciated their guidelines for action, in terms of the manners of existence of the individual human life.

Historical Survey

2. This concept of existence goes back to Søren Kierkegaard (1813–1855), and received further impulse through the work of Friedrich → Nietzsche (1844–1900). Danish philosopher of religion Kierkegaard set over against Hegel's conceptual thinking the passion of the 'one who exists,' the one infinitely interested in existing. Kierkegaard's pioneering analysis of fear, death, and existence was still conducted in a Christian connection of meaning, although the latter was abandoned by the philosophers of existence of the twentieth century.

In the secular context, and standing before the challenge of European nihilism, Karl Jaspers (1883–1969) systematically formulated his thinking in his three-volume Philosophie (1932). He entitled the volumes, respectively, Philosophische Weltorientierung; Existenzerhellung; Metaphysik (Ger., "Philosophical Orientation to the World," "Enlightenment upon Existence," "Metaphysics"), and here sought to regain a coded experience of transcendence. The fact that in possible catastrophes, being can still be experienced, Jaspers thought, indicates that the "bestowal of meaning on the part of the meaningless" must occur in the "accomplishment of existing," and in the accomplishment of the existential communication that, not being conditioned by interests or compulsion, bestows and establishes true community. Martin Heidegger (1889–1976), in his Sein und Zeit (1927; Ger., "Being and Time,"), attempted an analysis of the human being as 'existence.' If persons make conscious choices in their being, they can live in the mode of being of Eigentlichkeit (lit., 'propriety': actuality, authenticity). Here as well, the project is to transfer, to translate, human temporality, historicity, and transitory condition (Sein zum Tode, lit., 'being to death': being as intrinsically ordered toward death), into a meaningful pathos, by means of an analysis of human existence. The momentum was taken up and extended by Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–1980) in his early standard work, L'être et le néant (1943; Fr., "Being and Nothingness"). The key word with Sartre is freedom, and his motto is that a person's existence precedes his or her essence. Only in finally existing do persons posit their essence as a projet, a 'project/plan' for the future. Inasmuch as there is no sign of transcendence in the world, (god-) abandoned human beings demand their freedom and become nothing other than their own 'project,' their sketch of what they would become. On this basis, Sartre develops his ethics of full responsibility for oneself and for humanity. It is especially in French existentialism that the quest for the meaning of the world is undone from its theistic models, and with Albert Camus (1913–1960), in a return to ancient mythology, leads to a new form of 'atheistic religiosity' vis-à-vis nature and the cosmos. It is this atheistic piety to which, with the aid of 'Mediterranean thought,' he wishes once more to conclude. In his very analysis of the absurd, Camus postulates the happy person, who consciously accepts her or his suffering. Further, out of the myth of Sisyphus, and later from that of → Prometheus, he shapes a new, exemplary account of resistance and revolt.

Reception outside Europe

3. In the course of European philosophy's exportation, existentialism was taken up in Japan through the Buddhist-influenced philosophers of the Kyôto school. Keiji Nishitani (1900–1990) engaged in confrontations with Heidegger and Sartre. Buddhist philosopher Yoshinori Takeuchi (b. 1913) designates his approach as 'Buddhist existentalism,' whose concern, he says, is to get beyond → metaphysics and to come to an existential illumination and development.

Locus of History of Religions

4. Existentialism has its locus in the philosophical confrontations co-impregnated by the development of modernity in the history of religions. It is both a product of and a reaction to the growing individualization and pluralization of offers of meaning. Kierkegaard himself had mounted such a quest for meaning on an existential basis, an effort directed against the religious and ethical norms channeled by the churches. The European philosophy of the modern age increasingly emancipated itself from its Christian context and sought to establish a sphere of meaning of its own, whose goal would be the unification of temporal and eternal (Kierkegaard), existence and transcendence (Jaspers), being hurled into the world and authenticity (Heidegger), freedom and determination (Sartre), absurdity and nature (Camus). Here various forms of philosophically articulated religiosity have developed whose worldview and ethics alike have little in common with collective and institutionalized forms of religion, and run counter to the Christian understanding of religion. Although scholar of religion Mircea → Eliade sees in existentialism an expression of the modern a-religious person, whose existential situation is exhausted in relativity, historicity, and a refusal of the transcendent and the cosmos, it must be pointed out that religious meanings of the human being and the world need not be tied to transcendence or the cosmos. Existentialism, then, presents a reaction to the increasing loss of a theistic meaning of the world and human existence in terms of Christianity. In the context of a religious history of Europe dominated by the Christian confessions, we also find an increasing rejection of collectively mediated meanings.

Literature

Sources: Camus, Albert, The Myth of Sisyphus, Harmondsworth 1975 ([1]1942); Idem, L'homme révolté, Paris 1951; Friedman, Maurice (ed.), The Worlds of Existentialism: A Critical Reader, New York 1964; Heidegger, Martin, Being and Time, New York 1962 ([1]1927); Jaspers, Karl, Philosophie, 3 vols., Berlin 1932; Jonas, Hans, The Gnostic Religion: The Message of the Alien God and the Beginnings of Christianity, Boston 1958; MacDonald, Paul S. (ed.), The Existentialist Reader: An Anthology of Key Texts, Edinburgh 2000; Nishitani, Keiji, Religion and Nothingness, Berkeley 1982; Ohashi, Kitarô (ed.), Die Philosophie der Kyôto-Schule: Texte und Einführung, Freiburg 1990; Sartre, Jean-Paul, Being and Nothingness: An Essay on Phenomenological Ontology, London 1969 ([1]1943); Idem, Existentialism and Humanism, London 1989.

Secondary Literature: Fulton, Ann, Apostles of Sartre: Existentialism in America, 1945–1963, Evanston 1999; Gordon, Haim (ed.), Dictionary of Existentialism, London 1999; Guignon, Charles (ed.), The Existentialists: Critical Essays on Kierkegaard, Nietzsche, Heidegger, and Sartre, Lanham 2004; Martin, Thomas, Oppression and the Human Condition: An Introduction to Sartrean Existentialism, Lanham 2002; Wolin, Richard, The Terms of Cultural Criticism: The Frankfurt School, Existentialism, Poststructuralism, New York 1992.

→ Gnosticism, Meaning/Signification, Modernity/Modern Age, Nietzsche, Theodicy

Jürgen Mohn

Exorcism

Concept

1. 'Exorcism' (from Gk., exorkizein, 'adjure to go out') can be defined generally as the ritual expulsion of spirits from persons (→ Possession) or (other) animate or inanimate objects. As such, it is to be encountered in many historical ages and cultures. Exorcism is always practiced by → specialists (shamans, priests, etc.), and according to prescribed rules. Possession can express itself in illness or in extraordinary conditions seemingly uncontrollable by the subject of the possession. Such conditions are particularly characteristic of the Christian diagnosis of possession. Unlike the curse, which can call a disease upon a person (→ Prayer/Curse), in possession an external being has itself seized the person, and is beyond his or her control. In the Western cultural milieu, the concept of exorcism is essentially marked by the Catholic theory and practice of exorcism. This theory is most vigorously disputed, meanwhile, even within the Christian churches. Although various forms of exorcism are practiced in many Evangelical churches, as well as in free charismatic communities, only the Catholic Church has developed an articulated theory and practice of exorcism. In the public consciousness, exorcism is usually identified with the Catholic reading of the same, and conditioned by films like William Friedkin's "The Exorcist" (USA, 1973), or spectacular cases like that of the exorcism, which turned lethal, of Anneliese Michel in 1976, arousing considerable attention (→ Psychopathology). Accordingly, the present article takes the Catholic teachings on possession and exorcism for its focus.

2. In the Hebrew Bible, exorcism is mentioned only in the late books (Tob 6:16-18), and then usually as part of an effort to attenuate plagues. Only after the encounter with Iranian religions and corresponding demonical doctrines does exorcism spread more strongly in Judaism as well.

'Minor' and 'Major' Exorcism

The healing accounts of the New Testament, in which Jesus is presented as a charismatic healer, serve as an exemplar for the teachings of Catholic systematic theology, in which a distinction is made between the 'minor' and the 'major' exorcism. Both consist of prayers and ritual actions, by means of which a combat is understood to be waged against diabolical trouble and affliction. The possibility of demonic possession (obsessio) is basically maintained, despite all relativization. The minor exorcism, performed not only by persons in sacred orders, but frequently by laity, was prohibited by the Catholic Congregation of the Faith in 1985. The formulae and procedure of the major exorcism, as prescribed in 1614, and contained in the Rituale Romanum, have remained all but unaltered down to the present. The last revision took place in 1954, and a new version appeared in 1999. Besides prayers, ritual actions, and adjurations, direct → communication with → devils and → demons is an essential part of the major exorcism. In order to execute it, a specially trained priest must receive the authorization of the competent bishop. Furthermore, especially in reaction to the Michel case, adequate care must be taken that no medical treatment be interrupted for the exorcism. On the contrary, collaboration with the physicians involved in the case is prescribed. As symptoms whose presence can support a diagnosis of possession, the following, among others, are indicated in the Rituale Romanum.

- Speaking, at some length, or understanding, foreign languages (glossolalia)
- Announcing the present or future reality of hidden or distant things (propheticism, divination)
- Sudden changes in behavior, such as rage or obscene name-calling, often accompanied by convulsions or feats of strength
- A strong revulsion for Christian symbols and sacred objects

Psychiatric Interpretations

3. In the secular scientific view of reality, such phenomena are diagnosed and treated in the framework of psychiatry as forms of psychosis, schizophrenia, or epilepsy. The causes are sought fundamentally in psychodynamic processes, not in external beings. Any collaboration with exorcists is usually renounced, as methods of exorcism are regarded as counterproductive. As for scientific → parapsychology, it emphasizes that even such paranormal phenomena as are listed above do not necessarily indicate a demonic possession, but are ultimately to be explained within a broadened scientific view of reality.

4. Since the Michel case, no exorcism has been authorized in Germany. In other countries, however, such as France or Italy, the number of exorcisms is growing. Although the Catholic Church is concerned to avoid open confrontation with the scientific view on this point (against this background, a fundamental reform of the Rituale Romanum is seen to be under way), it nonetheless renounces a secular view of reality where exorcism is concerned: the thesis of the theoretical possibility of a demonic possession is not called in question. From this point forward, cooperation with physicians and psychiatrists could be difficult, since the boundaries of accepted religious experience in a secular society would be overstepped in the process. After all, a possession justifying an exorcism can by definition be diagnosed only on the basis of personality disturbances with most extreme symptoms—and in secular societies, religion is denied appropriate competency precisely in such cases. It must therefore be taken into account that, as for Catholic practice, exorcism under official auspices continues to be performed, if at all, only in modified form, at least in the Western world. This situation does not, however, rule out its possible future rebirth in fundamentalist or charismatic circles.

Literature

Chajes, J. H., Between Worlds: Dybbuks, Exorcists, and Early Modern Judaism, Philadelphia 2003; Ferber, Sarah, Demonic Possession and Exorcism in Early Modern France, London 2004; Levi, Giovanni, Inheriting Power: The Story of an Exorcist, Chicago 1988; Sorensen, Eric, Possession and Exorcism in the New Testament, Tübingen 2002; Twelftree, Graham H., Christ Triumphant: Exorcism Then and Now, London 1985.

→ Demon/Demonology, Devil, Illness/Health, Magic, Possession, Prayer/Curse, Psychopathology, Ritual

Joachim Schmidt

Experience

'Religious Experience' is a term widely used and seldom explained, especially in western scholarship on religion. This is not surprising as both → 'religion' and 'experience' are notoriously difficult to define with the attempt to do so giving rise to a miniature industry in academic scholarship.[1] After briefly discussing some of the philosophical issues that arise in relation to 'experience,' I will turn to a more in-depth look at the notion of 'religious experience.'

Problems of Definition

Dictionary definitions of experience tend to focus on experience in two senses. The first is that of familiarity, accumulated knowledge such as "he is an experienced musician." The second sense is that of some sort of direct encounter with the sensory world. Philosophically, what might appear as a sort of common sense fact of reality becomes a subject of ongoing debate. What is it about the sensory world that allows it to be experienced? Is this experience reliable? Can it be used as a foundation for knowledge? How accurate is our perception of such experience? Do we change it in the act of → perception; that is, how much of a difference is there between appearance and reality? What is it about our mind that allows us to have such experience? The answers to these questions range from the extremes of radical empiricists who maintain that one can base a solid epistemology on the experience of concrete material reality, to thinkers in the idealist rationalist tradition who argue that the sensory world is completely unreliable as a source of truth about the nature of reality.

Turning to religion, the issues become even more complex. Before we can identify something as a religious experience, we must have some idea of what it is to be religious. However, what might have seemed possible to answer for a nineteenth-century western scholar of religion has become almost impossible for one living in the twenty-first as scholars increasingly realize the ethnocentric nature of most definitions. Nevertheless there is an ongoing discussion of religious experience in western scholarship of religion, and it is to this I will turn for the remainder of this discussion.

William James

Despite his critics, the influence of William James on the definition of religious experience cannot be ignored. James defines religion as "the feelings, acts and experiences of individual men in their solitude so far as they stand in relation to whatever they consider to be divine" (James 1982, 31). He makes a clear distinction between religion in its ecclesiastical, social forms including → ritual, → texts, doctrines etc. and religion as it is felt or understood, in short, 'experienced' on the part of the individual. What is important for James in this experience is found in the words "what he perceives to be divine." The emphasis here is on individual perception and meaning. James is less interested in the veridical nature of whatever it is the person is experiencing then with the impact of the experience on the person to whom it occurs.

Schleiermacher and Kant

James was influenced by the work of Friedrich Schleiermacher, who argued that "Religion's essence is neither thinking nor acting, but intuition and feeling" (Schleiermacher 1988, 22). Schleiermacher makes no distinction between intuition and → feeling; religious feeling constitutes a sense of immediate consciousness of dependence on an infinite existing both without and within the individual. Schleiermacher's conception of religion can be seen as a response to the rationalist critique of religion, a critique that in many ways undercut the foundations of traditional theistic belief in the West. Kant's rejection of the possibility of knowledge about God had been particularly problematic. Kant separated the world into two classes: noumena and phenomena. 'Noumena' refers to things as they are in themselves before they have been subjected to the inherent categories of the perceiving subject. These categories consisted of space, time, substance and causality. 'Phenomena' are the way things appear after they have been filtered or processed through these innate categories. God, according to Kant, transcends these human categories and thus can never be conceived as a phenomenon, hence allowing us no knowledge, no comprehension of the divine. Schleiermacher's reconceptualization of religion, not as a set of beliefs that must be defended but as a particular feeling or 'experience' that occurred before one divided the world into subject/object dichotomy circumvented the rationalist challenges to religion from Kant and others.

In this view, people do not become religious through the acquisition of knowledge about conduct or principles but first and foremost from this feeling. Dogmas and doctrines are devised after and arise from the experience. They are thus necessarily imprecise and imperfect and should not be taken in a literal sense nor treated as if they were veridical claims. According to Schleiermacher, this 'feeling' or intuition occurs before the division of perception into subject and object. This precedence makes it immediate. However, it also makes it extremely difficult, if not impossible to put into words. As it can only be experienced and only imperfectly defined, it is impossible to 'prove,' leading many people to reject its existence or at least deny its validity as a basis for religion.

James on 'Mysticism'

Schleiermacher's influence on James is most apparent in James's definition of → mysticism, a definition that has shaped much of the discussion of religious, especially mystical experience throughout the twentieth and into the twenty-first century. James outlines four characteristics of the mystical experience: Ineffability, noetic quality, transiency, and passivity. Of these, the notion of 'ineffability' is most germane to this discussion. James describes ineffability as that which cannot be adequately expressed in words. He argues that this quality "must be directly experienced; it cannot be imparted or transferred to others." He goes on to say, that "mystical states are more like states of feeling than like states of intellect," clearly reflecting his debt to Schleiermacher (James 1982, 380).

Defining religion in this individual, subjective sense, especially with this notion of ineffability came to play a vital role in nineteenth and twentieth century discussions of religious, especially mystical, experience. In many ways it laid the framework for the development of the field of comparative religion, opening the way for claims that differences in religions arise from people attempting to describe this feeling or intuition drawing on diverse → languages and cultural symbols. This view quickly led to the argument that all religions were at heart essentially the same, with apparent differences simply arising from the culture and language within which the person having the experience lived. Differences were superficial.

"Perennial Philosophy"

This view, which came to be known as the 'perennial philosophy' or the universalist position has gone through a number of variations. Aldous Huxley offered an early version in his book of the same name (Huxley 1945). R. C. Zaehner argued for three types of religious experience: pantheistic, monistic, and theistic, of which the latter, for him, was clearly superior (Zaehner 1959). Walter Stace further developed the idea in his work Mysticism and Philosophy (1961). In recent years Robert Foreman has claimed that this core mystical experience is one of 'pure consciousness' with its highest expression found in non-dualist states (Foreman 1990).

The Constructivist Position

In 1972 Steven Katz published the essay "Language, Epistemology and Mysticism" that has come to represent what is known as the 'constructivist' position (Katz 1978). Katz argues that there is no such thing as pure consciousness and that religious experience is shaped by the cultural context in which the person having the experience is found. Thus a Christian will have a Christian mystical experience, a Buddhist, a Buddhist experience, and so on. Attempts to compare experiences across cultures are like trying to compare 'apples and oranges.'

The debate between the 'universalists' or 'perennialists' and 'constructivists' has dominated the literature on religious experience since the publication of Katz's essay. However, as Grace Jantzen points out, these debates are far removed from the ways in which individual mystics and others known for their 'religious experience' describe or understand their experience. Drawing on the work of Foucault, Jantzen argues that the way religious experience is understood has changed throughout the centuries reflecting a complex intertwining of issues of power, gender, and authority. That is, she says, "answers to questions of what mysticism is and of who counts as a mystic, thought they will not be constant, will always reveal interconnected struggles of power and gender" (Jantzen 1995, 2).

Another challenge to the debate on 'religious experience' arises from scholars working in the area of postcolonial theory (→ Colonialism). William Halbfass, in his essay "The Concept of Experience in the Encounter between India and the West" (in Halbfass 1988), notes the fascination that experience in Indian religions holds for Western scholars. There is no doubt that the concept of experience plays a crucial role in these traditions. Buddhism centers on the enlightenment experience of the Buddha, teaching its followers that they too must cultivate their own experience and not attempt to achieve enlightenment through the use of intermediaries such as scripture, doctrines or even the Buddha himself (→ Light/Enlightenment). In Hinduism, Vedantin schools stress the importance of experience arguing that texts and teachers can take a student only so far, ultimately one must achieve one's own experience of enlightenment. Devotional Hindu sects also stress the experience of → love for the divine. Experience is thus essential, however it is important to note the understanding of experience among these traditions is very diverse. Unfortunately, Western scholars of religion have often ignored this diversity in their appropriation of these traditions for their own purposes, especially when seeking to defend some notion of universal, often non-dual religious experience.

Neurobiological Aspects

In recent years there has been an increasing interest in the neurobiological aspects of religious experience, giving rise to a new research area—'neurotheology.' Work in this area has focused on the mapping of subject's brain activity using a number of neural imaging devices while the subjects were undergoing some sort of 'religious experience.'[2] The work by Andrew Newburg and Eugene D'Aquili (Newberg/D'Aquili 1999) was prominent in the field, until D'Aquili's death in 1998. Central to their research is a definition of religious experience as some sort of sense of unity, a feature they claim to be common to descriptions of religious experience across differing cultures. Other researchers in this field include the neuroscientist V. S. Ramachandran who focuses on temporal lobe activity as a possible source of many 'religious experiences' (Ramachandran/Blakeslee 1998). Michael Persinger argues that many religious experiences might be the result of 'microseizures'—some sort of disruption of brain activity, possibly through electromagnetic fluctuations arising from a variety of external sources (Persinger 1987).

Experience in the New Age Movement

Finally, in recent years on a more popular level, experience is a central characteristic of what has become called the → 'New Age movement.' Characterized by a focus on self and a rejection of external authority, much emphasis has been placed on individual 'spiritual' experience as the authoritative guide for a person's emotional, psychological, and spiritual wellbeing. Analysis of many of these movements shows a high degree of continuity between late nineteenth and early twentieth century movements that embraced such concepts as evolutionary spiritual development and some form of the perennial philosophy. The popularity of such movements in many ways could be credited for a definition of religious experience that is amenable to Western individualism, yet can be stretched to embrace some form of 'global' spirituality, albeit spirituality still fundamentally rooted in western philosophical and religious history.

1. See, for example, HALBFASS 1988, 378-403; SHARF 1998.
2. One experiment centered on brain imagining studies of three nuns rapt in contemplative prayer and eight Buddhists engaged in a form of Tibetan meditation.

Literature

FOREMAN, Robert, The Problem of Pure Consciousness: Mysticism and Philosophy, New York 1990; HALBFASS, William, India and Europe: An Essay in Understanding, Albany 1988; HUXLEY, Aldous, The Perennial Philosophy, New York 1945; JAMES, William, The Varieties of Religious Experience, Harmondsworth 1982 ([1]1902); JANTZEN, Grace, Power, Gender and Christian Mysticism, Cambridge 1995; KATZ, Steven, "Language, Epistemology and Mysticism," in: KATZ, Steven (ed.), Mysticism and Philosophical Analysis, Oxford 1978, 22-74; NEWBERG, Andrew/D'AQUILI, Eugene, The Mystical Mind, Minneapolis 1999; PERSINGER, Michael, Neuropsychological Basis of God Beliefs, New York 1987; RAMACHANDRAN, V. S./BLAKESLEE, Sandra, Phantoms in the Brain, New York 1998; SCHLEIERMACHER, Friedrich, On Religion: Speeches to its Cultured Despisers, Cambridge 1988 ([1]1799); SHARF, Robert H., "Experience," in: TAYLOR, Mark C. (ed.), Critical Terms for Religious Studies, Chicago 1998, 94-116; STACE, Walter, Mysticism and Philosophy, London 1961; ZAEHNER, R. C., Mysticism Sacred and Profane: An Inquiry into some Varieties of Praeter-natural Experience, Oxford 1959.

→ Esotericism, Holy, Mysticism, Perception, Psychoanalysis, Psychopathology, Vision/Auditory Experience

Debra Jensen

Fairytale

Genre and History

1. Literary scholars designate narratives of popular origin containing elements of the wondrous and supernatural as 'folktales' or 'fairytales.' Anthropologists often use the same term to designate all oral narrative (→ Oral Tradition). While fairytales of popular origin are always anonymous, literary fairytales, which have appeared in Europe since the Rococo, have authors.

Originally, fairytales and folktales were stories recounted freely to an adult audience by a storyteller, usually based on well-known motifs and materials, geared to respective narrative situations and audiences, and further shaped by the stimulation and encouragement of the audience itself. The storyteller's mimicry, gesticulation, voice modulation, and histrionic talents contributed as much to the effect as did the matter of the recital. In central European spinning rooms, women recounted fairytales. As we have come to know in rather recent times, the same occurred in the female communities of oriental harems.

Respect for fairytales, as stories for the uneducated, dimmed, in Europe as in the Near East, as literacy increased knowledge of and appeal to reality. The first great European collections of fairytales and other diverting tales—most of them of popular origin, but consciously framed even with didactic tendencies—those of G. Straparola (1550–1553) and G. Basile (1634–1636), come from the Italian Baroque. The purpose of these is to entertain and instruct, and they manifest a variety of influences on their layout and framework, especially those of A Thousand and One Nights.

A Thousand and One Nights

With the French Enlightenment, interest in the fantastic and exotic grew, and along with it, interest in fairytales. As French orientalist Antoine Galland published his adaptation of the A Thousand and One Nights (1704–1717), just so was the interest of courtly, aristocratic readers aroused by the fairytales of, for example, Charles Perrault (1697) and Madame d'Aulnoy (1698). In the East, recitals from A Thousand and One Nights, or the Arabian Nights, were stories told by male storytellers for male audiences, at first at courts, and later, as one may conclude from their heroic figures as images of identification, for urban merchants, artisans, and laborers. Narrative material from many countries of the Near East, as well as from antiquity, reaching Baghdad beginning in the late eighth century, was mixed together and repeatedly reshaped; then it wandered to other lands, there to be adapted, altered, and expanded. Written and oral traditions oscillated. But as the narrators' stories, transmitted orally, were fixed in writing and maintained in the vernacular, and only in rough draft, and were not didactic and informative, but merely entertaining, they were looked down on by the Arab educational elite. But their swift victory lap through Europe in their Galland version (recension), which also contains pseudo-Arabian tales like "Aladdin's Lamp" and "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," worked its way back to the East beginning with the young Arab theater in Beirut and Damascus around 1860.

The Grimms' Tales

The best known folktales are found in the collection created by brothers Jacob and Wilhelm Grimm, Kinder- und Hausmärchen (Ger., "Children's and Home Folktales"; 1812–1815). These, with their "Annotations" (1822), constituted the basis of fairy- and folktale research in Germany. The mentality of the brothers Grimm was rooted in German → Romanticism and its values. Indeed, they did take these narratives, transmitted to them orally by members of the Hessian middle class, and worked them into children's stories framed in a literary style. A precursor of the Grimms' collection was the five-volume Volksmährchen der Deutschen (Ger., "Folktales of the Germans"; 1782–1786), a collection of tales freely formed, in the spirit of the late German Enlightenment, into idyllic and satirical adult reading by secondary school instructor J. K. A. Musäus.

Elements of the Wondrous in the Fairytale

2. The reason why many indigenous peoples' tales (among those of others) endow trees and rocks with life, is that their roots are the animistic beliefs presented in tree divinities and rock idols. The fariytale abounds in elements of the wondrous. 'Animal helpers' and supernatural helpful or harmful beings such as elves, fairies, water spirits, watermen, witches, sorcerers, giants, dwarfs, jinn in Arabic and Persian tales, magicians, useful 'sprites on call' like 'Table, be Set' or 'Cudgel-out-of-a-Bag,' a magic lamp, a wishing ring, a flying carpet or horse, a plant or apple that heals all ills—all of these were originally 'really believed in,' and symbolize humanity's age-old dreams, wishes, or fears.

In the sacred writings of Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, angels appear as real, as does the devil. According to the Qur'an, Islam was revealed to jinn (spirits formed of smokeless flame), as well as to human beings and angels. The Hebrew Bible and the New Testament contain motifs of the wondrous that could be classified amongst Aarne and Thompson's 'Types of the Folktale.' The category can mingle with myth.

The Fairytale in Various Lands

3. The thesis of Indologist Theodor Benfey that all fairytales come from India, is today regarded as passé. But there are comprehensive collections of Indian origin, partially influenced by Buddhism, such as the Jataka and the Pantshatantra, whose motifs appear in fairytales of other lands, with and without variation, as well as in the Arabian Nights. It must be presupposed that the materials of fairytale and folktale arise everywhere, roam abroad, and develop different 'ecotypes.' "Sleeping Beauty" and "Cinderella," for example, are found in Basile's Pentameron as in Perrault and the brothers Grimm, however variously accented.

Form of the Fairytale

4. European fairytales are usually short, concentrated on one narrative thread, and so shaped as to take up a single evening. Lengthy descriptions, as interrupting the tension, are rare. Place and time of the action are undetermined. Figures are nameless and stylized, except those with action-related names such as "Snow White" and "Thumbling." The unreal comes to life. In the battle waged by the 'good and beautiful' against the 'evil and ugly,' it is the former, just as in a light fiction, that always wins.

The actual fairytales or fairytale novels from A Thousand and One Nights cannot be ranged among Jolles's "simple forms." They were obviously each recounted for several evenings. Several story threads run in parallel and side-by-side. There is not just one fairytale hero, with but one male or female assistant and antagonist respectively, but the hero encounters many figures. The protagonists have real names, each according to the respective genre of the tale, common people's names in merry tales, or, otherwise, names from the later courtly milieu. Real places, even streets and squares in Cairo or Baghdad, are named, and intertwined with motifs of wondrousness. Names of distant countries and places are interchangeable story by story, or suggested by rhyme scheme, and betray the geographical ignorance of the storyteller. The courtly ambience of rooms, gardens, raiment, food, drink, even human beauty and ugliness are sketched in detail, often in rhymed prose or poetry. As Safawid Shah Abbas in Persian folktales, Abbasid caliph Harun al-Rashid becomes the mighty ruler in crystalline form, and his wife Zubaida the prototype of the jealous, intriguing courtly spouse. The claim to a realistic style, then, is akin to that of Arabian 'high literature,' and this to a greater extent than in European fairytales. Belonging to this form is the didactic style as a prerequisite for reception, and rhyming style, which is actually only rarely realized. The manner in which death is dealt with is more realistic as well. Over against the European 'and lived happily ever after,' or 'if they have not died they are living till today,' stands the joy of life, at length attained, that lasts until the advent of the 'destroyer of all joys.' The motif of 'the Goodman Death,' or of the 'return from the realm of the dead' in European folktale, and the rescue of the protagonist in ugly disguise by the love of a woman, as in "Snow White and Rose Red" or "The Frog King" is likewise missing. Instead, the realistic motif of the beautiful, clever, and sagacious young slave woman who becomes the rescuer of her handsome but stupid master in difficult situations, is frequent. The master, to be sure, receives the reward. Islamic optimism concerning destiny lies at the basis of the ascription to God of the 'fairytale coincidence,' always advantageous to the hero. Belief in fate engenders tolerance, for human beings are innocent in what they do. The triple series of the Indo-European fairytale (three brothers, sisters, rings, wishes) often corresponds to an Islamic quaternity. In tales from the Arabian Nights, sorceresses and witches are usually young, beautiful, and seductive, and thereby all the more dangerous.

Fairytales usually correspond to the universal standard of social stability, although in the play of wishful thinking they may overcome class barriers ("The Goose Girl," "The Princess and the Swineherd," or the Arabian "Maaruf the Cobbler"). Pranks and farcical tales, on the other hand, oftentimes express concealed criticism of society, or even of power.

Literary Fairytales

5. Beginning in Romanticism, 'literary fairytales' (Kunstmärchen in German) were composed with various goals in view. Styles here included a poetics of the naïve (C. Brentano, L. Tieck), the quest for meaning (Goethe, Oscar Wilde), the visionary, an emphasis on the absurd/fantastic (E. T. A. Hoffmann, E. A. Poe), parody (I. Fetscher), and surrealistic estrangement (F. Kafka), as well as social and/or political criticism (Saltikov-Shchedrin). Beginning in the eighteenth century, in France, England, and Germany, the Arabian Nights summoned forth an abundance of Rococo-style erotic and ironically satirical works, usually for aristocratic readers (Montesquieu, Diderot, A. Hamilton, Cazotte, Crébillion the younger, W. Beckford, J. Potocki, C. M. Wieland, Edgar Allan Poe). In the modern literatures of the Islamic Middle East, a role is played by varied motifs and forms borrowed from A Thousand and One Nights, usually modified to metaphorical criticism of contemporary social and political conditions (e.g., N. Machfus, S. Wannus, Salman Rushdie).

Literary fairytale novels, such as those of J. R. R. Tolkien and Michael Ende, overstep the boundary between composed fairytale and the literature of → fantasy, and became bestsellers in print and film.

Quasi-Fairytale Principles in Various Literary Genres

6. Light fiction builds on the basic principle, specific to the fairytale, of ultimate (illusionary) wish fulfillment after victory over obstacles, but in simple, colloquial form, with figures in cliché, and in plain black and white depiction. In common with fairytales throughout the world, light fiction has a fundamental perspective that is socially conservative. The depiction of woman is dominated by the Cinderella motif. The Arabic joy-after-suffering genre (al-farag ba'da s-sidda), on the other hand, belonged to the 'high literature' of the ninth to the eleventh centuries, and had the function of literary consolation in times of need and feudal despotism. In these anecdotes and stories tightly recounted from memory, the happy endings are grounded in the factors of the translucent reality of God's will, along with human cunning and ingenuity, a skillful, aesthetically attractive choice of words, and unexpected succor from fellow human beings. That modern adventure novels and films are structured on principles of the fairytale has been established by Umberto Eco's treatment of the James Bond figure (Buono/Eco 1966). Utopian literature, from antiquity to the Enlightenment and Romanticism to today, crosses the bounds of reality, while using it as its starting point. It can sketch technological fantasies, as well as social and political ideas, the latter usually didactically, and/or in a satirically or futuristically estranged manner (Daniel Defoe, Victor Hugo, George Orwell, Arno Schmidt, S. Lemke).

The Fairytale Today

7. Animated → films (Walt Disney), as well as the many-faceted application of familiar fairytale motifs and figures in advertising, political cartoons, cartoons in men's magazines, 'magical' card games, and comics, prove the enduring popularity of fairytale materials and figures, even in ambivalent and satirical alteration.

Fairytale research today is taking various directions: a systematic understanding of types and motifs that span national frontiers (A. Aarne, S. Thompson), a structuralist approach (founded by V. Propp), a phenomenological approach in terms of the literary sciences (M. Luethi, L. Röhrig, H. Rölleke, H.-J. Uther), a sociological approach (A. Nitzschke), a psychological one appealing to Freud, Fromm, or Jung (H. v. d. Beit), a psychotherapeutical one (Bruno Bettelheim, E. Drewermann, V. Kast).

Literature

Ashliman, D. L., A Guide to Folktales in the English Language, New York 1987; Idem, Folk and Fairy Tales: A Handbook, Westport 2004; Bausinger, Hermann, Formen der "Volkspoesie," Berlin [2]1980; Bottigheimer, Ruth B. (ed.), Fairy Tales and Society: Illusion, Allusion and Paradigm, Philadelphia 1986; Buono, Oreste del/Eco, Umberto (eds.), Der Fall James Bond: 007, ein Phänomen unserer Zeit, Munich 1966; Davidson, Hilda Ellis/Chaudhri, Anna (eds.), A Companion to the Fairy Tale, Woodbridge 2003; Harries, Elizabeth Wanning, Twice Upon a Time: Women Writers and the History of the Fairy Tale, Princeton 2001; Jolles, André, Einfache Formen, Tübingen [6]1982; Kast, Verena, Folktales as Therapy, New York 1995; Lüthi, Max, The European Folktale: Form and Nature, Philadelphia 1982; Idem, The Fairy Tale as Art Form and Portrait of Man, Bloomington 1984; Ranke, Kurt (ed.), Enzyklopädie des Märchens, vol. 1: Göttingen 1977; vol. 5ff. (1987ff.) ed. by Rolf-Wilhelm Brednich; Irwin, Robert, The Arabian Nights: A Companion, Harmondsworth 1995; Propp, Vladimir, Theory and History of Folklore, Manchester 1984; Zipes, Jack David, Fairy Tales and the Art of Subversion: The Classical Genre for Children and the Process of Civilization, London 1983; Idem, The Great Fairy Tale Tradition: From Straparola and Basile to the Brothers Grimm: Texts, Criticism, New York 2001; Idem (ed.), Spells of Enchantment: The Wondrous Fairy Tales of Western Culture, New York 1991; Idem (ed.), The Oxford Companion to Fairy Tales, Oxford 2000.

→ Fantasy (Genre), Literature, Myth/Mythology, Oral Tradition, Romanticism

Wiebke Walther

Family Cult (Greek and Roman)

A family cult stands in a special relationship with a unit of kinship (Lat., gens). In practicing the cult, the kinship group presents itself as a unit, both to those within and those without. The concept comes from early Roman religion, where it stood for two kinds of cult: (1) a family can be responsible for the maintenance of a particular cult of general interest (sacra publica; Lat., 'popular rite'). Thus, in Rome, the cult of the Sol (sun) was in the hands of the gens Aurelia. When this gens died out, the state took responsibility for the cult. Later, almost all such family cults came into the hands of collegia or sodalites—associations responsible for the cult, without any longer having to have a special connection with a gens. (2) In addition, under 'family cult' fall cults belonging to a specific gens and not honored beyond it. Frequently, such cults were a matter of lesser gods, whose names were connected with that of the gens. Thus, Caeculus belonged to the gens Caecilia. This phenomenon is referred to as 'eponymity.'

Under the influence of Greek conceptions, these gods were later regarded as divine ancestors of the respective clans in question—as the fictitious mother or father of all of the families belonging to that clan. In Greece, as well, intimate relationships prevailed between particular families (genera) and places of worship. The genos of the Eumolpides, for instance, was accountable for a part of the Eleusinian mysteries. In contrast with the Roman family connections, the Eleusinian relationship was lasting. The administration of Eleusis did fetch honor, but no special wealth or political power. Greek families also had eponymous clan ancestors, often with the status of a heros (Gk., 'hero'). For example, the genos Kerykes traced its lineage back to the hero Keryx.

→ Antiquity, Cult, Family/Kinship/Genealogy

Leo Tepper

Family / Kinship / Genealogy

Christian Model of the Family

1. a) The traditional model of the family is in the process of dissolution. The churches, and religious traditions, were once transmitted through the celebration of the feasts of the course of life; both are now crumbling away. The family model of European history of religion, however, is not 'normal,' but formed by the Christian religion. In late antiquity, as Christianity became the prevailing religion, basic changes occurred as to who might found a family with whom. On the one side, the Church forbade its officials to found families themselves (celibacy); on the other, it limited the concentration of possession and fortune to one family. Members of the same family were prohibited from marrying (exogamy), and the opportunity for a childless couple to will the family fortune to an adopted child, or to procreate a legatee by another woman, was excluded. In this fashion, the Church as an institution inherited and amassed enormous fortunes, but prevented the concentration of power, either within the Church through episcopal dynasties, or outside in families (see Goody 1983).

b) That family and ('blood') kinship are formed not 'naturally,' but culturally, was discovered by middle-class scientists of the nineteenth century, in confrontation with extra-European cultures. Since Johann Joachim Bachofen, a Basle jurist, believed that he had found, from ancient sources, a societal stage of the 'matriarchy' (1861), in which men were only used for procreation, and had no right to the children or to the community's possessions, missionaries and explorers began a search for such a society. Only with the description by American entrepreneur and anthropologist L. H. Morgan (1818–1881) of the matriarchal system of the Iroquois, however, did a matriarchal stage preceding the patriarchy seem established. The argumentation that seems so strange to us today was universal then: relations among 'primitives' were 'survivals' of prehistoric ages. And as it was thought that, of course, the patriarchy was more advanced, the patriarchy could only have developed from the older matriarchy (→ Matriarchy/Patriarchy). The Iroquois constituted one of the altogether rare peoples that could be designated, even in terms of concepts prevailing at that time, a matriarchy.

A charismatic family in Michigan makes its 'prayer before meals.' This form of pre-prandial prayer, become rare today, is a traditional ritual of the middle-class Christian family. Either in free formulations or established formulas ("Bless us, O Lord, and these, thy gifts, which we are about to receive from thy bounty. Through Christ our Lord"), thanks are rendered for the meal, and a blessing sought. The prayer can—as here—be pronounced by the father, the 'head of the family,' or it may be recited by everyone together. (Benita von Behr)

Together with E. B. Tylor's (1832–1917) Primitive Culture (1871), this was the start of anthropology. However, the conceptualization that one might equivalate primitive cultures with prehistoric societies was given up—at any rate, in Anglo-Saxon anthropology. Today no anthropologist any longer subscribes to it. Concepts such as the assumption that in old times human beings knew a primitive monogamy, or practiced sexual promiscuity, are speculation, and only reflect the notions of researchers of that time, rather than being scientific conclusions.

Forms

c) Although the attempt to discover the original forms of society by way of 'primitive' societies had met with failure, interest in systems of kinship remained. A multiplicity of classifications of kinship were discovered within many cultures, and the number of concepts used for the purpose of indicating all of the nuances grew to a long list. An additional difficulty is related to the fact that there is no consensus in anthropology as to the usage of the expressions involved. None of these developments render this already difficult matter any easier. The European system of kinship is two-sided (cognate, or bilateral): this means that we have two sets of relatives, paternal as well as maternal. Nor is any special emphasis placed on the one side or the other. This appears logical, since it does reflect biological conditions: we have the same amount of genetic material from both sides. But this principle obtained even where the view prevailed that the child was present in the male seed, and the mother had to nourish it only in her womb. Accordingly, although in the first approach, with mother and child, kinship is genealogical, by extension the principle holds: kinship is determined on cultural, and not biological premises. Apart from our cognate system, there are also linear systems: that is, one has relatives either only on the paternal side (patrilineal), or only on the maternal (matrilineal) side. If a society is organized in matrilineal terms, this expresses something about the lines of kinship, and not anything to the effect that this society is under the rule of women. For that matter, societies are seldom organized entirely in either patrilineal or matrilineal terms, but usually have modified systems. A subdivision of the investigation of

Cognate

Linear

Polygamy among American → Mormons: The family of Dennis Matthews, who is married to five women, does not seem an unhappy one, at least not in this shot for which the clan poses in the living room, unwonted as this form of life is for Western societies. Although the polygyny (from Gk.; marriage with 'many women') of this religious community originally had to endure numerous confrontations, and since 1890 has been considered dismantled, the tradition survives among Mormons yet today. Founder Joseph Smith, who at first declared himself for monogamy, began in 1836 to enter into polygamous relations himself, and in 1836—'by God's command'—proclaimed polygyny; the number of his own wives was between twenty-seven and forty-nine. The family is especially highly regarded in Mormonism. In the 1960s, to counteract the collapse of family structures, the 'family evening' was introduced: every Monday evening, the family gathers in the home for common prayer, reading, and singing, in accordance with a schema prescribed by the church. (Benita von Behr) kinship is the analysis of various designations of kinship within a culture. For example, Latin has two words for 'uncle': patruus for an uncle on the father's side, and avunculus for an uncle on the mother's side. The distinction is made because these uncles do not have the same roles: the avunculus is the friendly uncle, the patruus the stern one. The relationship between the avunculus and his nephews is different, then, from that between the patruus and his, not because the character of the uncles is different, but because their roles are culturally defined (in German, until early modern times there was a distinction between Vetter [i.e., the father's brother] and Oheim [i.e., the mother's brother]). In many cultures, as in the old Icelandic and the old English, it was even the practice to have sons reared in the house of the mother's brother. But with the disappearance of the functional difference between the two uncles in the eighteenth century, the word 'uncle' was borrowed from the French. On the other hand, a distinction was now made between 'nieces' and 'nephews,' both of whom were originally included under the designation for cousin, just as in Dutch today. The word for cousin changed its meaning, and 'cousin' was borrowed from the French. This makes it clear that concepts of kinship reflect the family order, and when this order changes, the concepts change as well.

Marriage

2. a) Relations of kinship are important for inheritance, and in the choice of spouses. For most Westerners today, matrimony is a union freely entered into by two individuals. In many cultures, however, it is a bond between two groups, and serves their interests. In other words, one or both of the partners have no right to interfere anywhere in the process. It even happens that partners are chosen for children at birth, as in certain Islamic countries, or a girl is pledged to a much older man shortly after her birth, as is still frequently the case in India today. The difference in their ages can easily be ten or more years. There are various ways of selecting a marriage partner. Leaving the West out of consideration, there are two possibilities: a partner is either selected from within one's own group (endogamy), or must be chosen from outside (exogamy) that group. Endogamy has the advantage that ownership remains in the family, and exogamy the advantage that an alliance can be struck by means of the marriage. In the Arab world, endogamy is customary; a marriage between first cousins is not unusual. Australian aborigines, on the other hand, observe exogamy, and are renowned among anthropologists for the complicated rules among them: materially simple cultures not necessarily have simple social structures. Even a combination of endogamy and exogamy is possible, for example in India, where one must marry outside one's family, but within one's caste. And although such prescriptions are forbidden since the abolition of the caste system, they are still socially regulative, all the more in that prescriptions for marriage are laid down in the traditional law books, the religiously based dharmashastras. Transgression is still reckoned an offense against the dharma, the religious law. In India, these rules are explicitly laid down. A girl can be received into a higher caste, whereas this is impossible for a man.

Endogamy / Exogamy

Barter / Exchange

